On December 29, 1998, Detective Constable Dupuis observed Mr. Leblanc in his car with a young person who was approximately fourteen years old. Detective Constable Dupuis followed the vehicle until it went down a dead-end road. When the vehicle came back, the youth was no longer with Mr. Leblanc. Detective Constable Dupuis followed Mr. Leblanc but eventually lost him. He then attempted, unsuccessfully, to locate the boy.

Detective Constable Seguin located the boy, C-82, the next day. Detective Constables Seguin and Dupuis conducted an interview of C-82. Although initially afraid to disclose the abuse, C-82 eventually confirmed that Mr. Leblanc had sexually assaulted him and added that the abuse had occurred as recently as the week before the interview.

Decision to Delay Arrest

Detective Constable Dupuis informed Detective Sergeant Hall of C-82's allegations the next morning, on December 31, 1998. Detective Constable Dupuis advised Detective Sergeant Hall that in his opinion, there was no one else in danger over the holidays. C-82 had been taken out of danger because his parents had been informed of the abuse, and C-82 did not say that Mr. Leblanc was abusing anyone else. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he trusted Detective Constable Dupuis' judgment on this issue. Detective Constable Dupuis, on the other hand, testified that he was not involved in the decision on the timing of the arrest. The officers were aware at this point that Mr. Leblanc was a school bus driver.

Detective Sergeant Hall then contacted Detective Inspector Smith. They discussed the issue, and ultimately Detective Inspector Smith decided not to arrest Mr. Leblanc immediately. Instead, they would wait until January 5, 1999. This was the first day back to school after the holidays. The fact that it was New Year's Eve was a factor in the decision. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he agreed with Detective Inspector Smith's decision at that time.

The officers agreed that in retrospect, they should have arrested Leblanc on December 31, 1999. In my view, Detective Constables Dupuis or Seguin should have contacted Detective Sergeant Hall on December 30, immediately following the interview with C-82. This would have permitted Detective Sergeant Hall or Detective Inspector Smith to confirm the arrest for that evening or the next morning.

Detective Inspector Smith made the following comment at the hearing:

We discussed it and ultimately it was my decision, and probably the worst decision I had made in my whole career, to not arrest but to arrest him in five days time. And fortunately between that time and the time he was arrested, nothing happened but I had left myself wide open for something that could have been catastrophic.

... [I]t was a bad decision, poor judgment on my part.

Arrest of Jean Luc Leblanc

On January 4, 1999, Detective Sergeant Hall contacted Richard Abell of the Children's Aid Society (CAS). Detective Sergeant Hall informed Mr. Abell that Mr. Leblanc would be arrested the following day and gave him the names of the victims, C-21 and C-82, as well as other information about the families and the offences. Detective Sergeant Hall also contacted Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald, who told him that there was no problem with his office taking on the prosecution of Mr. Leblanc. This was despite the fact that Crown MacDonald remained, at that time, a person of interest in Project Truth's conspiracy investigation. Finally, Detective Sergeant Hall contacted Detective Sergeant Millar and CPS Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet and informed them of the upcoming arrest of Mr. Leblanc.

The same day, Detective Constable Genier contacted the Sureté du Québec and informed them of the allegations that involved events in the Gatineau area at Mr. Leblanc's mother's cottage.

Detective Constables Seguin and Genier arrested Mr. Leblanc at his home on the morning of January 5, 1999. Mr. Leblanc was charged with twelve counts relating to the alleged sexual abuse of C-21 and C-82. He was handcuffed and taken to the detachment. He was granted bail later that day under a number of conditions, including that he refrain from associating with persons under age sixteen unless accompanied by an adult or parent.

Contact With the Children's Aid Society

On January 7, 1999, Detective Constable Seguin was contacted by Brian MacIntosh of the CAS (see Chapter 9, on the institutional response of the CAS). The contact between CAS and the Ontario Provincial Police was made not as a result of any protocol, but only because Mr. MacIntosh had seen Mr. Leblanc's name in the newspaper. Mr. MacIntosh told Detective Constable Seguin that the CAS had visited Mr. Leblanc's residence in the summer of 1998 and found a young person, C-81, present at the time. The CAS learned that C-81 had been living at Mr. Leblanc's residence for several weeks but C-81 did not report any abuse.

Project Truth officers had further contact with the CAS in the course of investigating the allegations against Mr. Leblanc. Detective Constable Dupuis had several contacts with Pina DeBellis and Bill Carriere, who shared with him the information in their files relating to C-82. The CAS also assisted the OPP by putting Detective Constable Dupuis in touch with a young person who had run away from foster care to spend time with Mr. Leblanc. Detective Constable Seguin described Mr. Carriere as being helpful in his investigation.

It is noteworthy that CAS was not contacted by the Project Truth team when they first learned of allegations against Mr. Leblanc. Nor were they contacted by Detective Sergeant Millar when he learned of concerns in September 1998. This lack of coordination and cooperation is troublesome. Dr. Peter Jaffe, an expert on the institutional and community response to child sexual abuse, testified before me that cases of sexual assault with multiple victims and multiple accused are so complex that they can quickly overwhelm local resources. For this reason, it is crucial that all agencies—the police, the Crown, and child protection services—work collaboratively.

In its submissions to this Inquiry, the OPP emphasized the need for a standardized protocol that would provide for consistent roles for the CAS and the police in sexual abuse investigations, including historical sexual abuse investigations. I endorse the development of such a protocol.

As noted in the introduction to this chapter, until 2003 the Ontario Police College and the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies delivered joint training on investigating offences against children. Almost all observers, including police, child welfare organizations, and experts on child sexual abuse, view the end of this joint training as a significant loss. The interaction that occurs during joint training builds better day-to-day relationships and also allows organizations to understand and benefit from the perspectives and expertise offered by other organizations. Clearly a stronger relationship between OPP officers and CAS workers could have enabled the sharing of information in the Leblanc case. I reiterate here my recommendation that the reinstitution of such training should proceed immediately and include specific training on responding to historical allegations of abuse.

Further Investigation of Jean Luc Leblanc

C-81 was interviewed by the OPP on January 12, 1999, and denied that any abuse had taken place. The OPP continued to investigate the matter, and in an interview on April 12, 1999, C-81 disclosed that he had been abused by Mr. Leblanc.

Project Truth also discovered a number of new alleged victims of Mr. Leblanc. One of these victims was Cindy Burgess-Lebrun. She is the sister of Jody Burgess, whom Mr. Leblanc was convicted of molesting in 1986 (see Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Community Police Service). Ms Burgess-Lebrun testified that Detective Constables Seguin and Dupuis arrived at her home unexpectedly on February 10, 1999, to ask her about Mr. Leblanc. She did not know about Project Truth and was angry that they came to see her without advising her first. Describing the shock of being asked about Mr. Leblanc unexpectedly, Ms Burgess-Lebrun said it was like “a train hit me.”

Detective Constable Dupuis testified that he thought that he had contacted her in advance, but he was not 100 percent certain. There is a note in Detective Constable Dupuis' notebook that indicates that on February 9, 1999, he had made an appointment to meet Ms Burgess-Lebrun the following day. Detective Constable Dupuis stated that it was preferable to contact victims of abuse in advance, and Detective Constable Seguin testified that it was their practice to contact victims before an interview and tell them that they would like to speak to them about the alleged perpetrator. Detective Constable Seguin also testified that Ms Burgess-Lebrun did not seem surprised to see them.

Ms Burgess-Lebrun testified that the officers interviewed her the day after she met them at her house. However, both officers' notes indicate that they met her at her house on the day of the interview, and that they proceeded shortly afterward to the Prescott Detachment for a videotaped interview.

Further Charges Laid

On March 11, 1999, Project Truth officers arrested Mr. Leblanc again on sixteen counts of sexual offences in relation to six additional alleged victims. On March 12, Detective Inspector Hall contacted Mr. Abell of the CAS and informed him of these additional victims and charges.

The day of the arrest, Mr. Leblanc, through his lawyer, provided Project Truth with the names of eight individuals to talk to. In the following months, Project Truth attempted to contact these individuals. Four of them provided statements alleging sexual abuse by Mr. Leblanc. Further charges were laid on July 27, 1999, in relation to these four individuals. Three others did not wish to provide statements, and one could not be located.

In November 1999, Detective Constable Dupuis was contacted by Jason Tyo. Mr. Leblanc had been convicted of abusing him in 1986 (see Chapter 6). Mr. Tyo informed Detective Constable Dupuis that the abuse had continued after Mr. Leblanc's initial conviction. Mr. Tyo had never before disclosed this to the police, not even in the statement he gave to Project Truth officers in February 1999. He testified that he came forward because "[i]t was just tearing me apart. I had enough. I wanted to get it off my chest and report it." Additional charges were laid against Mr. Leblanc on April 7, 2000, for these allegations.

In total, fifty-one charges were laid against Mr. Leblanc in relation to thirteen victims.

After charges were laid, Project Truth officers continued to be involved in the case in various ways. In addition to victim liaison, the officers referred some victims to counselling, and assisted at least some of the victims with their victim impact statements and with applications for compensation from the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board. Other victims claimed that they had to do this themselves.

A number of the victims had positive things to say about their interactions with Project Truth officers. Mr. Tyo described them as considerate and understanding. Scott Burgess described the OPP's response as quick and thorough. However, Ms Burgess-Lebrun had a mixed evaluation of the OPP's response. She said that she had good contact with the OPP officers, but she also said that she felt that she was “just left in the blue” after the interview. The officers did call her to tell her that Mr. Leblanc had been charged and advised her of court dates, but she felt there had been very little contact.

Sentencing of Jean Luc Leblanc

On March 26 and June 7, 2001, Mr. Leblanc pleaded guilty to eighteen of the fifty-one charges. The remaining charges were withdrawn (see Chapter 11, “Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General”).

Beginning in fall 2001, the Crown applied to have Mr. Leblanc declared a dangerous offender, or alternatively, a long-term offender (see Chapter 11). The OPP provided some support to the Crown in gathering evidence for this application. Detective Constable Dupuis was tasked with obtaining Mr. Leblanc’s file at the CAS. On October 25, 2001, Detective Constable Dupuis wrote in his duty notebook:

Advised that CAS does have a file—Leblanc, Jean Luc, registered as a sex offender. They will not give police any info out of this file. They stated that they fear being sued by Leblanc if they gave info. Carriere also advised that all the info came from police source but will not advise what police force or when they got info other than files date 1988.

Neither Detective Constable Dupuis nor Mr. Carriere had an independent recollection of this conversation. Mr. Carriere testified that this incident is contrary to his practice. He stated that he may have told Detective Constable Dupuis that he could not provide anything out of the files without a subpoena, but said that he would have let Detective Constable Dupuis see the file and there is no reason he would refuse to tell him the police force referred to. Mr. Carriere apologized for this incident if it did occur.

On April 22, 2002, Mr. Leblanc was declared a long-term offender.

The Police Services Board Complaint

On December 11, 2003, just prior to his retirement, Detective Inspector Hall met with Detective Inspector Colleen McQuade, the officer who would be taking over for him in Project Truth. He told her about Detective Sergeant Millar’s failure to take action on the information he received about Mr. Leblanc in September 1998. Detective Inspector Hall advised her that this inaction had been reported to various managers in the Eastern Region and nothing had been done.

On December 30, 2003, Detective Inspector McQuade met with Detective Superintendent Ross Bingley, Director of the Criminal Investigation Branch, and advised him of Detective Inspector Hall's concerns.

In November 2004, the Premier of Ontario announced the Cornwall Public Inquiry. In its preparations for this Inquiry, the OPP identified Detective Sergeant Millar's failure to act as a possible "pressure point" and therefore initiated a Professional Standards Bureau investigation into the matter in the fall of 2005.

The Police Services Board report concluded:

It is fairly obvious that Randy Millar was overwhelmed. He made extraordinary efforts to try and obtain more personnel and resources in order that he could adequately meet the demands of the crime unit mandate. Almost on a weekly basis he met or phoned a supervisor in Eastern Region and pleaded for more resources without success.

Despite these findings, the Police Services Board decided that Detective Sergeant Millar was in neglect of his duties because he "failed to report a matter that was his duty to report." No lack of resources or heavy workload could "possibly preclude him from making a telephone call to his supervisors ... and also sharing the information with his subordinates." The Board suggested that had Detective Sergeant Millar reported the matter, his supervisors might have provided additional resources. In his testimony before me, Detective Inspector Millar testified that he disagreed with these findings. As set out above, I agree with the conclusion of the Police Services Board that he should have informed his supervisors about the Jean Luc Leblanc matter.

Despite these findings, Detective Inspector Millar was not disciplined. The complaint was filed well after the six-month limitation period under the Police Services Act.

In fall 2005, a parallel investigation was launched to look into Detective Inspector Hall's assertion that he had brought Detective Sergeant Millar's inaction to the attention of more senior officers and that they had failed to act. The investigation found that there was insufficient evidence to support the allegations made by Detective Inspector Hall. In particular, it noted that when Detective Inspector Hall was promoted to detective inspector in April 1999 and took over as case manager for Project Truth, he was in an ideal position to initiate an internal complaint against Detective Sergeant Millar. "For whatever reason," the Board noted, "he chose not to."

Based on my review of the evidence, I agree with the findings of the Police Services Board. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he did not question Detective

Sergeant Millar or comment on his inaction because they were of the same rank. However, Deputy Commissioner Chris Lewis testified that anyone in the OPP can make a Police Services Board complaint about another officer, and that Detective Inspector Hall would have been aware of this fact. Detective Inspector Hall was also aware from his work as a Police Services Act investigator that there is a six-month limitation period for filing a complaint. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he did not file a complaint, nor did he specifically ask anyone else to.

Detective Inspector Smith testified that he had addressed Detective Sergeant Millar's inaction directly with him. Detective Inspector Smith said that he "dressed him down a touch" and that Detective Sergeant Millar acknowledged that he should have done something. As far as Detective Inspector Smith was concerned, that was the end of the matter, and he did not report Detective Sergeant Millar's conduct or instruct Detective Inspector Hall to do so.

Investigation of Bernard Sauvé

As discussed in the section "Project Truth's Mandate," in the spring of 1998, Project Truth became aware that C-66 had reported allegations of abuse by Bernard Sauvé. C-66 told the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) about this abuse in March 1997, while talking to CPS Sergeant Brian Snyder about abuse allegedly perpetrated by Marcel Lalonde. C-66's complaint against Mr. Sauvé was not investigated by the CPS, but his complaint against Mr. Lalonde was. Detective Inspector Tim Smith and Detective Sergeant Pat Hall decided that Project Truth should take on the complaint against Mr. Sauvé.

Detective Constable Don Genier was assigned as investigating officer in the Bernard Sauvé matter. He initially contacted C-66 on May 12, 1998, to schedule an interview for the next day. A few hours later, he received a call from Constable René Desrosiers of the CPS, who said that C-66 was very fragile and that the call from the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) had made him nervous. Detective Sergeant Hall and CPS Inspector Richard Trew discussed the matter, and Detective Constable Genier decided to "hold off for now."

C-66 called Detective Constable Genier on May 21, 1998, to ask why the interview had not gone ahead and what the OPP wanted to speak with him about. He told Detective Constable Genier that Mr. Sauvé had abused him when he was a teenager working at Mr. Sauvé's convenience store. The officer's notes of this discussion state that C-66 "is very willing to disclose" the sexual assault allegations against Mr. Sauvé. Detective Constable Genier took a statement from C-66 on May 22, 1998, regarding these allegations of sexual abuse. During the interview, Detective Constable Genier asked C-66 about the concerns he had with their first scheduled interview. C-66 answered that when he first received the call from Detective Constable Genier he did not understand why the OPP wanted to meet with him and decided to call CPS Constable Desrosiers, whom he knew. Constable Desrosiers was not in, and C-66 spoke with Sergeant Snyder to obtain more information. Sergeant Snyder had told C-66 that he would speak to Detective Constable Genier about the allegations. Having not heard back from either of them, C-66 decided to call back Detective Constable Genier.

An officer from either the CPS or the OPP should have contacted C-66 and informed him of the reasons for Detective Constable Genier's initial call. Not only is this a basic courtesy, but keeping an alleged victim informed is an essential part of victim support.

Following further investigations, a Crown brief was prepared and submitted on November 2, 1998. On February 2, 1999, Crown Attorney Robert Pelletier recommended that charges be laid against Mr. Sauvé. He was arrested and charged on March 11, 1999, based on the allegations of C-66. According to Detective Inspector Hall, Mr. Sauvé was legally blind and in poor health at the time of his arrest.

The following day, Detective Sergeant Hall informed Richard Abell of the Children's Aid Society of the arrest and gave him C-66's name.

An additional complainant came forward after the charges were laid against Mr. Sauvé, possibly due to publicity surrounding the arrest. A further Crown brief was prepared and forwarded to Crown Attorney Curt Flanagan on May 11, 1999, for a Crown opinion on charges. Further to Mr. Flanagan's opinion, more charges were laid against Mr. Sauvé on July 28, 1999, for the alleged abuse of this new complainant.

The preliminary inquiry in the Bernard Sauvé matter took place April 4 to 6, 2000. Mr. Sauvé was committed to stand trial, and a trial date was set for June 2001. The trial date was adjourned for close to a year due to the accused's problems with his heart, diabetes, and blood pressure.

On June 17, 2002, the day the Bernard Sauvé matter was to proceed to trial, the Crown withdrew all charges, partly because of Mr. Sauvé's health, but primarily because the complainants were not able to proceed given the "extreme anxiety and stress related to Court" and the fact that "they may not be able to endure testifying in Court."

In total, more than five years had passed since C-66 first told the CPS about his allegations against Mr. Sauvé. The effect of a lengthy court process on alleged victims and how this can be mitigated by the intervention of victim services is further discussed in Chapter 11, "Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General." This is an example of alleged victims of historical sexual abuse having difficulties in coping with the court process. This said, the delay in this case is not attributable to the OPP. Faster court dates and better victim services would have helped to mitigate the stress caused to the alleged victims by delay.

Investigations of Complaints of Ron Leroux and C-15

As previously discussed, Ron Leroux made a number of allegations against various members of the clergy and prominent community members, who he claimed belonged to a group or “clan” of pedophiles. Mr. Leroux claimed to have been a victim of abuse by some of these clergy members and to have witnessed some of them abuse others. The claims of abuse were made by Mr. Leroux against Bishop Eugène LaRocque, Monsignor Donald McDougald, Father Bernard Cameron, Father Gary Ostler, and Father Kevin Maloney.

In addition, the Fantino Brief contained a statement from C-15, who alleged that he had been abused by Father Maloney.

Statements by Ron Leroux

In 1996 and 1997 Mr. Leroux provided a number of statements to Constable Perry Dunlop and his lawyer, Charles Bourgeois. He also provided an affidavit in support of Constable Dunlop’s lawsuit against the Cornwall Police Service (CPS), the Diocese, and others. An affidavit dated November 13, 1996, and a statement dated December 4, 1996, were included in the Fantino Brief.

Mr. Leroux was interviewed by OPP officers in Orillia on February 7, 1997, in the presence of Mr. Bourgeois. He was also interviewed by Detective Sergeant Pat Hall and Detective Constable Don Genier on November 25, 1997.

There are some significant discrepancies between these numerous statements, which may have affected the OPP’s assessment of Mr. Leroux’s credibility. Some of these differences will be discussed below. Further, Detective Inspector Hall testified that when he met with Mr. Leroux, he was able to assess his demeanour and did not find him to be credible.

I would also note that Mr. Leroux was questioned by the OPP in 1993 after Ken Seguin’s death, but he did not disclose his allegations of sexual abuse to them at that time.

The OPP prepared individual Crown briefs for allegations made against Bishop LaRocque, Monsignor McDougald, Father Cameron, Father Ostler, and Father Maloney. As Mr. Leroux claimed that some of these clergymen attended the same events where abuse allegedly occurred, I will describe the investigations by event, rather than by individual.

Abuse at St. Columban's Boys' School

Mr. Leroux alleged that he had been abused during confession while he was a student at St. Columban's Boys' School. The details surrounding this abuse varied from statement to statement. What is consistent is the claim that he was asked inappropriate questions of a sexual nature and then he was touched. At first he only named Father "McDougal" or "McDougald" as the alleged perpetrator, but in later statements he claimed to have experienced similar abuse at the hands of Father Cameron. Mr. Leroux was considerably confused about his age when the incidents occurred; the earliest age he gave was nine and the latest was fourteen, thus dating the alleged abuse between 1956 and 1961.

I note that victims of child sexual abuse often have difficulty establishing the exact dates of their abuse, and these discrepancies alone should not undermine a complaint's credibility. In this case, Detective Sergeant Hall and Detective Constable Genier attempted to help Mr. Leroux find markers, such as what grade he was in at the time of the alleged abuse, in order to establish the dates.

The Children's Aid Society (CAS) provided the OPP with two letters in August 1997 that contained the priests' response to these allegations.

A letter written in response to a demand for particulars in Constable Dunlop's lawsuit admitted that Monsignor McDougald heard confessions at the St. Columban's Boys' School during the relevant period, but denied the allegations. The letter noted there were no confessional stalls, so everyone in the room could see everyone else.

The second letter, written to CAS Executive Director Richard Abell, stated that Father Cameron was not ordained until 1958 and that he denied that he could have done the things alleged by Mr. Leroux in the late 1950s. This said, it is important to note that some of Mr. Leroux's statements put the date of the abuse after 1958.

Both Monsignor McDougald and Father Cameron were interviewed by the OPP, but neither were asked about hearing confessions at St. Columban's Boys' School.

While it may be that the officers did not put much weight on Mr. Leroux's statements given the important discrepancies within them, it would have been wise to do a complete interview of the suspects. They should have probed Monsignor McDougald about the confessions he heard at St. Columban's Boys' School and ascertained whether Father Cameron ever heard confession at the school during the relevant period.

Abuse at Cameron's Point

Mr. Leroux claimed that in 1959 or 1960, when he was twelve or thirteen years old, he attended a "religious retreat" at Cameron's Point. Mr. Leroux claimed that at this event he saw numerous boys being abused by priests and that some of the boys had sheets over their heads and candles in their rectums. He also claimed that at this event, he was abused by Bishop LaRocque, who was a priest at that time. In his statements to Constable Dunlop and Mr. Bourgeois, Mr. Leroux also said that he saw Father Cameron and a Father “McDougall” or “McDougald” molest altar boys at this retreat. Mr. Leroux later told Detective Sergeant Hall and Detective Constable Genier that either Father Cameron or Father McDougald also touched him at this retreat. Mr. Leroux said that Father Cameron threatened him not to tell anyone.

In his November 13, 1996, affidavit, Mr. Leroux claimed that this ritual at Cameron’s Point occurred on a weekly basis. This detail is not mentioned in later statements.

Mr. Leroux claimed that he had attended the retreat with another boy, who was also allegedly abused. Unfortunately, by the time of the OPP’s investigation, this individual was dead. Mr. Leroux also gave the names of a number of people who could confirm his story about Cameron’s Point. Although some attempts were made to interview some of these people, they were not all interviewed. In Project Truth’s Case Manager Assignment Register, there is a note beside some names stating that because the individual who accompanied Mr. Leroux to Cameron’s Point was deceased, the “information [was] no longer required.”

The OPP interviewed a number of former altar boys about the allegations made by Mr. Leroux. Detective Inspector Hall testified that no one came forward to say that this incident at Cameron’s Point had occurred.

Bishop LaRocque, Monsignor McDougald, and Father Cameron were all interviewed by the OPP and were asked whether they had been to Cameron’s Point.

Upon review of these statements, I found these interviews to be superficial. The officers appear to have been simply going through the motions. They asked what appeared to be a pre-set list of questions, and failed to follow up on inconsistencies or on information learned. For example, Monsignor McDougald said that Bishop LaRocque had hosted an event for altar boys at Bishop Brodeur’s summer home at Bishop’s Point. The interviewer did not ask any follow-up questions about this event.

The fact that the investigating officers questioned Mr. Leroux’s credibility may have been a factor in these poorly conducted interviews.

As previously noted, Mr. Leroux testified at the hearings that he did not actually witness a ritual at the Cameron’s Point retreat involving sheets and candles.

Abuse at Malcolm MacDonald’s Cottage

Mr. Leroux also claimed that Bishop LaRocque and Father Ostler would visit Malcolm MacDonald’s cottage and that Mr. MacDonald brought male prostitutes and young boys there. Mr. Leroux alleged that he saw Bishop LaRocque and a “youngster” go into a bedroom and close the door. Mr. Leroux suggested that the young person appeared to have been “conditioned” for abuse.

The OPP interviewed the owner of a cottage near Mr. MacDonald and the owner of the marina in Summerstown, near Mr. MacDonald’s cottage. They also interviewed Mr. MacDonald, who denied that the Bishop had ever been to his cottage and denied that he had attended social events with Father Ostler.

Both Bishop LaRocque and Father Ostler stated they had never been to Mr. MacDonald’s cottage.

I find that the officers took reasonable steps to ascertain whether abuse had occurred at the cottage.

Abuse at the St. Andrew’s Parish House

Mr. Leroux also claimed that Bishop LaRocque and Father Maloney had attended dinner parties at the St. Andrew’s Parish house. He said that after the meal, the group would disappear to separate rooms, including the bedrooms. The officers interviewed most, if not all, of the people who allegedly attended these parties.

Further, Mr. Leroux alleged that when he was painting the parish house, Father Ostler grabbed him in the genitals and asked, “[W]hat’s your game?” Mr. Leroux said that this incident occurred between 1987 and 1989. Mr. Leroux would thus have been over forty years old at the time. Detective Sergeant Hall and Detective Constable Genier asked Mr. Leroux about this incident in November 1997, and he said he didn’t consider it to be an assault, “it was, was like a joke really.” During his interview, Father Ostler was not asked about this incident, but he denied knowing Mr. Leroux.

Mr. Leroux also claimed that when he was painting the parish house in 1989 or 1990, he saw Father Maloney abuse an unidentified boy aged twelve to fourteen.

Credibility of Ron Leroux

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he did not find Mr. Leroux to be credible and that the other officers shared this opinion. This affected his subjective belief in the allegations, and Detective Inspector Hall testified that he was not able to form reasonable and probable grounds to lay charges.

Allegations by C-15

The Fantino Brief contained a second allegation of abuse against Father Maloney. C-15 alleged that between 1975 and 1979, he was abused by Father Maloney while he was a student at the “Alfred Boy’s School,” formally known as St.

Joseph's Training School for Boys. C-15 said that Father Maloney was not a regular priest there but filled in when other priests were sick.

In a response to a demand for particulars, most likely in relation to Constable Dunlop's lawsuit, Father Maloney denied that he had ever been to the Alfred training school or that he had any connection with that school. The OPP were given this document by Bill Carriere from the CAS.

Detective Constable Steve Seguin was the lead investigator on this complaint. He testified that during this investigation, he learned that the Archdiocese of Ottawa was responsible for assigning priests to the Alfred training school. He spoke with Monsignor Roger Morin of the Diocese of Ottawa as well as Father Gilles Tanguay from St. Victor Parish in Alfred to find out if Father Maloney had ever been assigned to St. Joseph's Training School. Detective Constable Seguin reviewed a variety of records, such as cheque stubs, bills, phone bills, and registers that recorded baptismal and marriage ceremonies. He testified that he did not find any cheques payable to Father Maloney, nor did he find any mention of him in the school's bills.

Detective Constable Seguin also interviewed individuals who had been at St. Joseph's Training School and none of them said that Father Maloney had been there.

Father Maloney was interviewed by Detective Constables Seguin and Genier, but he was not asked if he knew C-15 or if he had ever been to the St. Joseph's Training School. The officers should have put these questions to him during their interview.

After the Crown brief was submitted, Lorne McConnery wrote to Detective Inspector Hall and requested that he obtain the actual records from the school that would indicate whether Father Maloney had been there or not. Mr. McConnery advised that these records were in the possession of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board. Mr. McConnery testified that he was eventually provided with these records. It is unclear to me what documents Mr. McConnery was looking for in addition to the records that Detective Constable Seguin had obtained from the Ottawa Diocese earlier in the investigation.

Detective Constable Seguin testified that he found no corroborating evidence for C-15's complaint. Thus, he was not able to form reasonable and probable grounds to lay charges against Father Maloney.

Submission of the Crown Briefs

Crown briefs were submitted to Shelley Hallett on September 22, 1999, for the complaints against Bishop LaRocque, Monsignor McDougald, Father Cameron, and Father Ostler. The brief in the Father Maloney matter was submitted to regional Crown James Stewart on November 15, 1999, although Shelley Hallett may not have received the brief until January 2000.

A Crown opinion was not rendered until August 15, 2001. The reasons for this substantial delay and the OPP's response to it are discussed further in the section entitled "Conspiracy Investigation" and in Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Investigation of Brian Dufour

On September 17, 1997, C-97 provided Detective Constables Steve Seguin and Joe Dupuis with a statement alleging that he had been abused by Brian Dufour, as well as by a number of other individuals. As discussed earlier in the section "Project Truth's Mandate," the allegations against these other individuals were referred to the Cornwall Police Service (CPS), albeit several years later. C-97 told the OPP that Mr. Dufour was a childcare worker at the Cornwall Youth Residence (known today as Laurencrest) and that Mr. Dufour had sexually abused him on a number of occasions when he was a resident. He also claimed that Mr. Dufour had sexually abused him when he was out on a day pass from a prison drug treatment facility. C-97 told the officers that he believed that Mr. Dufour was in Brampton, running a private home for boys.

Detective Constable Seguin was the lead investigator on this matter. In the fall of 1997, he contacted Bryan Harris, a social worker with the Ontario Correctional Institute, who corroborated C-97's story of being abused while on a day pass from a correctional facility.

Detective Constable Seguin testified that he informed Bill Carriere from the local Children's Aid Society (CAS) about the allegations against Mr. Dufour. On November 20, 1997, Mr. Carriere told Detective Constable Seguin that he had in turn notified the Brampton CAS.

In December 1997, Detective Constable Seguin contacted the Ministry of Community and Social Services and learned that Mr. Dufour was not operating a group home in the Peel Region. He also reported Mr. Dufour to the Peel Regional Police. However, Detective Constable Seguin testified that he did not know Mr. Dufour's current location at that time. He could not recall the specific steps he took to locate Mr. Dufour but testified that when he became aware of a suspect it was his practice to search the Canadian Police Information Centre (CPIC) and Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Cooperative, and to obtain driver's licence information from the Ministry of Transportation.

C-97 contacted Detective Constable Seguin on August 19, 1998, to ask how the investigation was proceeding. There is no indication in Detective Constable Seguin's notes or his will-state on the Brian Dufour case of contact with C-97 between October 1997 and August 1998. When Detective Constable Seguin told him that they could not find Mr. Dufour, C-97 gave him the name of someone he believed was Mr. Dufour's brother-in-law and who C-97 thought might be able to assist in locating the suspect.

It appears that Detective Constable Seguin did not follow up on this lead until eleven months later on August 4, 1999. He then spoke to the man referred to him by C-97, who said that Mr. Dufour lived in the Hamilton area. Detective Constable Seguin contacted the Hamilton police two days later to request any information they had on Mr. Dufour.

In November 1999, the Hamilton police informed the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) that Mr. Dufour had been arrested and charged for sexually assaulting an undercover police officer in Hamilton area in 1988. There was no record of this in CPIC. A Ministry of Transportation search conducted on November 9, 1999, provided an address for Mr. Dufour in Hamilton. It is not clear whether Detective Constable Seguin or the Hamilton police conducted the search. The fact that they were able to obtain an address for Mr. Dufour when the search was conducted in 1999 suggests that Detective Constable Seguin probably did not conduct the search as he should have, early in the investigation.

During the fall of 1999, Detective Constable Seguin also interviewed a number of former residents of the Cornwall Youth Residence.

A Crown brief was submitted on December 17, 1999. The OPP received a recommendation from the Crown to proceed with charges on April 3, 2000, and Mr. Dufour was arrested on April 6, 2000. He died a few days later, on April 11, and the charges against him were withdrawn.

The total delay between the time C-97's statement was taken to the laying of charges by Project Truth was almost thirty-one months. The investigation itself lasted twenty-seven months, and it took an additional four months to obtain an opinion from the Crown. Detective Constable Seguin does not appear to have taken any investigative steps between December 1997 and August 1998 or between October 1998 and August 1999.

At the hearing, Detective Constable Seguin could not recall the reason for these gaps in the investigation. Having reviewed the evidence, I can see no justification for delays of this length and find that Detective Constable Seguin unreasonably delayed the investigation into allegations of sexual abuse by Mr. Dufour.

Further, Detective Constable Seguin's supervising officers, Detective Inspectors Tim Smith and Pat Hall, should have noted the delays in this investigation and ensured that the complaint was being investigated in a timely manner. A request to the Criminal Investigation Branch of the OPP for additional resources might have mitigated this and other delays.

Investigation of Keith Jodoin

In a statement to Detective Constables Joe Dupuis and Steve Seguin on March 22, 1999, Marc Carriere alleged that he had been sexually abused by Keith Jodoin. In 1985, Mr. Carriere was an intern at the Ontario Provincial Court offices in Cornwall and Mr. Jodoin was a Justice of the Peace. Mr. Carriere, who was then twenty-one years old, alleged that Mr. Jodoin touched him sexually while they were in a car on the way to Mr. Jodoin's cottage.

Detective Constable Dupuis took two statements from potential witnesses in May 1999. On May 19, 2000, Detective Constables Dupuis and Don Genier took a cautioned statement from Mr. Jodoin. These are the only statements listed in the Crown brief submitted by the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) on May 29, 2000. It is unclear to me why this investigation took over a year to complete.

On July 4, 2000, the Crown advised that there was sufficient evidence to proceed with charges. Detective Constable Dupuis and Crown Attorney Claudette Wilhelm met with Mr. Carriere on July 31, 2000. The next day, Mr. Carriere signed a document requesting the OPP not proceed with charges against Mr. Jodoin, because he did not wish to attend court and give evidence in the matter.

Mr. Carriere changed his mind and returned to the OPP on August 8, 2000. He provided a statement to Detective Constables Dupuis and Genier on August 9, 2000, confirming that he wanted to proceed with the charges. He testified that it was Richard Nadeau who encouraged him to return to the OPP.

Mr. Nadeau was an alleged victim of sexual abuse and was involved with a controversial website about allegations of sexual abuse in the Cornwall area and about Project Truth. He was also a plaintiff in a class action lawsuit for victims of abuse. As discussed further in "External Pressures: The Media, Websites, and Garry Guzzo," Mr. Nadeau's contact with alleged victims, such as C-8, was a concern for Project Truth.

Detective Constable Dupuis interviewed Mr. Nadeau on August 8, 2000. Mr. Nadeau said Mr. Carriere had initially told him about the incident with Mr. Jodoin in early 2000. Mr. Nadeau spoke to Mr. Carriere again after learning that he did not want to proceed with the charges. According to Mr. Nadeau, they discussed Mr. Carriere's concerns about going forward, including the facts that he felt intimidated by pursuing the charges as a sole complainant, he was worried about the effect the case would have on his relationship with his partner, and he believed there was little chance for success at trial. Mr. Nadeau told Detective Constable Dupuis that he advised Mr. Carriere to think about it over the weekend and to do what was right for him and his partner, but also "what was right ... for society."

Mr. Jodoin was arrested on August 24, 2000, and charged with one count of sexual assault on a male. The Crown withdrew this charge on November 20, 2000. According to Detective Inspector Pat Hall's notes, Mr. Nadeau's involvement was a factor in that decision.

Investigation of Father Romeo Major

Project Truth Receives Complaint Against Father Major

On October 13, 1999, Detective Constable Don Genier received a call from C-111, who alleged that she had been sexually abused by Father Romeo Major in 1978, when she was an altar girl at the Paroisse des Saints Martyrs Canadiens. Detective Constables Genier and Steve Seguin took a formal statement from C-111 on October 19, 1999.

The Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) conducted a number of interviews of potential witnesses.

A Crown brief was submitted on February 18, 2000, and on March 12, 2000, Crown Attorney Claudette Wilhelm recommended that the OPP proceed with charges. Detective Constable Dupuis attempted to take a statement from Father Major on March 16, 2000. Father Major told Detective Constable Dupuis he was told not to say anything and requested to call his lawyer. His lawyer advised him not to provide a statement.

On April 10, 2000, Father Major was charged with one count of indecent assault on a female.

C-69 Alleges Abuse by Father Romeo Major

Shortly after the arrest of Father Major, C-69 contacted Detective Inspector Pat Hall and inquired about the procedure for someone who has a complaint. She wanted to know if it would automatically go forward. She advised Detective Inspector Hall that a member of the clergy was involved but did not provide a name. Arrangements were made for C-69 to meet with Detective Constable Joe Dupuis or Detective Constable Genier.

As I have previously mentioned, it is important to note that Project Truth did not have any female police officers. In this case, the two alleged victims were female. Although I have seen no evidence to indicate that the gender of the officers was a problem in this case, it is nonetheless important that complainants be given a choice about the gender of the officers when they are going to disclose allegations of sexual abuse. There should have been a female officer involved in the project, even if only on an "as-needed" basis.

Detective Constables Dupuis and Genier interviewed C-69 on April 18, 2000. She refused to provide a formal statement. According to Detective Constable Dupuis, C-69 was "very fragile," and it was difficult for her to disclose her allegations to the officers. She said Father Major abused her when she was between fourteen and sixteen years old.

She also alleged that she was abused by a priest in Quebec. She said that she received $5,000 for treatment from a diocese in Quebec and that her “good friend” Jacques Leduc had helped her get that settlement. According to C-69, Mr. Leduc, who was acting for the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall at the time, advised her she could not proceed criminally due to a two-year limitation period for these charges in Quebec. I would point out that this is not the law in Quebec. C-69 said had to sign a document agreeing to never talk about the abuse by this Quebec priest again.

At the hearings, Mr. Leduc confirmed that he had represented C-69 and that he helped her obtain a civil settlement from a Quebec diocese for a complaint of sexual abuse against a priest. He denied having told her that there was a limitation period for her criminal complaint.

C-69 also told the officers that Bishop Eugène LaRocque told her that if she talked about the abuse, he would ensure she was fired from her teaching position with the Catholic school board. At the hearings, the Bishop was asked about this comment, to which he said, “That is entirely false.” C-69 also said that she had disclosed to Mr. Leduc everything that had happened to her. Detective Constable Dupuis testified that he did not speak to Bishop LaRocque or Mr. Leduc about these issues. He thought that perhaps Detective Constable Genier may have looked into this in greater detail.

In my opinion, the OPP should have made some enquiries of Mr. Leduc and Bishop LaRocque about this information. Especially in light of the settlement with David Silmser in 1993, the police should have been alert to the potential attempt to obstruct justice in this scenario. In addition, if, as C-69 alleged, she had told Mr. Leduc about her abuse by Father Major, Mr. Leduc may have been able to provide the police with additional information or a corroborating statement, if C-69 waived her right to solicitor-client privilege over the matter.

In addition, C-69 also told the officers that she knew of two other people who had been allegedly abused by Father Major. She did not provide names because she wanted to speak to them first. She said that one of them was mentally handicapped and that C-69 actually observed the assault on this person. C-69 said she wanted to discuss the issues with her therapist and would get back to the officers.

Detective Constable Dupuis briefed Detective Inspector Hall about the interview with C-69.

On April 26, 2000, C-69 called Detective Constable Dupuis and asked if anyone else had come forward. C-69 said she had talked to the other two victims and one wanted time to discuss the matter with her husband because she had never told him about the abuse. Again, C-69 was going to talk to her therapist and get back to the officers about whether she wanted to go forward with her allegations.

Detective Constable Dupuis contacted C-69 two days later, but she had not yet made up her mind about coming forward with her allegations against Father Major.

Detective Constable Dupuis made a number of unsuccessful attempts to contact C-69 between April and June 2000. Project Truth officers spoke with C-69 again on September 13, 2000. She was upset that the officers had taken notes during their first meeting.

C-69 Not Medically Fit to Proceed

On September 28, 2000, Detective Inspector Hall received a call from a doctor treating C-69, who advised that she was not medically fit to participate in any legal proceedings about her alleged abuse and that she requested that she not be contacted again. The doctor declined to provide a letter to this effect. He was advised of the new court date for Father Major but said he would not tell C-69 because it could affect her fragile condition.

Prosecution and Withdrawal of Charges

The case against Father Major continued to proceed on the basis of the allegations of C-111. Detective Constable Genier and Crown Wilhelm met with C-111 on November 14, 2000. They discussed C-111's medical condition and the Crown explained the court process to her. Sometime before her statement to the OPP in the fall of 1999, C-111 had been diagnosed with cancer and she had developed a brain tumour, some of which had been surgically removed. By the time of this meeting, however, she had been further diagnosed with breast, liver and kidney cancer. Although C-111 wanted to continue with the court process, Detective Constable Genier's notes of the meeting indicate that she was having difficulties remembering details of her childhood because of medication she was taking. She was becoming frustrated and discouraged with her inability to remember things.

The preliminary inquiry was held on September 19 and 20, 2001. It became apparent that C-111's memory had been affected by her illness and treatment, and the Crown made the decision to withdraw the charges. The decision was explained as follows:

Prior to the preliminary hearing, the complainant was interviewed by Crown Counsel and was both willing and able to give evidence. However, while testifying at the preliminary hearing held in Cornwall on September 19-20, 2001, it became apparent that the memory of the complainant was negatively impacted upon by her illness and subsequent treatment. As a result the Crown determined that the quality of her memory is such as to lead to the conclusion that there is no longer a reasonable prospect of conviction.

The charges were withdrawn on October 10, 2001.

David Petepiece's Complaint

David Petepiece called Project Truth on July 15, 1998, and Detective Constable Steve Seguin met with him that day. On the following day they met again, and Mr. Petepiece provided him with a typewritten statement of his allegation.

Mr. Petepiece reported that in 1956, when he was ten years old, he was hospitalized at Cornwall General Hospital for a period of about ten days. During this time, he was visited several times by a clergyman from Trinity Anglican Church. According to Mr. Petepiece, the man:

... began to tell me about a job that he had been assigned by the church. And he wanted my help in this project ... All I had to do was to let him put his hands under the blankets and what he wanted to do, and what his project was, was to determine sort of a size change in a male penis from sort of a flaccid to the erect state. And he wanted to do that and I wouldn't allow him to do that.

Mr. Petepiece did not tell anyone about the incident at that time.

Mr. Petepiece told Detective Constable Seguin that in the 1980s he contacted a record keeper at the Anglican Church, who gave him the name of an individual who may have been the perpetrator, but very little other information. Mr. Petepiece also gave Detective Constable Seguin the name of the boy who shared the hospital room with him.

Detective Constable Seguin told Mr. Petepiece that he would look into the allegations and get back to him in two or three weeks. Just over a week after his meeting with Mr. Petepiece, Detective Constable Seguin interviewed Tommy Basil, with whom Mr. Petepiece claimed to have shared the hospital room. Mr. Basil said that he did not know Mr. Petepiece and that he had been at a different hospital and therefore could not corroborate Mr. Petepiece's allegations.

Despite taking this prompt action to investigate the complaint, Detective Constable Seguin did not contact Mr. Petepiece within a few weeks as promised, or, it appears, at all.

Mr. Petepiece contacted Detective Constable Seguin on January 18, 1999, to inquire about the status of the complaint. Detective Constable Seguin told him about the interview with Mr. Bazil and said that the matter remained open. According to Mr. Petepiece, Detective Constable Seguin “made no mention of trying to identify the priest.” Detective Constable Seguin testified that he could not recall if attempts had been made to identify the alleged perpetrator.

In May 2001, Mr. Petepiece wrote a letter to the Ontario Civilian Commission on Police Services, stating that he did not feel that his complaint had been fully investigated and asking that the investigation be “reinvigorated.”

He drafted a similar letter to the OPP Professional Standards Bureau on July 12, 2001, but before sending it, Mr. Petepiece “decided to give Constable Seguin one last chance.” He contacted Detective Constable Seguin, told him that he was about to make a formal complaint, and asked if he would like to meet.

They met on July 16, 2001. Detective Constable Joe Dupuis also attended this meeting. Mr. Petepiece mistakenly thought he was Detective Inspector Pat Hall. Mr. Petepiece testified that this officer:

... made it a point to sit where he could sort of stare at me. He wrote down every word I said. It was almost like he was taking dictation. I could almost feel his presence, sort of in trying to intimidate me.

The officers explained to Mr. Petepiece why the investigation of his complaint was not pursued further. Detective Inspector Hall outlined the reasons in a letter sent to Mr. Petepiece a few days after the meeting.

On reviewing this file, I instructed that no further investigation be done for the following reasons:

1. No criminal offence had been committed. In order for an offence to take place under the Criminal Code of Canada in 1956, physical contact would have had to take place. In 1985, the Criminal Code was amended to include the offences of Sexual Interference, Section 151; Invitation to Sexual Touching, Section 152; Sexual Exploitation, Section 153 of the Criminal Code of Canada. I have attached copies for your information.
2. The mandate of Project Truth was to investigate historic allegations of a sexual nature involving the Catholic Clergy and other prominent persons in the Cornwall area. This did not include every sexual assault allegation in the City of Cornwall that was reported, and did not include allegations against members of other religions.

3. Any allegations of a criminal nature occurring in the City of Cornwall were passed on, by memorandum, to Staff Sergeant Rick CARTER, Cornwall Police Service, for their investigation. Due to the wide publicity generated by Project Truth, our office received many calls from individuals, such as yourself, who had allegations, but possibly unsure as to who should investigate. We looked into all allegations that were received by Project Truth.

In your particular case, there was no criminal offence committed. I regret you were not completely made aware of our actions, or lack of continuation on the investigation. This may have been due to miscommunication between Detective Constable SEGUIN and myself.

If you wish to pursue this matter, I request you contact the Cornwall Police Service for that purpose, as the incident took place within their jurisdiction. (Emphasis added)

In a report to the Criminal Investigation Branch, Detective Inspector Hall stated that the allegations made by Mr. Petepiece were “[t]urned over to Cornwall Police Service” (CPS). However, Detective Inspector Hall did not write a letter to the CPS to request an investigation into Mr. Petepiece’s allegations, unlike the outstanding allegations brought forward by C-97, or the complaint reported by Marc Latour (see “Project Truth’s Mandate” section above). He simply told Mr. Petepiece to contact the CPS himself if he wanted further action to be taken.

In preparation for this Inquiry, Mr. Petepiece met with Archdeacon Ross Moulton of the Trinity Anglican Church on August 19, 2006, to inform him that he would be testifying. Mr. Petepiece showed him the statement that he had given to the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP). He testified that the Archdeacon:

... was quite compassionate in his reaction to it; expressed a great deal of regret for what had gone on; was offering to do whatever he could to assist me. He indicated that he did have an obligation through church policies to report my story to some committee, which I agreed that he could do.

In an e-mail to Mr. Petepiece, the Archdeacon stated, “I regret deeply the hurt you were subjected to those years ago,” and offered further support. In addition, Mr. Petepiece testified that the Archdeacon did some research to identify the alleged perpetrator and determined that the individual died in 1960.

Mr. Petepiece testified that this gave him a sense of “closure” and that it “had dealt with my most troubling concern, which was that other people were possibly still being victimized.”

Although the Anglican Diocese is not an institution that is being examined by this Inquiry, I mention this interaction because it provides insight into an appropriate institutional response. Mr. Petepiece testified that he felt that this was a model response:

First of all, there was no attempt to dismiss, defend or excuse the conduct that I was alleging had occurred. It was accepted at face value. I was made to feel as if the church through this individual was truly sorry for what I had experienced as a child. And I think his follow up which, as I said before was unrequested, which I think much more positively identified the perpetrator and established that he was dead, gave me the closure that nobody else has been able to do.

In contrast, the OPP displayed a disappointing lack of sensitivity in its dealings with Mr. Petepiece. The decision not to pursue Mr. Petepiece’s complaint may have been reasonable; however, Detective Constable Seguin’s failure to inform him of this decision was not. If it was determined that the complaint was properly in the jurisdiction of the CPS, a referral should have been made immediately by Project Truth rather than pointing Mr. Petepiece in this direction three years after his initial complaint.

In my view, this case demonstrates one instance of the OPP and Project Truth management’s failure to develop and enforce policies, practices, and procedures that would have ensured complainants making allegations of sexual abuse were dealt with appropriately, offered support, and kept apprised of the status of the investigations into their complaints.

Investigation of John Christopher Wilson

On October 10, 1997, Detective Constable Joe Dupuis received a call from probation officer Jos van Diepen, who said that Keith Ouellette reported being sexually assaulted by Ken Seguin, Richard Hickerson, and John Christopher (Chris) Wilson. Detective Constables Steve Seguin and Dupuis met Mr. Ouellette at the Cornwall jail two weeks later, and he disclosed that he had been sexually abused by his brother, Richard Ouellette, his probation officer, Mr. Seguin, Mr. Hickerson from Canada Manpower, and a former teacher at St. Lawrence College, Mr. Wilson. I comment on the investigation of Mr. Hickerson in another section in this chapter. Mr. Seguin was deceased when Keith Ouellette reported the allegations.

According to Detective Constable Seguin's notes, Mr. Ouellette was emotional and asked if he could wait to give a recorded statement until he was released from jail. On October 30, 1997, Detective Constables Seguin and Dupuis conducted an audiotaped interview of Keith Ouellette regarding allegations of sexual abuse by Richard Ouellette, Mr. Seguin, Mr. Hickerson, and Mr. Wilson.

Mr. Ouellette recounted that Mr. Wilson was the Theatre Manager of Aultsville Hall in the 1970s and was a teacher at St. Lawrence College, where Mr. Ouellette studied. Mr. Ouellette alleged that during a Halloween party at Aultsville Hall he was drugged and woke up in Mr. Wilson's bedroom. He alleged that Mr. Wilson sexually abused him while he was intoxicated and that this was not consensual.

At some point following the night of the Halloween party, Mr. Wilson offered to have Mr. Ouellette stay at his residence. Mr. Ouellette recalled that he would go to Mr. Wilson's on the weekends and that this developed into a sexual relationship. Mr. Ouellette testified that after having been previously abused by other men in the Cornwall area, he started to question his sexuality. As a result, he believes that there may have been some consensual sex with Mr. Wilson.

On May 25, 2000, Detective Constables Dupuis and Don Genier took a second statement from Mr. Ouellette specifically regarding his allegations against Mr. Wilson. During the second interview, Mr. Ouellette had difficulty recalling the chronology of the abuse but alleged that he was sexually abused four or five times over a two-year period. He also clarified that the incidents took place sometime in 1976–1977 and that he was about twenty-four years old at the time.

Mr. Ouellette testified that he spoke regularly with Detective Constable Dupuis throughout the investigation:

I was very aggravated over the fact that my other two perpetrators were dead and that I couldn't do anything about it. It aggravated me and I thought to myself that something has to be done about John Christopher Wilson and my brother but I hesitated with my brother, but I wanted to continue on with John Christopher Wilson.

On June 2, 2000, Mr. Wilson gave a cautioned statement to Detective Constables Dupuis and Genier. Mr. Wilson confirmed that he was Mr. Ouellette's teacher at St. Lawrence College in 1978, but he denied that Mr. Ouellette ever lived with him or that they ever had a sexual relationship. However, Mr. Wilson disclosed that he was fired from the college because of allegations of sexual indiscretions with a student. He also acknowledged that he held parties at his residence in the late '70s and early '80s, and that Mr. Ouellette probably attended along with other students. When pressed by the officers, Mr. Wilson conceded a certain attraction to Mr. Ouellette and stated that there may have been some flirting.

As discussed in Chapter 11, “Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General,” Alain Godin was provided with the Crown brief on June 27, 2000. He was asked to review the file and provide an opinion as to whether charges should be laid against Mr. Wilson. On June 29, Alain Godin determined that there was no reasonable prospect of conviction because of inconsistencies in Mr. Ouellette’s statements and problems with the issue of consent.

External Pressures: The Media, Websites, and Garry Guzzo

The media coverage of the Project Truth investigations was, by and large, negative. The Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) was frequently portrayed as, at best, ineffective and incompetent in its investigations and, at worst, compliant in a cover-up of historical sexual assault in the Cornwall community. Several key narratives, including the existence of a pedophile ring, were repeated in the media throughout the Project Truth investigations and became problematic for the investigation and for the OPP.

In Chapter 4, “Media Coverage of Allegations of Historical Abuse of Young persons in the Cornwall Area,” I set out the findings of a study that concluded media coverage in Cornwall did not meet the expected journalistic standards, lacked in-depth investigation and analysis, and contained too much speculation and too little fact. In this section, I will examine the OPP’s response to those media reports, along with its response to websites about Project Truth and to individuals, such as Garry Guzzo, MPP for Ottawa West–Nepean from 1995 to 2003, who were providing information (and misinformation) to the media.

As discussed in the section “Initial Media Announcements of Project Truth,” the first stories about Project Truth appeared in the summer of 1997. The OPP announced the launch of the project in a press release on July 28, 1997, and held a press conference on September 25, 1997. The media coverage that followed created difficulties for the OPP because it suggested that (1) Project Truth was focused on investigating a ring of pedophiles; (2) sexual abuse was endemic in the Cornwall area; and (3) the investigations conducted by Project Truth were simply a continuation of earlier investigations by the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) in 1993 and by the Ottawa Police Service and the OPP in 1994.

From the outset of Project Truth, the media reported that the OPP was investigating a pedophile ring, even though there was no mention of a “ring” in the initial documentation provided to the media by the OPP. The July 1997 press release simply stated that “the Ontario Provincial Police is investigating allegations of sexual abuse in the Cornwall, Ont. area.” The materials released at the OPP’s press conference said, “At present, 18 persons have had allegations of sexual abuse made against them by a number of complainants.” The headlines, however, reported:

- “OPP probe sex ring allegation: Investigation to focus on purported pedophile group in Cornwall”;
- “18 Eyed in Sex Ring”; and
- “Police widen sex-crimes investigation: Eighteen Cornwall residents suspected in pedophile ring.”

An article in the Brockville Recorder and Times stated that Detective Inspector Klancy Grasman of the OPP refused to comment on the nature of the allegations, but did say the investigation was based on statements taken and information obtained by CPS Constable Perry Dunlop. The reporter then turned to the amended statement of claim in Constable Dunlop’s civil suit against the CPS, the Diocese, and others to explain the nature of the allegations, and pointed out that Constable Dunlop alleged that a group of pedophiles had been, and might still continue to be, active in Cornwall.

Similarly, shortly after the initial press release, an article in the Ottawa Sun reported that the OPP was also looking into allegations that the “pedophile clan” had plotted to murder Constable Dunlop and his family. Again the OPP refused to comment and the reporter turned to Constable Dunlop’s statement of claim to explain the allegation.

These two articles demonstrate that, just as the mandate for Project Truth was framed by Constable Dunlop’s materials, so too was the public’s understanding of the problem under investigation. The OPP did not take proactive steps at the outset to explain the nature of the allegations and the scope of its investigation.

The initial media coverage also gave the public the impression that there was a problem of endemic proportion. Helen Dunlop was colourfully quoted in an August 3, 1997, newspaper article: “I’ve been trying to get these dishes done for six hours and I haven’t been able to because it hasn’t stopped,” referring to constant visits and phone calls from alleged victims. Carson Chisholm told the Ottawa Citizen that “when this breaks, it is going to make Prescott look like a Sunday School picnic ... we’re talking big numbers here. Huge numbers.” Mr. Chisholm was probably referring to the OPP’s Project Jericho investigation in Prescott, which uncovered 275 victims and 119 alleged perpetrators.

In the August 3 newspaper article just mentioned, Cornwall MPP John Cleary noted that he had received four phone calls from victims “tied into this pedophile clan” in the past four months. Detective Constables Steve Seguin and Don Genier went to see Mr. Cleary a few days after this article was published and asked for the victims’ names. Mr. Cleary refused to give them the names as the victims had been promised confidentiality, but he agreed to have his office contact the victims and ask them to come forward to the OPP. When the OPP followed up with Mr. Cleary, he said that all of the victims he was in contact with had come forward.

In the September 1997 press conference, the OPP told the public that eighteen people were under investigation. In reality, the number of suspects was larger; eighteen suspects were identified based on the Fantino Brief, but by September 1997, the OPP had additional suspects from Claude Marleau and other alleged victims who had come forward. The media reported that there were over 350 people to be interviewed.

The articles following the September press release also framed Project Truth as a continuation of previous police investigations. Detective Superintendent Larry Edgar was quoted as saying, “This investigation has been on-going since 1992 and we want to bring closure to it.” This may have suggested to readers that all the allegations being looked at by Project Truth had been investigated since 1992. This was not the case. The earlier investigations were narrowly focused on alleged abuse by Father Charles MacDonald and the illegal settlement with David Silmsner, rather than on abuse perpetrated by a larger number of individuals.

However, this suggestion is repeated in later media stories. A 1999 story by the CBC implies that Constable Dunlop alerted the police to the existence of a pedophile ring well before Project Truth, but that no charges were laid at that time. The significance of this inaccuracy became quite apparent when Mr. Guzzo began alleging police incompetence, claiming that all of the charges laid by Project Truth were “missed” by the previous investigations.

In my view, the OPP did not respond well to the initial media framing of the Project Truth investigation. The existence of a pedophile ring was the allegation most referenced in media coverage of Project Truth. The OPP should have been alert to this characterization of the investigation and responded accordingly.

There is no technical definition of a “pedophile ring.” To the extent that term refers to a group of individuals—some of whom know each other—who are accused of sexually abusing young people, there was evidence that such an entity existed in Cornwall. On the other hand, Project Truth found no evidence of a “ring of pedophiles” as described by Ron Leroux.

The problem is that the OPP never clearly articulated what a ring was or what Project Truth's mandate was in relation to investigating the existence of such an entity. As I discuss further in the section on the OPP's conspiracy investigation, Project Truth appeared to focus on the more narrow issue of whether there was a conspiracy to obstruct justice with respect to the Silmser settlement. Subsequent blanket denials of the existence of a ring were therefore understandably upsetting and confusing to the community in light of known connections between alleged perpetrators and the fact that some perpetrators shared a common alleged victim.

Media and the July 1998 Arrests

As previously discussed, on July 9, 1998, Project Truth conducted a mass arrest of six individuals. Unfortunately, arresting the suspects together did nothing to dispel the notion that the OPP was investigating a clan or ring, and the accompanying press release prematurely signalled the end of Project Truth.

The six individuals arrested on July 9 were Brother Leonel Romeo Carriere, Roch Landry, Father Paul Lapierre, George Sandford Lawrence, Father Kenneth Martin, and Dr. Arthur Peachey. The OPP had planned to arrest Harvey Latour that day as well, but he had taken an overdose of pills. He was arrested shortly thereafter. None of these individuals came to the OPP's attention through the Fantino Brief.

On the day of the arrests, the OPP issued a press release and Superintendent Carson Fougère spoke at a news conference. He made a number of statements that may have contributed to some of the rumours circulating in the community.

Superintendent Fougère said that the men arrested were "life-long friends," that "their connections are through the Roman Catholic Church," and that some of the men had business relationships. These assertions are inaccurate—the accused did not all know each other and only some of them had a connection through the Catholic Church—but were repeated in the media in the years that followed.

The media was also told that "five of the accused shared one victim" and that another victim was abused by two of the accused. At the same time, Superintendent Fougère said, "There is no evidence this was a ring," and, "A pedophile ring? We haven't uncovered evidence of it." It is not surprising to me that some members of the press and the public would find the inconsistency of these statements confusing, and even disingenuous.

The media release issued by the OPP stated that Project Truth was continuing, but that it was projected to end in the fall of 1998. This statement probably caused concern for Helen Dunlop, who was interviewed shortly after the arrests and noted that none of the individuals arrested were mentioned in the materials that she and Constable Dunlop had handed over to the OPP. Ms Dunlop said that there were ten other individuals who should have been charged.

The Dunlops, the Media, and Project Truth

Shortly after the July 9 arrests, Constable Dunlop met with Detective Inspector Tim Smith, Detective Sergeant Pat Hall, and Inspector Richard Trew. During this meeting they became aware that the material in the binders delivered to the Ministry of the Attorney General and the Ontario Civilian Commission on Police Services on April 7, 1997, had not been forwarded to the OPP. This meeting is discussed in the section “Interactions between Project Truth and Constable Perry Dunlop.”

This discovery may have fuelled Constable Dunlop’s concern about whether Project Truth had all the relevant information and was fully investigating the allegations uncovered by the Dunlops. At the time of the July 1998 arrests, a number of key suspects in the Fantino Brief, including Father Bernard Cameron, Bishop Eugène LaRocque, Murray MacDonald, Father Gary Ostler, Father David Ostler, and former Cornwall Chief of Police Claude Shaver had not yet been interviewed. In addition, the OPP had not yet begun its investigation of the alleged conspiracy, although this may not have been publicly known. Further, an article in the Cornwall Standard-Freeholder on July 10, 1998, may also have raised Constable Dunlop’s suspicions about the OPP’s investigation. The article stated that the OPP had told some people that they were not under investigation.

As noted in the section of this chapter dealing with Constable Dunlop’s interactions with Project Truth, the relationship between the OPP and the Dunlops began to break down in the fall of 1998. Constable Dunlop refused to sign a document indicating that he had given the OPP all his disclosure, and there was a tense telephone conversation between Detective Sergeant Hall and Constable Dunlop over his contact with Claude Marleau. In January 1999, Detective Inspector Hall informed the Dunlops that there would be no charges laid in the investigation into the death threats they had received, much to their displeasure.

The breakdown of this relationship was significant because of the considerable goodwill the Dunlops enjoyed in the Cornwall area and beyond. The Dunlops received attention from the national media in the winter of 1999 in stories by CBC radio and Chatelaine magazine on whistleblowers. These stories are just two examples of the numerous media pieces that depicted Constable Dunlop as a “folk hero” and a whistleblower. Similar media pieces had started several years earlier, such as the Fifth Estate episode aired on CBC television in late 1995. Dr. Mary Lynn Young noted in her study that this was a dominant theme in the media coverage surrounding the events in Cornwall (see Chapter 4). It does not appear to me that the OPP understood the impact of this framing by the media on the investigation.

One of the consequences of the public perception of the Dunlops was that some victims and their families brought their complaints directly to Constable Dunlop rather than, or as well as, to the OPP. The OPP failed to fully transfer the public trust and goodwill toward Constable Dunlop to the Project Truth investigators. Such an effort may have minimized victims' desire to reach out to the Dunlops.

In my view a joint effort with Constable Dunlop should have been made early on wherein he and the OPP could have made a public appeal asking that alleged victims report allegations to Project Truth. This could only have worked early in the investigation, when the relationship with the Dunlops was better. The Citizens for Community Renewal submitted, and I agree, that people went to the Dunlops and others because they had lost faith in the police.

Contact between the Dunlops and the complainants caused considerable difficulties in some of the Project Truth prosecutions. However, the OPP was strongly criticized when it admonished Constable Dunlop for interfering with investigations because of his status as "folk hero." The Dunlops' criticism of the OPP's investigation also significantly undermined the public's trust in Project Truth. These difficulties were multiplied when Project Truth began to receive heavy public criticism from other individuals who were held in high regard in the community, such as MPP Garry Guzzo.

Garry Guzzo's Involvement

On July 31, 1998, Helen Dunlop delivered a variety of documents, including newspaper clippings and materials relating to Constable Dunlop's charges under the Police Services Act, to Mr. Guzzo's office. Constable Dunlop's lawyer forwarded other materials to Mr. Guzzo on August 11, 1998.

Mr. Guzzo testified that he first became aware of concerns about the sexual abuse of young people and institutional cover-up when he was called by a prominent Cornwall lawyer, Duncan MacDonald, in late 1995. Mr. MacDonald described concerns about sexual abuse and the involvement of the Catholic Church related to the David Silmsen settlement with the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall and Father Charles MacDonald. He purportedly appealed to Mr. Guzzo to look into the issue, as a Catholic lawyer and a member of the government.

Mr. Guzzo testified about his interactions with a number of alleged victims, the first of whom were referred by Mr. MacDonald. Mr. Guzzo's testimony about his encounters with alleged victims was sketchy at best. He purposely did not take notes or have them leave documents with him. He testified that he typically suggested they contact the police and almost universally told them to consider retaining counsel to pursue civil actions. He testified that these alleged victims told him of abuse by Father Charles MacDonald and other priests, by Nelson Barque and Ken Seguin while they were on probation, and by Marcel Lalonde and other schoolteachers.

Mr. Guzzo also testified about Cornwall connections he uncovered while on annual trips to Fort Lauderdale, Florida. His inability to remember important details, such as the name of a former bookkeeper for the Saltaire Motel, makes it difficult to give this testimony on this point much weight.

While I understand Mr. Guzzo's concerns about protecting the privacy interests of alleged victims whom he saw sporadically over several years, his actions vis-à-vis his notes were ill-advised. In addition, his lack of notes for his interactions with institutional officials, with a few exceptions, is unfortunate, as he was unable to be certain about many concerns he raised in the media and elsewhere after the late 1990s.

Having heard from Mr. Guzzo, I have no doubt he was genuinely concerned about the well-being of the alleged victims who sought him out. In addition, I am also of the view that his initial concerns about the complicity of institutions in covering up abuse or their or lack of action in dealing with the sexual abuse of young people were well-motivated. However, as I describe in this section, his interactions with the media, other politicians, and the OPP were at times careless or even reckless. His criticisms of the OPP Project Truth investigation were sometimes based on incomplete or inaccurate information, and had a profound impact on the investigation's effectiveness. These criticisms caused alleged victims and others to distrust the officers involved. The criticisms distracted the officers from the huge amount of work they had and it likely had an impact on their morale.

On September 18, 1998, Mr. Guzzo wrote a letter to Premier Mike Harris outlining his concerns about the OPP's investigation in Cornwall. In particular, Mr. Guzzo stated that key witnesses who had provided affidavits to Constable Dunlop had not been interviewed. One of the key witnesses, Ron Leroux, had in fact, been interviewed by the OPP on two occasions prior to September 1998. Mr. Guzzo also mentioned that the owners of the Saltaire Motel in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, had not been interviewed, which was true. He raised the issue of the missing binders that were delivered to the Ministry of the Attorney General and said that while he did not believe that there had been any wrongdoing by the government, he questioned whether anyone would believe this if the issue became public. Mr. Guzzo suggested that the OPP's conduct in the matter should be reviewed by a judicial inquiry.

In February 1999, MPP Mr. Guzzo wrote a second letter to Premier Harris. Again, Mr. Guzzo raised the OPP's failure to interview complainants and witnesses who would have knowledge of illicit activities occurring in Florida in the '60s and '70s.

On March 5, 1999, Detective Chief Superintendent Wayne Frechette contacted Mr. Guzzo at his home in Florida. Mr. Guzzo testified that he believed this phone call was a result of his letters to the Premier. According to Mr. Guzzo:

Mr. Frechette asked me in plain English what the hell I was talking about when I spoke of affidavits, documents and evidence served upon our government on April 7, 1997. He told me that no one in the Ontario Provincial Police was aware of any of this material and he, quite frankly, questioned the accuracy of my statements that same even existed. He reiterated that he was the senior person in charge of criminal investigations with the Ontario Provincial Police and that if such documentation existed, he was certain none of his officers in Cornwall, and no one at the Orillia headquarters, was even aware that this documentation existed.

Detective Chief Superintendent Frechette's purported comments were inaccurate. I have discussed the discovery of these materials by Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall in July 1998 in the section dealing with Project Truth's interactions with Constable Perry Dunlop.

In March 1999, Mr. Guzzo's letters to the Premier were leaked to the press, and between March 17 and March 24 a number of stories appeared in the media in which Mr. Guzzo was highly critical of Project Truth.

One of the major issues raised in these stories was the OPP's failure to interview some of the key witnesses in the case. In particular, Mr. Guzzo alleged that one of the key witnesses who had not been interviewed was the owner of the Saltaire Motel, a motel located "on a strip of Ft. Lauderdale, Fla. notorious for underage, male prostitutes" where Cornwall officials allegedly stayed with young men under the age of consent. Mr. Guzzo claimed to have seen the registration slips listing the names of some of the alleged perpetrators. A second major issue raised in these articles was the missing binders that had been delivered to the Ministry of the Attorney General on April 8, 1997, but were never passed on to the OPP. The OPP had received a copy of these materials only on July 31, 1998. One of the articles published the receipt that Detective Sergeant Pat Hall signed for these materials, which read:

The Ontario Provincial Police "Project Truth Investigators" never received the full package that was delivered to the Office of the Attorney General, or the Office of the Solicitor General, Ontario Civilian Commission on Policing Services that was hand delivered on the 8th of April 1997 to the said offices by Constable Perry Dunlop.

This revelation probably seemed significant to the public because it provided an explanation for why the OPP had failed to interview certain witnesses. In addition, one article referred back to Ms Dunlop's comment after the July 1998 arrests that the perpetrators arrested were not the ones whom Constable Dunlop had identified, thus giving the impression that the materials that the OPP had been missing were entirely new to them. In fact, while there was some useful information in the new materials, the loss of the binders was not the reason certain witnesses had not yet been interviewed. Rather, a strategic decision had been made to delay the interviews of witnesses related to the conspiracy investigation.

Mr. Guzzo also emphasized the scope of the potential problem in the community, noting that even though twelve people had been arrested, "the probe has only scratched the surface." One of the articles pointed out that Mr. Guzzo had "seen much of the evidence firsthand" and that he had been contacted by "about a dozen" victims, thus adding credibility to his concerns about the matter. Detective Inspector Hall testified that Mr. Guzzo would have seen only the material provided by Constable Dunlop and had not received any of Project Truth's files.

Having heard Mr. Guzzo's evidence and in particular his concessions about the limited information he had when he spoke with the media on several occasions, it appears he overstated his knowledge of the facts. He also did not evaluate the reliability of much of the information he was receiving. This was indeed unfortunate because as a public figure (an MPP, a former judge, and a lawyer), Mr. Guzzo attracts media attention and is more apt to be respected and believed.

The OPP took a number of steps to respond to Mr. Guzzo's allegations. First, on March 22, 1999, Detective Sergeant Pat Hall wrote to Detective Superintendent Larry Edgar and informed him that the binders delivered to the Ministry of the Attorney General on April 8, 1997, existed, that he had received a copy of them in July 1998, and that the only additional materials not already in the OPP's possession were "two additional statements of people we were already aware of, and additional news clippings." Detective Chief Superintendent Frechette contacted Mr. Guzzo on March 31 and informed one of his staff that the OPP had found the missing materials.

Second, in order to respond to the assertion that the OPP had failed to interview the owner of the Saltaire Motel, Detective Inspectors Smith and Hall travelled to Fort Lauderdale in May 1999. That trip is described in detail in the following section, "Conspiracy Investigation." I will note here my view that the trip provides a clear example of how the Project Truth team changed their investigative strategy based on public pressure rather than setting their own priorities.

Third, Detective Superintendent Edgar requested that retired Detective Inspector Smith give an interview to a reporter from the Toronto Sun to respond to Mr. Guzzo's allegations. Detective Inspector Smith was upset by Mr. Guzzo's statements and felt that they were harming the investigation. At the hearing, he said, "I felt that Guzzo was grandstanding at the expense of Project Truth." Detective Sergeant Hall and Detective Superintendent Edgar were also present for the interview.

In the resulting article, the OPP attempted to correct many of Mr. Guzzo's concerns about the Project Truth investigation. Detective Sergeant Hall addressed the issue of the missing documents and explained, "This second round of documents was really just the first batch split into several files, along with Police Service Act material relevant to Dunlop's civil action, but not to our investigation ... It's true that there were three new affidavits included in that second batch of information. But we had already interviewed all three complainants by the time the material came to us." Detective Inspector Smith also addressed the accusation that a key complainant had not been interviewed, noting that the man (who was Mr. Leroux) had been interviewed twice by the OPP.

In addition, Detective Inspector Smith spoke about the pornographic tapes seized at Mr. Leroux's house, which, according to rumours, contained evidence of illegal sex acts performed by some of the alleged pedophiles. Detective Inspector Smith told the reporter that "the tapes were commercially produced pornography showing sex involving adult homosexuals."

Detective Inspector Smith also admitted that the OPP had not yet interviewed Chief Shaver, nor had it been to Florida. He explained however, that there had only been one complainant out of eighty-three who had been taken to Florida: "So we have concentrated our efforts in Canada."

I commend the proactive efforts of the OPP in this instance in attempting to correct inaccurate information circulating in the media. It is unfortunate that the information provided by Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Sergeant Hall did not quell rumours and speculation. I note, for instance, that Mr. Guzzo continued to cite the destruction of the tapes as evidence of incompetence or cover-up long after this article was published.

Unfortunately, Detective Inspector Smith made some troubling comments during the interview. For instance, he defended Murray MacDonald, saying, "Why would he protect a stranger and turn in his own father?" Detective Inspector Smith also denied the claim that there was a clan of pedophiles:

There is no evidence of a group or clan of active pedophiles operating in Cornwall today. It is true that a number of the accused are Catholic. But there is no evidence of common victims. Only five of the accused to date know each other. But in a town like Cornwall, everybody sort of knows everybody, so people tend to think the worst.

There were a number of problems with these statements. Project Truth had not completed its conspiracy investigation, and thus Detective Inspector Smith was not in a position to comment on Murray MacDonald's involvement, or on the existence of a pedophile group.

In addition, Detective Inspector Smith's comment contained key factual errors: three victims had allegedly been abused by more than one of the accused, more than five of the accused knew one another, a number of the accused were Catholic priests, not just Catholics, and there were a number of other linkages between alleged perpetrators. These factual errors made the OPP look either disingenuous or misinformed. Either way, people in the community who knew that these statements were inaccurate would have reason to doubt Detective Inspector Smith's reassurance that there was no ring. This was not a good strategy for ensuring effective cooperation with other public institutions and the media. In his testimony Detective Inspector Smith acknowledged that the OPP did a poor job "of letting the public know exactly what was going on."

Detective Inspector Hall wrote to Mr. Guzzo on June 24, 1999, and informed him that all victims who came to the OPP's attention would be interviewed. He also noted that Mr. Guzzo appeared to have names of victims of whom Project Truth was not aware. He requested a meeting with Mr. Guzzo, but nothing was actually arranged until November 2000. This meeting will be discussed in more detail below. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he attempted to obtain these names from Mr. Guzzo before this meeting, but was not successful.

Reports on CBC Radio

The issue of whether there was a pedophile ring in Cornwall became prominent in the media again in April and May 1999. The CBC broadcast a number of stories about "how a group of powerful people sexually preyed on generations of young boys in Cornwall, Ontario."

In one of these stories, the CBC aired a quote from Detective Inspector Klancy Grasman, Deputy Director of the Criminal Investigation Branch, stating, "There is no evidence at all that there was any type of organized ring or common thread though any of this." CBC reporter Maureen Brosnahan contrasted this refusal by the OPP "to acknowledge any links between the men charged with abusing boys" with comments made in court by Crown Alain Godin during a joint preliminary inquiry into the charges against Father Lapierre, Father Martin, Mr. Lawrence, and Dr. Peachey. She noted that Mr. Godin told the judge that in some cases there was more than one person present when the abuse occurred and that the various accuseds “groomed the boys to become victims of abuse.” She did not quote Mr. Godin as saying that there was an organized ring, but this was insinuated in the story.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he did not have a discussion with Detective Inspector Grasman about whether it was advisable to make this comment to the media. He said, “All media stuff was done through our headquarters in Orillia.” After the story aired, Detective Inspector Hall contacted the CBC and asked them to put in a retraction because he felt that the reporter had violated a publication ban by broadcasting Mr. Godin’s comments from court proceedings. This issue is discussed further in Chapter 11, “Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.”

In fairness, Detective Inspector Grasman did not testify, and it is not known when exactly he made the comment. However, this radio story demonstrates again why the absolute denial of a ring, or any type of common thread, by the OPP in 1998 and 1999 was troublesome. A number of facts had been reported that indicated the OPP was uncovering something more than a series of isolated incidents of sexual abuse. As one example of this, it may have seemed suspicious to the public that by 1999, three of the individuals involved in the Silmser settlement, Malcolm MacDonald, Father MacDonald, and Jacques Leduc, had been charged for allegedly abusing young people. In addition, Albert Roy and others were publicly alleging that they had been passed between Nelson Barque and Ken Seguin. Mr. Roy’s claim would have probably been seen as particularly credible given that Mr. Barque had been convicted of abusing him.

Moreover, the OPP’s denials of the existence of a ring were premature, given that it had not completed its conspiracy investigation and that it was unclear whether Project Truth was making a concerted effort to find a ring at all. This is discussed further in the “Conspiracy Investigation” section.

Shift in the Public’s Perception of Project Truth

In December 1999, an article appeared in the Standard-Freeholder entitled, “Do we still need Project Truth?” The writer questioned whether Project Truth was necessary, given that after fifteen months it had found no evidence of a ring, and the CPS was perfectly capable of investigating sexual assaults.

In addition, the comments being made by Mr. Guzzo and by the CBC were beginning to undermine the OPP’s credibility. The allegations, including the destroyed tapes, the missing binders, and the failure to interview certain key suspects, cast the OPP in a negative light.

Beginning in late 1999 and through 2000 the public perception of Project Truth probably worsened, as many of the suspects charged by Project Truth were not convicted. A number of suspects died: Malcolm MacDonald and Dr. Peachey died in December 1999, Brian Dufour died just after his arrest in April 2000, and Roch Landry died in October 2000. In June 2000, Harvey Latour was found not guilty, and the charges against Brother Carriere were stayed due to his health. In addition, the charges against Keith Jodoin were withdrawn by the Crown in November 2000 because there was no reasonable prospect of conviction.

When cases are not adjudicated, like five of the seven mentioned above, convictions are not possible. Media criticism of the OPP's investigation for the lack of convictions was not fair. Perhaps more could have been done by the OPP and the Ministry of the Attorney General to educate the media and the public.

Richard Nadeau and the Project Truth Websites

Project Truth also faced a public relations challenge from a new source—the Internet. On July 26, 2000, the OPP became aware of a website called projecttruth.com. The OPP were contacted by Murray MacDonald, who was upset with some of the website's content. Detective Inspector Hall, in turn, informed Shelley Hallett about the site.

The website contained six statements from victims that were taken by Constable Dunlop and provided to Richard Nadeau. In most of the statements, the name of the victim had been redacted. The website also contained commentary setting out a conspiracy theory about a group of pedophiles operating in Cornwall, a theory bolstered by the inclusion of Ron Leroux's statements on the website.

The website was created by and registered to James Bateman. Mr. Nadeau supplied information to Mr. Bateman to post on the website. As discussed in the section on Classical College, Mr. Nadeau had come forward to the OPP in September 1997, alleging that he had been abused by a priest named Hector Côté while he was a student there. Unfortunately, Father Côté was deceased and the investigation could not proceed. Mr. Nadeau then attempted to organize a class action for alleged victims in Cornwall.

Detective Inspector Hall contacted Mr. Nadeau on July 31, 2000, and explained that some of the information on the site was incorrect and that his actions could harm the prosecution of Father MacDonald. Detective Inspector Hall also told Mr. Nadeau that the victims could be identified based on the information in their statements, even though their names were not given.

The projecttruth.com website was shut down on August 2, 2000. Detective Inspector Hall testified, "I think I was largely responsible for shutting down the first one [website]."

However, throughout the month of August, the OPP continued to receive complaints about items that had been posted on the website. Detective Inspector Hall received a call from Robert Robineau, Officer in Charge of the Cornwall jail, who was concerned about allegations on the website against Father Kevin Maloney. Father Maloney had been a part-time chaplain at the Cornwall jail since 1996. Detective Inspector Hall also received calls from victims and family members of victims and witnesses in the Project Truth cases. These individuals were concerned by the fact that the victims could be identified based on the information in the statements.

A second website, projecttruth2.com, was launched on August 26, 2000. This site was run by Mr. Nadeau alone. Detective Inspector Hall contacted regional Crown James Stewart, who advised him to speak to Ms Hallett. The response of the Ministry of the Attorney General to the website is set out in Chapter 11.

Detective Inspector Hall was concerned about the website because it listed certain people as pedophiles who were not even suspects, and because it contained incorrect information that would mislead the community. Detective Inspector Hall also thought victims would be less willing to come forward if they believed that their information would be posted on the site. He said he contacted Mr. Nadeau and asked him to change or remove the incorrect information. Detective Inspector Hall testified, "I think that strategy caused Mr. Nadeau to take a lot of his information off the website."

Project Truth also became concerned about the contact that Mr. Nadeau was having with alleged victims. As mentioned in the section on Keith Jodoin, Mr. Nadeau had some contact with complainant Marc Carriere, which may have contributed to the charges against Mr. Jodoin being withdrawn.

On September 12, 2000, the CPS received a complaint from C-8, who claimed that Mr. Nadeau had left a message on his answering machine, threatening to publish certain information about his relationship with Ron Leroux, as well as the assault against a teenage girl. The OPP investigated. A brief was submitted to and reviewed by the Crown, which determined that no criminal offence had taken place.

Mr. Nadeau's website also became a major issue during the first trial of Jacques Leduc. The OPP assisted the Crown in dealing with the matter.

The website was shut down on April 13, 2001, but resurrected around February 15, 2002. The website is still in operation, but it has not been updated since Mr. Nadeau's death in 2006. Despite his concerns about the website, Detective Inspector Hall said the following about Mr. Nadeau in his testimony, "I had great compassion for the man, and he believed what he was doing was right and, you know, he just took it too far."

The site made information (and misinformation) widely available to the public, and in the relatively small community of Cornwall, the website was a significant source of gossip and innuendo. This type of citizen journalism had even more impact because the public was less knowledgeable about and familiar with websites than it is today. In 2000, the Internet was a relatively new medium, and the OPP also probably had little experience in handling this type of website.

Bill 103: Proposal for a Public Inquiry

In 2000, Mr. Guzzo began advocating for a public inquiry. He introduced Bill 103, “An Act to establish a commission of inquiry to inquire into the investigations by police forces into sexual abuse against minors in the Cornwall area.” The bill passed first reading on June 21, 2000.

Before 2000, Mr. Guzzo’s comments in the media were mainly directed at perceived flaws in the Project Truth investigation. Around the time of his demands for a public inquiry, Mr. Guzzo began suggesting that the OPP were either incompetent or part of a cover-up, both to other members of the legislature and in the media.

In order to gain support for his bill, Mr. Guzzo sent a letter to the other members of the legislature in October 2000. This letter contained numerous inaccuracies that formed the foundation for Mr. Guzzo’s claims of incompetence or corruption. I will not set them all out here but will outline some of those claims that relate to the OPP.

Mr. Guzzo stated in this letter that the Cornwall police had conducted a review of complaints about a pedophile group in 1992 or 1993 and determined that there was no impropriety. According to Mr. Guzzo, this finding was reviewed by the Ottawa police, which determined it had no time to devote to the issue and closed its file. It was reviewed again by the OPP who also found no evidence of a pedophile ring. Mr. Guzzo then pointed out that the 115 charges laid by Project Truth must have been overlooked in the previous investigations.

Mr. Guzzo was mistaken in these assertions. The mandate of Project Truth was much broader than the previous investigations, which looked at a specific complaint of abuse by one individual, a narrow conspiracy to obstruct justice, and a possible extortion. The scope of the previous investigations are explained in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service, and in an earlier section of this chapter entitled “Commencement of Detective Inspector Tim Smith’s 1994 Investigations”.

Other major issues raised by Mr. Guzzo included the missing materials that were delivered to the Ministry of the Attorney General on April 7, 1997 (Mr. Guzzo said they contained an inculpatory statement from a perpetrator, which was incorrect), and the OPP’s delay in conducting investigations in Florida. I note that both of these issues had been addressed by OPP investigators in their April 1999 interview with the Toronto Sun.

Mr. Guzzo also claimed in this letter that he had met with 45 alleged victims and that the OPP had stated it had interviewed about 900 alleged victims. Although the OPP said it had taken hundreds of statements, it had not claimed to have spoken with this many victims.

At the hearing, Detective Inspector Hall testified that the inaccuracies or misleading statements in Mr. Guzzo's letter could have been easily verified "[i]f there was an effort put forward."

Bill 103 passed second reading by a vote of 45 to 3 on October 12, 2000, and was referred to committee. On October 16, 2000, Detective Inspector Hall met with Detective Inspectors Chris Lewis and Klancy Grasman, and Marilyn Murray, from the OPP's media relations department, to discuss how to respond to Mr. Guzzo's allegations. Deputy Commissioner Lewis testified, "I was really gearing up for a media strategy here. I wanted to get the facts out as opposed to the misinformation that was out there."

It was determined that Detective Inspectors Hall and Lewis would meet with Mr. Guzzo, as arrangements were already underway for Detective Inspector Hall and Mr. Guzzo to meet. They also determined that they needed to communicate the facts both internally and to the public. Detective Inspector Hall was to prepare a chart to respond to Mr. Guzzo's claims. Detective Inspector Hall also prepared an explanatory document for Ms Murray, in which he noted that there was no evidence that the CPS was involved in a cover-up in the Silmsen matter. Although this was the conclusion that Detective Inspector Hall had reached in his conspiracy investigation, it is noteworthy that he felt comfortable making this statement given that at the time he was still awaiting a Crown opinion on his conspiracy brief. It is unfortunate that the OPP did not develop a media strategy to respond to Mr. Guzzo's public claims much earlier.

The meeting between Mr. Guzzo and Detective Inspectors Hall and Lewis took place at Queens Park on November 22, 2000. This was the only meeting that Mr. Guzzo had with Detective Inspector Hall. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he spent most of the meeting explaining the inaccuracies in Mr. Guzzo's comments and letters. Deputy Commissioner Lewis said that the conversation was friendly, and that he explained to Mr. Guzzo that they were there to tell him that he had been given some misinformation. Mr. Guzzo testified that during this meeting Detective Inspector Hall pointed out a few issues where he was in error and he acknowledged those errors.

However, Mr. Guzzo and Detective Inspector Hall offered conflicting testimony on the rest of the items discussed during this meeting. One of these was the issue of the names of alleged victims. According to Mr. Guzzo, they discussed the names of some of the individuals that they had both spoken to and confirmed that the names were the same. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he asked Mr. Guzzo to provide the names of other victims and he declined to do so.

There was a discussion about the Ministry of the Attorney General's binders and the receipt Detective Inspector Hall had signed, which had appeared in the newspaper. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he showed Mr. Guzzo the indexes for the binders so that Mr. Guzzo could see what the OPP had and when. According to Mr. Guzzo, the OPP's explanation did not resolve his questions to his satisfaction.

Mr. Guzzo recalls asking Detective Inspector Hall about registration slips from Fort Lauderdale hotels. He testified that Detective Inspector Hall patted his briefcase and said, "We have them," but did not show him the slips. Mr. Guzzo also said that Detective Inspector Hall told him that one of the slips had Bishop LaRocque's name on it. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he did not pat his briefcase, that he not have the registration slips with him, and that he would not have said that Bishop LaRocque's name was on the slips.

Detective Inspector Hall and Mr. Guzzo also discussed the destruction of the videotapes. Mr. Guzzo testified that when asked about the tapes, Detective Inspector Hall answered, "The man was dead. The man's dead. You can't prosecute a dead man. The evidence wasn't necessary."

Mr. Guzzo had suggested in the legislature that the OPP were either incompetent or part of a cover-up. Detective Inspector Hall's notes of the meeting state that Mr. Guzzo said that "was not his intent. He was referring to CPS. He apologized to the OPP for his critical comments and misinformation." Mr. Guzzo, on the other hand, testified that he apologized for alleging that the OPP was incompetent, but stated that he did not take back the alternative—a cover-up.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he left the meeting with a feeling that Mr. Guzzo was satisfied with the answers that the OPP had provided. He also left with the feeling that Mr. Guzzo was genuinely concerned about alleged victims of sexual abuse. Deputy Commissioner Lewis said that after the meeting, "we felt comfortable that we had got the message across that we'd wanted to get across." Mr. Guzzo testified that he had sympathy for Detective Inspector Hall and his team given how difficult the investigation was and the hesitancy of people to come forward. Mr. Guzzo testified that he had a very positive impression of Detective Inspector Hall and that he believed Detective Inspector Hall was working in a straitjacket.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that Mr. Guzzo did not make any public statements about Project Truth for a few months after this meeting, "But then he carried on as if I'd never met with him." Given the different views of the issues discussed or resolved at that meeting, in hindsight it would have been prudent for the OPP to send Mr. Guzzo a letter confirming the contents of their discussion. Mr. Guzzo's bill for a public inquiry died on the order paper in the months following this meeting.

Garry Guzzo's Statements in the Legislature

Mr. Guzzo reintroduced his legislation calling for a public inquiry in May 2001 and reinvigorated his critique of Project Truth. He threatened to name some of the alleged perpetrators who had not been charged in the legislature, where he would have immunity from prosecution. Ultimately, he did not follow through with this threat.

On June 27, 2001, Mr. Guzzo raised the issue of the Leroux/Seguin tapes in the legislature. He stated that the OPP had seized:

a suitcase containing 24 or more pornographic movies. Some of these were commercially edited and sold and some were homemade, some from a camera mounted at the foot of the probation officer's bed ...

... this evidence, these films have been in the hands of the OPP for over six years. The evidence has never been tendered in court proceedings and indeed many of the predators in these movies, both the commercial movies and the homemade movies, have never been charged. I'd like to ask you, sir, where those films are located at this time ...?

... on November 22 of last year, when I was debriefed by the OPP, visited by Detective Inspector Hall, the lead investigator for Project Truth, and one of his superiors from Orillia, I put that same question to Detective Inspector Hall. Here was his answer. He said, "Mr. Guzzo, we don't have those tapes. We don't have those films any more. We destroyed them."

I said, "No, no, you can't destroy evidence in this province. That's against the law." He said, "The man was dead; he wasn't going to be charged."

I said, "What about the other people in the movies? What about the kingpins of this organization who were also seen in those movies?"

He shrugged his shoulders, the same way he did when he couldn't explain the 115 charges that were missed three times.

Mr. Guzzo then declared that copies of the movies had been found and that a citizens' group had them. As mentioned above, other than telling Mr. Guzzo that Ken Seguin was dead, Detective Inspector Hall denies making the statements attributed to him.

Detective Inspector Hall responded by writing to Mr. Guzzo on July 18, 2001, and asking him for assistance in determining who was in possession of the movies mentioned in the legislature. Mr. Guzzo wrote back that he did not have copies of the films and that he had not seen them. Mr. Guzzo stated that he had urged the person who had the tapes to provide them to the OPP and stated that he would contact this person again.

My findings in relation to the videotapes and their apparent destruction are set out earlier in this chapter, but I repeat here that I neither heard nor saw any evidence to suggest that the videotapes seized from Mr. Leroux's home contained proof of group pedophilic activity in Cornwall, or that a copy of the tapes exists today. Mr. Guzzo acknowledged during his testimony at this Inquiry that he had never seen the tapes nor spoken to anyone who had. In my view, given his lack of information, the suggestion that the OPP destroyed evidence of the "kingpins" of a pedophile ring engaged in criminal activity was extremely irresponsible. It is unfortunate that Mr. Guzzo continued to make these suggestions after the OPP attempted to address his concerns both in the media and in their meeting on November 22, 2000.

Public Pressure to Wrap Up the Investigation

Both Detective Inspector Hall and Deputy Commissioner Lewis testified that the negative media attention, particularly from Mr. Guzzo, was generating public pressure to wrap up Project Truth.

By the fall of 2000, the investigative phase of Project Truth had effectively ended. The last Crown brief was submitted on July 20, 2000. The OPP was waiting for an opinion from the Crown on this brief, as well as five others. The delay in the review is discussed in the "Conspiracy Investigation" section of this chapter and in Chapter 11.

Deputy Commissioner Lewis received a call from Chief Anthony Repa of the CPS on December 6, 2000, and asked why the Crown Law Office was taking so long to review the briefs, one of which related to the conspiracy investigation involving the CPS. Chief Repa mentioned that the CPS was getting beaten up in the press. Deputy Commissioner Lewis told Chief Repa that he was waiting to hear back from regional Crown James Stewart on the matter. Deputy Commissioner Lewis testified that he did not feel that the CPS was putting pressure on him but rather, “It was just another indicator to me that this thing is still hanging out there and it’s affecting a lot of people.”

An article appeared in the Standard-Freeholder on January 9, 2001, in which the mayor of Cornwall, Brian Sylvester, stated that he wanted a report on Project Truth to be delivered to City Council as soon as possible. The article noted that a report on Project Truth was initially expected in October 2000. Deputy Commissioner Lewis testified that he was unaware of any promise to deliver a report, but said, “[T]here is [was] certainly a will by a number of people to have this over and done with, including us [in] the OPP.”

In January 2001, Bishop LaRocque also made public statements requesting the OPP to declare an end to its investigation. He was quoted in the Standard-Freeholder asking for Project Truth to end “so the process of healing can begin.”

Deputy Commissioner Lewis stated at the hearing that there was a desire to state publicly that the investigation was over. The negative publicity Project Truth attracted had a bad effect on morale within the OPP. Deputy Commissioner Lewis noted that it could discourage further victims from coming forward, and it could harm the OPP’s reputation and ability to do its job more generally. In addition, there was a concern that suspects needed to be treated fairly. I agree with this concern. Delays in completing investigations can be difficult for all parties involved, whether they are complainants or suspects.

Announcement of End of Project Truth

The OPP received an opinion from Crown Lorne McConnery on August 15, 2001, on the outstanding Crown briefs. Mr. McConnery recommended that no charges be laid.

The OPP issued a press release on August 22, 2001, stating: “The OPP found no evidence that a pedophile ring operated in the city. There is nothing to indicate individuals operated in concert with each other to commit offences.” The press release further declared, “All information provided to or uncovered by investigators was followed up.”

This announcement did not quell public criticism. Mr. Guzzo continued to insist that there was a pedophile ring operating in Cornwall and that the videotapes, had they not been destroyed, would have provided enough evidence to convict all those who were not charged in Project Truth. Mr. Guzzo also made new inaccurate claims. In an article published September 9, 2001, Mr. Guzzo said that the Ministry of the Attorney General had recently instructed the OPP not to lay charges despite the fact that “Project Truth investigators ‘strongly recommended’ to the ministry that charges be laid against five men who [Mr. Guzzo] called ‘the kingpins’ behind the organized sexual abuse.”

In addition, the OPP's assertion that there was no ring was further undermined in September 2001 during trials involving the allegations made by Claude Marleau. During Father Lapierre's trial, he told the Court under cross-examination that other priests had confided in him about sexually abusing boys. He did, however, deny being part of a ring. During the George Lawrence trial, the media reported that Mr. Marleau alleged he had been passed around "like a toy" between the various accused.

Need for a Coordinated Media Strategy

As noted in Chapter 4, the media study conducted for this Inquiry concluded that the most prevalent theme in coverage of historical sexual assault in Cornwall was police ineffectiveness. The fact that the OPP were unable, or unwilling, to correct some of the inaccuracies in the media (that Project Truth was focused on uncovering a pedophile ring, that it was the continuation of three earlier investigations, and that the numbers of victims coming forward was shocking) probably contributed to the negative portrayal of the investigation.

The OPP failed to provide appropriate information to the community through the media with respect to allegations of sexual abuse and the related investigations. A coordinated media strategy is essential in maintaining public trust, ensuring a smooth investigation, and minimizing inaccurate, exaggerated, and fear-inducing messages. As Dr. Peter Jaffe testified:

The media is hungry for a story. If the media is seeking a story but there's no information available, if there's no promise that there is a group, you know, that's going to share information on a timely basis when it can be made public, it creates all kinds of speculation, all kinds of stories that have no basis in fact.

Those dangers materialized during the Project Truth investigation when media became overly focused on unsubstantiated rumours of a ring or "clan." This led to an effort by the OPP to downplay facts, which led in turn to much public criticism. The OPP should have said what its real focus was and how that focus was different from 1994. Accordingly, I recommend that in future special projects, a communications plan be developed at the outset of any investigation. This could be the responsibility of the media liaison designated for all cases that pass the threshold for major case management. Developing a media strategy includes clarifying roles and communication lines within and between agencies.

Guidelines for dealing with the media in large-scale, multi-victim, multi-offender investigations were available at the time of Project Truth. I point in particular to the report produced following the completion of Project Jericho in nearby Prescott, which included a section on how to handle the media. It is unfortunate that these resources were not utilized.

A coordinated media strategy should be much easier for the OPP today. I was heartened by the evidence of Deputy Commissioner Lewis, in particular the following:

And organizationally now, the mindset—and we’ve engrained this [in] everyone that we can—that we’ll tell the media all we can, except those things that might jeopardize an investigation or may hurt the judicial process in some way or identify a victim or witness unnecessarily.

So that mind shift is very, very prominent in the OPP. We have way more people trained in media relations, including CIB inspectors. They didn’t take a media relations course in those days. And that’s no [dis]respect to Tim or Pat or anyone; that just wasn’t the way we operated at the time. We weren’t going to tell anybody anything anyway, so there wasn’t any much reason to train anybody.

But that’s changed a lot, too. And the CIB inspectors are expected to be out there, not curtailed from being out there.

Conspiracy Investigation

As previously discussed, the mandate of Project Truth was to investigate the allegations in the Fantino Brief. The brief contained a number of specific allegations of sexual abuse. In addition, the brief contained a series of claims that there was an organized group of sexual abusers who held prominent positions within the community and were able to use these positions to stifle complaints and investigations into sexual abuse. In particular, this group was allegedly responsible for the illegal settlement that ended the investigation into David Silmser’s complaint against Father Charles MacDonald in 1993. These people also allegedly attended a number of locations together where they committed acts of sexual abuse.

Although the public believed that the OPP was investigating whether or not there was a group or ring of organized pedophiles operating in the Cornwall area, I am of the view that the OPP’s investigation was much narrower, and was very closely linked to the specific allegations contained in the Fantino Brief. After reviewing the brief that was submitted to the Crown for review, as well as the statements taken by the investigating officers, I find that the OPP investigated three distinct issues:

1. whether certain individuals were members of a group or “clan” of pedophiles, who attended specific locations together and committed sexual abuse there;
2. whether certain individuals conspired to obstruct justice with the illegal settlement with David Silmsen that resulted in halting the investigation into Father MacDonald, and whether the conspiracy was formed during a “VIP meeting” on Stanley Island in late summer 1993; and
3. what happened to the pornographic tapes that were seized from Ron Leroux’s residence in 1993.

The OPP was not investigating the larger issue of whether there was an endemic problem of sexual abuse and whether prominent people were acting together to perpetrate or cover up this abuse.

Mandate of the Conspiracy Investigation

At the April 24, 1997, meeting between the OPP and Crowns Peter Griffiths, Robert Pelletier, and Murray MacDonald, it was decided that all the allegations in the Perry Dunlop materials would be investigated. Detective Inspector Hall testified that the conspiracy investigation was based on the Fantino Brief and the April 7, 1997, letter from Perry Dunlop to the Solicitor General. Detective Inspector Hall explained, “Well, this mandate was derived because of the meeting with Mr. Griffiths, based on Perry Dunlop’s material ... We framed it fairly tightly. We weren’t there to investigate everything else that happened.”

The “Clan of Pedophiles” Allegation

The first allegation was that there was an organized group, ring, or “clan” of pedophiles. This allegation stemmed from the statements made by Ron Leroux in the Fantino Brief and to the OPP in Orillia.

In his statements, Mr. Leroux named the members of this group and alleged that they had a number of regular meeting spots, namely:

- Cameron’s Point;
- Birch Avenue, Fort Lauderdale, Florida, a “pedophile strip” frequented by under-aged prostitutes in Florida;
- the Saltaire Motel in Fort Lauderdale, Florida;

- Malcolm MacDonald's summer residence on Stanley Island;
- Ken Seguin's house in Summerstown; and
- the St. Andrews Parish house.

Mr. Leroux claimed to have witnessed certain members of the clan abuse young people in some, but not all, of these locations. The allegations of sexual abuse were investigated separately by Project Truth rather than as part of its conspiracy investigation. As outlined in previous sections of this chapter, charges were laid against a number of alleged clan members, although not based on the claims made by Mr. Leroux. Other complainants had come forward with allegations against these individuals.

The Fantino Brief contained a number of statements from witnesses who claimed that they had seen a number of the individuals named by Mr. Leroux at some of the locations that he mentioned.

The Conspiracy to Obstruct Justice Allegation

The second allegation was that members of the clan had conspired to obstruct justice by reaching an illegal settlement with David Silmsner that caused him to withdraw his complaint against Father MacDonald in 1993. This allegation was similar to matters that were investigated by Detective Inspector Tim Smith in 1994, but the Fantino Brief contained an additional claim. Mr. Leroux alleged that there was a "VIP meeting" at Malcolm MacDonald's summer cottage on Stanley Island in late August/early September 1993. Constable Dunlop pleaded in the amended statement of claim of his civil suit that it was at this meeting that the decision to enter into the illegal settlement with Mr. Silmsner was reached.

Mr. Leroux said in his affidavit that he did not attend this meeting, but he saw the participants arrive and was told about the meeting afterwards by Ken Seguin.

The Incriminating Videotapes Allegation

Mr. Leroux also alleged that in 1993, the OPP had seized pornographic videotapes during a search of his home. Mr. Leroux claimed that Mr. Seguin told him that the tape collection was his and that the tapes would "clinch" a conviction against him for sexual assault. Mr. Leroux was told by the OPP that the tapes were going to be destroyed.

MPP Garry Guzzo later alleged that the tapes were homemade and commercial pornography, and that some of them contained the "kingpins" of the group of pedophiles.

In the affidavit included in the Fantino Brief, Mr. Leroux did not allege that any of the OPP officers involved in destroying the tapes were members of the clan.

Although the tapes could have provided some evidence for charges against members of the clan, this allegation is only loosely tied to the investigation of any sort of conspiracy. Nonetheless, this investigation was contained in Project Truth's conspiracy brief.

Other Items Contained in the Conspiracy Crown Brief

The Crown brief also contained materials that were not directly related to any of these three issues, and were not investigated by the OPP. For example, it contained the receipts signed when Constable Dunlop delivered binders to three government offices in April 1997, as well as materials from a Cornwall Police Service (CPS) investigation into death threats uttered against Constable Dunlop's daughter.

The Need for a Broader Mandate

It appears to me that Project Truth simply took Constable Dunlop's theory of what the conspiracy entailed and who was involved in it, and investigated it in order to disprove it. The investigation was narrowly limited to an examination of whether there was a group of abusers who met in the locations mentioned by Mr. Leroux and who covered up one specific allegation of sexual abuse. If the OPP could not find credible evidence that the particular events alleged by Mr. Leroux had occurred, then it could conclude that there was no conspiracy, and thus no pedophile ring operating in the Cornwall area.

The officers did not reflect upon Constable Dunlop's materials and ask whether Constable Dunlop had found a problem but misunderstood its nature. Nor did they try to determine whether there were other ways that people could be assisting one another in perpetrating or covering up allegations of sexual abuse, using the Dunlop materials only as a starting point. It is my view that that the community did not just want an answer about the Silmser case—they wanted to know if there was an endemic problem of sexual abuse in their community and they wanted to know if people were misusing their authority to perpetrate it or cover it up. Although the Dunlop materials focused on the allegations of a ring, as well as the settlement with David Silmser and the CPS decision to drop the investigation, statements in the materials also insinuated that there were other instances in which complaints had not been pursued or complainants were discouraged from pursuing a complaint.

For example, in Constable Dunlop's amended statement of claim, he pleads that the Silmser settlement and CPS's refusal to pursue the complaint were "part of a greater conspiracy to keep a lid on allegations of sexual abuse involving prominent individuals in Cornwall" and that the CPS and others "conspired to derail the investigation involving Father Charles MacDonald and the late Ken Seguin as such an investigation would ultimately lead to the investigation of several prominent individuals in the Cornwall community.”

Constable Dunlop also pleads that the Catholic Church had concealed sexual abuse of children by priests and that “the suppression of the identity of sexual offenders was purposely done to prevent the filing of both criminal and civil complaints.”

In addition, the Fantino Brief contained statements which suggested that there were attempts to quash complaints beyond the Silmsers settlement.

One of these was a statement from C-99, who alleged that her children had been abused and that she had been told by a CPS officer that “it would be tough to prove sexual assault given the age of the victim.” C-99 claimed that she then sought legal advice from Malcolm MacDonald, who told her to “back off.”

Another statement in the Fantino Brief alleged that C-15 had asked Malcolm MacDonald to lodge a complaint about abuse he had suffered at the St. Joseph’s Training School in Alfred, but Mr. MacDonald “stalled continually and never did proceed with the file.”

The Dunlop materials and Mr. Leroux’s statements also insinuated that various perpetrators either passed children between them or, at least, were aware or should have been aware that others were committing act of abuse. Alternatively, they suggest that in the youth criminal justice system and the Church, young people were exposed to and abused by a number of people working in those institutions, and that people in these institutions ignored complaints of abuse.

Constable Dunlop’s April 7 letter mentions the case of Albert Roy, who was abused by probation officer Nelson Barque. When Mr. Roy complained about the abuse to Ken Seguin, he testified that Mr. Seguin then abused him.

The Fantino Brief contained a statement from Carole Deschamps, who said, “Malcolm [MacDonald] and Ken [Seguin] shared a lot of clients,” and, “I believe there was a nice little pedophile ring going until Perry Dunlop came along. I believe that alot [sic] of people knew what was going on with Malcolm, Ken and Father Charles [MacDonald].”

There was also a newspaper article included in the brief about Benoit Brisson’s case against Father Gilles Deslauriers. Shortly after Mr. Brisson told the Bishop about his abuse, the Bishop advised the Brissons that Father Deslauriers would be removed from parish work and be sent for treatment. Notwithstanding this promise, Father Deslauriers was seen working in another parish.

The materials Constable Dunlop provided thus could have been seen as an indication that there was a larger problem that went beyond the David Silmsers case.

Certainly, the wording of the mandate of Project Truth would have permitted an investigation into these larger issues:

In addition, it is alleged the suspects were able to terminate investigations and prosecutions against them by abusing their positions of trust within the community. It is alleged the Crown Attorney, the Diocese of Cornwall and the Cornwall Police conspired to obstruct justice in these matters.

However, the Project Truth investigators did not seem to turn their minds to the possibility that a group of pedophiles could have been operating in Cornwall, that institutions or individuals could have covered up complaints of abuse, or that abusers could have been passing children between them, even if Constable Dunlop and Mr. Leroux's version of the conspiracy could not be proven or simply was not true. If they had, the brief would have contained statements from victims who had allegedly been introduced by an abuser to other abusers, such as, for example, Claude Marleau, Keith Ouellette, and Robert Renshaw. It also would have contained statements from people such as Albert Roy and Robert Sheets, who alleged that they were abused by a person in a position of authority after they disclosed that they had been abused by someone else.

The brief did not contain the statements from C-15 or C-99, who alleged that they had been discouraged by Malcolm MacDonald and by a CPS officer from pursuing their complaints. Nor did it include the statement from C-21, who alleged that he was abused at a cottage by Jean Luc Leblanc and Mr. MacDonald and that he witnessed other children being abused.

Because the investigation into the conspiracy was limited to an investigation into the theory presented by Constable Dunlop and Mr. Leroux, the OPP was able to say only that the Dunlop/Leroux allegations were not true. The OPP was not able to answer the broader question of public concern; that is, the OPP was not able to reliably tell the public whether there was an organized group of people abusing young people and misusing their positions within the community to suppress complaints against them. The need to answer this question was particularly pressing given the number of complainants who came forward during the course of the investigation, the number of people accused and arrested, and the connections, both social and institutional, among those accused. The public's perception of the investigation was dealt with in more detail in the previous section, on the media.

Decision to Delay the Investigation

As previously discussed in this chapter, Detective Inspector Hall decided to delay the conspiracy investigation until after the allegations of sexual assault had been looked into.

Project Truth began interviewing witnesses in this investigation in the summer of 1998. The vast majority of the interviews were conducted in 1999 and 2000, with the CPS being investigated in earnest starting in January 2000.

There were two main reasons behind the decision to delay the investigation.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that his priority was to investigate claims of sexual abuse because, “I think crimes against a person are far more important than a conspiracy investigation. He said that if he had given the conspiracy investigation priority, it would have delayed the sexual abuse investigations.

The second reason was that the officers hoped that they could obtain information in the course of their investigations into sexual abuse that would assist them in the conspiracy investigation. Certainly, if other victims had come forward who claimed that they had been abused by the clan members at the locations mentioned by Mr. Leroux, this would have been useful information. As it turned out, Detective Constable Joe Dupuis testified that they did not learn any useful information during the sexual assault investigations that was put toward the conspiracy investigation. They did of course gain information from alleged victims that would have assisted in a broader conspiracy investigation, had they been looking at issues beyond the allegations made by Mr. Leroux.

However, the decision to delay the investigation created a number of problems for Project Truth.

The first issue was that Project Truth had to maintain some distance from the Cornwall Police Service, given that the CPS was being investigated as one of the alleged conspirators. This became problematic in investigations where both the CPS and the OPP were involved in investigating a particular suspect, and in cases where a victim had allegations against multiple suspects that were divided between the two forces.

The need to maintain a distance between the two police forces contributed to some of the disclosure issues that arose during the Marcel Lalonde case. As discussed previously in this chapter, CPS Constable René Desrosiers was not aware of notes in Project Truth’s possession that related to C-8, one of the alleged Lalonde victims that Constable Desrosiers was responsible for. An issue arose in fall 1999 when defence counsel requested these notes and the trial had to be adjourned.

It also became problematic when Constable Dunlop delivered nine banker’s boxes of materials to the CPS in the spring of 2000. It became necessary for the CPS to review the material in the boxes to determine whether they contained materials that had to be disclosed in the Marcel Lalonde prosecution. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he did not have concerns about the CPS reviewing the boxes of material even though it was still under investigation for the conspiracy.

It is my view, however, that he should have been concerned, given that the boxes may have contained information that could have been relevant to the conspiracy. It was possible that the CPS's possession and review of these boxes could lead to allegations or rumours that the CPS had tampered with materials in them. Crown Shelley Hallett was cognizant of this fact and she made arrangements to transfer the boxes to the Project Truth office.

Further, when the OPP transferred C-10's allegations against Carl Allen to the CPS, it did not give C-10's complete statement to the CPS because the OPP was uncomfortable sharing certain information while the CPS was under investigation for the conspiracy to obstruct justice.

The delay in the conspiracy investigation also meant that the OPP had to maintain distance from the local Crown Attorney's Office throughout the duration of Project Truth. Crown Murray MacDonald was another one of the alleged conspirators. This added to the difficulties in securing a dedicated Crown for Project Truth cases.

An additional difficulty created by the delayed conspiracy investigation was the fact that suspects were unwilling to give information to the police once they had been charged with sexual abuse. Detective Inspector Hall explained that he did not try to interview Jacques Leduc for this very reason. Furthermore, at least one key witness/suspect, Malcolm Macdonald, died by the time the OPP completed its investigation and thus the OPP could not use him to implicate other conspirators.³⁶

The delay of the conspiracy investigation also meant that the decision to charge or not charge certain alleged perpetrators was delayed. Ms Hallett told Detective Inspector Hall that she wanted to review the conspiracy brief before she reviewed the briefs that related to Mr. Leroux and C-15's allegations of sexual assault.

Finally, as discussed in the previous section of this chapter, the delay of the conspiracy investigation added to the controversy in the media about the competence of Project Truth's investigation. In 1998 and 1999, a controversy arose over the fact that certain key suspects witnesses had not yet been interviewed. Indeed, these individuals had not been spoken to because the interviews of conspiracy witnesses had been strategically delayed. In addition, the OPP's delay in announcing a close to the conspiracy investigation allowed rumours in the community about the conspiracy to grow, while the OPP came under attack from various sources, such as Mr. Guzzo. By the time the OPP announced an end to its investigation, its credibility had been undermined and the announcement did not satisfy the public.

It is unfortunate that the lack of resources devoted to Project Truth by the OPP forced Detective Inspector Hall to delay some investigations he was tasked with in favour of others. In hindsight, he should have asked for more resources in order to complete this investigation more quickly.

However, given that Detective Inspector Hall was faced with a resource issue, I find that he made a reasonable decision in prioritizing investigations into sexual abuse over a conspiracy that had already been the subject of one investigation, notwithstanding the difficulties that arose as a result of this decision.

The Set-Up of the Conspiracy Investigation

Although Detective Constable Dupuis held the title of lead investigator for the conspiracy investigation, in practice the investigation was headed and directed by Detective Inspector Hall. The other members of the Project Truth team also participated in the case.

Detective Inspector Tim Smith's role in the investigation was quite limited, because he had retired by the time the investigation was fully underway. He participated in only two interviews.

The investigation included a review of the statements that had been taken throughout Project Truth and during Detective Inspector Smith's 1994 investigation. The officers re-interviewed some people who had been previously interviewed, and they conducted interviews of witnesses who were not interviewed in 1994.

The primary method of investigation was statement taking. Detective Inspector Hall testified that traditional methods of investigating a conspiracy, such as wiretaps and surveillance, could not be used in this case, primarily due to costs and a lack of manpower. Detective Inspector Hall did not think that he would be able to obtain a court's authorization to use these methods to investigate a historical conspiracy.

I disagree. The police do not need a court order to conduct surveillance. There may have been some value in conducting surveillance of the key meeting places of the clan in order to find corroboration for Mr. Leroux's story, and to possibly detect any ongoing abuse occurring there. While some of the allegations made by Mr. Leroux were very old, he also alleged that the group had met on Stanley Island as recently as 1993, only four years before the beginning of Project Truth.

Investigation of the "Clan of Pedophiles" Allegation

The first aspect of the conspiracy investigation was the allegation that there was a group or "clan" of pedophiles operating in the Cornwall area, and that this group met at a number of different locations, such as the parish house in St. Andrews, Ken Seguin's house, Malcolm MacDonald's cottage, and the Saltaire Motel in Fort Lauderdale. These allegations were derived from the affidavits and statements made by Mr. Leroux, and from other statements contained in the Fantino Brief.

Allegations about sexual abuse committed by the alleged clan members were investigated separately from the conspiracy investigation, and separate Crown briefs were prepared where such briefs were warranted. Charges were laid against alleged clan members Father Charles MacDonald, Malcolm MacDonald, and Jacques Leduc. In other cases, a Crown brief was prepared but the officers determined that they did not have reasonable and probable grounds for charges.

A number of other people were accused by Mr. Leroux as being members of the clan, yet no complainants came forward during Project Truth alleging that these people had committed acts of abuse. No Crown briefs were prepared for these alleged clan members, no doubt because there were no individual complaints against them, other than Mr. Leroux's allegation that they belonged to the group.

Method of the Investigation

The OPP interviewed all of the individuals named by Mr. Leroux in paragraph six of his affidavit as attending the various meeting places of the clan of pedophiles. Some of these people were complainants who alleged that they had been abused by individuals named by Mr. Leroux as members of the clan. Others did not disclose witnessing or experiencing any abuse. All of the alleged members of the clan were also interviewed. It does not appear that the OPP ever cautioned any of these people during these interviews. Not all of these statements were included in the Crown brief.

For many of the interviews, the officers prepared a list of questions that focused on determining whether the person knew any of the other alleged clan members, and whether that individual had been to any of the alleged meeting places of the group. The questions were modified somewhat for each person who was interviewed, but they were similar because many of the people were allegedly seen at the same places or events.

I agree with the OPP's approach, because in order to address Mr. Leroux's allegations, the OPP had to assess whether the alleged clan members knew one another and whether they had been to any of the locations where Mr. Leroux alleged he had seen them.

However, I find that the questions asked during these interviews were superficial; it appeared that the officers were simply going through the motions. The set list of questions was asked in sequence, often with little or no follow-up, particularly in exploring the nature and depth of people's connections with one another.

I also find that the questions lacked subtlety and lent themselves to denials. It is worth noting that many of the people who were being interviewed would have seen Constable Dunlop's statement of claim, given that they were being sued by him. Father Kevin Maloney told the interviewing officers this, saying, "That's why I'm not shocked by the questions you're asking, I know where you are going." Thus I question the method of running the suspects sequentially through the list of the alleged clan members and clan locations, given that it would have been clear to many of the interviewees what information the OPP would have needed to make their case.

It also puzzles me why the officers asked questions such as, "Have you heard of the term, 'Clan of Pedophiles'? Can you give me your opinion on this matter?" Questions like this cause me to question the objectivity of this part of the investigation.

Investigation of Allegations in Fort Lauderdale, Florida

According to Mr. Leroux, members of the clan were known to frequent the Saltaire Motel, as well as a "pedophile strip" on Birch Avenue, in Fort Lauderdale, Florida. Mr. Leroux claimed to have witnessed abuse perpetrated at the motel by Malcolm MacDonald and a priest named Richard Orlando, who the OPP later discovered was deceased.

On March 20, 1999, an article appeared in the Ottawa Sun in which MPP Garry Guzzo criticized the OPP for failing to interview the owner of the Saltaire Motel. Mr. Guzzo also claimed to have seen "registries from motels on a strip of Ft. Lauderdale, Fla., notorious for its underage male prostitutes" that contained "many of the names" of people who were related to the Project Truth investigation.

It was only as a result of the media coverage that Detective Inspectors Hall and Smith went to Fort Lauderdale in May 1999 to interview the motel owner. When asked whether these allegations fell within Project Truth's mandate, Detective Inspector Hall responded that "we had no jurisdiction in Florida." He pointed out, however, that there was significant concern in the media and also that Detective Inspector Smith was already in Florida to testify at a murder trial.

During their trip, Detective Inspectors Smith and Hall went to the Fort Lauderdale Police Department and provided the names of the individuals identified by Mr. Leroux. A computer search revealed that none of these people had come to the attention of the Fort Lauderdale police. The police also advised that they had not received any complaints about sexual incidents occurring at the Saltaire Motel; the only complaint on file was a theft in 1994.

Detective Inspectors Smith and Hall then attempted to interview the owner of the Saltaire Motel, but he refused to answer any questions. The officers were able to speak to his wife. She did not give a statement, but she agreed to answer a written questionnaire that would be sent to her later by mail.

Detective Inspector Hall prepared and mailed a list of questions. Among other things, he asked whether certain alleged perpetrators had been to the motel. The motel owner replied that the only people on the list who had stayed at the motel were Mr. Leroux, Richard Orlando, and Malcolm MacDonald. He also sent the guest registration slips for these visits. In his reply, the owner told Detective Inspector Hall that Mr. Guzzo had not been to the motel nor viewed the registration slips. The owner said that he had never witnessed any sexual misconduct by guests staying at his motel.

The OPP did not interview the person who owned the motel before 1986, nor did the officers obtain registration slips prior to this date. Nor did they interview the former bookkeeper of the motel whom Mr. Guzzo testified that he spoke with, although the OPP may not have known of this bookkeeper at the time.

Although any incidents of abuse that occurred in Florida would be outside the OPP's jurisdiction, in my view the OPP should have informed their American counterparts of the allegations when they became aware of them in 1997. This would have allowed Florida police to investigate if they found it necessary, and would have alerted them to the possibility that Canadians were travelling to Florida in order to abuse children.

Given the limited resources afforded to Project Truth, I do not find it unreasonable that the investigators did not originally intend to visit Florida. However, they could have taken other investigative steps short of travelling to Fort Lauderdale, including organizing a telephone interview or a written survey (as they later did) to obtain information about whether any of the suspects had been guests of the motel. Doing so might have prevented the criticism that ultimately convinced Detective Inspectors Hall and Smith to make the trip.

The Problem With Investigating the "Clan of Pedophiles" Allegation

There was a fundamental conceptual difficulty with this portion of the investigation undertaken by the OPP. Proving that certain people had a personal or a professional relationship is obviously not enough to establish a criminal conspiracy. In order to lay a criminal charge, the police must be able to prove that these people acted in concert in some way to perpetrate or cover up allegations of sexual abuse.

Thus, establishing that certain people attended Malcolm MacDonald's cottage, Ken Seguin's residence, the St. Andrews Parish house, or the Saltaire Motel does nothing more than provide some corroborating evidence for Mr. Leroux's story. The police must be able to demonstrate that abuse actually occurred at that place, with that person present, and that the person participated in the abuse or knew about the abuse that was being perpetrated by others, or that when these people were together they were conspiring to commit criminal offences.

Without information from complainants of abuse or from informants, this would be very difficult to establish. Unfortunately, the only complainant and informant who alleged he knew of the “clan” abusing people in these locations was Mr. Leroux, whom the OPP found not to be credible. No one else came forward to substantially corroborate Mr. Leroux’s claims. I comment on Mr. Leroux’s credibility in the section “Investigations of Complaints of Ron Leroux and C-15.”

Investigation of the Silmsen Settlement

The Stanley Island Meeting

Ron Leroux alleged that in late August/early September 1993, there was a “VIP meeting” at Malcolm MacDonald’s cottage on Stanley Island. Mr. Leroux did not attend this meeting, but he claimed that Ken Seguin told him after the meeting that the allegations against Mr. Seguin were “settled.” In his amended statement of claim, Constable Dunlop pleaded that the purpose of this meeting was to reach a settlement with David Silmsen for his claims against both Father MacDonald and Mr. Seguin, and to terminate the criminal investigation into these allegations.

The alleged participants named by Mr. Leroux were all interviewed by the OPP. Bishop Eugène LaRocque provided an alibi, telling the officers that he was attending a meeting of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops in Ottawa the weekend of the alleged meeting. The OPP did not follow up and confirm this alibi until requested to do so by Crown Lorne McConnery in July 2001.

Although this new allegation about the Stanley Island meeting was a major focus of the conspiracy investigation, the OPP also re-investigated the parties who had been investigated in 1994 by Detective Inspector Smith in relation to the Silmsen settlement.

The Lawyers

The OPP took a second look at the roles of the lawyers who were involved in reaching the settlement with Mr. Silmsen. Unlike in 1994, the Project Truth team spoke to Malcolm MacDonald’s and Jacques Leduc’s legal assistants.

Mr. MacDonald was interviewed on November 18, 1998, and on December 17, 1999, just prior to his death. It is worth noting that by this time, he had pleaded guilty to attempting to obstruct justice for his role in the settlement.

Mr. Leduc was not interviewed. Detective Inspector Hall believed that he was not likely to agree to an interview, given that he had been charged for sexual abuse. While this may have been the case, it is my view that the officers should have at least attempted to conduct the interview. There was no harm in doing so, and they might have obtained some useful information for their investigation.

Sean Adams, the lawyer who provided independent legal advice to David Silmsen, was not re-interviewed.

Most of the new information obtained in this portion of the investigation thus came from Mr. MacDonald and from Mr. Leduc's former legal assistant, Hélène Jones.

Idea for the Settlement

In his interviews with Project Truth, Malcolm MacDonald told the OPP that he attended a meeting at the request of Mr. Leduc or the Bishop at which the three of them discussed making a settlement. According to Mr. MacDonald, Monsignor Donald McDougald was also present. Mr. MacDonald said that they never explicitly discussed the fact that the settlement would cause the criminal charges to be dropped, but that it was understood as the purpose of the settlement.

Bishop LaRocque testified, to the contrary, that he explicitly said in front of both Mr. MacDonald and Mr. Leduc that he did not want the settlement to interfere with the criminal process. The OPP should have been suspicious about the fact that the Diocese was interested in entering a civil settlement in the absence of a civil action or the concrete possibility of a lawsuit. There was a real need to explore what each of the parties believed that the settlement would achieve.

Drafting and Exchange of Settlement Document

In 1994, both Malcolm MacDonald and Mr. Leduc told the OPP that Mr. Leduc provided a precedent for the settlement, then Mr. MacDonald drafted the document, Mr. Leduc reviewed it and suggested changes, and Mr. MacDonald prepared the final version.

Mr. MacDonald told Project Truth that the word "criminal" was in the version of the settlement document that he sent Mr. Leduc for review. Mr. Leduc had reviewed the document thoroughly, in Mr. MacDonald's view, because Mr. Leduc sent back very detailed changes including minute differences in wording. Mr. MacDonald said that he made these requested changes, and only these changes, before he sent the final version of the document back to Mr. Leduc. Mr. MacDonald did not say this to the police when he was interviewed by Detective Inspector Smith in 1994. When Mr. Leduc was interviewed in 1994, he said that he made some minor changes to some of the document's wording, but that if the word "criminal" was there, he missed it.

One of Mr. Leduc's former assistants, Hélène Jones, provided further information about the draft settlement documents. She was interviewed by Detective

Constable Dupuis on August 9, 2000. A few hours after the interview, Ms Jones called the OPP and told Detective Constable Dupuis that at the time of the settlement, she used a Xerox memory typewriter that was able to retain a limited amount of text in its memory. According to Detective Constable Dupuis' notes, "after document was typed, Jacques asked H  l  ne to erase the memory of the typewriter with reference to this document."

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he did not take steps to obtain copies of the correspondence or draft agreements that went between Mr. Leduc's office and Mr. MacDonald's office. He did not ask the lawyers to voluntarily provide them, and he did not obtain a search warrant for these materials. It surprises me that Detective Inspector Hall did not think he had reasonable and probable grounds to obtain a warrant, given Mr. MacDonald's admission that draft copies of the settlement agreement had passed between the two offices.

It is also unfortunate that, just like Detective Inspector Smith, Detective Inspector Hall did not obtain a fax from Mr. Leduc to Mr. MacDonald that contained a draft settlement with handwritten notations. It is similar to the final settlement document but does not contain the illegal clause in paragraph two. Instead, there is a handwritten note indicating where paragraph two should be inserted, without the text of this paragraph, and the later paragraphs are renumbered. This document was disclosed by Mr. Leduc in a subsequent civil proceeding. Detective Inspector Hall admitted that this document would have been useful in his investigation.

In addition, Detective Inspector Hall repeated the error made by Detective Inspector Smith in failing to obtain documentation that could have indicated where the settlement monies came from.

Reconsideration of Jacques Leduc as a Suspect

Detective Inspector Hall testified that the fact that Mr. Leduc had been charged for alleged abuse did not cause him to reassess Mr. Leduc's motives in 1993 and think that perhaps Mr. Leduc had something to gain in reaching this illegal settlement. He obviously did not consider the possibility that Mr. Leduc could have been afraid that charges against Father MacDonald might have encouraged other alleged victims to come forward to accuse their abusers.

Crown Lorne McConnery had a very different view. Upon reviewing the brief, he noted:

It is quite clear that Mr. Leduc, having been subsequently charged with sexual assaults himself, is not necessarily the person he was considered to be in 1994. This subsequent investigation of both Leduc and Malcolm MacDonald put them both in a different light.

In retrospect, Leduc and Malcolm MacDonald could clearly be seen to have their own personal agenda in getting Mr. Silmser to sign this agreement in 1993. Without the evidence of Malcolm MacDonald, is there really a case to pursue against Leduc?

Mr. McConnery testified that once Mr. MacDonald died in December 1999, it would have been difficult to make a case against Mr. Leduc. However, the OPP should have made efforts to obtain all of the relevant documentation and then decided whether there was sufficient evidence to proceed in the absence of Mr. MacDonald's testimony.

Role of Sean Adams

It does not appear that the OPP reconsidered the role of Sean Adams, either, despite new information that they received from Malcolm MacDonald.

Mr. Adams told Detective Inspector Smith in 1994 that David Silmser had approached him and asked him to provide independent legal advice. Mr. Adams said that Mr. Silmser was a former client. He also said that he did not discuss the matter with Mr. MacDonald prior to the settlement, other than to set up a meeting at his office.

However, Mr. MacDonald told the Project Truth investigators that he had asked Mr. Adams to give Mr. Silmser independent legal advice. He also said that the two men had not met before.

Notwithstanding this important discrepancy, Mr. Adams was not re-interviewed during the Project Truth investigation.

By 2000, the OPP also would have been aware that Mr. MacDonald had instructed Mr. Adams to hold the settlement monies for Mr. Silmser in escrow until Mr. Silmser advised the police that he did not want to proceed with charges. This document was appended to Constable Dunlop's will-state. It certainly calls into question Mr. Adams' role in the settlement, as it demonstrates that Mr. Adams knew or ought to have known that the payment was contingent on charges being dropped. In addition, Mr. Adams witnessed David Silmser sign the direction to the CPS to terminate its investigation.

The Diocese's Understanding of the Effects of the Settlement

The OPP re-interviewed the Diocesan officials who had been interviewed in 1994: Bishop LaRocque, Monsignor McDougald, Gordon Bryan, and Father Denis Vaillancourt. Detective Inspector Hall testified that the officers approached Father MacDonald during the conspiracy investigation but he refused to be interviewed. He had already been arrested for charges related to sexual abuse by the time Project Truth began.

The OPP received considerable evidence from these interviews to support Malcolm MacDonald's assertion that the parties who decided to enter the civil settlement with Mr. Silmsner understood that it would result in the suppression of criminal charges.

Although the officers did not interview Father Charles MacDonald, the OPP had some evidence from the 1994 investigation that suggested that he understood that the effect of the settlement was that the charges against him would be dropped. He told Detective Constable Michael Fagan in 1994:

Sometimes people in high profile positions panic at the thought of their name being publically [sic] connected to a crime, especially sexual assault rather than go through the agony of proving there [sic] innocence and enduring the stigma they are willing to buy the accusers silence ...

In Bishop LaRocque's interview with Project Truth, the Bishop said that Mr. Leduc and Mr. MacDonald explicitly told him that the settlement would only relate to a civil case and would not affect the criminal process:

[T]hey convinced me that it would be good for the Diocese, and for Father Charles, and for David SILMSER, if we were to settle this thing out of court. The civil effects, but they assured me that there was nothing to do with the criminal effects of the case.

This comment is a significant change from the Bishop's viewpoint in 1994. At that time, he told Detective Inspector Smith that the lawyers told him that the settlement would avoid scandal, preserve Father MacDonald's reputation, and allow the priest to continue his work. The Bishop denied, however, that in return for the money, Mr. Silmsner was not to bring charges against Father MacDonald.

I would note that at the hearings Bishop LaRocque testified that the lawyers told him that the settlement would allow Father MacDonald to continue his ministry, but that the complainant would remain free to follow the criminal process. He also testified that the settlement would keep things quiet and avoid scandal.

I fail to see how a civil settlement would avoid scandal, protect Father MacDonald's reputation, and allow him to keep working if criminal charges were eventually laid.

It is unfortunate that the officers did not present this discrepancy to the Bishop and probe the issue further with him in their interview. Clearly the Bishop's intentions in reaching the settlement and the representations made to him by the lawyers were key issues in determining whether anyone other than Mr. MacDonald believed that the purpose of the settlement was to force David Silmsers to withdraw his criminal complaint.

In addition, the officers had information that Detective Inspector Smith had obtained from Nancy Seguin in 1994 that the Bishop told her that "David Silmsers in return for the money was to stay quiet and not bring charges against Fr. Charlie." No statement was taken from her then, and given the new information obtained and the broader re-investigation, she was someone who could and perhaps should have been fully and properly interviewed.

The bursar, Gordon Bryan, told the officers that the purpose of the settlement was "so that Father Charlie would not be embarrassed by ah, all of this ah, kind of allegations coming out in the press."

Father Vaillancourt told the police, "[T]he decision was made to, to give him money to save the reputation of Father MacDonald whether he was guilty or not."

Monsignor McDougald was interviewed twice by Project Truth, once in relation to Mr. Leroux's allegations about sexual abuse, and once in relation to the settlement with Mr. Silmsers. In the latter interview, Monsignor McDougald denied having anything to do with the settlement and said that it was a matter between the Bishop and the lawyers.

David Silmsers's Perspective

It does not appear to me that the officers approached the investigation from the perspective of understanding why David Silmsers wrote the direction he did and then went to the Cornwall Police Service and dropped the complaint. Clearly he believed that he had to do this in order to receive the $32,000 payment. In addition, it is clear from his interview with the Children's Aid Society in November 1993, a copy of which the OPP had had since 1994, that Mr. Silmsers thought he would lose the $32,000 payment for talking to anyone, including the police or CAS, about his allegations. He was not interviewed as part of the conspiracy investigation.

Detective Inspector Hall explained that he did not interview Mr. Silmsers because "David Silmsers at that point had been interviewed several times by police officers ... and he wasn't too receptive." He added that if Mr. Silmsers had any useful information, "I'm sure if he had he would have told us." I find this explanation wholly unsatisfactory. Even though the police had a difficult time dealing with Mr. Silmsers, at the very least an attempt could have been made to interview him.

Furthermore, the OPP did not explore the issue with the various other people involved in the settlement. Neither Mr. Leduc nor Mr. Adams were interviewed, and neither Bishop LaRocque nor Malcolm MacDonald were asked for many details about the conversations they had with each other or Mr. Silmsers around the time of the settlement, or why Mr. Silmsers would have believed that he had to drop the charges.

Interviews of CPS Officers

One of the biggest differences between Detective Inspector Smith's 1994 investigation into the conspiracy to obstruct justice and Project Truth's investigation into the matter was the fact that Project Truth interviewed and obtained police notes from most of the CPS officers involved. Detective Inspector Hall and Detective Constable Dupuis attempted to interview Constable Heidi Sebalj, but she was on sick leave at that time and declined to be interviewed. This is an unfortunate gap, given that Constable Sebalj was a key witness. It is equally unfortunate that she was unable to testify at this Inquiry.

The officers were provided with a list of written questions just prior to their interviews. Detective Constable Dupuis testified this was not normal procedure but that the purpose of this was to give the officers "a feel of where we were going to, to assist them in their thought process." This in my view, is unacceptable. Differential treatment should be discouraged, and the OPP should, except in exceptional circumstances, employ the same procedures when interviewing police officers as when interviewing anyone else.

I have only a few comments to make about these interviews.

I find it unfortunate that the OPP did not obtain the officers' notes prior to interviewing some of the other alleged suspects who had interactions with the officers, such as Murray MacDonald and Malcolm Macdonald. The OPP asked for and obtained the notes around the time of the CPS interviews in January and February 2000.

I also find it surprising that the OPP did not already have the notes of certain officers, particularly those who had contacts with David Silmsers, such as Sergeant Ron Lefebvre. These notes may have been necessary to disclose to the defence in the Father MacDonald trial, an issue that I address elsewhere in this chapter.

I find that the issues raised by Constable Dunlop in his statement of claim and in his other materials were addressed during the interviews with the CPS officers and the OPP received reasonable explanations.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he did not think that it was a real possibility that the officers were corrupt and had done the things that Constable Dunlop had alleged.

All of the officers were interviewed in early 2000, with the exception of Chief Claude Shaver. Chief Shaver was interviewed on July 9, 1999. Detective Inspector Hall told Chief Shaver at the outset of the interview that he was “being interviewed strictly as a witness.” I am surprised by this comment, given that in 1994, Detective Inspector Smith believed that Chief Shaver would have had to have been involved in the conspiracy in order for it to work. It appears that the OPP was deviating from its typical practice of interviewing the key suspect last by interviewing Chief Shaver before the conspiracy investigation was well underway. Given what Chief Shaver was told, and the types of questions that were put to him, I question whether Project Truth ever considered him to be a suspect.

Interview of Crown Murray MacDonald

As part of the conspiracy investigation, the OPP purportedly took a second look at Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald’s role in advising the CPS to not lay charges against Father Charles MacDonald in 1993. The actions that were taken by Crown MacDonald at that time are explored in detail in Chapter 11, “Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.”

Murray MacDonald was re-interviewed by Detective Inspectors Hall and Smith on December 17, 1998.

For the most part, the interview dealt with the allegations raised by Mr. Leroux. They questioned Murray MacDonald about whether he had been at a party at St. Andrews Parish, whether he had been at Ken Seguin’s house, whether he had been at Malcolm MacDonald’s cottage, and whether he knew of a cottage owned by a priest or Bishop at Cameron’s Point. The officers asked Murray MacDonald only a few questions about his role in the David Silmsier matter. In fact, Detective Inspector Smith said, “[I]n 1994 we interviewed you in regard to um, your part, or your knowledge of a settlement that took place between a David SILMSIER and ah, the Diocese of Cornwall. Um. I don’t plan to ah, re-address that issue. We’re satisfied with the results of that investigation.”

The questions that were asked about the events surrounding the settlement were highly leading. Some of them seemed to be in direct response to media allegations. For example, Detective Inspector Smith asked Murray MacDonald about whether he provided a written opinion, saying, “[I]t’s alleged that all of this was done in secret. But there is documentation ... both between yourself and the Cornwall police, in regard to these allegations ... and this is prior to ah, Perry Dunlop getting involved.”

It was not, in my view, a probing interview. There was no attempt to obtain new evidence about the events surrounding the settlement, including Murray MacDonald's conversations with Mr. Leduc and Malcolm MacDonald around the time of the settlement, and his conversations with Chief Shaver after the settlement.

Detective Inspector Smith admitted during the hearing that he did not view Murray MacDonald as a suspect in 1998. This is clear both from the leading questions he asked during the interview as well as from the nature of some of the questions. For example, Detective Inspector Smith asked:

[C]an you give us your ah, your stand on, and your position you take on sexual abuse, within your jurisdiction, and some, perhaps, some of the experiences, some of the things that you've had to do that, that um, have ah, would indicate your integrity?

This interview demonstrates the problem with tasking Detective Inspector Smith to revisit his previous investigation. Clearly he had made up his mind about certain people, and the issues were not addressed from a fresh perspective. Furthermore, Detective Inspector Smith had worked with Murray MacDonald during the prosecutions that arose from the investigation into the St. Joseph's Training School in Alfred. In hindsight, it was not wise to assign this task to Detective Inspector Smith.

This view of Murray MacDonald may also explain why Detective Inspector Smith did not see a problem with his presence at the April 24, 1997, meeting at the formation of Project Truth.

It appears that Detective Inspector Hall had a slightly different view. He testified that Murray MacDonald could have been a suspect but was being interviewed as a witness. If he said anything inculpatory, Detective Inspector Hall would have cautioned him.

It is my view that the OPP was not justified in immediately ruling Murray MacDonald out as a suspect in this case, at least not prior to a complete investigation. As mentioned in Chapter 11, his actions in this matter were not without flaws, as he should not have written the opinion letter to the CPS without a full review of all of the investigative materials, including possibly the settlement, and given that he had declared a conflict of interest. Rather than advising the CPS that they could not have proceeded with an unwilling complainant, he should have encouraged them to discover why Mr. Silmsen wanted to drop the complaint, and he should have been wary that counsel for the other parties involved in the settlement were contacting him and the investigating officer.

Although the OPP may have reached the same conclusion as in 1994, this interview demonstrates that the OPP did not attempt to re-evaluate Murray

MacDonald's role in the alleged conspiracy. The objective of this interview was to address Mr. Leroux's allegations against him, rather than conduct a fresh re-investigation of the David Silmser matter.

Destruction of Videotapes Found in Ron Leroux's Home

The issue of the tapes was raised in several of the affidavits and statements given to Constable Dunlop that were included in the Fantino Brief. My concerns about the destruction of these tapes are more fully set out earlier in this chapter, in the section "Videotapes Found in Ron Leroux's House by the OPP."

In his affidavit dated November 13, 1996, Mr. Leroux states that the OPP searched his house in November 1993 and seized a suitcase containing pornographic tapes. Mr. Leroux said that Ken Seguin later told him that "these tapes would 'clinch' a conviction against him." Mr. Leroux did not say that any other members of the clan were on the tapes. In his statement to the OPP in Orillia, Mr. Leroux mentioned that there were people other than Ken Seguin on the tapes and that Mr. Seguin had told him that "a lot of people were going down" if the tapes were discovered. C-8 mentioned the seizure of the tapes in his statement in the Fantino Brief, although he did not say anything about what was on them. Gerald Renshaw said that Mr. Seguin told him that he "had to get rid of some videotapes that would implicate him."

The Project Truth investigators interviewed the officers who seized the tapes, the officers who viewed them, and their supervising officer in fall 1998 and early winter 1999. They did not, however, interview the caretaker who had, according to Constable Steve McDougald, destroyed the tapes.

The tapes became a major issue in the media in the summer of 2001 when MPP Garry Guzzo mentioned in the legislature that pornographic tapes containing evidence of the "kingpins" of the pedophile network operating in Cornwall had been destroyed by the OPP. Mr. Guzzo also stated that the tapes had been found and that a citizen's group had them.

By this point in time, the Crown brief in the conspiracy investigation had already been submitted and was being reviewed. Lorne McConnery wrote to Detective Inspector Hall on July 11, 2001, and requested that he ascertain whether the tapes still existed and obtain them if they did. Detective Inspector Hall interviewed Carson Chisholm and wrote to Mr. Guzzo about the matter. Both denied having copies of the tapes. Mr. Guzzo told Detective Inspector Hall that he would attempt to contact the person who could provide them, but Detective Inspector Hall testified that he did not hear back from Mr. Guzzo about this.

Mr. Guzzo continued to raise the issue of the tapes in the press after Project Truth announced that its investigation was over, and he alleged that the OPP would have been able to convict all those who had not been charged had the tapes not been destroyed.

It is unfortunate that the OPP's investigation into the destruction of the tapes did not silence the public speculation about what was on them. This is one of several issues where the OPP did not respond well to media reports.

Submission of the Crown Brief

The Crown brief for the conspiracy investigation was submitted on July 20, 2000. The brief consisted of nine volumes of materials and was over 3,000 pages long. This was the largest Crown brief prepared during the Project Truth investigation.

On top of the investigative materials that were included, Detective Inspector Hall and Detective Constable Dupuis prepared three summary documents: a timeline, a synopsis, and a document called, "Allegations of Constable Perry Dunlop." Each of these documents is described in detail below.

The first volume of the brief contained these summary materials, as well as the materials upon which the investigation was based, namely Constable Dunlop's statement of claim and his April 7, 1997, letter to the Solicitor General. Volumes 2 to 6 contained statements from civilian witnesses, organized alphabetically. Volumes 7 and 8 contained statements and notes from police officers. Finally, Volume 9 contained some of the documentary evidence that surrounded the Silmser settlement. It also contained materials that were not directly connected to the issues under investigation by the OPP, such as the death threats against Constable Dunlop's daughter. It remains unclear to me why some of these materials were added to this voluminous brief.

Timeline

The timeline set out the facts underlying the alleged obstruction of justice in the Silmser case, beginning with his complaint and ending with the termination of Detective Inspector Smith's investigation in 1994. The document was prepared by Detective Constable Dupuis and was reviewed and approved by Detective Inspector Hall.

Detective Constable Dupuis acknowledged that the majority of the entries deal with actions taken by the CPS. The timeline does not set out in detail the actions taken by other alleged conspirators, such as Crown Murray MacDonald or the lawyers involved in drafting the release and providing advice to David Silmser. For example, there is no mention of advice given by Murray MacDonald to Constable Sebalj throughout the investigation, no mention of conversation between Murray MacDonald and Malcolm MacDonald prior to the settlement, no details about when Sean Adams was retained, and no details about draft documents for the settlement. Detective Inspector Hall testified that this document focused on the actions of the CPS because in his view, “most of the events revolved around the Cornwall Police Service.”

Synopsis

Detective Inspector Hall prepared the synopsis. It set out the background of Mr. Silmsker’s complaint to the CPS in 1992, the settlement, the subsequent police investigations into the settlement, Constable Dunlop’s civil action, the claims made in the Fantino Brief about a purported “clan of pedophiles,” the various elements of the conspiracy that had been alleged by Constable Dunlop and the media, as well as some of the investigative steps taken by the Project Truth team during their investigation.

I find this document problematic for a number of reasons.

First, it contains at least one key factual error. The synopsis states that in September 1993, the CPS was directed by Malcolm MacDonald to stop the criminal proceedings against Father Charles MacDonald. It says that Mr. MacDonald was acting as David Silmsker’s lawyer; however, Mr. MacDonald was actually the lawyer acting for Father MacDonald. Obviously, a request from an accused person’s lawyer to end a criminal investigation is far more suspicious than a request from a complainant’s lawyer to do so.

Second, it fails to mention key facts that would explain certain suspects’ alleged role in the conspiracy. For example, there is no mention of the legal advice that Murray MacDonald gave to the CPS that led the CPS to drop the complaint. Given that the brief was so voluminous, it was essential to set out the key facts for the Crown in this synopsis so that he or she could turn his mind to the appropriate issues while reviewing the statements contained within the brief, rather than requiring the Crown to glean the key facts from the materials as they were reviewed.

Third, the synopsis fails to clearly set out the mandate of the investigation. It is unclear after reading the synopsis whether the investigation was simply a re-investigation of the David Silmsker matter or whether it was broader.

Fourth, although Detective Inspector Hall testified that this document did not contain the findings of his investigation or any conclusions, I find that his opinion is implicitly reflected through his choice of language used to describe the allegations. For example, he notes that “Mr. Dunlop began a crusade aimed at exposing what he perceived to be a conspiracy in Cornwall” (emphasis added). Further, he repeats the language used by Crown Robert Pelletier in a 1997 memo to Peter Griffiths in which Mr. Pelletier attributes the conspiracy theory to “three unfortunate coincidences,” namely the conviction of Murray MacDonald’s father for sexual abuse, the advice given by Murray MacDonald to the CPS to not lay charges in the Silmsner matter, and Malcolm MacDonald's conviction for obstruction of justice.

Finally, this document shows that the investigation has been completely framed by Mr. Leroux, Constable Dunlop, and the later media allegations, and that there has been little or no independent thought on how to investigate the broader claim that prominent people in the community have been obstructing justice.

"Allegations of Constable Perry Dunlop" Document

This document was prepared by Detective Inspector Hall, possibly with assistance from Detective Constable Dupuis. It analyzes the following four matters raised in Constable Dunlop's will-state:

1. Richard Abell indicated that there was a cover-up.
2. Father Charles MacDonald was getting nervous about being arrested and handcuffed.
3. Dunlop found it suspicious that the Silmsner complaint was entered on a project file rather than on the Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Cooperative.
4. The OPP had illegally seized videotapes from Mr. Leroux's residence.

For each of these points, Detective Inspector Hall provides some commentary, some of which stems from the investigative materials and some of which appear to be his opinion.

Again, I find this document troubling for a number of reasons.

First of all, it is unclear to me why these four particular issues were selected for analysis. These are not key events or facts that are essential to the claim of a conspiracy, nor are they the most important elements of Constable Dunlop's conspiracy theory. There is no coherent link between these four issues.

Second, some of the analysis in this document is inaccurate. For example, after setting out Constable Dunlop's allegation that Richard Abell says that there was a cover-up, the document states that during his interview with the OPP, Mr. Abell "adamantly denies ever saying there was a cover-up" and that "he does not believe there was a cover-up. However, Mr. Abell actually said in his statement that while he did not recall saying that there had been a cover-up, he believed that the effect of the settlement was to cover up the allegations against Father MacDonald.

The document also states that Constable Dunlop's allegation about the illegal seizure of the videotapes is "totally false." As discussed elsewhere in this chapter, the OPP would have discovered that pornographic videotapes were indeed seized during a firearms search at Mr. Leroux's home. However, rather than addressing what this investigation revealed about the real issue underlying the tapes, i.e., whether or not they contained evidence of sexual abuse, the document simply sets out the fact that that Mr. Leroux gave contradictory stories about the tapes.

Finally, the document goes into some detail about the allegation that the David Silmsner complaint was put on a project file and concludes that the file was not used “for an illegal purpose.” I think this mischaracterizes Constable Dunlop’s allegation; he did not allege that the use of the project file was illegal. Detective Inspector Hall testified that he did not find it problematic that the case was entered as a project file. He says, “I don’t think it would be unusual, it’s the nature of the investigation. Here you’ve got allegations against a priest and a probation officer.” The document does not draw the Crown’s attention to the fact that a number of the officers interviewed indicated that entering the information on a project file was unusual for cases of sexual assault.

Comments on Summary Documents

Although I recognize and accept the officers’ testimony that the substantive results of the investigation are contained in the statements taken by the officers and the evidence collected by them, I do think that it is important that the summary materials provided by officers must be accurate and well-prepared, particularly given the volume of materials contained in the Crown brief. The summary documents should provide the Crown with a clear understanding of the nature and scope of the allegations under investigation, and should highlight key issues for the Crown to consider.

I would recommend that when asking the Crown for an opinion on a large and complex brief, the police should point out particular areas in which they would like to have the Crown’s opinion. For example, they might request a fresh look at the evidence or ask for the Crown’s views on what charges should be laid. Of course, the Crown must also exercise discretion to address issues that the police do not specifically draw to his or her attention.

Awaiting an Opinion on the Brief

The Crown brief was submitted on July 20, 2000, but an opinion was not issued until over a year later, on August 15, 2001. The OPP was also waiting for an opinion to be rendered on five other Crown briefs that had been submitted to the Crown in fall 1999. This delay is discussed in detail in Chapter 11.

All of these briefs were initially provided to Crown Shelley Hallett. Detective Inspector Hall testified that Ms Hallett told him that she wanted to review the conspiracy brief before she rendered an opinion on these five other investigations. All of these briefs involved complaints made by Mr. Leroux, while one of them contained an additional complaint from C-15. Detective Inspector Hall testified that it made sense for Ms Hallett to review these briefs together because Mr. Leroux was a common element in all of them.

As discussed in the previous section of this chapter, in the fall of 2000 and the winter of 2001 the OPP was facing considerable public pressure to declare an end to the investigation. Detective Inspector Hall also testified that he wanted to conclude the investigation in fairness to those who had been accused of abuse.

Crown Hallett had initially told Detective Inspector Hall that she would have the briefs reviewed by the end of October 2000. When this did not happen, he spoke to both her superior and his own and expressed his concerns.

Detective Superintendent Chris Lewis raised the issue with senior Crown officials in the winter of 2000–2001. He was told by Murray Segal that Ms Hallett was about to start a trial and he was reluctant to speak to her about it. Mr. Segal testified that he did not consider reassigning the briefs at that time.

After the stay of proceedings in the Jacques Leduc matter, Detective Inspector Hall sent the following e-mail to Detective Superintendent Jim Miller on April 16, 2001:

MATTERS WE ARE WAITING FOR LEGAL OPINIONS ON—
Five clergy and conspiracy. HALLETT had promised on numerous occasions she would have them for us. We are being held hostage by the CROWN'S office. I have spoken to Reg. Crown Jim STEWART about it. Chris LEWIS has also spoken to him and Murray SEGAL. The Mayor of Cornwall, the Chair of the Police Services Board, The Chief of C.P.S., Crown Attorney Murray MACDONALD and Lawyers for the Bishop have all contacted me as to when our investigation will be concluded. Since HALLETT has been removed from Project Truth case Jim STEWART is in the process of getting three crowns together to review these cases. I would expect this to take place in the next couple of weeks.

After receiving this e-mail from Detective Inspector Hall, Detective Superintendent Miller e-mailed Murray Segal on May 22, 2001, that he was “very concerned with the time frame involved here.” He asked when the OPP could expect “some feed back on the opinions that Det. Inspector Pat Hall has asked for.”

Detective Superintendent Miller was informed the following day that the opinions had been reassigned to Crown Lorne McConnery who would be reviewing the materials “on a priority basis.”

I find that Detective Inspector Hall took appropriate action in this case by raising the issue with his superiors once it became evident that he could not resolve it directly with Crown Hallett. In turn, his superiors attempted to deal with Ms Hallett's superior. This said, once it became clear that the Crown was not going to render an opinion within an acceptable time frame, the OPP needed to reconsider its options.

Both Detective Inspector Hall and Detective Constable Dupuis testified that they did not have a subjective belief that there were reasonable and probable grounds to lay a charge in the conspiracy investigation. Detective Inspector Hall said that he was not likely to lay charges unless Ms Hallett saw something that he did not see. It is my view that rather than being paralyzed by the Crown's inaction, they needed to make their own decision about whether or not to lay charges. Given that the police had no reasonable and probable grounds, it is highly unlikely that the review of the briefs would have led to a recommendation for charges, and thus the OPP should have considered concluding its work and announcing an end to the investigation in the absence of a Crown opinion.

The Winding Down of Project Truth

The officers submitted their Crown brief on the conspiracy investigation on July 20, 2000. This date marks the end, in my view, of the investigative stage of Project Truth. Just prior to the submission of the brief, on July 18, 2000, Detective Constable Genier went through the case manager assignment book and closed off a number of outstanding assignments by entering the following under the heading "Action Taken":

Above was previously spoken to in original Father MacDonald brief or is mentioned in Perry Dunlop's binders as a person related to persons aware of abuse. Considering time lapse and opportunity to report abuse since original brief, above will not be interviewed. Detective Constable Genier.³⁷

At the hearing, Detective Inspector Hall explained the rationale behind the decision not to contact these individuals:

These people didn't contact us. These were names we derived from a list. And I believe Detective Constable Seguin acquired a list of potential altar boys, the people that we thought were altar boys at one time.

37. The assignments were largely identified by the name of the person to be spoken to. As such, "above" refers to each of the people identified in the assignment.

... So we made a decision that we weren't going to go out and start soliciting complaints, so to speak; that if somebody had a complaint they would either call us or call somebody, maybe even Mr. Dunlop, to bring it forward. That's mainly why these weren't addressed.

And we had been going from '97 at this point so they had, you know, a few years to think about it.

[I]t would have took considerable time to go, like I say, knocking on doors and soliciting. Some of them we didn't even know where they were. Some of them had moved out west. Some of them were deceased. I mean, if I had a big team of investigators and we wanted to contact every person that's name came to us to determine why it was in the material; sure.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that as of July 18, 2000, the "active investigation" was "pretty well" on hold. However, he noted that the Project Truth officers would have been available through their local detachments to investigate complaints that came in after this date.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he was under pressure from the local detachments to end the investigation, and this factored into his decision:

I was constantly being asked to—when the investigators would be returned to their detachment—Inspector Hawkins; I had several conversations with him about, "When can we get the men back? When can we get the men back?" So as a responsible supervisor and management of resources I made a decision, we weren't going to go any further unless they came to us.

Follow-Up With the Crown

Detective Inspector Hall met with Crowns Lorne McConnery and Kevin Phillips several times to go over the brief to ensure that they understood the nature of the allegations and the information provided by the investigating officers.

Crown Opinion and Press Release

On August 15, 2001, Lorne McConnery rendered an opinion recommending that no charges be laid. The opinion letter to Detective Inspector Hall stated:

The laying of criminal charges by an officer is predicated upon his or her being satisfied both objectively and subjectively that there is credible evidence of all of the essential elements of the offence investigated respecting all parties against whom the charges are alleged. The officer in swearing the information must state under oath that he or she believes that the evidence is sufficiently strong to give rise to reasonable and probable grounds. The objective and subjective aspects of the test of reasonable and probable grounds must be satisfied before any criminal charges are laid.

I understand from several discussions with yourself, and with Detective Constables Joe Dupuis and Don Genier and information from Detective Constable Steve Seguin that the investigating officers are not personally satisfied that reasonable and probable grounds exist to lay charges in the six briefs provided to me. Absent such subjective belief that the grounds exist, criminal charges cannot be laid.

Upon our review of all the above-noted material, I find that your concerns and conclusions about the lack of reasonable and probable grounds are appropriate and justified. All of the allegations of the complainants Leroux and [C-15] have been carefully studied in the context in which those allegations were made, and your opinion as to the credibility of the allegations is reasonable and well founded in my view.

The OPP issued a press release announcing the conclusion of Project Truth on August 22, 2001. The press release said, in part:

... Legal opinions were sought from Crown Law Office Criminal concerning a number of remaining matters, and as a result, investigators have determined that there is not sufficient evidence to lay additional criminal charges in this investigation.

The OPP found no evidence that a pedophile ring operated in the city. There is nothing to indicate individuals operated in concert with each other to commit offences.

...

[A]llegations of a criminal conspiracy involving a cover up were also thoroughly investigated. No evidence of any such criminal wrong doing was discovered.

Mr. McConnery testified that he had an issue with the comment made in the press release that the OPP had found no evidence of a pedophile ring:

I was never asked for an opinion on that. I don't know if it would have been a proper question to ever put to me because I don't—we don't give opinions on things like that. We are asked was there evidence to support this criminal charge.

And so the thrust of this press release seemed to me to be saying this has all been subjected to Crown review, i.e., Lorne McConnery, without naming me, and he too has found that there is no paedophile ring in the City of Cornwall.

I share Mr. McConnery's criticism of the OPP's August 22 press release. His opinion was restricted to determining whether, based on the material provided to him, there was a basis to support a charge of criminal conspiracy. He was not asked for his opinion on the broader question of the existence of a pedophile ring. I discuss this broader question in the linkages section below.

Investigation of Linkages Among Alleged Perpetrators

As mentioned in the previous section of this chapter, there were numerous reasons why many members of the public were not satisfied with the work of Project Truth and with its final press release announcing that there was no "pedophile ring" operating in the Cornwall area. Even before Project Truth's final announcement, thousands of people signed petitions asking for an inquiry into the allegations of sexual abuse in Cornwall.

Defining a "Ring"

The difficulty with tasking the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) to investigate a pedophile ring is, such a ring is not easily defined at law. It is not a crime to be a "member" of a group of pedophiles; it is only a crime to commit acts of abuse, to assist others in doing so, to assist an abuser in avoiding criminal charges after the fact, or to conspire to commit abuse.

Because there is no legal definition of a pedophile ring, the concept could mean different things to different people. It could be:

- a group of people who committed acts of abuse together;
- a group of people who actively assisted one another in committing acts of abuse, either through passing young people between them, or by covering up one another's actions; or

- a group of people who were passively aware that the others were committing acts of abuse and did nothing to stop it.

Some people would define a “ring” as a group of people who all know one another, while others would say that a ring could exist even if some of the people involved know some but not all of the others.

Given the information that it had, it is difficult to say whether the OPP should have declared that it had found some evidence of a “pedophile ring.”

On one hand, such a declaration would have answered the rumours that were widespread in the community at that time. As discussed further in this section, it was well known that there were connections between some of the alleged perpetrators and that there was some evidence that certain alleged victims had been passed between abusers.

On the other hand, this terminology creates a great deal of stigma for the individuals labelled as members of a ring, for the institutions that employed these people, for innocent associates of the accused, and for the police forces that failed to find the ring sooner. A declaration by the OPP may have added to the widespread panic in the community rather than resolving the public’s fears. Both of these factors could have been exacerbated if, after laying charges, the justice system could not secure convictions for many of the accused.

I question whether the OPP considered the matter strategically, or whether its outright denial of the existence of a ring was based on the very strict definition relied upon by the officer in charge of Project Truth at its completion. Detective Inspector Pat Hall testified that in his mind, a ring consisted of a group of people who all knew one another and were all working together. He would not consider a group of abusers who introduced children to other abusers to be a ring unless the last person in the chain knew the first. It was for this reason that he could not say there was a ring in the Claude Marleau case; only some, but not all, of the alleged perpetrators knew one another.

In addition, Detective Inspector Hall testified that in order to establish a ring, the suspects would first have to be convicted for sexual abuse:

... I would have preferred to have some convictions on the allegations we had so that I could say that the victim is a true victim. Secondly, that the suspect is now a charged person and then I would determine what linkages there were between the individuals and I would go somewhere.

... [Y]ou can’t say there’s a pedophile ring until you’ve got convictions. And you can’t get convictions until you have alleged victims giving you the information.

I find this logic overly restrictive and even circular. It does not make sense to wait for convictions to begin looking for a ring—the linkages themselves could have led to convictions on abuse-related charges, conspiracy charges, or accessory charges, and this information could have been useful during investigations, trials, and sentencing.

It is unclear to me whether senior OPP officials were aware that Detective Inspector Hall had such a narrow view, or whether they simply adopted his determination that Project Truth had found no evidence of a ring. Detective Superintendent Chris Lewis testified that Detective Inspector Hall did not tell him that he needed at least two convictions to say that there was a ring. Detective Superintendent Lewis testified:

I hadn't thought specifically at that time what that might mean, that kind of that—the word “ring” was used, et cetera, but I certainly would consider more than just knowing one another and having common victims ... as being an organized ring.

Throughout this Inquiry I have heard evidence that suggested that there were cases of joint abuse, passing of alleged victims, and possibly passive knowledge of abuse. I want to be very clear that I am not going to make a pronouncement on whether a ring existed or not; it is not within my mandate to say what would have come from this information had it been explored more fully.

What I am saying is that there is good reason why certain members of the public were less than satisfied with the OPP's unequivocal position about the non-existence of a ring. I would note that much of what I have heard about linkages remain allegations that have not been proven beyond a reasonable doubt. Nonetheless, these allegations merited an in-depth review and investigation to determine if there was any significance to the linkages and to lay charges where appropriate.

Allegations of Joint Abuse

I have, for example, heard evidence that individuals acting together may have jointly abused some individuals. Claude Marleau, for example, alleged that more than one person was present in some of the instances when he was abused. Although Father Paul Lapierre was convicted in Quebec for one of these incidents, his alleged co-abuser was acquitted. In the other instance, the alleged co-abuser was dead, so it cannot be said that the OPP would have been able to obtain a conviction for joint abuse.

C-21 alleged that he attended events at Jean Luc Leblanc's cottage where a number of adults were abusing children together. The OPP did not investigate these allegations, as they occurred in Quebec, but passed them on to the local Quebec police. However, Mr. Leblanc was charged and convicted for other instances when he abused C-21.

Allegations of Passing of Victims and Overt or Implicit Knowledge

There have also been numerous allegations of young people being passed from one abuser to another. In some cases, it was clear that the alleged abusers knew about each other's criminal proclivities; in others, a case for such knowledge would be based on circumstantial evidence about the close ties that the two alleged perpetrators shared. Some of these alleged perpetrators worked together, some were friends, and some were connected through the probations and criminal justice system.

Some examples of this linkage are the five people who testified about one of their alleged abusers knowing of the others' criminal proclivities. Mr. Marleau claimed that he had been passed from Roch Landry to Father Paul Lapierre, and that Father Lapierre introduced him to a number of his other alleged abusers.

Keith Ouellette alleged that after his probation officer, Ken Seguin, abused him, Mr. Seguin sent him to Manpower to see Richard Hickerson, who also allegedly abused him. C-5 claimed that Mr. Seguin introduced him to Malcolm MacDonald, and that he was abused by both men. Robert Renshaw also alleged that Mr. Seguin introduced him to another alleged abuser, Father Charles MacDonald. David Silmsen testified that Mr. Seguin told him "that he knew about Charles MacDonald sexually abusing" him, then clarified that Mr. Seguin may not have used those words. Upon further questioning about the words Mr. Seguin used, Mr. Silmsen responded, "he knew what Charles MacDonald was doing, type of thing."

Allegations of Passive Awareness of Abuse

There were also situations in which alleged victims were abused by two people with connections to one another, although they did not claim that they had been passed on from one abuser to another.

To give just a few examples, Albert Roy alleged that after he told Mr. Seguin that Nelson Barque had abused him, Mr. Seguin abused him as well. Robert Sheets claimed that he told his probation officer, Mr. Barque, that Mr. Hickerson had abused him, and after that, Mr. Barque abused him. C-8 testified that he told Ron Leroux that he was being abused by Marcel Lalonde, and then Mr. Leroux abused him as well. David Silmsen claimed during his testimony that he was abused by three people on different occasions: Father MacDonald, Marcel Lalonde, and Ken Seguin.

This abuse may have been the result of an organized group of individuals, or it could have been an unfortunate coincidence that the alleged victim was abused by two people who had connections with one another. This coincidence may have arisen from the fact that a number of alleged abusers had ties to a particular institution or system, such as the Diocese or the youth criminal justice system. Dr. Peter Jaffe, an expert in child sexual abuse, testified that abusers tend to associate themselves with particular institutions that give them ready access to children.

The Problems With the OPP's Investigation

I heard conflicting testimony about whether Project Truth was actually looking for an organized group of pedophiles or evidence that individual perpetrators were working together to either pass young people around or hide their abuse of them.

In response to a question about whether Project Truth was investigating a clan or ring of pedophiles, Detective Inspector Tim Smith testified, "I would say rather than a ring, I would say a group of organized paedophiles. Yes, that will be part of our mandate." He added:

[M]ainly the ones that were named here in, you know, the first paragraph of our mandate. Were they organized? Were they a group that—were they a group of paedophiles? Now, that's what we're looking at. And they were investigated individually to see where they all tied together was another facet of the investigation.

Detective Inspector Hall also acknowledged that they were looking into the connections between individuals and whether suspects were working in concert in some way to abuse children.

However, Detective Constable Steve Seguin testified:

I don't think we were really investigating the clan. I mean that's one of the allegations that there was a clan. I think that's all part of investigating the people involved, the allegations made against the different people. A determination as to whether or not there was a clan of paedophiles, I guess, would be made once everything was obtained, all the information and then scrutinized.

Although I am of the view that the OPP investigated Ron Leroux's specific allegation about a "clan of pedophiles," I find that the OPP did not conduct a full-scale investigation into the linkages between victims and perpetrators in a manner that went beyond Mr. Leroux's allegations.

Even if Project Truth was looking at linkages in a broader sense, it did not, in my view, employ an approach that would have allowed it to do so properly.

Part of the difficulty was a lack of resources. Detective Inspectors Smith and Hall initially hoped to obtain funding for a crime analyst who would assist them in looking at the relationships between the victims and suspects. Detective Inspector Hall made some informal inquiries and was told that funding was not available. He testified:

I didn't make a formal request because I knew resources were tight. I knew that our analysts in Orillia probably wouldn't be available for something like this because they basically work on organized crime and high-profile investigations with a significant number of officers and whatnot, like major frauds, that sort of thing.

Without a crime analyst, the Project Truth officers were left to do the linkage work themselves. Detective Inspector Hall had some training in linkage analysis, and he did this work in conjunction with the other officers. He admitted that the linkage work was time-consuming and that a crime analyst would have helped them do this work more quickly.

Deputy Commissioner Chris Lewis testified that the OPP has more crime analysts today than in 1997:

[K]nowing what we know in results with what happened with [Detective Inspector] Pat [Hall] in terms of his needs for an analyst and the years of work that goes into something like that that involves abuse, ultimately children and male victims, et cetera, I'm certain he would find an analyst somewhere for that project. We just—it's just something we have to do.

The ACCESS program was used for some of the linkage work; it could be used to generate an Association Report that tracked whether there was a relationship between two people. However, this document gave very little information about the nature of the connection between the two people, and it was not helpful to assess the connections between many individuals at once.

It was expected that linkages would become evident as the Project Truth officers discussed their individual investigations with each other. Detective Constable Seguin testified that the officers were expected to know a great deal about the other files: "We spoke daily about what each other was doing and the different connections between the different players." However, he also testified that no one was assigned to plot the linkages on a chart or to do work of that nature. He added that the person with the most knowledge about the investigation and who would be expected to put all the pieces together was Detective Inspector Hall.

I find it difficult to see how the officers could have developed a comprehensive understanding of the connections between so many people with such an informal system. It is my view that Project Truth did not make a serious effort to understand the linkages between the various individuals involved in this case.

In addition, Detective Constable Seguin testified that Project Truth did not investigate allegations against deceased perpetrators because such an investigation would not lead to charges. Given that a number of persons of interest were deceased, that many of them worked together or had other connections and that these people were not thoroughly investigated, these individuals could have been missing links in any analysis that attempted to piece together the connections between individuals.

As a result, the OPP failed to explore the links between people and use them to obtain more information for its investigation.

Using Information About Linkages

I also find that the officers did not think creatively about how the links between individuals could have assisted in the investigations and prosecutions related to Project Truth.

First of all, by understanding the connections between people, the officers would have been able to obtain information that could have assisted in their investigations into individual allegations of sexual abuse.

Second, understanding the linkages between people could have assisted in building a case for conspiracy or accessory charges in addition to charges for sexual abuse. In cases where the OPP did not have direct evidence that an alleged abuser intentionally passed a young person over to another person to be abused, evidence about a strong connection between people, including evidence of possible knowledge of the alleged abuser's illicit activities, could have provided circumstantial evidence for conspiracy or accessory charges.

Third, in cases where the officers discovered that a number of suspects were employed by or involved with a particular institution or organization, they could have used this information to reach out to the organization in an attempt to identify other potential victims. For example, given that there were allegations that a number of people in the probations system were abused, the OPP could have approached the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services to obtain the names of other probationers who had contact with the alleged abusers at the relevant time. Likewise, more could have been done with the Diocese given the number of former altar boys who were victims or alleged victims.

The OPP would have been well advised to inform these institutions that there was a problem. It appears that certain officials at the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services were informed about the scope of the problem in the probation office only after obtaining information from one of the Project Truth websites. It is my view that the OPP needs to develop protocols to share information about criminal investigations in order to assist public institutions in identifying systemic problems and confirming that there are no current victims.

Fourth, information about linkages could be helpful during the trial process. As is discussed in Chapter 11, “Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General,” Crown Alain Godin attempted to use links between the alleged perpetrators to demonstrate that Claude Marleau did not consent to sexual acts and that he was abused. Evidence that an alleged abuser participated in passing young people around could also be useful in the court process to impose an appropriate sentence on the accused.

Conclusion

In examining the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) and its officers, I had the opportunity to review a great deal of documentary evidence and to hear testimony from a number of officers. Throughout this chapter I have made some conclusions about specific issues and I will not repeat all of these conclusions here. I would instead like to comment on some of the general themes that have become apparent as a result of my examination of the OPP’s institutional response.

This Inquiry was called, in part, to respond to rumours and innuendo in the community about events such as the seizure and destruction of tapes found at Ron Leroux’s residence, Ken Seguin’s death, and the settlement between David Silmser and the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, all of which fuelled questions about whether there was an organized group of pedophiles operating in Cornwall. It was also called as a result of public dissatisfaction with the Project Truth investigations.

This chapter has not been able to provide definitive answers to all these matters, and the truth behind some of them may never be known. It is my hope, however, that I have been able to shed some light onto the facts surrounding these events and that I have been able to explain why the OPP’s various investigations were not able to provide a satisfactory answer to these questions at the time.

I further note that had the OPP avoided some of the mistakes in some of its earlier investigations, these matters may well have been resolved and the later rumours would not have found such fertile ground in which to grow. In particular, I am disappointed with the quality of the OPP’s 1994 re-investigation of the events surrounding the Silmser settlement as well as its re-investigation of Mr. Silmser’s allegations against Father Charles MacDonald.

The OPP was called in to investigate these matters after the Ottawa Police Service identified some serious deficiencies in the Cornwall Police Service's investigation of Father MacDonald. Given these problems and the considerable controversy surrounding the issue, it was of paramount importance for the OPP to conduct a complete and thorough re-investigation, which unfortunately, it did not. It was equally important for the OPP to properly investigate the very serious allegations of conspiracy and obstruction of justice that were undermining the community's trust in public institutions. The flaws in this investigation stemmed in part from assumptions made by the investigators and in part from the investigators' failure to interview certain people with relevant information and to obtain documentary evidence from the lawyers involved in the settlement. The OPP was called in to resolve the controversy, but instead its incomplete investigation allowed the rumours to grow and later allowed the force to become a target of the public's mistrust.

In this chapter, I examined a number of investigations into allegations of sexual abuse of young people. The Project Truth investigation was examined in detail at the hearings. Five of the six officers who worked on the investigation were called as witnesses. The sixth was unable to testify due to illness, but in his case I had the benefit of his police notes and the testimony of others regarding his role. It is clear from the evidence, both documentary and testimonial, that these officers did a tremendous amount of work during the course of the project. The majority of them worked for more than three years on the investigation, but some remained working, albeit on a part-time basis, for several more years.

I have no hesitation in concluding that these officers were all dedicated and hard-working. In agreeing to participate in this special project, they made sacrifices such as forgoing overtime pay and postponing retirement. I trust these efforts have been recognized by the OPP in some way.

The Project Truth investigation involved an enormous amount of work. Hundreds of individuals were interviewed, including dozens of victims and alleged victims, many perpetrators and alleged perpetrators, and hundreds of witnesses. Approximately thirty Crown briefs were prepared and dozens of charges were laid by Project Truth officers. Charges were also laid by other police services based on referrals from Project Truth officers.

Only one person arrested by Project Truth was convicted and from the public's perspective, this made Project Truth a failure, particularly given the number of complainants and suspects that the project dealt with. Although the justice system does not measure success in terms of the number of convictions, I am troubled by the relatively small number of these cases that were brought to a full trial on the merits.

Some of the underlying problems that plagued Project Truth are common in investigations of historical sexual abuse, and lessons can be learned from the Project Truth experience.

Victims' and witnesses' memories fade, and investigators need to know how to help victims in particular situate events in time. Had the officers done this with Claude Marleau, for example, perhaps some of the difficulties in the prosecutions related to his allegations could have been avoided. Consent can be a complicated issue in cases where the victim has been groomed to participate in abuse, and officers need to understand this so that they can obtain evidence to demonstrate whether consent may have been vitiated.

In addition, victims can be fragile, and some, such as C-66, have such difficulty dealing with the justice system that they eventually withdraw their complaints. Other victims, especially those who have been abused by people in positions of trust and authority, may have difficulty dealing with authority figures such as police and Crown prosecutors and may express their mistrust through anger and hostility. These problems can be compounded if complainants are not given accurate and timely responses to their questions or are forced to speak to the police or the Crown only through their own lawyer. Steps must be taken to put complainants at ease and assist them in bringing their allegations forward.

Further, historical allegations can be incredibly labour-intensive. Witnesses and even alleged perpetrators may no longer live in the area and may be deceased or difficult to find. Institutional records must be tracked down to help corroborate allegations and situate events in time.

Notwithstanding the passage of time since the event, allegations must be acted upon in a timely manner. Suspects may be of an advanced age and at risk of dying before the trial process is complete. Victims can become fatigued by a drawn-out investigation and may withdraw their participation. Most importantly, these allegations should be acted on quickly because suspects of historical abuse may still be in contact with children and may be continuing to perpetrate abuse, as was the case with Jean Luc Leblanc. Even in historical cases, early contact between the police and the Children's Aid Society and joint investigation can be useful.

Fortunately, I also heard expert evidence about some of the solutions to these problems. The proper training and retraining of officers is of paramount importance. In particular, this training should address the challenges of dealing with victims of male-on-male abuse and those inherent in historical cases. Assistance to victims is also essential, both in dealing with the justice system and in coping with their experiences of abuse. Finally, it cannot be overemphasized that these investigations need to have adequate resources.

In light of the expert contextual evidence I heard about the under-reporting of child sexual abuse, it is not surprising that once Project Truth was put in place to investigate historical sexual abuse, victims not identified in the Fantino Brief found the courage to come forward. It is apparent that the significant increase in the number of alleged victims and perpetrators was not anticipated by Detective Inspector Smith or others in the planning stages of Project Truth. An investigation that was anticipated to last no more than one year soon stretched to over three years.

I have no doubt that some of the deficiencies I have noted throughout this chapter could have been mitigated if senior OPP officials had recognized the full extent of the allegations of abuse in the community and responded by providing additional resources. A quick response requires knowledge that comes from communication between the case manager and OPP Headquarters. The case manager should have emphasized the increased number of the allegations to be investigated in the early stages of the special project in the fall of 1997. Unfortunately, interim reports setting out the nature and extent of the investigation were not sent until the summer of 2000, at which time most of the investigative work was completed.

Additional resources in the form of extra officers, a crime analyst, and administrative support (including bilingual staff) all would have assisted the Project Truth investigation in following up on additional leads and allowing more time for linkage and other intelligence work. It would also have allowed time for training, in addition to the on-the-job training Project Truth officers received. This could have been particularly helpful to the junior officers, given their lack of training and experience in these types of investigations.

A further resource in the form of a dedicated Crown attorney or team of Crown attorneys would have been immensely helpful to the project. Former Project Truth case manager Detective Inspector Pat Hall pointed out the challenges in dealing with numerous Crowns and recommended that in the future, special projects be assigned a dedicated Crown.

The OPP also faced an unusual combination of challenges during Project Truth. The officers had to deal with unfriendly media, a largely untrusting public, and a vocal group of community activists who relied on questionable evidence and spread rumours through websites, through an outspoken MPP, and through the media. In addition, the officers faced the unique challenge of investigating allegations brought to light by Constable Perry Dunlop during an off-duty and unauthorized investigation that suffered from many deficiencies including poor note-taking, inappropriate interview techniques, and undue, although unintentional, influence of victims and witnesses. In addition, the Project Truth officers had the difficult task of obtaining the disclosure of materials from Mr. Dunlop, who was distrustful and less than forthcoming, although in part this was due to his prior mistreatment by the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) and legal advice that he received.

Although these factors were quite unusual, I have explained that the OPP failed to put a strategy in place to deal with the media, to inform the community and dispel rumours, and to track and manage Perry Dunlop's exposure to their cases once it became evident that they were unable to obtain his cooperation.

A further unique difficulty was the OPP's inability to openly share information with the CPS and the local Crown Attorney's Office, because both of them were being investigated for their roles in the Silmser settlement. The OPP failed to develop a strategy to overcome any actual or perceived conflict of interest and share information where necessary. The result was that information was unnecessarily withheld from the CPS, either deliberately, in the case of C-10's statement, or inadvertently, as was the case with the disclosure in the Marcel Lalonde prosecution. The barrier between the Crown Attorney's Office and Project Truth contributed to the difficulties in having Crowns assigned to these cases.

The Project Truth officers did not have an easy task. Having said this, I have outlined in several sections of this chapter when and how their institutional response could be improved. In several instances, I have set out recommendations for the future.

Deputy Commissioner Lewis testified about a number of advancements that have been made since Project Truth finished a few years ago. He talked about increased training and the resulting number of officers with full training in sexual assault investigations throughout the province. He also talked about other improvements that have resulted from the adequacy standards including enhanced major case management, sexual abuse coordinators at the regional and detachment level, new initiatives with media training and communications.

I agree with him that the OPP of the present is not the same as the OPP of the 1990s. I would also note, however, that several improvements had been made in the years before Project Truth began and thus should have been utilized throughout its duration. Unfortunately, despite using abuse coordinators and a coordinated media approach in Project Jericho a few years before Project Truth, this approach was not followed in Project Truth. Fully trained and experienced sexual assault investigators could have been assigned but were not. The fact that more resources are available does not ensure they are used efficiently and thus I have tried to recommend instances where additional resources should be requested.

I agree with a number of the recommendations proposed by Deputy Commissioner Lewis in his helpful recommendations to the Inquiry. He echoed the words of many others in calling for a return to joint training with CAS officers. I agree with him that this needs to occur. I also agree with his recommendation that present training programs should be reviewed at the Ontario Police College and the OPP Academy in respect to sexual assault investigations and in particular that programs or modules be developed to address the investigation of historical sexual assaults, the understanding of and responding to male victimization, and the investigation of sexual offences against children.

Much has been done and further improvements are required to ensure that the OPP and other police forces are better able to respond to the needs of victims of child sexual abuse, whether it is a historical report of abuse or not. I hope that in future special projects, many of the recommendations I have made in this Report will assist the OPP with the difficult and important service it provides to all the people of the Province of Ontario.

Recommendations

Protocol for Special Projects

1. The Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) should develop and implement a protocol for special project investigations involving sexual assault/abuse cases.³⁸ This protocol should set out, among other things:
 - the need for a clear mandate of the special project;
 - the special projects mandate communicated to all [regional] OPP officers. For example, information regarding a special project in Eastern Ontario should be sent to local detachments and posted in full view with a contact number to call if there are questions or a need for further information;
 - the need for a dedicated Crown attorney(s);
 - a media strategy developed at the outset of any investigation;
 - a clearly defined reporting structure;
 - timely and frequent communications with OPP Headquarters to ensure appropriate resourcing; and
 - a formal strategy for collaboration with other relevant agencies including other police forces, child protection services, school boards, and the Crown, which defines the roles and responsibilities of participants.

Priority of Sexual Assault/Abuse Cases

2. The OPP must ensure that historical sexual assault/abuse cases are accorded high priority and are treated with the same urgency as recent sexual assault/abuse cases. Appropriate measures must be taken to ensure that such investigations are conducted in an expeditious manner.

Training

3. Training and refresher courses should continue to be provided to OPP officers involved in sexual assault/abuse investigations. This should include training on both current and historical abuse investigations. It should also include information that will assist

38. The reference to sexual assault/abuse refers to the sexual abuse of children and young people, whether current or historical, unless defined otherwise.

- officers in understanding sexual abuse victims, including the “grooming” of victims of sexual abuse and issues particular to victims of historical sexual abuse and male-on-male sexual abuse, as well as in interviewing individuals suspected of sexual abuse.
4. Regular refresher courses on sexual assault/abuse, including child sexual assault/abuse, historical sexual assault/abuse, and male-on-male sexual assault/abuse, should be provided to all officers involved in investigating sexual assault/abuse cases. In addition, officers who are starting these types of investigations should receive or continue to receive in-service mentorship. If not already in place, a procedure should be established to ensure that OPP officers investigating lawyers as suspects have specialized training and knowledge, or are able to consult with someone who does, such as a Crown attorney in the Special Prosecutions Unit.
 5. It is important that officers in the OPP receive ongoing training regarding their statutory reporting duties to the Children’s Aid Society (CAS) under the Child and Family Services Act to ensure that children at risk are protected.

Interviewing Sexual Assault/Abuse Complainants

6. Although it is sometimes necessary because complainants will disclose the full extent of their abuse only over time, taking multiple statements from a complainant should be avoided where possible.
7. The OPP and the CAS should jointly conduct interviews with child complainants to minimize the number of interviews.
8. All efforts should be made to ensure that interviews with complainants of sexual assault/abuse take place in a comfortable setting, for example, a neutral location rather than an interrogation room. Whenever possible, these interviews should be done in person, not by telephone.
9. Investigative protocols should require officers to help complainants to develop a plan to best recount their version of past events, including dates. Officers may suggest using certain techniques, such as collecting documents and photographs and/or creating a timeline. OPP officers should be involved in obtaining these documents. In some circumstances, search warrants may be required.
10. Complainants should be offered the opportunity to be interviewed in the language of their choice. To ensure this choice is the complainant’s, the interviewing officer should not state his or her preference. If the complainant has difficulty expressing him or herself in English or French, every effort should be made to provide accommodation by way of interpreters or otherwise.

11. It is important that the OPP develop a protocol to ensure that complainants of sexual assault/abuse make their disclosures to and are interviewed by officers of the sex of their choice. This will ensure that the trauma of the complainant is reduced and enhance his or her ability to provide intimate and personal details of the sexual assault/abuse alleged.

Communication With Complainants

12. The OPP should institute or augment measures to ensure that victims and alleged victims of sexual assault/abuse and, in the case of children who are sexual abuse victims or alleged victims, their parents and family members, are offered support and apprised of the investigation, the laying of charges, and the court proceedings. This could be done by the OPP directly, through the Victim/Witness Assistance Program (VWAP) or by a liaison person as described in the recommendations in Phase 2 of this Report.
13. It is important that the OPP officers inform victims and alleged victims of sexual assault/abuse of the outcome of any proceedings against the perpetrator and the sentence imposed by the court. This could be done by the OPP directly or through a liaison person as described in the recommendations in Phase 2 of this Report.

Counselling and Support Services

14. OPP officers should continue to augment their knowledge of counselling and support services available for victims and alleged victims of sexual assault/abuse, for male-on-male sexual assault/abuse, and for their families. Police officers should always attempt to make referrals to these services when they receive a complaint of sexual assault/abuse.

Consultation in Historical Sexual Abuse Cases

15. Given the particular complexities and sensitivities that arise in historical sexual abuse cases, case managers (for major cases) should consult with the Regional or Detachment Sexual Abuse Coordinator early in the planning phases of such investigations and include these officers as part of the investigative team.

Note Taking, Record Keeping, and Accessing Records

16. It is critical that OPP officers maintain detailed documentation of their investigative work as well as of meetings attended.
17. It is critical that OPP officers record and insert their notes from investigations into the Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Cooperative (OMPPAC) and other electronic databases to ensure that other police officers have access to information about the alleged perpetrator(s) of sexual assault/abuse.
18. It is important that OPP officers involved in sexual assault/abuse investigations regularly access OMPPAC and other electronic databases such as the Canadian Police Information Centre (CPIC) to determine whether other officers in their police force or other police forces have information on the alleged perpetrator(s).
19. The OPP should take appropriate measures to ensure that its policy on the retention of officers' notes is clearly defined, well understood, and strictly enforced. The policy should continue to stipulate that the officers' notes are the property of the OPP and that should the officer retire or go on extended leave, his or her notes need to be turned over to the force. Such a policy must also address an efficient way to store these records so they can be searched and accessed whenever necessary.
20. The OPP should take steps to develop policies and protocols for the destruction of property. These policies and protocols should require that property reports clearly indicate who disposed of the property. As well, quit claim forms should require a witness signature; at least two people should be present for the complete destruction of property; time, date, and method of destruction should be recorded along with both witnesses' signatures; and the viewing of tapes with suspected criminal activity should be better itemized and then archived for future reference.
21. A protocol should be developed on recording information by videotape or audiotape from witnesses in police interviews. It is important that the technology—video and audio—used by officers is of sufficiently high quality to ensure that the words, gestures, and body language of the person interviewed is accurately and fully recorded.

Adequate Resources

22. The OPP must ensure that it has the necessary resources, such as the requisite number of fully trained officers, to conduct investigations of sexual assault/abuse in a timely manner, in particular, historical sexual assault/abuse cases.

Communication Plans and Media Releases

23. Press releases should provide appropriate and accurate information to the public. Regular communication between the investigators and the media liaison official should help to ensure this occurs.

Informing Employers

24. An order or directive should be developed that requires the OPP to inform public institutions, such as school boards, child welfare agencies, hospitals, local religious institutions, and Justice partners, that an allegation of sexual assault/abuse has been made against one of their employees if the employee under investigation comes into contact with children in the course of their work. This protocol should also apply to anyone on contract with a public institution or community-sector organization, such as a bus driver or cleaning staff, and anyone who volunteers with a public institution if the individual under investigation comes into contact with children in the course of his or her duties. Notification should be made by a designated senior OPP officer to a designated senior person in the public institution or community sector organization.

Recommendations for the OPP and Other Public Institutions

Child Protection Protocol, 2001

25. The OPP is a partner in the Child Protection Protocol: A Coordinated Response in Eastern Ontario (July 2001). Since this protocol has not been updated, the OPP should meet as soon as practicable with other partners to review and update the protocol. For those partners actively involved in the investigation and prosecution of sexual assault/abuse cases, consistent roles for the participants should be set out as well as guidance on information sharing between investigating bodies. The process of reviewing and updating the protocol should continue triennially.

Joint Training

26. The government of Ontario and the responsible ministries should reinstitute joint training for CAS workers and police officers as soon as practicable. This joint training should include specific training on responding to historical allegations of abuse. For some aspects of training, consideration should be given to including other Justice partners, such as Crown counsel or those working in hospitals, in specialized assault units. Joint training might also support more standardization or the development of “best practices” protocols between police and Children’s Aid Societies.

Court Management Protocol

27. The OPP and MAG, in particular the Crown Attorney’s Office in Cornwall, should develop a court management protocol as soon as practicable. This protocol should address the specific roles, duties, and relationship between OPP officers and Crown attorneys in relation to prosecutions, and be reviewed triennially.

Special Project Prosecutions

28. OPP and MAG should work together to develop joint operational plans in special project prosecutions.
29. MAG and Ontario police agencies should review and compare their major case management protocols to identify and rectify inconsistencies and gaps.

Disclosure in Joint Investigations

30. In joint investigations involving more than one police force, a protocol should be developed that stipulates that one officer should be responsible for all disclosure requests. This officer should have a contact on the other force or forces who assists with disclosure but should personally oversee and track which items have been disclosed to the Crown on behalf of all police forces involved in the investigation.

Institutional Response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall

Introduction

As will be discussed in the Chapter 12, on the process of Phase 1 of the Inquiry, I found the Episcopal Corporation of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall (referred to in this Report as the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall) to be a “public institution” within the language of the Order-in-Council. The response of the Diocese as a “public institution” to allegations of historical abuse could be examined and recommendations could be made for how it could and should respond to such allegations in the future.

I indicated that I would not be investigating the Roman Catholic Church, its doctrine, or its beliefs but rather the corporate entity of the Diocese as an employer of the priests who worked in the Diocese. In this chapter, I begin by providing an overview of the organizational structure of the Roman Catholic Church and the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. This information is provided solely for background and contextual purposes.

The Organizational Structure of the Roman Catholic Church

The organizational structure of the Roman Catholic Church is set out in canon law, the body of laws that govern the Church. The Roman Catholic Church’s central administration is located in Vatican City, an autonomous state that is surrounded by Italy. The Pope is the head of the Church. The Roman Curia, which corresponds to a cabinet and civil service in secular society, assists the Pope in the administration of the Church.

The Church is divided into nine congregations. Each congregation is headed by a cardinal who lives in Rome. The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith is responsible for the unity of faith and for overseeing morals in the Church. Since 2001, all cases of alleged sexual abuse involving priests must be sent to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. The Congregation for the Clergy is responsible for priests. The Congregation for Bishops is responsible for the functioning of the dioceses.

The Roman Catholic Church also has tribunals. There are three tribunals in Rome: (1) the Apostolic Penitentiary, (2) the Roman Rota, and (3) the Apostolic Signatura. The Apostolic Penitentiary deals with matters of conscience. It is private and involves no written documents. The Roman Rota is the supreme court of the Church. The Apostolic Signatura is the highest tribunal. It functions as the Privy Council did in Canada before the Supreme Court of Canada was declared the highest judicial authority. Its focus is on procedures followed, not on the content of the case. Since 2001, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith has set up a parallel tribunal to the Apostolic Signatura, and as a result, none of the three tribunals discussed above deals with cases of priests alleged to have committed acts of sexual abuse.

The Roman Catholic Church also has pontifical councils, which are bodies that advise the Pope.

The Secretary of State and the congregations, tribunals, and councils constitute the Pope's "Cabinet." These bodies meet with the Pope on a regular basis.

The Roman Catholic Church is divided into ecclesiastical provinces, composed of an archdiocese headed by an archbishop, and a number of dioceses, each headed by a bishop. There are three ecclesiastical provinces in Ontario: Toronto, Kingston, and Ottawa. The Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall is in the ecclesiastical province of Kingston.

Each diocese consists of a number of parishes. A parish is a body of Catholic people who are served by a priest.

According to Canon 447 of the 1983 Code of Canon Law, a Conference for Bishops is a permanent national or territorial institution that coordinates pastoral functions for the Christians in its territory "in order to promote the greater good that the Church offers to humanity." The Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops (CCCCB) was founded in 1943 and officially recognized by the Vatican in 1948. It is composed of all bishops in Canada, including retired bishops. Paul-André Durocher, Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, testified that while the CCCC has no power to establish national protocols for dealing with issues such as sexual abuse, it has great influence on the creation of such protocols at the diocesan level.

Religious orders are groups of lay people or clergy such as priests, nuns, and monks who are not assigned to a particular location. Many religious orders have autonomy from dioceses and bishops because their members make vows of obedience to the superior of the order. To exercise ministry within a diocese, a member of a religious order must obtain permission from the bishop of the diocese.

Authority Within the Catholic Church

There is no central Church authority within particular countries. The Vatican is the sole central authority. The organization of dioceses into ecclesiastical provinces is to foster common pastoral action and relations between bishops in the diocese.

As discussed by Church officials at the hearings, the Catholic Church has a hierarchical, monarchical government structure in which power is held by the Pope as the head of the institutional Church and by the bishop in each diocese. The bishop of each diocese is accountable only to the Vatican.

Each bishop is required to send the Vatican a report on the state of his diocese every five years. Moreover, he is obliged to visit the Vatican every five years, at which time he is questioned on his report.

Orders of Deacons, Priests, and Bishops

There are three orders in the Catholic Church: the Order of Deacons, the Order of Priests, and the Order of Bishops. Deacons can baptize people, preside at marriages and funerals that do not include a mass, and proclaim the gospel and preach during mass. However, they cannot administer the Eucharist.

Priests can perform the same acts as deacons as well as administer the Eucharist, anoint the sick, hear confession, and, if so delegated by the bishop, preside over confirmation ceremonies. A priest has three main functions: (1) preaching, teaching, and setting up educational programs for his parishioners; (2) administering the sacraments, including the regular celebration of the Eucharist; and (3) acting as a leader, which includes setting up committees at the pastoral level.

The care of the diocese is entrusted solely to the bishop. Bishops can perform the same functions as priests as well as preside at confirmation ceremonies and ordain priests. A diocesan bishop is responsible for (1) evangelization and faith education, which involves preaching and teaching and ensuring that these duties are being performed well throughout the diocese; (2) liturgy, which involves leading the celebration of sacraments; and (3) leadership and organization, which includes being responsible for the financial administration of the diocese, the appointment of priests, deacons, and support staff, and the establishment of commissions and committees to coordinate Church life. It is important to note that diocesan bishops have no power to change anything regarding sacramental or liturgical law in the Church.

According to Canon 378 §1, a bishop must be:

1. outstanding in solid faith, good morals, piety, zeal for souls, wisdom, prudence, and human virtues, and endowed with other qualities which make him suitable to fulfill the office in question;

2. of good reputation;
3. at least thirty-five years old;
4. ordained to the presbyterate for at least five years;
5. in possession of a doctorate or at least a licentiate in sacred scripture, theology, or canon law from an institute of higher studies approved by the Apostolic See, or at least an expert in the same disciplines.

At least every three years, the bishops of an ecclesiastical province or a Conference of Bishops meet to compile a list of candidates considered suitable to become bishops. When a vacancy arises in a diocese the Apostolic Nuncio, also known as the Papal Nuncio, the ambassador of the Pope in a particular country, consults his networks to try to identify the person or persons who would be best for the diocese. In consultation with lay people and others, he prepares a list of three names, which he sends to the Congregation for Bishops in Rome. The prefect of the Congregation in Rome then gives his choice to the Pope, who has the final word on the nomination.

Organizational Structure of Dioceses in Ontario

The federal, provincial, and territorial governments of Canada do not recognize the Catholic Church as a legal entity. They recognize only the corporations under which Catholic dioceses operate. Diocesan corporations are autonomous, private corporate entities. Like other corporations, diocesan corporations are subject to regulations relating to corporate registration, taxation, and charitable status. In all of Canada other than Quebec, the bishop is the sole member, officer, and director of a diocesan corporation. Subject to certain negative financial limits beyond which a bishop cannot act without the Pope's permission, a diocesan bishop has control of all of the diocesan corporation's affairs.

Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall

St. Andrew's Parish in the county of Stormont and St. Raphael's Parish in the county of Glengarry were granted official status by the Roman Catholic Church in 1802. The Diocese of Alexandria was established in 1890. In 1976, Bishop Eugène LaRocque was granted permission from the Congregation for Bishops to establish a co-cathedral in Cornwall and affix the name Cornwall, so that the Diocese became known as the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

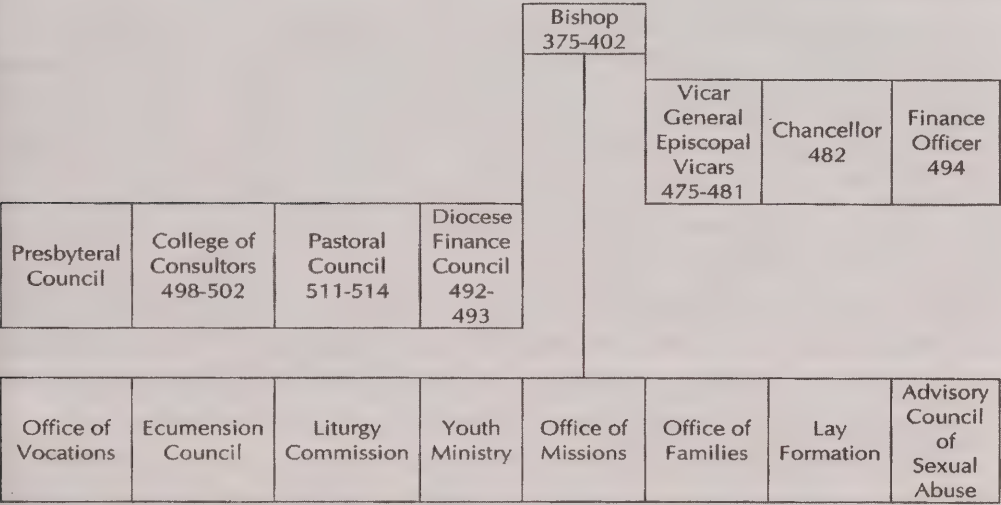

Approximately 56,000 of the 87,000 people in the geographic area of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall are Catholic. There are thirty-one parishes in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. These parishes are located in the counties of Stormont and Glengarry as well as in the City of Cornwall. The largest parish in the diocese is St. Columban's, in Cornwall.

The Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall is divided into four deaneries, which are groups of parishes.¹ Parishes are grouped to assist in facilitating collaboration among those that share geographic or linguistic similarities. The priests in each deanery elect a priest as a dean, and deans become members of the Presbyteral Council (described below). There are approximately thirty priests in the Diocese. About twenty of these priests are active and the others are retired.

- 1941–1966 Rev. Rosario Brodeur
- 1962–1964 Rev. Jacques Landriault (Auxiliary Bishop)²
- 1964–1967 Rev. Joseph-Aurèle Plourde (Auxiliary Bishop)
- 1967–1974 Rev. Adolphe Proulx
- 1974–2002 Rev. Eugène LaRocque
- 2002– Rev. Paul-André Durocher

The Vicar General, Episcopal Vicars, Chancellor, and Finance Officer are the “backbone” of the bishop’s staff. All dioceses have at least one vicar general, a priest who assists the bishop and exercises some administrative authority. Bishop Durocher testified that there is currently one Vicar General in the Diocese of

1. The City of Cornwall has an English and a French deanery, as does the surrounding countryside.

2. An auxiliary bishop is an additional bishop assigned to a diocese for reasons such as if the diocesan bishop is unable to perform his functions or if the diocese is so extensive that it requires more than one bishop to administer.

Alexandria-Cornwall. Some bishops have episcopal vicars, to whom the bishop delegates some of his powers. Bishop Durocher stated that there are not currently any episcopal vicars in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. The Chancellor is responsible for maintaining the archives of the Diocese as well as the publication of decisions, edicts, and decrees of the Bishop. It is not necessary for him to be a priest. The Finance Officer is the chief assistant to the Bishop in administering the finances and assets of the Diocese. He is generally a lay person.

The councils described on the left of the chart are consultative bodies that assist the Bishop in the administration of the Diocese. The Presbyteral Council is a subset of priests, both active and retired. It includes the Vicar General and the Chancellor, priests elected by their peers, and priests named by the Bishop. A smaller group of five priests makes up the College of Consultors. This group acts only in special circumstances. For example, if the Bishop were incapacitated, the College of Consultors would convene to elect an administrator to replace him while a new Bishop was being named. Also, the Bishop needs to obtain this group's permission to sell property over $450,000 or to close or open a new parish. The Pastoral Council is an advisory body to the Church that is composed mainly of lay people.

Diocesan activities are carried out by certain "ministries" or "commissions," listed at the bottom of the chart. The Office of Vocations deals with the recruitment and training of future priests. The Ecumenism Council deals with the relationship of the Diocese with other churches. The Liturgy Commission represents the Diocese at national or provincial meetings regarding liturgical policies, practices, or developments. The Youth Ministry provides services to youth, including educational and religious services. The Office of Missions focuses on local, national, or international missionary activities of the Church. The Office of Families deals with marriage preparation, marriage counselling, remarriage, and the death of a spouse. And finally, the Lay Formation Ministry recruits and develops leadership teams to carry out diocesan and parish activities.

The next section of this chapter discusses the expert evidence presented at the Inquiry on canon law and on sexual abuse by members of the clergy. Father Thomas Doyle and Father Frank Morrissey were qualified as experts on these subjects at the hearings. They discussed issues such as the Catholic Church's historical response to sexual abuse by clergy, the 1983 Code of Canon Law, the 1992 From Pain to Hope document of the CCCB, and the 2001 and 2002 norms. Topics such as the secret archives of the Church as well as screening and training of members of the clergy on how to address sexual abuse were also canvassed. A discussion of the policies and protocols developed in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall to address clergy sexual abuse follows the section on the expert evidence. The balance of the chapter focuses on the institutional response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall to allegations of sexual abuse of and inappropriate contact with young persons by various members of the clergy. It discusses the institutional response of the Diocese to allegations of sexual misconduct by Father Gilles Deslauriers, Father Carl Stone, Father Charles MacDonald, Father Romeo Major, Father Paul Lapierre, Father Ken Martin, and other priests.

Expert Evidence on Canon Law and Sexual Abuse by Clergy

Background of Experts

Father Thomas Doyle received a Doctorate in Canon Law from the Catholic University of America in Washington, DC, in 1978. He obtained a Masters degree in Canon Law from the University of Ottawa in 1977. His dissertation was "The Canonical and Legal Foundation of the Dominican Order in Canada." Father Doyle also received his Pontifical Licentiate in Canon Law from Saint Paul University in Ottawa in 1977. In addition, Father Doyle has Masters degrees in Philosophy, Political Science, Theology and Church Administration.

Father Doyle was ordained as a Catholic priest in 1970 in Dubuque, Iowa. A year after his ordination, he was assigned to a Dominican parish in River Forest, Illinois, where he worked as an associate pastor for approximately three years. In 1974, he was appointed an advocate for the Metropolitan Tribunal of the Archdiocese of Chicago, Illinois, and from 1978 to 1981, he served as a judge for this same tribunal. From 1986 to 1990, he was a tribunal judge for the Diocese of Scranton, Pennsylvania, and from 1991 to 1993, for the Diocese of Lafayette in Indiana. Father Doyle was also a tribunal judge for the Diocese of Pensacola-Tallahassee from 1993 to 1995.

Father Doyle served as secretary-canonist at the Vatican embassy in Washington, DC, from 1981 to 1986. His primary duties entailed managing the program whereby dioceses were created, candidates for the Office of the Bishop were proposed to the Vatican, and bishops were transferred. As the official staff canon lawyer, he was also responsible for a variety of research projects for the Papal Nuncio to the United States and provided assistance on difficult personnel issues, including cases of clergy sexual abuse.

Father Doyle served two terms as a consultant on matters of canon law for the United States National Conference of Catholic Bishops.³

3. Now called the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Father Doyle was a faculty member at the Midwest Tribunal Institute of the Mundelein Seminary in Mundelein, Illinois, the Tribunal Institute of the Catholic University of America in Washington, DC, and the Institute of Spirituality in River Forest, Illinois. He was a visiting lecturer in canon law at the Catholic Theological Union in Chicago, Illinois, from 1979 to 1981 and the Catholic University of America in Washington, DC, from 1981 to 1986.

Father Doyle has acted as a support person, pastoral counsellor, and legal advocate for priests accused of sexual abuse since the mid-1980s. He has also provided pastoral care for victims of clergy sexual abuse and has been involved with victims' groups. Father Doyle is a certified alcohol, drug, and addictions therapist.

Father Doyle has received a number of awards for his work in the area of clergy sexual abuse, including a Priest of Integrity Award from the Voice of the Faithful, a Boston-based group of Catholic lay people committed to assisting survivors of clergy sexual abuse, the Cavallo Award for Moral Integrity, the Isaac Hecker Award for achievements in social justice, the Community Hero Award from the Association of Trial Lawyers, and the Red Badge of Courage Award from the Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests (SNAP). He has also received an official commendation from the Dominican Fathers for his "prophetic work in drawing attention to clergy sexual abuse and for advocating the rights of victims and abusers."

Father Doyle has served as a consultant and expert witness on several hundred clergy abuse cases in the United States, Ireland, Israel, and Canada. He has been qualified as an expert in canon law, Church governmental structures, penal processes, and the rights and obligations of clerics; the spiritual and pastoral dimensions of clergy sexual abuse; and the historical background of clergy sexual abuse in the United States.

Father Doyle has authored a number of publications, including entries on canon law topics in The Concise Catholic Encyclopedia and articles on clergy sexual abuse. He co-authored a book entitled Sex, Priests, and Secret Codes, in 2006.

Father Doyle has worked on developing policies and procedures for clergy sexual abuse for dioceses and religious orders in the United States, Australia, and New Zealand. In 1985, he co-authored a manual entitled "The Problem of Sexual Molestation by Roman Catholic Clergy: Meeting the Problem in a Comprehensive and Responsible Manner." Father Doyle and his co-authors assembled an interdisciplinary team of experts on "medical, legal, psychological, moral and scriptural" child sexual abuse, to provide bishops in the United States with information to assist them with this issue. (The United States Conference of Catholic Bishops declined to accept this manual.) In 1986, Father Doyle and his co-authors sent the manual to all bishops in the United States. Father Doyle has since delivered seminars to priests in different areas of the United States on the legal, pastoral, and psychological aspects of sexual abuse of children.

Father Thomas Doyle was qualified at the Cornwall Public Inquiry as an expert in canon law and on the historical background of clergy sexual abuse.⁴

Father Francis Morrissey also provided expert testimony at the Inquiry. He has eleven degrees from the University of Ottawa and Saint Paul University. In 1972, he received a Doctorate in Canon Law from Saint Paul University. His doctoral dissertation, “The Juridical Status of the Catholic Church in Canada, 1534–1840,” addressed Church–state relationships in Canada.

Father Morrissey was ordained as a priest in Ottawa in the Missionary Oblates of Mary Immaculate in 1961. As a member of a religious institute, he is not incardinated in a diocese.

Between 1966 and 1983, Father Morrissey held several positions in the Canadian Canon Law Society, including President, Secretary-Treasurer, and Executive Secretary. He is an honorary life member of this society as well as the Canon Law Society of America, the Canon Law Society of Great Britain and Ireland, the Canon Law Society of Australia and New Zealand, and the Canon Law Society of Southern Africa.

From 1966 to 2005, Father Morrissey was a consultor to the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops’ (CCCCB) Canon Law Commission.

From 1973 to 1983, Father Morrissey was a judge for the Quebec Metropolitan Tribunal. He was appointed in 1983 as a judge for the Canadian Appeal Tribunal, the highest Church court in Canada for the adjudication of marriage cases. He continued in this capacity at the time of the Inquiry.

From 1985 to 2000, Father Morrissey served as a consultor to the Pontifical Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Code of Canon Law in Vatican City. From 1994 to 1999, Father Morrissey was a consultor to the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life in Vatican City.

From 1972 to 1984, Father Morrissey was the Dean of the Faculty of Canon Law at Saint Paul University. In 2007, Father Morrissey became an adjunct professor at Saint Paul University in Ottawa. From 1984 to 2007, he was a titular professor at the Faculty of Canon Law of Saint Paul University. He has taught courses on several subjects, including Church penal law and crimes and penalties.

Father Morrissey received an award from the Pope for his work on the preparation of the revised 1983 Code of Canon Law. He also is the recipient of awards

4. The Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall brought a motion to exclude the evidence of Father Thomas Doyle. Among the grounds were that Father Doyle was hostile to the interests of the Diocese and the Catholic Church and that he was biased and should not be qualified as an expert. I denied the motion on August 29, 2007. I stated that the Inquiry was a non-adversarial proceeding and that, in my view, Father Doyle has the qualifications to provide contextual expert evidence. Issues of concern regarding his testimony would go to weight.

from the Canon Law Society of America and the Canadian Canon Law Society for his work in the development and teaching of law.

Father Morrissey founded Studia canonica, a professional journal in canon law that is recognized worldwide, and he was the editor of this journal between 1967 and 2004. He has authored over 300 articles in the field of canon law and Church history, including a number of articles on sexual abuse of minors by clergy and responses to this abuse.

Father Morrissey has acted as a special advisor to Episcopal Conferences on the preparation and implementation of the Code of Canon Law. He has been invited to lecture to bishops, priests, and religious and lay people in many countries, including Vatican City, England, Ireland, France, Poland, Spain, Italy, Germany, Belgium, Canada, the United States, South Africa, Lesotho, Ghana, Australia, New Zealand, Kenya, Thailand, Sri Lanka, Denmark, and Peru.

Father Morrissey has testified and offered affidavits as an expert witness in numerous court proceedings in Canada, the United States, Namibia, and Singapore. He has acted as a consultant to parties in Church and secular litigation, some of which involved alleged abuse of young people by clergy.

Father Morrissey was qualified at the Inquiry as an expert in canon law and, in particular, abuse cases involving members of the clergy.

Frequency of Child Sexual Abuse by Roman Catholic Clergy

Father Morrissey states in a 2001 article, “Addressing the Issue of Clergy Abuse,” published in Studia canonica, that accusations of clergy sexual abuse were initially met with denial by Church officials. Even when it became evident that some of these accusations were true, Church officials were still reluctant to recognize the extent of this behaviour:

At first, accusations were generally met with denial; later on, when it became evident that there was indeed a foundation to at least some of the accusations, grudging steps were taken to address individual cases ... Church authorities were, obviously, reluctant to recognize the extent of such deviant behaviour. It just did not seem possible that it was widespread; rather, it was considered limited to isolated incidents.

Father Morrissey considers child sexual abuse by clergy a widespread global phenomenon. He stated that since 2001, when the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith became responsible for cases of child sexual abuse by clergy, the Congregation has been overwhelmed by the number of cases it has received. According to Father Morrissey, the Vatican has not released statistics on the results of these cases.

The United States Conference of Catholic Bishops commissioned a study, known as the John Jay study, to determine the prevalence of sexual abuse by priests and members of religious orders in the United States from 1950 to 2002. This information was collected through surveys distributed to the American dioceses and religious orders. Ninety-seven percent of the dioceses, which represented approximately 99 percent of Catholics in the United States, completed the surveys. There were some shortcomings in this study, according to Father Doyle. First, the information was collected from bishops, whose priests were the subject of the research in their respective dioceses. Father Doyle stated that a few dioceses were uncooperative and did not comply with the study. Second, the survey results did not include allegations considered to be “unfounded” or that were withdrawn. According to Father Doyle, there were some cases in which a bishop reported fewer allegations of sexual abuse than were reflected in diocesan files. When the bishops were asked about the discrepancy, they would explain that they had decided unilaterally that some of the allegations were unfounded.

According to the John Jay study, 4,392 of the 109,694 priests in active ministry between 1950 and 2002 were accused of sexual abuse of a minor, according to Church officials. This number represents approximately 4 percent of the priests in active ministry during this period. The study found that the number of complaints increased significantly in the 1960s and 1970s, peaked in the 1970s, and decreased in the 1980s and 1990s. According to the study, 81 percent of the complainants were male and the number of complaints regarding sexual abuse of males increased more than sixfold between the 1950s and 1970s.

The John Jay study reported that 56 percent of the accused priests had one allegation against them; 27 percent had two or three allegations against them; nearly 14 percent had four to nine allegations against them; and 3 percent of the priests had ten or more allegations against them. The 149 priests who had ten or more allegations against them involved 3,000 alleged victims and constituted 27 percent of the allegations.

Father Morrissey testified that he does not know of a Canadian study equivalent to the John Jay study.

Prior to 1917

Both Father Doyle and Father Morrissey provided testimony on early Catholic Church documents that discuss the seriousness of sex between adults and children. Sexual sins were raised at Catholic Church Councils, meetings of Church leaders at which current issues and their implications for the Church are discussed.

Councils often produce “exhortatory” statements and canons in regard to issues discussed. Many Councils, including the Elvira Council, the Lateran Councils, the Council of Basel, the Council of Trent, and the First Vatican Council or Vatican I, issued canons that condemned the sexual abuse of minors. Some of these laws set out penalties. For example, in 1178 the Third Lateran Council passed legislation stating that clerics who engaged in pederasty or sodomy were to be “dismissed from the clerical state” or “confined to monasteries to do penance.” Furthermore, canons issued as a result of the Council of Basel condemned not only sex between clerics and young boys but also clergy superiors who condoned this activity or who were aware of such activity but failed to take any action.

The Council of Trent authorized the use of ex informata conscientia, or “informed conscience,” which allows a bishop to take action against a priest based on information received rather than proceeding through a lengthy administrative or judicial process. In other words, if a bishop obtained what he believed to be reliable information that a priest was sexually abusing a child, he could suspend the priest without process.

Father Doyle explained that sexual sins, such as sexual relations between priests and children or young adolescents, were mentioned regularly in the penitential books. These books were unofficial manuals used between approximately the 6th and 12th centuries that were designed to assist priests in hearing confessions. They contained lists of sins and corresponding penances, and according to Father Doyle, are a valuable source of information about what the community considered to be inappropriate behaviour. The higher the rank of the Church figure, the more stringent the penalties.

Father Doyle discussed the Book of Gomorrah, written in the 11th century by St. Peter Damian, which describes a variety of sexual crimes by the clergy, including a priest soliciting sex from male or female penitents during confession and sex between priests and bishops and young boys. It also condemns ecclesiastical and religious superiors who condone this type of activity. When St. Peter Damian sent a report on these issues to the Pope, the Pope’s response was that although these issues were serious, a priest would not be defrocked for only one or two instances of sex with a minor.

The first formal collection of Church laws, promulgated in 1234, contained procedures on sexual abuse of a child by a cleric. Priests convicted of abusing a child would be sentenced to imprisonment in a monastery for seven years with their diet restricted to bread and water.

In the mid-16th century, Pope Pius V issued two documents that addressed clergy sexual abuse, Horrendum est and Suit nuper. The former, which set out penalties for the sexual abuse of young boys by the clergy, was a public document that was posted on the doors of churches.

In 1741, Pope Benedict XIV issued a document that addressed solicitation of sex by priests within the context of sacramental confession. Father Doyle explained that while some areas issued local legislation regarding solicitation in the confessional, this was the first document on the subject that “touched the entire Church.” As Father Doyle stated, misusing the sacrament of confession in this way is extremely serious, as people are at their most vulnerable during confession. Roman Catholics believe that in confession, the priest takes the place of Christ in giving them absolution. They believe they will be condemned to hell if they die without absolution.

In 1866, Pope Pius IX issued an instruction that imposed absolute secrecy on the process of prosecuting crimes of solicitation during confession.

1917 Code of Canon Law

The first Code of Canon Law was created in 1917 under Pope Pius X. Canon 2354 §2 states that if a cleric is convicted of raping a youth of the opposite sex, he will be:

... punished by an ecclesiastical tribunal, according to the varying degree of the fault, with penances, censures, privation of office and dignity and, if it seems necessary, also with deposition.

Canon 2359 §2 states that if a cleric engages with a minor under sixteen years old in a number of sexual acts, including sodomy, he will be “suspended, declared infamous,” and “deprived of any office, benefice, dignity” and responsibility within the Church. In more serious cases, the cleric would be removed from his position in the Church. The bishop was required to hold a formal penal trial if he wished to have an accused priest dismissed from the clerical state. If he wished to remove the priest from ministry, he could do so through “administrative action,” meaning that no formal trial was required. According to Father Morrissey, few dioceses conducted canonical penal processes.

Allowing a bishop to suspend a cleric under his authority by way of informed conscience, authorized by the Council of Trent, was confirmed in Canon 2186. However, a bishop was not authorized to dismiss a priest from the clerical state through informed conscience. If a bishop wished to take this step, he was required to establish a formal tribunal to hear the case and there was an opportunity to appeal the decision to an ecclesiastical court.

According to the 1917 Code of Canon Law, if a cleric was required to take action but failed to do so, he could be charged with an ecclesiastical crime. Thus, if a bishop knew one of his priests was sexually abusing children and did nothing about it, he could be charged with cooperation in that crime.

Father Morrissey stated that the 1917 Code of Canon Law also set out “terrible penalties” for priests who misused the confessional to arrange meetings for a sexual purpose.

1922 and 1962 Instructions

The 1922 document Instructio de modo procedendi in causis sollicitationis provided bishops with instructions on how to proceed for cases of solicitation in the confessional and other “worst crimes,” such as homosexuality, bestiality, and sex with minors. Father Morrissey explained that instructions are not laws; rather, they are similar to regulations that delineate how a law is to be applied. The 1917 Code of Canon Law set out the laws and penalties regarding the worst crimes, and the instructions delineate which crimes are to be considered the worst crimes and the process for dealing with such crimes. The 1922 document elevated sexual abuse of minors to the level of the worst crime.

The 1922 instructions defined a minor as an individual who had not yet reached puberty. Thus, for sexual abuse of a minor to be defined as a worst crime, the minor would need to be prepubescent, which Father Morrissey stated was twelve years old for girls and fourteen years old for boys.⁵

Father Morrissey explained that although diocesan tribunals were to be set up to deal with the worst crimes, such tribunals were not created until the 1940s. Bishops had a residual plenary power to punish by administrative action, and this was generally how cases continued to be handled.

The 1922 instructions were protected by the Secret of the Holy Office, the highest form of confidentiality in the Church. They were sent to all bishops secretly. The 1922 instructions were stored in the secret archives and were not taught in seminaries. Father Morrissey explained that bishops appointed after 1922 who did not review the archives would not have known of the existence of the instructions.

Father Doyle and Father Morrissey testified that the 1922 and 1962 documents did not forbid people from disclosing sexual abuse to civil authorities prior to the commencement of the ecclesiastical process. However, from the commencement of the Church’s preliminary investigation into an allegation of sexual abuse, anyone involved in the process, including the accuser, the alleged perpetrator, witnesses, and individuals representing the alleged perpetrators, were bound to perpetual silence by the Secret of the Holy Office. According to Father Morrissey, breaching this secret resulted in automatic excommunication.

In 1962, the instructions were revised with only minor changes.

5. Note that the 1922 instructions are in Latin and that they were interpreted by Father Morrissey.

The first time the instructions were officially mentioned in a document from the Vatican was in a 2001 letter from Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, head of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith at the time. The letter addressed the release of new norms regarding “certain grave delicts ... including the sexual abuse of minors by priests.” It stated that previous norms remained in effect but needed to be revised, and it mentioned the 1962 instructions in a footnote. The mention of the 1962 instructions in Cardinal Ratzinger’s letter raised debate over whether the 1962 instructions were in effect after 1983. Canon 6 of the 1983 Code of Canon Law introduced a new procedure for handling allegations of sexual abuse against young people, and it stated that previous legislation was abolished. However, some argued that the instructions were not law and therefore were still in effect. In Father Doyle’s view, whether the 1962 document still applied after the 1983 Code of Canon Law was promulgated is a moot point because very few people were aware of the 1962 document and it was not used a great deal.

Father Doyle testified that he believes the secrecy surrounding the 1922 and 1962 instructions is indicative of the large role of secrecy in the institutional Catholic Church.

1983 Code of Canon Law

The 1983 Code of Canon Law, which continues to apply today, sets out a new procedure for dealing with allegations of sexual abuse by clergy. Canon 1395 §1 states that a cleric who “persists with scandal” in engaging in prohibited sexual activity is to be punished by suspension and “if he persists in the delict after a warning, other penalties can gradually be added, including dismissal from the clerical state.” This canon further states that a cleric who engages in prohibited sexual activity “by force or threats or publicly or with a minor below the age of sixteen years, is to be punished with just penalties, not excluding dismissal from the clerical state if the case so warrants.”

Father Morrissey explained that the “just penalties” referred to in this canon are found in Canon 1336 §1, which states:

In addition to other penalties which the law may have established, the following are expiatory penalties which can affect an offender either perpetually, for a prescribed time, or for an indeterminate time:

1. a prohibition or an order concerning residence in a certain place or territory;
2. privation of a power, office, function, right, privilege, faculty, favor, title, or insignia, even merely honorary;

3. a prohibition against exercising those things listed under n. 2, or a prohibition against exercising them in a certain place or outside a certain place; these prohibitions are never under pain of nullity;
4. a penal transfer to another office;
5. dismissal from the clerical state.

According to Father Morrisey, this canon contemplates a graduated approach to these penalties and suggests that dismissal from the clerical state should be considered the last step.

Canon 1389 §2 provides a penalty, including dismissal from office, for a Church official who, with culpable negligence, fails to perform an act of ecclesiastical governance. This appears to apply to a bishop who knew that a priest was abusing children but took no action to enforce Canon 1395.

The 1983 Code of Canon Law set the limitation period for a case of sexual abuse of a minor at five years.

In addition, it removed the ability of a bishop to proceed by way of informed conscience, which had enabled a bishop to take action against a priest without proceeding through a formal process. This was considered to be unfair, as it was at the discretion of the bishop and offered no right of defence, recourse, or appeal for accused clergy.

The 1983 Code introduced protections and due process rights for accused clergy. Canon 220 states: “No one is permitted to harm illegitimately the good reputation which a person possesses nor to injure the right of any person to protect his or her own privacy.” This canon has been interpreted to mean that an accusation should not be publicized pending the results of a secular trial, in order to protect the reputation of the priest in question. Moreover, Canon 221 states:

- §1. The Christian faithful can legitimately vindicate and defend the rights which they possess in the Church in the competent ecclesiastical forum according to the norm of law.
- §2. If they are summoned to a trial by a competent authority, the Christian faithful also have the right to be judged according to the prescripts of the law applied with equity.
- §3. The Christian faithful have the right not to be punished with canonical penalties except according to the norm of law.

As Father Morrisey explained, this canon grants a priest accused of abusing a minor the right to canonical counsel, the right to know the accusations against him, the right to know who is testifying against him, and the right to appeal a decision.

Father Morrisey stated that between 1983 and 2001, sexual abuse trials were handled by local tribunals set up at the diocesan level. However, he was not aware of any sexual abuse cases that went to trial in Canada during that period. Father Doyle also stated that there was “scant evidence” that the crimes mentioned in Canon 1395, which included sexual activity with a minor under sixteen years old, were actually prosecuted.

Father Morrisey testified that prior to 2001, it was expected that a warning would be given before a suspension, censure, or excommunication was imposed on members of the clergy. However, since 2001, every priest has been required to sign a diocesan protocol that indicates they are aware of the consequences of committing sexual abuse.

In 2001, the Vatican released a document entitled Litterae apostolicae motu proprio datae, which contained new norms regarding the sexual abuse of minors by clergy. The norms raised the age at which an individual is considered to be a minor from under sixteen years old in the 1983 Code of Canon Law to under eighteen years old. The limitation period was also increased for cases of sexual abuse of minors by clergy from five years (in the 1983 Code of Canon Law) to ten years. Moreover, this limitation period would begin only once an individual had reached the age of eighteen.

Perhaps the most notable change is that the 2001 norms removed the ability of local dioceses to prosecute complaints regarding the sexual abuse of minors by clergy. As mentioned, since 2001, solely the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith has been permitted to prosecute such cases. If a bishop receives a complaint of sexual abuse, he is to conduct a preliminary inquiry to determine whether the accusation has a semblance of truth, and if so, he is required to send the information he has gathered, and his recommendations, to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. However, if a bishop determines that an accusation is unfounded, he is not required to forward any information to the Congregation.

Father Morrisey testified that prior to 2001, the Congregation for the Clergy dealt with some cases of sexual abuse of minors, but he thought that this would have been fairly rare.

Notwithstanding the requirement since 2001 that a bishop refer all cases of clergy sexual abuse of minors to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, the bishop retains the authority to apply a number of administrative measures, pending the decision from Rome. Canon 1722 states:

To prevent scandals, to protect the freedom of witnesses, and to guard the course of justice, the ordinary, after having heard the promoter of justice and cited the accused, at any stage of the process can exclude the accused from the sacred ministry or from some office and ecclesiastical function, can impose or forbid residence in some place or territory, or even can prohibit public participation in the Most Holy Eucharist.

In 2002, some adaptations to the 2001 norms were released. Bishops were granted the right to seek a waiver of the ten-year limitation period and the adaptations authorized administrative dismissal from the clerical state, which meant that this could be done without a formal trial.

When the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith receives a complaint, it can (1) direct the diocese that sent the complaint to prosecute the case in its own or in another diocese; (2) prosecute the complaint in its own tribunal; or (3) recommend an administrative dismissal from the clerical state. If the diocese prosecutes the case, there is the possibility of appeal to the Tribunal of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. If the Congregation decides to try the case in its own tribunal, the victim or accused may be interrogated at the Vatican, but generally there are people in the country where the complaint is made who are mandated to gather the evidence and send it to the Vatican. The judges of the Tribunal of the Congregation for the Doctrine of Faith render their decision and inform the affected persons. Then there is an automatic appeal to another bench of judges in the Congregation. After this appeal, the final decision is rendered and the penalty is imposed.

If an individual had made a complaint to civil authorities, the Church generally awaits the outcome of the criminal process. It is important to note, however, that once a case has been sent to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, all those involved in the case are sworn to perpetual silence. When the Vatican asks a local bishop to set up a tribunal to deal with a case, the tribunal is acting as a circuit court for the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith and the Secret of the Holy Office applies to its work. If a victim who is under an oath of perpetual silence decides he is not satisfied with the way the Church has dealt with his case and discloses to the police, the local bishop can excommunicate the victim for breaking the oath.

As Father Morrissey explained, because the canonical trial process is secret, the laity would not usually know that a particular priest had been dismissed from the clerical state because of sexual abuse.

Since 2001, when cases of child sexual abuse by clergy were reserved to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, the Congregation has been overwhelmed by the number of cases it has received. Father Morrissey stated that it has been difficult to deal with these cases in an expeditious manner.

Canada

The legislation and protocols currently applicable in Canada include the 1983 Code of Canon Law, the 2001 and 2002 norms, a 1992 publication of the CCCB entitled From Pain to Hope, and laws promulgated by bishops in their respective dioceses.

The Archdiocesan Commission of Enquiry into the Sexual Abuse of Children by Members of the Clergy (the Winter Commission) was created in 1990 to inquire into the sexual abuse of children by diocesan priests in the St. John's Archdiocese. The Commission was a Catholic Church initiative.⁶ The Archbishop of St. John's appointed former Lieutenant Governor the Honourable Gordon A. Winter as the Commissioner. The Commission's report, referred to as the Winter Report, recommended that the Catholic Church formally acknowledge and accept its responsibility for the abuse of children by members of its clergy.

In 1992, within two years of the publication of the Winter Report, the CCCB released a document entitled From Pain to Hope, which made recommendations about policies, procedures, and protocols that should be developed in Canadian dioceses regarding sexual abuse of minors by clergy. However, it is essential to note that this document is not binding on dioceses. The document was sent to all bishops in Canada, who were asked to promulgate a binding diocesan protocol on the subject. Father Morrissey testified that he does not know of any diocese that does not currently have such a protocol. In many cases, these protocols were based on the provisions in the CCCB document.

From Pain to Hope states that the Church "too readily shelters its ministers from having to account for their conduct ... [and] is often tempted to settle moral problems behind a veil of secrecy which only encourages their growth." It encourages the Catholic Church to acknowledge and take responsibility for clergy sexual abuse. The CCCB document states:

The spontaneous reaction of shamed self-defense must be avoided under the circumstances, lest one risk becoming, consciously or not, party to further cases of abuse. The fear of scandal often conditions our instinctive reactions of inadvertently protecting the perpetrators and a certain image of the Church or the institution we represent, rather than the children, who are powerless to defend themselves.

6. G.A. Winter, Report of the Archdiocesan Commission of Enquiry Into the Sexual Abuse of Children by Members of the Clergy (Winter Report), (St. John's, NF: Archdiocese of St. John's, 1990), p. viii.

From Pain to Hope suggests that each bishop establish an advisory committee of at least five persons in their diocese and that issues involving sexual abuse should be referred to this committee. The document states that the composition of this committee should be as diversified as possible and should include a canonist, a civil lawyer, and a professional person with experience treating victims of sexual abuse or treating those with sexual disorders. From Pain to Hope recommends that the advisory committee develop a protocol to deal with allegations of clergy sexual abuse. It suggests that each diocese appoint a priest, referred to as a “bishop’s delegate,” to take responsibility for issues regarding sexual abuse. In the event of a complaint of clergy child sexual abuse:

The delegate should be empowered and directed by the bishop to act immediately (i.e., within twenty-four hours or as soon thereafter as possible), with a view to determining in a discreet and pastoral manner whether there are reasonable and probable grounds to believe there was child sexual abuse by a priest.

The document states that if the delegate determines that the allegations are frivolous or unsubstantiated, the inquiry will be terminated. However, if such grounds are established, “The priest under inquiry should be placed on administrative leave with pay.”

From Pain to Hope states that if secular proceedings are underway, it may be preferable to delay further canonical inquiry until the matter has been resolved before the secular courts. However, if there are no secular proceedings and the accused priest admits that the allegations are true, the delegate is to immediately present a report on the investigation to the diocesan bishop.

If the priest denies the allegations, the delegate is to conduct further inquiry. If, after hearing from those who have brought the complaint, the delegate believes there is reason to proceed further, the accused priest is to be granted the opportunity to be heard. Lawyers for the diocese or the accused or members of the advisory committee may be asked to participate in this stage of the inquiry. If there is reason to proceed further, with his consent the priest will be referred to a treatment centre for an assessment. If it is determined that the accused priest can be considered responsible for his actions, the advisory committee will determine whether the matter should be referred to the diocesan bishop.

If the diocesan bishop decides to proceed in an administrative manner, then he may impose the appropriate penalties according to Church law. Alternatively, the bishop can decide that the case should be judged by a canonical penal trial and pass the evidence on to the promoter of justice. If the promoter of justice considers it opportune to begin a canonical trial, then the provisions of Canon 1722 can be applied: the accused can be excluded from ministry or from a Church position or function, required or forbidden to live in a particular place or territory, or prohibited from public participation in the Eucharist. If the accused is found guilty at the conclusion of the trial, the appropriate canonical penalties would be imposed.

In 2002, the CCCB established a task force to report on progress regarding From Pain to Hope ten years after its release. The task force reported in 2005. It outlined a number of concerns, many of which focused on the treatment of victims and the accountability of bishops. While the task force found that the majority of dioceses had implemented measures related to clergy sexual abuse based on From Pain to Hope, some dioceses did not provide the information the task force requested, and as a result, it was not able to confirm that all dioceses had done so.

The task force recommended that the CCCB adopt a national protocol to which the bishop of each diocese would be invited to make a commitment. This approach was chosen in order to respect the autonomy of each diocese. The protocol proposed the retention of the majority of the recommendations in From Pain to Hope but suggested further measures to promote greater diocesan transparency in regard to clergy sexual abuse and to increase the accountability of bishops for the management of clergy abuse. The protocol also contained measures designed to prevent clergy sexual abuse, such as security clearance for those working with children. Father Morrissey testified that he was not aware of any follow-up in regard to this document.

United States

In the mid-1990s, after From Pain to Hope had been released, the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops published a series of documents on clergy sexual abuse entitled Restoring Trust. According to Father Doyle, these documents were fairly ineffectual and were not widely distributed.

In 2002, a series of articles about clergy sexual abuse appeared in The Boston Globe. This information led to a grand jury investigation in Boston and about twelve other grand jury investigations in other areas of the United States, some of which were in progress when the Church experts testified at the Inquiry. Father Doyle explained that a grand jury is a body composed of twenty-four people who consider evidence on a particular issue and decide whether there is sufficient evidence to justify proceeding to a trial. He stated that the Boston grand jury investigation revealed that more than eighty priests in Boston had allegedly sexually abused children and either been allowed to maintain clerical assignments or been transferred to another location. Moreover, because the statute of limitations had lapsed, some criminal proceedings were not pursued.

In 2002, shortly after the Boston Globe articles were published, the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops developed and adopted the Dallas Charter and Norms.⁷ Generally, a national Conference of Bishops cannot create legislation that applies across the country. However, the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops asked the Pope for permission to enact law for the United States on the issue of clergy sexual abuse, which was granted. Therefore, the Dallas Charter and Norms, unlike From Pain to Hope, are binding on all dioceses in the United States.

The Dallas Charter and Norms contain a “one-strike-you’re-out” policy—any person, either priest or deacon, will be permanently removed from ministry for any act of sexual abuse. The original version of the preamble to the norms states: “Sexual abuse of a minor includes sexual molestation or sexual exploitation of a minor and other behaviour by which an adult uses a minor as an object of sexual gratification.” As Father Morrissey explained, this is a broad definition of sexual abuse that can encompass an array of acts from serious sexual abuse to leering. It is noteworthy that in 2006, the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops revised the norms and significantly narrowed the definition of sexual abuse to committing adultery with a minor as understood in canon law.

Father Morrissey was critical of the “one-strike-you’re-out” policy. In his view, the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops should have taken action in regard to clergy sexual abuse much sooner. Father Morrissey believed that this lack of action caused the Conference to act too strongly. In his opinion, removing the option of rehabilitation was excessive. Furthermore, he claimed that although Canon 9 says the law is not retroactive, the “one-strike-you’re-out” rule is improperly being applied retroactively.

Father Doyle also provided some criticism of the Dallas Charter and Norms. He stated that the norms address only deacons and priests who have sexually abused children, not bishops who have abused or have been complicit in a cover-up. He also said that rather than having a face-to-face audit on an annual basis, the United States bishops prefer to provide their own reports regarding their compliance with the Dallas Charter and Norms. There has been criticism that bishops “immediately started to water down the compliance reports.”

The Dallas Charter required the creation of an Office for Child and Youth Protection at the headquarters of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops. This Office was to assist with the implementation of policies and programs related to the Dallas Charter and to ensure that dioceses were adhering to the document. A National Review Board was established to assist and monitor the Office in its duties. The National Review Board was also tasked with commissioning a study of the causes and context of clergy sexual abuse in the United States. In 2004, the National Review Board issued a document entitled A Report on the Crisis in the Catholic Church in the United States, which focused on the responsibility of the Catholic Church for the sexual abuse of minors by members of its clergy. The Report discussed cover-ups and lack of adequate action in responding to victims of sexual abuse: “Even more troubling than the criminal and sinful acts of priests who engaged in abuse of minors was the failure of some bishops to respond to the abuse in an effective manner.” It made recommendations regarding enhanced screening, training, and oversight of clergy, increased sensitivity and effectiveness in responding to allegations of abuse, greater accountability of bishops and other Church leaders, and improved interaction with civil authorities:

A. Further Study and Analysis

- The bishops and religious ordinaries should continue to support the undertaking of a comprehensive scientific study relating to the causes and context of sexual abuse in the Church and in society. In Article 16 of the Charter, the bishops pledged their willingness to cooperate in such research “with other churches and ecclesial communities, other religious bodies, institutions of learning, and other interested organizations.” The problem of sexual abuse of minors is a societal problem, and the Church can take the lead in addressing the problem throughout society.
- The bishops should agree to ongoing diocesan audits to ensure compliance with the Charter and the Essential Norms.
- There should be a periodic review of the effectiveness and fairness of the zero-tolerance policy to ensure the application of individualized justice.

B. Enhanced Screening, Formation, and Oversight

- Bishops and seminary leaders must ensure that each candidate is a mature, psychologically well-adjusted individual, with an unequivocal commitment to a life of service to the Church and her people, and a clear understanding of the challenges of the priesthood, including celibacy, before admission into the seminary. A bishop must get to know each potential candidate and exercise good judgment in determining whether the candidate is suitable for the priesthood. Candidates should be thoroughly vetted through all appropriate methods.

- Seminaries must provide better preparation for the challenges of living a celibate life in today's culture.
- Seminaries must institute rigorous procedures for continually evaluating the suitability of those admitted to study for the priesthood, as well as mechanisms (including expulsion) for addressing problems identified in the evaluation process.
- Seminaries themselves must be more rigorously evaluated. The upcoming Apostolic Visitation should be conducted by independent, knowledgeable individuals who can provide an honest, informed, and unbiased evaluation. It must examine both the curriculum and the formation program. To the extent that institutions operating certain seminaries are not providing adequate oversight, the seminaries should be placed under different authority.
- A healthy priest is connected to God, connected to his bishop or religious superior, connected to his fellow priests, and connected to the People of God. Accordingly, there must be ongoing intellectual, spiritual, and psychological formation and monitoring of priests after ordination. Priests should be encouraged to participate in fellowship groups with other priests, to form close, healthy relationships with priests and with laity, and to maintain an active prayer life.
- Bishops must meet frequently with their priests to monitor their morale and emotional well-being. A bishop must know his priests.
- Each bishop should meet annually with the religious superior for any non-diocesan priests who are resident in his diocese to ensure that the religious superior takes responsibility for monitoring the non-diocesan priests engaged in ministry in the diocese.

C. Increased Sensitivity and Effectiveness in Responding to Allegations of Abuse

- Seeing to the welfare of victims of abuse must be the primary duty of the Church when confronted with evidence of abuse. Dioceses must ensure that victims of clergy sexual abuse are encouraged to come forward and are treated with respect, dignity, and compassion.
- Bishops and Church leaders must recognize both the criminal and the sinful nature of the sexual abuse of minors by members of the clergy. Bishops must respond vigorously to all allegations of abuse, maintain accurate records of such allegations and the responses thereto, and openly exchange information with other dioceses about such allegations.
- All bishops and leaders of religious orders should meet with victims and their families to obtain a better understanding of the harm caused by the sexual abuse of minors by clergy. Bishops and leaders of religious orders must be personally involved in this issue and not delegate a matter of such importance to others.

- In assessing individual cases in order to determine whether the priest engaged in an act of sexual abuse of a minor and therefore must be removed from ministry, bishops and other Church leaders should honor the rights of accused priests and consult with their lay review boards, so that together they might strive for individualized justice in light of their developing experience and expertise.
- Dioceses and religious orders should re-examine their litigation strategies to ensure that a pastoral response takes precedence over legal tactics. Dioceses should eschew litigation when possible and earnestly pursue other avenues of resolving allegations of abuse.
- In seeking therapeutic options for priests who have engaged in sexual abuse of minors, the dioceses should use only well-qualified treatment centers that specialize in treating sexual disorders and that are able and willing to evaluate patient outcomes in a disinterested professional fashion.
- The Church should make use of national or regional canonical tribunals in the United States to consider cases for laicization under the Charter in order to ensure that experienced individuals hear and decide these cases and that they are decided in a consistent fashion. Bishops should ensure that the appropriate authorities at the Vatican are provided with a comprehensive and complete file to review when determining whether to laicize a priest.

D. Greater Accountability of Bishops and Other Church Leaders

- The process for selecting bishops should include meaningful lay consultation.
- The bishops should trust and learn to make greater use of those consultative and deliberative bodies established by canon law to assist them in the pastoral care and governance of their dioceses. These bodies should be filled with faithful laypersons and priests who are talented, responsible, and dedicated to the Church, but who are also capable of offering, and who are expected to offer, truly independent counsel to the bishop.
- The Church should consider restoring and strengthening the role of the metropolitan archbishop in overseeing suffragan bishops and should consider steps to enable the national conferences to serve as information clearinghouses and to provide enhanced information flow among dioceses about critical issues facing the Church.

- The bishops should be more willing to engage in fraternal correction and should appeal to the Vatican to intervene if a particular bishop appears unable or unwilling to act in the best interests of the entire Church.
- An audit team through the Office of Child and Youth Protection should review the handling of abuse allegations by individual dioceses and orders. The audit team should publish its findings in a report so that the laity will be apprised of the results.

E. Improved Interaction with Civil Authorities

- Dioceses and orders should report all allegations of sexual abuse to the civil authorities, regardless of the circumstances, or the age or perceived credibility of the accuser.
- Dioceses and orders should endeavor to resolve civil claims and government investigations on reasonable terms and in a manner that minimizes the potential for intrusion of civil authorities into the governance of Church matters.

F. Meaningful Participation by the Christian Faithful in the Church

- The bishops and other Church leaders must listen to and be responsive to the concerns of the laity. To accomplish this, the hierarchy must act with less secrecy, more transparency, and a greater openness to the gifts that all members of the Church bring to her.

Father Doyle testified that Church leaders in the United States are still failing to respond appropriately to complaints of clergy sexual abuse. He stated that there have been instances of bishops intentionally returning sexual abusers to their ministries without disclosing the situation to the parish.

Despite some criticism of the Dallas Charter and Norms, Father Doyle stated, “I do think it is a useful exercise to have a uniform policy ... because if it is suggested as Pain to Hope was, you’re going to end up several years down the line with another document such as the 2005 critique of From Pain to Hope which mainly said these things look nice but they weren’t done ... I suspect ... the Dallas ... norms will be further refined and changed to reflect the needs that have arisen and the critiques.”

Adequacy of Canon Law to Deal With Sexual Abuse by Clergy

According to A Report on the Crisis in the Catholic Church in the United States (2004) by the National Review Board, canon law is inadequate to deal with cases of sexual abuse for many reasons. The first reason is that canonical tribunals in dioceses do not have the expertise to handle involuntary laicization cases.

The second reason is that the canon law process for dealing with sexual abuse cases is impeded by the concept of “imputability,” which provides that dismissal from the clerical state cannot be imposed if the accused priest is found not fully responsible for his actions due to an illness or psychological condition. Father Morrissey disagreed with this statement and commented that although a bishop could not dismiss a priest from the clerical state due to a mental illness, the Vatican could do so.

The third reason for the inadequacy of the canon law for cases of sexual abuse, according to the Report, was that “process often took precedence over substance.” Convictions could be overturned by the Vatican years after the fact due to failure to follow technical procedural requirements. One bishop was quoted in the Report as saying, “We were all very hesitant to do a canonical trial because if there’s any procedural flaw in it you can easily be overturned on appeal to Rome.” However, Father Morrissey argued that this situation also exists in secular courts, as an appeal court can overturn a first instance court because procedures were not followed.

The Report also stated there was a sense that Vatican tribunals had traditionally erred on the side of protecting the accused rather than on assisting the victim. Below are some excerpts from the U.S. National Review Board Report:

A significant cause of the inadequate response of Church leaders to allegations of sexual abuse was the fact that in assessing allegations against accused priests, presumptions rooted in both theology and Church culture heavily favored the accused priest. Surveying the landscape in certain dioceses, one bishop noted, “There is a larger pattern of protection of priests first, rather than protecting the children first.”

... Until recently, ... bishops all too often treated victims of clerical sexual abuse as adversaries and threats to the well-being of the Church, not as injured parishioners in need of healing. Far too frequently, they treated predator priests as misdirected individuals in need of psychological treatment or a simple change in environment, rather than as criminal offenders to be removed from ministry and reported to civil authorities for possible prosecution and appropriate punishment. These approaches did not solve any problems but rather served to exacerbate them.

... [C]anon law procedures made it very difficult to take action against a priest. As one bishop told the Board, "I'm not a canon lawyer, but I happen to think that the Code of Canon Law we've got is flawed ... I just think it's so much weighted toward the rights of the individual that the common good of the Church is not adequately protected."

...

Reportedly, the Vatican courts tended to err on the side of protecting a priest because of a concern that bishops could seek to use canon law to rid themselves of priests whom they did not like or with whom they disagreed on some point or another. The focus of the law and of the canonists interpreting and applying the law historically was on protecting the rights of the accused. Although the Review Board believes it is important to protect the rights of accused priests, it also believes that greater consideration must be given to the protection of the faithful.

Father Morrissey believes that canon law might have been adequate to deal with clergy sexual abuse of children if it had been used. Father Doyle commented that historically it was often within the bishop's discretion to determine how to deal with sexual abuse and that until recently, almost all incidences of sexual abuse of minors were handled without process. Father Doyle testified that in his examination of confidential Church records over a twenty-year period, he had seen evidence of a tribunal process only about three times in several thousand instances of clergy sexual abuse:

... [T]he bishop decided when it was too inconvenient to go through process. And unfortunately, what happened in all the cases, the individual was transferred to another assignment in the same diocese or in another country or another diocese where inevitably he would continue to offend.

Dioceses that received accused priests were often not notified of the reason for the transfer. Father Doyle testified that he knew a priest who turned himself in about two or three times to bishops and was given a new assignment each time. He also mentioned a case in which three priests had been convicted in a canonical trial of sexually abusing young boys at a school in Colombia and their sentence was to study sociology for at least a year outside the country. He said that one of the priests was sent to California, where he had family and it was known why he was there. Nevertheless, the priest was assigned to another parish and within a week there was another complaint.

In Father Doyle's opinion, it has been a combination of public pressure, the media, and lawsuits that have caused the Church to take action in regard to sexual abuse by clergy:

... [I]t has been the pressure from the media, the public pressure as well as the pressure from the litigation that has caused these things to happen, the action that the Church has taken—the institutional Church has taken. Otherwise, sad to say, I think they'd still be dragging.

The Effect of Secrecy in the Catholic Church on Dealing With Clergy Sexual Abuse

Both experts testified that canon law and the Catholic Church have often displayed an excessive preoccupation with secrecy. As Father Doyle stated:

Secrecy is imposed on anything that could render the church somewhat vulnerable or embarrassing to it. Secrecy is imposed on most church activities, most legislative activities, most deliberative activities that go on behind closed doors.

Father Morrissey agreed that secrecy has often attached to issues involving a person's conscience; sexual assault always involves conscience because it is a serious sin, and "sin is a matter of conscience."

Father Doyle agreed with the following statement in From Pain to Hope: "Secrecy is the breeding ground for the development and repetition of child sexual abuse." In his view, the current process for dealing with sexual abuse complaints is cloaked in secrecy:

... [O]nce the preliminary investigation is concluded, it goes to the Congregation [for the Doctrine of the Faith], and in my interpretation ... that's when the secrecy is imposed ...

... You wrap it up in an envelope and send it to Washington, D.C., to the Papal Nuncio⁸ and ask him to transmit it to the Congregation in Rome through the diplomatic pouch ... Some time later ... you get a letter back saying, "We've looked at this case. We now are remanding it back to you for a judicial trial.” ... You, the bishop, then have to constitute a tribunal ... You name the officials, the promoter of justice. You have the promoter of justice start the process, and that’s all covered by confidentiality or secrecy. He sends out letters to the potential witnesses, to the accused, to the victims ... the people involved, and they start the process which means they will come for depositions, to give testimony, and this is all under the cloak of secrecy.

8. The Pope's ambassador in a country.

Secret Archives

Canon law requires each diocese to maintain a secret archive to which only the bishop has a key.

Father Doyle testified that the 1922 instructions regarding the “worst crimes” stated that it was to be retained secretly, which suggested that the 1922 instructions should be kept in the secret archives. As discussed, the fact that this document was placed in the secret archives meant that any bishop after 1922 who did not go through the old archives would not have known of this document’s existence.

Father Morrissey testified that before 2001, files regarding allegations of sexual abuse against minors were kept at the diocesan level and often they were placed in the secret archives. Since 2001, cases involving allegations of sexual abuse against minors must be sent to the Vatican.

Problems of secrecy in the Church and an inadequate system for the files of clergy members are discussed in A Report on the Crisis in the Catholic Church in the United States:

... [I]n part out of an overemphasis on secrecy, dioceses and religious orders did not utilize adequate methods to track allegations against priests. Because records relating to an individual priest often would be kept in three or four separate files, Church leaders investigating allegations of sexual abuse by an individual priest did not always have all of the information they needed in order to assess the credibility of the allegations. Important documents often were maintained in “secret archives” pursuant to canon law, and Church officials without access to these files often were unaware of critical past allegations against a priest when addressing other allegations. Reflecting this, Cardinal Law at one point put the blame for the transfer of predator priests in part on an inadequate filing system.

The Review Board believes that dioceses and religious orders must maintain more open and accurate personnel records regarding priests, which should be audited and reviewed by diocesan lay boards or outside auditors. Nevertheless, the existence of a bad filing system only partially explains, and in no way excuses, the failing of various dioceses to respond properly to evidence of sexual abuse by members of their clergy. Had bishops placed the issue of sexual abuse of minors by the clergy at the top of their agenda, we have no doubt that the filing system on priest perpetrators would have been improved.

Impact of Clericalism on Dealing With Clergy Sexual Abuse

Father Doyle explained that clericalism is the belief that clerics are entitled to deference and are above lay people as a result of their ordination. He explained that this attitude is encouraged by Catholic Church doctrine, which teaches that priests take the place of God and Christ. The U.S. National Review Board Report in 2004 stated that Church leaders were often reluctant to acknowledge that “a man ordained to be ‘another Christ’” could have engaged in sexual abuse:

Clerical culture and a misplaced sense of loyalty made some priests look the other way in the face of evidence of sexual abuse of minors, and contributed to the unwillingness of members of the clergy to condemn the conduct of a brother priest.

Father Doyle testified that victims of clergy sexual abuse who believe that a priest takes the place of Christ or God are confused about why a member of the clergy would abuse them. Some victims, he said, may think that the abuse occurred because they did something wrong. This creates obstacles to the disclosure of the sexual abuse. Father Doyle also explained that victims may fear divine retribution for accusing a priest of abuse. Moreover, some victims have been punished by their parents for accusing a priest of such acts.

The concept that lay people are lower than the clergy remains deeply entrenched in Church law, tradition, and doctrine, explained Father Doyle. He noted, however, that Vatican II, which began in the early 1960s, initiated a process whereby the chasm between the clergy and the laity began to be narrowed. The clergy and the hierarchy began to become demythologized. As a result, some Catholic people began to overcome their fears that something bad would happen to them if they exposed a priest to authority figures in the Roman Catholic Church for engaging in sexual abuse.

Screening and Training of Candidates for the Priesthood

Before a candidate for the priesthood is admitted to seminary, he is required to be presented by a bishop. Canon 241 §1 states:

A diocesan bishop is to admit to a major seminary only those who are judged qualified to dedicate themselves permanently to the sacred ministries; he is to consider their human, moral, spiritual, and intellectual qualities, their physical and psychic health, and their correct intention.

This canon further states: "If it concerns admitting those who were dismissed from another seminary or religious institute, testimony of the respective superior is also required, especially concerning the cause for their dismissal or departure."

The U.S. National Review Board Report stated that over the past fifty years some men who should never have been admitted to the seminary or ordained have become priests. The Report discusses several reasons why this occurred, among them that "[s]eminaries simply presumed that no one afflicted with a severe sexual dysfunction would have heard the call to the priesthood in the first instance." It also stated that bishops may have felt reluctant to question a call from God. However, the Report states that this reluctance is based on a misunderstanding of the bishop's role in determining whether candidates are suitable for the priesthood. It cited a letter from Pope Paul VI that made it clear that those involved in the education of priests have a responsibility not to admit candidates who are unsuitable to enter the seminary:

Those who are discovered to be unfit for physical, psychological or moral reasons should be quickly removed from the path to the priesthood. Let educators appreciate that this is one of their very grave duties. They must neither indulge in false hopes and dangerous illusions nor permit the candidate to nourish these hopes in any way, with resultant damage to himself or the Church. The life of the celibate priest, which engages the whole man so totally and so delicately, excludes in fact those of insufficient physical, psychic and moral qualifications. Nor should anyone pretend that grace supplies for the defects of nature in such a man.

Although canon law has a long history of addressing clergy sexual abuse, not every seminarian has received training in canon law. Before World War II, priests-in-training, even those at the doctoral level, did not receive much information about conducting canonical trials because these trials were simply not held. It was not until 1946 that bishops in Canada began to seriously consider establishing Catholic Church tribunals.

As Father Morrissey stated, most priests who were ordained between 1967, the end of Vatican II, and 1983, when the revised Code of Canon Law was released, did not study canon law in the seminary. He stated that Vatican II made significant revisions to canon law. This gap in canon law training, he explained, means that many of those individuals who are bishops today have not studied canon law.

Father Doyle testified that when he has spoken to bishops about why they have not acted when confronted with child sexual abuse by one of the priests in their dioceses, some have responded that they were uncertain of the appropriate course of action in this situation. Father Doyle explained that these bishops “had been trained in a system that said that the welfare of the institution” was of “paramount importance” and the priesthood was a “sacred brotherhood” that must be protected “at all costs.”

Many bishops have also told Father Doyle that they did not have a full understanding of the devastating effects clergy sexual abuse has on victims. Through his experience dealing with victims of clergy sexual abuse, Father Doyle has realized that celibate priests and bishops may have difficulty comprehending the pain of parents when they learn that their child was abused by a priest.

Canon 242 §1 of the 1983 Code of Canon Law states that each nation is to have a program of priestly formation that is established by the Conference of Bishops and approved by the Vatican, and this program is to be “adapted to new circumstances,” with the approval of the Vatican. From Pain to Hope states:

The formation of candidates to the priesthood in the Catholic Church is a long and complex process which includes various dimensions: theological, spiritual, communal and pastoral formation within a framework which usually requires three or four years of study and one or two years of pastoral experience.

In 1992, John Paul II issued a document called Pastores dabo vobis, which set out the four poles of formation of priests: human formation, spiritual formation, intellectual formation, and pastoral formation. In 2006, drawing on Pastores dabo vobis, the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops published a program of priestly formation.

Father Morrissey testified that although there are Canadian documents that address the formation of priests, he believes Canadian seminaries are using the U.S. document as it is the most current.

According to the U.S. program, if there is any evidence that a candidate for the priesthood has engaged in criminal sexual activity with a minor or showed an inclination toward such activity, he will be disqualified from admission to the priesthood. It also states that if there is any credible evidence that a candidate is sexually attracted to children, he will be dismissed from the seminary immediately. The program stresses the need for candidates for admission to the priesthood to have healthy psychosexual maturity. It states that the program of formation must be designed to assist candidates for the priesthood to meet the challenge of psychosexual growth. It expresses the need for “high standards and strict vigilance ... in evaluating human thresholds pertaining to sexuality,” and says, “As we have recently seen so dramatically in the Church, when such foundations are lacking in priests, the consequent suffering and scandals are devastating.” The annual evaluation of candidates for the priesthood is to include an evaluation of “[a]ffective maturity and healthy psychosexual development; clarity of male sexual identity; an ability to establish and maintain wholesome friendships; the capacity to maintain appropriate boundaries in relationships.”

Duty to Report

Legislation requiring any person having information regarding the physical ill treatment of a child or of a child in need of protection to inform the civil authorities has existed in Ontario since the 1965 Child Welfare Act was introduced.⁹ In 1979, section 49 of the 1978 Child Welfare Act was proclaimed. This section placed a duty to report suspected abuse specifically on professionals and a penalty was imposed for failure to report.¹⁰ Subclause 94(1)(f)(ii) of the 1980 Child Welfare Act added that every director, officer, or employee of a corporation who knowingly concurred in contravening the corporation’s duty to report was guilty of an offence and set out penalties for such an offence.¹¹ The Child Welfare Act was replaced in 1984 with the Child and Family Services Act.¹² Two sections were added to expand the definition of a child in need of protection to include a child who was being sexually molested or was at risk of being sexually molested or exploited. The Child and Family Services Act specifically includes priests in its list of professionals who have a duty to report suspected abuse:¹³

- (2) A person who believes on reasonable grounds that a child is or may be in need of protection shall forthwith report the belief and the information upon which it is based to a society.
- (3) Despite the provisions of any other Act, a person referred to in subsection (4) who, in the course of his or her professional or official duties, has reasonable grounds to suspect that a child is or may be suffering or may have suffered abuse shall forthwith report the suspicion and the information on which it is based to a society.

R.S.O. 1990, c. C.11, s. 72(1-3).

- (4) Subsection (3) applies to every person who performs professional or official duties with respect to a child, including,
 - (a) a health care professional, including a physician, nurse, dentist, pharmacist, psychologist;
 - (b) a teacher, school principal, social worker, family counsellor, priest, rabbi, member of the clergy, operator or employee of a day nursery and youth and recreation worker;
 - (c) a peace officer and a coroner;
 - (d) a solicitor; and
 - (e) a service provider and an employee of a service provider. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.11, s. 72(4); 1993, c. 27, Sched.
- (5) In clause (4)(b),
 “youth and recreation worker” does not include a volunteer.
- (6) A society that obtains information that a child in its care and custody is or may be suffering or may have suffered abuse shall forthwith report the information to a Director.
- (7) This section applies although the information reported may be confidential or privileged, and no action for making the report shall be instituted against a person who acts in accordance with subsection (2) or (3) unless the person acts maliciously or without reasonable grounds for the belief or suspicion, as the case may be.

The child protection legislation that has existed since 1965 states that the duty to report applies regardless of whether the information is confidential or privileged. The exception is solicitor–client privilege.

Father Morrissey stated if an individual admits to sexually abusing a child in the confessional, the priest who hears the confession is confronted with a conflict between the seal of confession and the duty to report. The seal of confession applies the highest level of secrecy to any communication to a priest in the confessional. In fact, the canon dealing with the confessional seal is the sole canon that states that it is inviolable, meaning there are no exceptions. Any priest who breaks the confessional seal is automatically excommunicated. It is Father Doyle’s view that canon law will never change with respect to the seal of confession.

It is important to note that the Dallas Charter and Norms, binding on all American dioceses, requires that allegations of sexual abuse be reported to civil authorities, even when not required by law. As Father Morrissey stated, the exception to this is the seal of confession.

Father Doyle expressed the view that mandatory reporting by clergy and Church employees is important because it lessens the possibility of cover-up and enhances the possibility of healing for victims. It is noteworthy that From Pain to Hope states that dioceses will comply with civil reporting laws. However, Father Morrissey testified that in the case of a conflict between the civil law duty to report and the canon law seal of confession, priests are instructed to observe canon law. Father Morrissey stated that canon law does not require a priest who receives information regarding sexual abuse during confession to report it to the bishop; if such information is received during confession, the priest is obliged to keep it confidential.

Father Morrissey explained that Canadian dioceses now have a delegate for child sexual abuse complaints. Thus, any priest who receives information about an allegation of sexual abuse outside of confession should provide the complainant with the delegate's contact information, and the delegate should make the report to the civil authorities.

Father Doyle stated that there is an opportunity for a priest hearing a confession to have a dialogue with and give advice to the confessor, which could include encouraging the perpetrator to seek counselling. He testified that this is a subject that could be addressed as part of the training of seminarians. He also stated that if a priest believed that the person's confession was insincere, he could refuse to grant absolution. Furthermore, if an individual persisted in his sins, the priest could refuse absolution until the individual had taken some action, which could include disclosing the abuse to the authorities. In other words, a priest could make disclosing the abuse part of the confessor's penance. Father Morrissey did not endorse this approach. He stated that he would ask the individual to meet with him outside of the confessional to discuss how the situation could be addressed, and upon meeting, he would remind the individual that anything he told him outside of the confessional could be subject to civil law. Thus, if the situation involved sexual abuse, the priest would warn the individual that anything he told him outside of the confessional could trigger the priest's legal duty to report.

I commend Father Doyle and Father Morrissey for giving serious consideration to this issue and proposing ways in which clergy can fulfil their statutory duty to report child sexual abuse. This very important issue, including their proposals, should be addressed by the Diocese immediately to ensure that civil authorities are alerted to the alleged sexual abuse in order to conduct their respective investigations so that young people can be protected.

From Pain to Hope recommended that Catholics in Canada "become informed about the requirements of provincial and territorial reporting laws on child sexual abuse ... and become involved in information, education and prevention programs on child sexual abuse.” Father Morrisey testified that every diocese has a mandatory session on this subject for all priests, who must sign a document that states they have participated in this session and are aware of reporting obligations. He also stated that these sessions can be held in collaboration with local Children’s Aid Society authorities or with the local police.

Father Doyle stated that in the United States, a report to the civil authorities is made after the bishop undertakes a preliminary inquiry into the allegations. Father Morrisey testified that he is unaware whether in Canada a complaint is required to be reported immediately or after the bishop conducts a preliminary investigation. In a 1991 article entitled “The Pastoral and Juridical Dimensions of Dismissal from the Clerical State and of Other Penalties for Acts of Sexual Misconduct,” Father Morrisey wrote:

In some places, the Children’s Aid Societies and similar organizations insist that they are to be informed even before the Church conducts any internal inquiry. This will be a matter for a prudential judgment on the part of those involved, and calls for the establishment, if possible, of suitable relations with such organizations beforehand.

According to Father Morrisey, it is the Church’s position that if a person who is no longer a minor reports historical sexual abuse that occurred when he or she was a minor, the person who receives the complaint is not required to report it to the civil authorities. A person who is no longer a minor is considered capable of reporting the abuse to the civil authorities. Father Morrisey contrasted this with the Dallas Charter, which states that the Church will “cooperate with public authorities about reporting in cases when the person is no longer a minor” and that bishops in some states have made a commitment to refer every case of clergy sexual abuse to the district attorney, regardless of whether it involves a duty to report. Father Morrisey was not aware of any similar commitment in Canada.

Treatment of Abusive Priests

In the past, sexuality was treated as something that could be controlled through willpower, and sexual abuse was considered a moral problem. Father Doyle explained that at times, a bishop would “put the fear of God” into a priest who had abused and the priest would promise not to do it again. However, Church experts currently take the position that sexual dysfunction is a highly compulsive form of mental illness, which cannot be willed away, and should not be considered simply a moral failing.

A priest cannot be forced to attend treatment. The Winter Report suggested that convicted priests who have completed prison terms should be offered therapy and that the cost of this therapy should be borne by the diocese. It also proposed that a follow-up and monitoring program exist for all priests after therapy and the archdiocese should be responsible for the implementation and administration of such programs.

There are a number of treatment centres available in Canada for priests who agree to undergo treatment for sexually abusing people. However, there are waiting lists at some of the facilities.

A priest cannot be forced to release his treatment records to the bishop or diocese. However, Father Morrissey explained that if a bishop does not receive a report on a priest's treatment, he may not provide the priest with an assignment or a salary. Therefore, there is considerable pressure on a priest to release his treatment report.

Return to Ministry for Abusive Priests

From Pain to Hope states that rehabilitation is possible for some priests who have committed abuse, while it may not be for other members of the clergy. According to Father Morrissey, true pedophilia is not a curable disorder. Father Doyle said that an individual suffering from sexual dysfunction requires intensive therapy for the duration of his life.

A centre that treats a priest for sexual dysfunction merely provides a medical evaluation. It is a bishop's responsibility to evaluate a priest's fitness for ministry. Father Morrissey testified that although it is unlikely that a priest who has sexually abused a child would be placed back in ministry, there is no categorical prohibition to ensure that this does not occur.

Father Morrissey pointed out that there is a difference between being found unsuitable to exercise ministry and being dismissed from the clerical state. He was of the opinion that with the input of clinicians trained in dealing with the issue, some priests who have committed child sexual abuse could be returned to some working function. Both Father Doyle and Father Morrissey agreed that simply releasing priests who have sexually abused children into the community does not protect the public because once a priest is dismissed from the clerical state, nobody has authority over him and there is nothing to prevent him from continuing to abuse children. Father Doyle said that in the United States, he has seen an increasing number of cases in which men dismissed from the priesthood for committing sexual abuse have subsequently worked in positions where they had access to children. He argued that keeping a priest in a special residence, akin to house arrest, can sometimes enable the Church to protect members of the public from clergy abuse.

The experts confirmed that there were cases in the past when offending priests were transferred to other dioceses or parishes without treatment for their sexual problems. Father Doyle described sexual dysfunction of clergy as a lifelong problem. Once an offending priest has received treatment, measures need to be taken to prevent him from re-offending. A priest found to have sexually abused a child may not be placed in ministry again. However, it is possible that a priest who has received treatment for sexual abuse will be transferred to another diocese in a position other than parish priest. Canon 241 §3 provides that “when persons seek admission after they have been dismissed from another seminary or from a religious institute, further testimony is required from the respective superior, especially regarding the cause of their dismissal or their leaving.” The problem is that if the information is strictly confidential or if it has been received in the confessional, it cannot be communicated. Father Morrissey stated that when a priest is removed from a diocese and seeks employment in another diocese, the receiving diocese may not be told the reason for the removal.

Prior to 1987, there were no policies or procedures in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall that addressed sexual abuse by members of the clergy. Bishop Eugène LaRocque testified that it became evident in 1986, when the Diocese was confronted with the Father Gilles Deslauriers matter, that the Diocese needed a formal procedure and protocol on how respond to this issue. As I discuss in detail in this chapter, Father Deslauriers was a priest in the Diocese against whom allegations were made of sexual abuse of young people in the Cornwall community. He was criminally charged by the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) and pleaded guilty in late 1986 to four counts of gross indecency. There were multiple victims.

Although there were no diocesan policies or protocols that addressed allegations of abuse by members of the clergy prior to 1987, Bishop LaRocque was aware that canon law dealt with issues of sexual abuse. He testified that there has never been a canonical prosecution dealing with sexual misconduct or clergy sexual abuse in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

The Diocese issued a policy on clergy misdemeanours in 1987. As will be discussed, it was not an official or a formal policy. In 1992, the Diocese developed guidelines that specifically dealt with sexual abuse by priests, deacons, seminarians, and pastoral assistants, and in 1995, they were replaced with another set of guidelines. In 2003, “Diocesan Guidelines on Managing Allegations of Sexual Abuse of Children and of Sexual Assault of Adults by Clergy, Religious, Lay Employees and Volunteers” took effect in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. The 2003 guidelines, with some revisions that have been made over the years, continue to apply in the Diocese today. Bishop Paul-André Durocher stated that these guidelines require updating, which he plans to undertake after he has received the recommendations from this Inquiry.

This section describes the protocols and policies developed in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall to address sexual abuse by members of the clergy.

Principles and Procedures for Clergy in Difficulty, 1987

The first protocol in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall on allegations of abuse on a young person by a member of the clergy, “Principles and Procedures for Clergy in Difficulty,” was developed in 1987. Bishop LaRocque explained that in signing this document, he was approving it for use within the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall “as a draft.” He stated that it was replaced in 1992 by a document created by Father Denis Vaillancourt.

In the late 1980s, bishops in Ontario and other provinces of Canada were trying to develop procedures for sexual abuse by clergy, in part because of the allegations of abuse at Mount Cashel in Newfoundland, the abuse of First Nations children in residential schools, and the allegations of sexual abuse by Christian Brothers in Ontario. There were also some high-profile cases in the United States.

“Principles and Procedures for Clergy in Difficulty” stated that the Diocese was formally taking the position that clergy misdemeanours must be taken seriously. It said that clergy and Church personnel must be educated on the legal and moral aspects of indictable offences, including child abuse and teenage sexual assault, and should be aware of procedures to deal with complaints of clergy misdemeanours. It also stated that the Diocese must assume responsibility for the care of victims of clergy misdemeanours:

1. The Diocese goes on record to take matters of clergy misdemeanours seriously, out of concern for the members of the clergy as well as those affected. Before these are legal problems, they are pastoral problems.
2. Clergy and personnel are to be educated on the legal and moral aspect of indictable offenses (e.g. drunk driving, embezzlement of funds, child abuse, teenage or retarded adult sexual assault ...)
3. Clergy and personnel are to know that there is a procedure for identification, care, support and after-care.
4. Diocese takes responsibility with the clergy concerned for the care of the victims.

“Principles and Procedures for Clergy in Difficulty” stipulated that upon receiving a complaint about a clergy member, the bishop was to refer the complainant to a third party designated by the bishop. This individual, who could be a clergy member or other person in a position of trust, was to obtain information on the complaint. Upon verification of the facts, the Diocese was to support both the clergy member and the victim—to help the alleged perpetrator with his problem and the victim with his or her trauma. The Christian community, it stated, must take responsibility for re-admitting the clergy member and the victim to the community. Bishop Durocher explained that “re-admission” of a clergy member referred to re-admission to functions or duties. The document stated that “in some instances, incardination in another Diocese may be best for all concerned.” Bishop Durocher explained that another diocese might have facilities for treatment unavailable in the current ministry or might have a more suitable position for the priest. He stated that the originating diocese has no ongoing responsibility for the priest if the priest is incardinated in a new diocese.

“Principles and Procedures for Clergy in Difficulty” recommended that the following canonical and legal procedures be applied in “more serious cases,” which Bishop LaRocque testified included sexual abuse:

1. immediate suspension, which meant that the priest could no longer celebrate the sacraments
2. immediate treatment and support of the member of the clergy and victim(s)
3. plea bargaining (if necessary to avoid litigation or incarceration).

The document stated that “legal advice and assistance is available to all members of the clergy involved in criminal investigations.” Bishop LaRocque explained that only unusual or exceptional circumstances would disqualify clergy from legal assistance, as was the case with Father Gilles Deslauriers. This is discussed in fuller detail in this chapter.

“Principles and Procedures for Clergy in Difficulty” did not discuss the duty to report complaints of abuse to the Children’s Aid Society (CAS) or of contacting other civil authorities such as the police.

Proposed Procedure to Be Applied in Cases of Child Sexual Abuse by a Cleric, 1988

In April 1988, in preparation for a Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops (CCCCB) meeting, the document “Proposed Procedure to Be Applied in Cases of Child Sexual Abuse by a Cleric” was distributed to local dioceses. The author of this document was Father Francis Morrissey, who, as mentioned, testified at this Inquiry as an expert in canon law. He periodically provided canonical advice to the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. This document was not an official CCCB document. It was circulated for information purposes only. Bishop Durocher explained that it had some persuasive value, but it was merely a proposed procedure, not binding on any dioceses. This proposed procedure was not adopted by the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

The document suggested that bishops appoint a team of competent people to handle allegations of child sexual abuse, who would report directly to the diocesan bishop. It was further recommended that the team establish a policy to deal with complaints of clergy sexual abuse, which would take into account existing Church and civil laws applicable to the territory such as reporting obligations, confidentiality, and privileged information. Once such a policy was established, it was to be communicated to clergy.

The proposed procedure indicated that the diocesan bishop should appoint one or more priests to conduct a preliminary investigation into complaints of child sexual abuse. It also stated that “suitable persons should be designated to meet with the parents, and eventually the children involved.”

It also suggested that referral centres be selected that could provide psychological testing and assessments and recommended that the diocese establish a contingency fund to cover legal, medical, and counselling expenses.

The CCCB document also suggested that as soon as a priest was accused of sexual abuse, a person designated by the bishop should meet with the parents of the alleged victim. With the parents’ consent, the alleged victim should then be interviewed by a mental health professional. If the parents did not consent to this interview, they should be advised as to where they could obtain appropriate professional counselling for their children as well as for themselves.

The document proposed that the accused cleric be given an immediate leave of absence and provided with a trial lawyer, a person other than the diocesan lawyer. It stated that a meeting could then be held with the bishop of the diocese, the diocesan lawyer, the accused priest, and the priest’s lawyer. The information discussed at such meetings would be protected by solicitor–client privilege. In my view, the bishop has responsibilities to the priest and the parishioners as well as to the alleged victims. The bishop, in my opinion, should adopt a more neutral role when dealing with the accused priest and discontinue meeting with the accused in the presence of his lawyer.

The CCCB document also stated that the accused cleric was to be provided with an appropriate place to reside pending the outcome of the investigation. It further stated that after the priest was accused of the abuse, neither the bishop nor any of the priests involved should hear his sacramental confession.

The designated priest would then conduct a preliminary inquiry on behalf of the Church. If he determined that there was reason to proceed with the case, the accused cleric would be heard.

Once the inquiry was complete, the designated priest would present a report to the bishop, stating either that there was no substance to the allegations or that this matter required further action. In the latter case, the cleric's faculties to preach and his right to hear confessions were to be immediately removed. The cleric would then be referred to a treatment centre for evaluation, and the team would decide whether the matter should be referred to a canonical penal trial.

If the matter proceeded to a canonical trial at which the cleric was found guilty, the appropriate canonical penalties would be applied.

If the sexual abuse was verified, the document recommended that the children and family involved continue to receive assistance from the Church. Any eventual return to ministry for the cleric could not be considered until after therapy and a recommendation by the team appointed by the bishop.

Criteria for Accepting Ordained Priests to the Diocese, 1989

When Eugène LaRocque was installed as Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria in 1974, there was no screening process for priests transferring from another diocese. The only practice that existed was for the bishop to contact the superior or the bishop of the priest's former diocese.

At a September 25, 1986, Council of Priests meeting, it was decided that admission criteria for accepting candidates from other dioceses should be established. It was suggested that such work be completed by a committee.

The minutes of a March 1987 meeting of the Council of Priests indicate Father Kevin Maloney presented some criteria for accepting candidates and priests to the Diocese.

At a Council of Priests meeting on September 13, 1989, the "Criteria for accepting ordained Priests to the Diocese" were accepted. Bishop LaRocque implemented these criteria in the Diocese.

The document stated that any priest applying for a position in the Diocese should do so by letter, specifying why he was leaving his present position and the reasons he wished to join the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. Moreover, the priest was to obtain a letter of recommendation from his superior, dated within six months of the application. In the case of a priest who worked in a diocese other than his own, letters of recommendation and evaluation had to be provided.

It was recommended that the applicant be interviewed by a panel of three priests selected by the bishop and that this panel provide a recommendation for action to the bishop. If an applicant was accepted and assigned to a parish, it was on a trial basis of three months, to be reviewed by the pastor, the applicant, and the bishop or his delegate.

Diocesan Guidelines on Sexual Abuse by Priests, Deacons, Seminaries, and Pastoral Assistants, 1992

Father Denis Vaillancourt, the Chancellor of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, prepared a document for the Diocese entitled “Diocesan Guidelines on Sexual Abuse by Priests, Deacons, Seminarians and Pastoral Assistants.” As the document was not signed, there was some confusion about when it was officially adopted. Bishop LaRocque testified that Church officials in the Diocese regarded this document as the official guidelines for the Diocese, despite the fact that it was not signed. He claimed that he followed these guidelines as early as summer 1992. Bishop LaRocque testified that these guidelines were in effect when David Silmsen contacted the Church and alleged that a priest in the Diocese, Father Charles MacDonald, had abused him. This is discussed in further detail in this chapter.

These guidelines remained in effect in the Diocese until 1995.

The guidelines stated that the person designated by the bishop was to meet with the complainant within forty-eight hours of receiving a complaint of sexual abuse. He was to assess the seriousness of the complaint and verify if the alleged victim was a minor. A minor was defined as an individual under sixteen years old. The designated person was to “ascertain that there are facts which support a ‘reasonable motive’ for the complainant according to the laws on the protection of youth (Children’s Aid Society).”

The designated person was to inform the complainant that there would be a meeting with the suspected aggressor, the advisory committee would study the complaint, and if the alleged victim was a minor, the CAS would be informed of the offence. Bishop LaRocque testified that it was unclear whether reporting was triggered in circumstances in which the alleged victim was a minor at the time of the offence but not a minor at the time of the complaint.

The designated person was to open a file on the case, record the events in chronological order, and write a report on the meeting with the complainant. He was also to discuss the contents of this meeting with the bishop.

The designated person was also to meet with the accused priest within forty-eight hours of the complaint. He was to notify him of the complaint, reassure him that his rights would be respected, and offer him legal and psychological support. If the alleged victim was a minor, the accused priest was to be informed that the case would be submitted to the CAS. The alleged perpetrator was also to be instructed not to have any contact with the complainant, the victim, or the victim's family, and if necessary, require that he voluntarily resign from his ministry.

The designated person was to file a report of the meeting with the accused priest and inform the bishop of this meeting.

After the above steps had been completed, the designated person was to convene a meeting with the advisory committee as soon as possible so that the committee could assess the value of the "reasonable motive." The minutes of the meeting were to be recorded. The bishop was to be informed of this meeting.

After the above steps had been followed, if necessary, the designated person was to notify the CAS of the case and follow its directives. The complainant and the suspected aggressor were to be informed of the measures taken. The guidelines stated that if the CAS was not notified of the case, the designated person was to meet with the complainant, explain the reasons for this decision, and inform the complainant of his right to bring the case to the attention of the CAS.

The guidelines stated that at this stage, "If the situation warrants it because the events have become public, because of the trial or that it is a case for the CAS, the Bishop will order the person concerned to leave his post." It is important to note that this does not cover situations such as those encountered by Mr. Silmsner, when an individual makes a complaint to the Diocese regarding sexual abuse allegations and the accusations are not yet public. Bishop LaRocque stated in his testimony that the bishop could temporarily suspend the faculties of the accused priest if he was of the view that there was a risk to the complainant, the alleged aggressor, or others.

Bishop LaRocque initially took the position when he testified at the Inquiry that if the policy was not followed, it was not his responsibility; rather it was the responsibility of the designated person. However, he later acknowledged in his evidence that it was in fact his responsibility to ensure the protocol was adhered to. He acknowledged that he should have monitored situations involving clergy sexual abuse in the Diocese much more closely. This is discussed further in this chapter.

Diocesan Guidelines on Sexual Abuse by Priests, Deacons, Seminarians, and Pastoral Assistants, 1995

In June 1995, Bishop LaRocque signed the "Diocesan Guidelines on Sexual Abuse by Priests, Deacons, Seminarians and Pastoral Assistants." These guidelines were a protocol created by the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall after consultation with the Children's Aid Society, the Ontario Provincial Police, and the Cornwall Police Service. The 1995 guidelines replaced the previous policy created by Father Denis Vaillancourt.

The guidelines developed by Father Vaillancourt in the early 1990s had contained more detail than the 1995 guidelines. Bishop Durocher explained that the CAS and the police believed they should handle investigations without the involvement of the Diocese, and therefore the 1995 guidelines simply set out that the Diocese should make a report to the CAS or police and then wait for the outcome of the investigation. He testified that this might have been necessary, given public perception of the Diocese at the time.

The previous guidelines prepared by Father Vaillancourt stated that if the offence involved a minor, after consultation with the advisory committee, the designated person was to make a report to the CAS. These guidelines made no mention of reporting to the police. In contrast, the 1995 guidelines stated that the first person who received a complaint was to report it to the police immediately or to the CAS if the offence involved a minor. Bishop LaRocque agreed that this protocol required reporting of historical sexual abuse if the alleged victim was under sixteen years old at the time of the offence. That was the agreement reached with the CAS at the time.

The guidelines stated that after a report is made to the CAS or police, the bishop of the Diocese is to be informed of the complaint. The next step was an investigation by either the CAS or the police. Bishop LaRocque stated that at this time an internal Church investigation could also be undertaken by the person designated by the bishop.

The guidelines say:

The Bishop waits for the investigation to take place. If the situation warrants it (because there is a risk to the alleged aggressor, or the possibility of a risk to other members of the community, because the events have become public, because charges will be laid, because a trial will take place) the Bishop removes the suspected aggressor from Church duties.

The final step of the process of dealing with the complaint is to offer help and support to the alleged victim and his family.

Protocol for Priests Who Are the Subject Matter of Criminal Proceedings or Civil Litigations, 1996

Bishop LaRocque signed the diocesan policy “Protocol for priests who are the subject matter of criminal proceedings or civil litigations” in June 1996.

These guidelines were in effect when Bishop Durocher was installed in the Diocese in 2002. This protocol remains in force in the Diocese today. It sets out the various protections available to an accused priest and the procedures to be followed if a priest is the subject of an allegation that results in a criminal proceeding or civil litigation.

According to the protocol, an accused priest has the right to seek legal counsel before responding to investigating authorities, both civil and religious. The priest is entitled to choose his legal counsel, and the cost of his legal counsel is to be borne by the Diocese, regardless of whether it is a criminal allegation or a civil lawsuit. The protocol states that a rationale for paying an accused priest's legal fees is the presumption of innocence. Bishop LaRocque explained that the reason the Church, an employer, pays the legal fees for the priest, an employee, is that members of the clergy do not have the funds to retain legal counsel. He stated that the protocol protects priests through an entire criminal law process, including all appeals. In my view, for funding appeals, the Diocese should require priests who wish to receive such funding to submit a written request in which reasons for the appeal are delineated. The Diocese should then review and assess the request to decide whether such funding should be provided. This will ensure that recourse to the courts is not unnecessarily drawn out, to enable the alleged victims to attain closure.

The protocol directs that a priest accused of an indictable offence be removed from his position and placed on a leave of absence for six months if one or more of the following conditions are present:

- a) risk to the alleged aggressor;
- b) possibility of risk to members of the community;
- c) because the events have become public;
- d) because charges will be laid;
- e) because a trial will take place.

According to the protocol, after a six-month temporary removal from ministry, the removal becomes permanent. Bishop Durocher testified that in his view, this provision contravenes canon law. He explained that a parish priest cannot simply be removed from his position. There is a procedure set out in canon law that must be followed and, as a result, Bishop Durocher was uncertain how this could be put into effect.

The protocol states that the accused priest will be provided with reasonable lodging and the necessary funds to provide such lodging and food.

The protocol directs that an accused priest who is asked to vacate his assignment will receive his full salary, car allowance, and benefits until the completion of all legal processes, including appeals. It also states that the Diocese will pay for the priest's therapy.

Bishop Durocher stated that there are cases in which canon law provides for a canonical penal process, which could result in a penalty. However, he explained that because penal processes are extremely rare, for all intents and purposes, the bishop or the superior of a priest belonging to a religious order decides the appropriate penalties to be imposed. As mentioned earlier, the 1995 “Diocesan Guidelines on Sexual Abuse by Priests, Deacons, Seminarians and Pastoral Assistants” state that there are certain circumstances that require a priest to be removed from his position and placed on a leave of absence.

The protocol states that priests who are indirectly involved in these matters will also be provided with legal representation. According to the provision: “Legal assistance should be provided to other priests who are interviewed by legitimate investigating authorities both civil and religious; the costs will be paid by the Diocese.”

Policy and Procedures for Screening Church Personnel, 2000–2002

In 2000, the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall drafted a screening policy that applied to all diocesan lay employees, clergy, seminarians, religious brothers and sisters, and volunteers. These individuals were required to submit a completed background check form. Employment, volunteer work, and ministry were contingent on a satisfactory investigation, updated every seven years. A copy of the policy and procedure for implementation was to be distributed to all parishes and diocesan entities.

The designated person in each diocesan entity was instructed to forward to the Chancellor’s Office a completed background check for each prospective or existing employee, volunteer, or religious person. A record of all personnel was to be retained.

Under the heading “Minimum Standards of Good Moral Conduct,” the policy states:

Anyone who has been found guilty of, regardless of adjudication, or entered a plea of guilty to, any offense prohibited under any of the following may be excluded from employment or volunteer work that places them in regular contact with children, fragile elderly or the physically or mentally challenged.

- a) relating to abuse or neglect against a child
- b) relating to abuse, neglect or exploitation of aged or disabled persons

- i) relating to child abuse ...

On January 1, 2002, the Diocese revised its screening policy to require all individuals involved in high-risk positions to provide personal information and references and to complete the necessary forms for criminal record verification.

Creation of the Ad Hoc Committee on Safeguarding Against Abuse, 2002

When Paul-André Durocher became the Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall in 2002, one of the first things he did was set up the Ad Hoc Committee on Safeguarding Against Abuse. This committee consisted of specialists who were to advise Bishop Durocher on the implementation of policies to help safeguard children and other vulnerable parishioners against sexual abuse. The Bishop issued a press release announcing the first meeting of this diocesan committee, which was held on August 15, 2002.

Bishop Durocher hired Ronald Bisson, a professional facilitator from Ottawa, to assist this process. The Bishop asked Father Everett MacNeil, a priest from the Diocese of Antigonish and then the bishop's delegate for the Archdiocese of Ottawa, to act as his delegate. Father MacNeil had related experience as a member of the Winter Commission in Newfoundland.

The mandate of the Ad Hoc Committee stated that it would be composed of a dozen members of different ages, genders, professions, and backgrounds. Along with Ronald Bisson and Father MacNeil, the members were Richard Abell, the executive director of the Children's Aid Society; Frances Lafave, administrator of the Glengarry, Stormont and Dundas Lodge, one of Cornwall's major senior homes; Lucie Lévesque, a teacher involved in one of the parishes; Chris McDonell, a retired police officer; Kevin Maloney, the Vicar General of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall; Ron McClelland, a local lawyer; Johneen Rennie, a former administrator of a local senior's home; Gérald Samson, a former superintendent of education for the public board; Judy Schaeffer, a mother active in one of the parishes; and Robert Smith, director of the Children's Treatment Centre.

The mandate contained a list of suggestions for the committee to follow in order to meet its objective, which was "to advise the Bishop on formulating and implementing diocesan policy which will help safeguard children and other vulnerable parishioners against possible sexual abuse by clergy, lay staff and parish volunteers." The first item was "learning from the history of the Church's response to allegations of sexual abuse by members of the clergy." Bishop Durocher wanted the committee to reflect on the history of the Diocese's response to allegations, how these responses were perceived, and the results of these responses. Another suggestion for members of the Ad Hoc Committee was to become familiar with the recommendations contained in From Pain to Hope. All the members were given copies of the document. A further suggestion was to study "recent developments in the field."

Another proposal was to receive "suggestions from concerned groups and individuals relating to the mandate of the committee." The Diocese published the "Diocesan Guidelines on Sexual Abuse by Priests, Deacons, Seminarians and Pastoral Assistants” and the “Protocol for priests who are the subject matter of criminal proceedings or civil litigations” in newspapers such as the Cornwall Standard-Freeholder and French newspaper le Journal de Cornwall and asked for feedback on them. Bishop Durocher testified that although the Diocese received some responses, it “wasn’t overwhelming.”

Bishop Durocher released on August 19, 2002, a press release entitled “First meeting of a diocesan committee on safeguarding against abuse” in which members of this committee were identified to the public.

Bishop Durocher told the committee that the current diocesan policy on clergy sexual abuse was deficient and that he wanted the committee to recommend ways that From Pain to Hope could be applied in the Diocese. The committee’s response to From Pain to Hope was positive. However, in the discussion of this document, a few concerns were raised, including what should be done to protect innocent priests who are falsely accused, what should be done if doubt persists in the public’s mind after an accused priest is acquitted of charges, and whether the Church should pursue an investigation based on canon law when a case is unresolved due to “legal technicalities.” In regard to the last point, it was stated that the Church would be leery of pursuing an investigation when the criminal justice system had not come to a conclusion.

The committee received and studied a second draft of the new policy “Diocesan Guidelines and Policy on Allegations of Sexual Abuse of Children by Clergy, Religious, Lay Employees and Volunteers” dated October 23, 2002.

The Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Safeguarding Against Sexual Abuse was submitted to Bishop Durocher on December 17, 2002. It set out draft guidelines entitled “Diocesan Guidelines on Reporting and Dealing with Allegations of Sexual Abuse of Children and of Sexual Assault of Adults by Clergy, Religious, Lay Employees, and Volunteers,” which were subsequently adopted with some revisions in 2003.

The Ad Hoc Committee Report also set out a “Framework of a Plan for Safeguarding against Sexual Abuse and Sexual Assault.” The aim was to “develop an education, training and prevention plan for safeguarding against sexual abuse and sexual assault in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.” It stated that the plan should meet the following six objectives:

1. To establish a mandatory ongoing education program for the clergy, members of religious orders, lay employees and volunteers regarding their responsibilities, obligations and rights on issues pertaining to sexual abuse and sexual assault.
2. To raise awareness within the diocesan church community, particularly with parents and children, in order to promote positive attitudes concerning healthy sexuality and good relationships.

3. To implement the Ontario Screening Initiative.
4. To assist the Bishop in developing a series of positive messages that will be heard as the voice of the Church in the community.
5. To develop effective communications procedures.
6. To identify and make available the human, technological and material resources required to support an implementation plan.

There was also a recommendation that the bishop annually establish a review committee to study the effectiveness of the diocesan guidelines and recommend improvements. The Report also contained a number of recommendations for follow-up:

In order to pursue the work initiated in August 2002, the Ad Hoc Committee recommends the following:

1. That consideration be given to identifying more clearly the “volunteer” category.
2. That approaches be developed to implement a healing process within the diocese through programs or sessions for various constituencies and for the community at large.
3. That the diocese develops a bank of local resources that could be called upon on short notice in matters relating to these guidelines.
4. Should a victim request a confidentiality agreement, that it be absolutely clear that it is being done at the request of the victim, represented by independent legal counsel, and that it in no way attempts to limit any rights of the victim flowing from criminal law.
5. That appropriate forms be drawn up relating to reporting and record keeping pertaining to actions taken in following the Guidelines.
6. That consideration be given for developing distinct procedures for religious, lay employees and volunteers.
7. That a victim be a member of the Committee for Victims.

In my view, the Diocese should adopt a policy that confidentiality agreements should not be solicited from a victim or alleged victim at any time.

The Report also set out draft guidelines that were to apply to all clergy, employees, and volunteers in the Diocese.

Diocesan Guidelines on Managing Allegations of Sexual Abuse of Children and of Sexual Assault of Adults by Clergy, Religious, Lay Employees, and Volunteers, 2003

Bishop Durocher circulated the draft guidelines submitted by the Ad Hoc Committee on Safeguarding Against Sexual Abuse to different parishes to elicit feedback before making them official. After receiving comments and making appropriate revisions, the “Diocesan Guidelines on Managing Allegations of Sexual Abuse of Children and of Sexual Assault of Adults by Clergy, Religious, Lay Employees and Volunteers” became effective on July 1, 2003. They replaced the 1995 guidelines and are the guidelines currently in effect in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

The guidelines state that clergy, Church employees, or volunteers who become aware of an allegation of child sexual abuse must report it to the bishop’s delegate and to the CAS. The bishop’s delegate will also contact the CAS regarding the allegation. Furthermore, if the allegation concerns historical abuse of a child, the bishop’s delegate will inform the CAS.

The guidelines state that the bishop’s delegate will contact the complainant immediately to verify the allegation, advise him of his right to contact the police, and inform the complainant that the delegate has an obligation to report to the CAS if the allegation involves a child.

Upon verifying the allegation, the bishop’s delegate is to immediately inform the bishop and to convene a meeting of the advisory committee within twenty-four hours. The advisory committee will direct and evaluate the actions of the bishop’s delegate. One of the first issues to be considered by the advisory committee is the care that is to be provided to the victim. The guidelines state that referral will be made to the victims’ care committee in appropriate cases, which is defined as “[a] standing, multidisciplinary committee set up by the Bishop to see that individualized support is available to the victim, both during and after the investigative process, upon referral by the Advisory Committee.” According to the guidelines, the victims’ care committee may pay for counselling or therapy. They also state that if charges have been laid or an investigation by the CAS or the police is ongoing, no meeting will be held with the victim unless proper authorization is obtained from the police or judicial authorities.

The 2003 guidelines stipulate that if charges are laid, “the Bishop will immediately place the accused on a leave of absence from parish ministry or from other Church-related responsibilities, brief the Delegate and the Diocesan Spokesperson, and call a meeting to advise the parish and community.”

If the matter is being pursued by the CAS and/or police, the delegate will not undertake any investigation “but will remain vigilant and will maintain appropriate ongoing communication with the civil authorities.”

If the advisory committee deems the innocence of the accused to remain in question after the conclusion of the police investigation, it can direct the delegate to investigate the allegations and prepare a report for the committee, which will make recommendations to the bishop. The guidelines state that if there is no police investigation of a complaint of a sexual assault of an adult, the delegate must investigate the complaint. Bishop Durocher explained that if the matter involves a child, the CAS and/or police will be involved in an investigation. However, if the case involves an adult, it is possible for the complainant to refuse to have the police involved. Bishop Durocher stated that in such a situation, the delegate must undertake an investigation and report his findings to the advisory committee, which will make recommendations to the bishop on how to proceed in regard to the complaint.

If either the judicial process or the advisory committee determines that an offence has been committed, the committee "will make recommendations to the Bishop on issues of censure, treatment, and future placement of the accused and ongoing care of the victim." If a judicial process or the advisory committee concludes that no offence has been committed, the committee brings the case to a close, and if the accused had been placed on a leave of absence, he will be permitted to resume his duties.

The bishop's delegate is responsible for ensuring that contact is maintained with civil institutions so that the advisory committee is aware of the reasons for decisions made by civil authorities. If the court process ends with a clear and unambiguous acquittal, this will be taken to mean that no offence has been committed. Bishop Durocher testified that if the court process does not end with a clear, unequivocal statement, the advisory committee must continue working on the case.

Throughout the process, the advisory committee makes recommendations to and oversees decisions made by the bishop with respect to pastoral care of parishioners, information provided to the clergy and public, and the status of any criminal charges or civil actions.

The guidelines state under "accountability" that the bishop will annually establish a review committee to study the effectiveness of the guidelines. The bishop will make the results available to the public. The delegate will maintain a written record of allegations received, meetings, and the outcomes of proceedings. Bishop Durocher explained that one of the reasons for establishing an advisory committee was to create a structure of accountability.

The guidelines do not discuss the specifics of civil proceedings. However, Bishop Durocher testified that if he received a statement of claim containing an allegation of historical sexual abuse but no allegation had been made to the bishop's delegate and there were no CAS or criminal investigations, the advisory committee would also be asked to examine the situation.

The 1996 "Protocol for priests who are the subject matter of criminal proceedings or civil litigation" continues to apply regarding issues not addressed in the 2003 guidelines. Bishop Durocher stated that if there are any conflicts between the 1996 protocol and the 2003 guidelines, the latter prevail.

The Diocese's screening policy was amended in January 2004 to include broader screening practices. In addition to police record checks of volunteers, the Diocese conducts reference checks and has an interview process. The policy distinguishes between high-, medium- and low-risk volunteer positions.

In each parish, there is a parish leadership team that is responsible for implementation of the policy. The team identifies high-risk positions and assesses whether the risk can be lowered. A high-risk position would be, for example, leading Sunday school for children. The risk could be lowered by ensuring that two or three adults are always present during Sunday school.

This policy sets out the following steps with respect to screening, among others:

1. providing a written description of the services offered in the Diocese
2. determining and reducing risks levels with respect to the services offered by the Diocese
3. making available to recruits the description of the service to be rendered and its rated level of risk
4. screening for high-risk positions by
 - a) obtaining information about the candidate
 - b) interviewing the candidate
 - c) verifying a candidate's references
 - d) conducting a police record verification
 - e) providing orientation and training
 - f) ensuring supervision and evaluation
 - g) obtaining feedback from participants.

Diocesan Guidelines on Managing Allegations of Sexual Abuse of Children and of Sexual Assault of Adults by Clergy, Religious, Lay Employees, and Volunteers, 2005

After the creation of the 2003 guidelines, Catholic Mutual Canada, the insurer for the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall offered to conduct professional audits of all policies in each Ontario diocese. In January 2005, the insurers met with members of the Diocese's advisory committee to review the 2003 "Diocesan Guidelines on Managing Allegations of Sexual Abuse of Children and of Sexual Assault of Adults by Clergy, Religious, Lay Employees, and Volunteers." They conducted an analysis of the guidelines and procedures for allegations of sexual misconduct. In 2005, the Diocese updated the 2003 guidelines.

Catholic Mutual Canada's review report recommended that the guidelines be modified to include information regarding what procedures should be followed when allegations of sexual abuse are raised anonymously or by someone other than the alleged victim. In response, the relevant section of the guidelines was amended to read:

If the complainant is not himself/herself the presumed victim, the delegate will attempt to contact the presumed victim in order to verify the allegation and advise him/her of his/her right to contact the police. The delegate will attempt to do so even in the case of anonymous allegations.

Further, a distinction needed to be made between an allegation of criminal activity and an allegation of consensual activity involving an adult. As recommended in the review, the definition of sexual assault was changed to read: "Contacts or interactions of a sexual nature between adults with or without mutual consent where a person deems himself or herself to have been victimized."

The review recommended that a written policy be created regarding communication with the media on sexual misconduct. It proposed that the leadership role of the bishop in the recovery process be included in this communication policy. Bishop Durocher stated that the Diocese has not yet developed a written communication policy.

Changes other than those recommended in the 2005 review were also included in the new version of the guidelines. A provision requiring the bishop's delegate to inform the accused of the allegation and record his response was added to the guidelines.

The following provision was also added to the guidelines:

In the case of the sexual abuse of a minor by a priest or deacon, if the presumed victim is under the age of 28 years old at the moment the complaint is made, the Bishop will also initiate a canonical investigation according to Canon 1717 of the Code of Canon Law and eventually refer the case to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

This change was made to reflect the fact that in 2001 the Pope released norms stating that all cases of sexual abuse of minors were to be reported to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. These norms set out that offences reserved to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith have a ten-year limitation period, meaning that after ten years have passed, the offence cannot be dealt with through a canonical process. However, the norms also state that in cases involving the sexual abuse of a minor, the limitation period does not begin to run until the minor reaches the age of eighteen. Therefore, if the complaint is made when the person is not yet twenty-eight years old, the bishop must initiate an investigation and refer the matter to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

The accountability section was changed to provide that the guidelines will be reviewed by an independent audit every second year. This replaced the review committee that was mandated in the 2003 guidelines with an independent audit.

Catholic Mutual's review report also recommended that any employee who has a role that falls within the definition of a high-level volunteer should be subject to a police check and detailed employment application process. It was also suggested that a protocol be established to audit all facets of the volunteer management process, and that this protocol apply to any diocesan employees who have interaction with any vulnerable person or group designated as "high" in relationship to volunteer grading.

The report also recommended that the Diocese amend its policy to make clear that it addresses employees as well as volunteers.

The insurer's review report further recommended that the Diocese create a written policy which requires the bishop or religious superior to disclose all information concerning sexual misconduct of any priest seeking to be transferred to the Diocese or seeking faculties in the Diocese.

The amended guidelines were made effective in September 2005. There was no audit conducted in 2007. Bishop Durocher stated that this audit did not take place because he was awaiting the findings and recommendations of this Inquiry.

Orientations Issued by the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops With Respect to Sexual Abuse of Minors, 2007

In 2006, the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops (CCCCB) initiated work on a document regarding sexual abuse of minors, which was adopted at an October 2007 plenary meeting. Bishop Durocher explained that this document did not have a large effect on the diocesan guidelines, as many of the issues had already been addressed in the 2005 guidelines.

The document has a section entitled "A Responsibility of the Individual Bishop." It reaffirmed the responsibility of each bishop to establish a protocol in each diocese.

The CCCC document stressed, "The protocol should recognize that the responsibility of the Diocese is primarily pastoral and that under no circumstances are its pastoral responsibilities to be overcome by its concerns about the possibility of forfeiting insurance coverage."

Bishop Durocher testified that the Diocese would be reviewing its documentation in light of this document and any recommendations from this Inquiry. Prevention and care were issues introduced in From Pain to Hope.

The Bishop stated that the Diocese has already started work on policies regarding screening. Bishop Durocher stated that the Diocese will need to develop a broader, revamped policy.

Conclusion

Bishop LaRocque testified that the Roman Catholic Diocese is an important institution in the Cornwall community. He agreed that it was important for the community as a whole that the institution be perceived as credible and forthright. Abuse allegations, if not handled appropriately by an institution, can affect the community at large and the Church in a detrimental way. It can also be a breeding ground for rumour and innuendo.

Bishop LaRocque stated that he, as Bishop, had ultimate authority in the Diocese.

Bishop LaRocque published an annual compendium of diocesan policies when he was the Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. In looking back on the evolution of protocols, both internal and inter-agency, Bishop LaRocque acknowledged that some of the practices and the implementation of these protocols could have been done differently. This is discussed in further detail in this chapter.

Bishop Durocher stated that a bishop can adjust the policies that apply in his diocese at will. As he said in his testimony, "Personally, I feel that it's too great a power for bishops but that's an issue to be debated within canon law."

The following sections discuss the institutional response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall to allegations of sexual abuse of young persons by members of the clergy.

Father Gilles Deslauriers

Shortly after Eugène LaRocque became the Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria in 1974, he discerned tension between Father Gilles Deslauriers and some priests in the Diocese. Father Deslauriers was perceived by some of the clergy as controlling and manipulative. At the time, Father Deslauriers was at two parishes; he was the administrator of Green Valley Parish and was responsible for youth at Sacré-Coeur Parish in Alexandria. In November 1974, Bishop LaRocque wrote to Father Deslauriers instructing him to stop interfering in the affairs of Sacré-Coeur Parish, to allow Fathers Raoul Poirier and Denis Vaillancourt to perform matters within their responsibilities. He asked Father Deslauriers to end his involvement in this parish.

Father Deslauriers had been ordained by Bishop Adolphe Proulx in 1970. After his ordination, the priest was in contact with students and youths. Bishop Proulx appointed Father Deslauriers the pastor responsible for French-speaking youth in Alexandria in 1971 and also gave him responsibilities teaching religion in the French sector of Glengarry District High School. Two years later, Father Deslauriers was appointed pastor for Rouleau School in Alexandria.

His contact with children and youth continued when Bishop LaRocque succeeded Bishop Proulx in the Diocese of Alexandria. In 1978, Father Deslauriers became responsible for apostolate with francophone youth in the Diocese. That year, Bishop LaRocque also named Father Deslauriers full-time chaplain at La Citadelle High School in Cornwall.

The appointment at La Citadelle High School, a French public secondary school, was a result of the request of Principal Jeannine Séguin. Ms Séguin lived with Bishop Proulx's sister in the Bishop's cottage. It is noteworthy that her suggestion that a Catholic priest be installed in a French public school as chaplain, with a salary to be paid by the school, was considered out of the ordinary by Bishop LaRocque:

... [C]'était inouï de penser d'un école publique de langue française mettrait un prêtre catholique comme aumônier et paierait son salaire. Je n'avais jamais entendu parler de cela.

Although some high schools had chaplains, the chaplains did not have offices. They were seldom at the schools other than for graduation or if a serious problem emerged and did not receive salaries from the school.

At the time Father Deslauriers became the full-time chaplain at La Citadelle High School, Bishop LaRocque wrote a pastoral letter to commemorate the twenty-fifth anniversary of his own ordination as a priest. It was directed at young people. The pastoral letter discussed the Roman Catholic Church teaching that love comes from practising chastity and control of sexuality:

... [J]'avais écrit la lettre pour essayer de rehausser la lettre de l'encyclique de Paul VI sur la contraception et l'idée de l'Église que l'amour vient en pratiquant la chasteté, le contrôle de notre sexualité par amour et non par peur. Et je l'avais écrite directement pour essayer d'aider aux jeunes.

In a letter to Bishop LaRocque in 1981, Father Deslauriers informed the Bishop that he had never distributed the pastoral letter to students at La Citadelle as he considered the message indigestible and unacceptable:

... [J]e voudrais vous dire que votre lettre past. sur la chasteté fut pour moi inacceptable. Elle reflétait un po pourri [sic] d'idées saugrenues et non digestibles ... [V]oilà pourquoi je me suis permis de ne pas la distribuer aux étudiants de la Citadelle.

Bishop LaRocque was very disappointed that Father Deslauriers had not circulated the pastoral letter to the students and was upset by the tone of the priest's correspondence to him.

Parishioners Raise Questionable Behaviour of Father Deslauriers With the Bishop, Claude Thibault Meets With Bishop LaRocque

Claude Thibault was born and raised in Cornwall. His parents were devout Roman Catholics. He served as an altar boy and a reader during mass and was involved in a youth group at his parish. In high school he was on the Pastoral Committee, which organized prayer sessions, masses, and other religious activities. As he said at the Inquiry, religion was an integral part of his life.

Claude Thibault was in grade 12 at La Citadelle High School when Father Gilles Deslauriers became chaplain of the French school. Father Deslauriers was in charge of the Pastoral Committee and organized prayer services and other activities for the high school students.

Father Deslauriers organized a spiritual movement called "R3" after he became the school chaplain. "R" stood for "rencontre," which means "meeting." As Bishop LaRocque explained, the "3" signified meeting with God, others, and oneself. There were monthly meetings and sometimes weekend retreats at which the students participated in prayer, celebrations, and sometimes confession.

Claude Thibault became very involved in the R3 movement when he was a grade 12 student at La Citadelle. Through the activities of R3, Father Deslauriers quickly became a "good friend," a "mentor," and a "confidant" for Claude Thibault. As Claude Thibault said in his evidence, "R3 really created the opportunity to get to know" the priest. Father Deslauriers told the student that he had a doctoral degree in psychology, which was untrue. Claude Thibault, who later became a priest, testified that the information about Father Deslauriers' doctoral degree was false. He considered Father Deslauriers his spiritual advisor.

Claude Thibault periodically sought advice from the priest. It was at one of these counselling sessions, said Claude Thibault, that Father Deslauriers began to sexually abuse him. He testified that he was abused by Father Deslauriers several times. It was his recollection that this took place between approximately January 1978 and September 1979. Although the grooming took place at La Citadelle High School, the abuse occurred at St. John Bosco rectory, where Father Deslauriers was a priest in residence. The abuse generally occurred in the evening. Claude Thibault, like many victims of abuse, did not disclose at that time the sexual acts committed on him by the priest.

But in August 1979, when Claude Thibault was at a retreat in Trois-Rivières, Quebec, he disclosed the sexual acts of the priest to a lay person in charge of the centre. Father Deslauriers did not attend this retreat. Nineteen-year-old Claude Thibault told this woman, Rose-Annette Vachon, that he was confused about the “therapy” administered to him by Father Deslauriers. She learned that the sexual contact perpetrated on him had been presented by the priest as “therapy.” Her reaction was one of surprise. She escorted Claude Thibault to a priest at the retreat centre. Father Thibault explained at the Inquiry the reason why he trusted Father Deslauriers despite the fact that the sexual behaviour, the “so-called therapy,” did not “feel right”:

... I believe that my involvement with the Church, my faith and all of that was very instrumental ... with the abuse itself. One of the reasons why—like, there was a lot of confusion over this abuse, this so-called therapy. In my mind, it never felt right, but it was somebody that, as he had said and falsely said, had a degree in psychology, and he spoke at different times that his thesis was something regarding sexual problems or deviants of whatever. So he was, in my mind, a master of that, but he was also a priest.

And I really—I wouldn’t say—I knew a number of priests so I wouldn’t say that I believed that a priest could do no wrong. I think I had a good understanding at that point that priests are human and can make mistakes but I constantly would come back to the fact, like, well, he knows what he’s doing, even though it doesn’t feel right. It doesn’t feel right with my religious values; what I had been taught; what I had grown up with. He is a priest. So there has got to be something that I’m missing that he sees and I—he had brainwashed me, I would say, so much with having to trust him that that is exactly what I did.

Claude Thibault spoke to Father Germain Coté, who worked at the retreat centre. In Father Coté’s office, he disclosed the “therapy” administered by Father Deslauriers. Claude said he felt guilty for participating in these acts. Claude Thibault testified that he is quite certain that the disclosure was “in the context of confession.” Father Coté’s immediate reaction was that this behaviour was inappropriate and did not “make sense.” He encouraged Claude to approach Father Deslauriers and make it clear to the priest that he wanted this “therapy” to stop. Claude Thibault testified that he does not recall Father Coté recommending that he contact the Bishop or the police or the Children’s Aid Society (CAS).

Claude Thibault decided to follow Father Coté's advice. After the spiritual retreat at Trois-Rivières, he met with Father Deslauriers and asked the priest to stop this behaviour. He testified that Father Deslauriers complied.

In 1981, Claude Thibault entered Saint Paul Seminary after completing three years at the University of Ottawa. He disclosed the abuse that had been perpetrated on him by Father Deslauriers to a friend at the seminary, who commented that there were likely to be other victims. His friend helped him to realize the control Father Deslauriers had over him and he began to understand that the sexual acts were without question inappropriate. This had a significant impact on Claude Thibault. He became angry and began to rebel against persons connected with the Diocese and generally with people in positions of authority. This behaviour had an adverse effect on his studies at Saint Paul Seminary and he received a poor evaluation from the rector in his second year.

Claude Thibault knew Father Deslauriers was manipulative and did not tell the truth and therefore was very worried that the priest who had sexually abused him would make negative and false comments about him to the Bishop. He thought that Bishop LaRocque trusted and highly respected Father Deslauriers. The theology student wanted the Bishop to know that his relationship with Father Deslauriers was poor. He sought the Bishop's understanding and support.

The meeting took place in Bishop LaRocque's office. Claude Thibault told the Bishop that he had a strained and difficult relationship with Father Gilles Deslauriers; the priest had not been "true" with Claude, and he was controlling and played games. Claude Thibault testified that he was "trying to open a door" because he "had a desire to go further eventually" and disclose the sexual abuse to Bishop LaRocque. But instead the Bishop chastised Claude Thibault for making these statements and said, "Attention; c'est des grosses accusations," which translates as "Be careful; those are grave accusations." This was a very unfortunate response. As Claude Thibault said, the Bishop's "response closed the door" to the "possibility" of revealing in the future the sexual abuse perpetrated on him by Father Deslauriers.

After completing his studies at the seminary, Claude Thibault had a pastoral internship in 1984 and 1985 at St. Columban's Parish in Cornwall. His spiritual advisor at that time was Sister Myrna Ladouceur of the Soeurs du Sacré-Coeur in Ottawa. Although he did not disclose the sexual abuse, Claude Thibault told Sister Ladouceur that Father Deslauriers lied, was manipulative, and abused his authority:

... I started talking about my relationship with Father Gilles since I had known him and different difficulties that I had had with him in the way he directed me and the control he had.

I did not at first speak to her about the so-called therapy or the sexual abuse, but I spoke about the lies that I had endured and the manipulation, other forms of abuse, abuse of authority.

Sister Ladouceur encouraged Claude Thibault to confront Father Deslauriers with these issues and to convey the impact of the priest's behaviour on his life.

The meeting with Father Deslauriers took place on March 21, 1985. Claude Thibault confronted the priest with the sexual abuse, and he told Father Deslauriers that he was "taking ... back" the "control" the priest had over his life. He described the adverse effect the priest's behaviour had on him. Claude Thibault felt unburdened and for the first time out from under the control of Father Deslauriers. He no longer feared Father Deslauriers. In a mixture of French and English, he said:

I realized only afterwards it was [the] first day of spring and it was a spring day in my life. So I basically went to see him after preparing with Sister Myrna and went over a number of issues and said ... when you did this, when you said that, this is what it what it had, the impact it had on me, this is how I felt. And although I had not spoken to Sister Myrna about the sexual abuse, I also confronted him specifically on that aspect, and brought that back and told him—talked to him about the -impact that it had had on me and how I felt at that time about it.

Le contrôle que je t'ai donné sur ma vie, je viens le reprendre. So the control I'd given you over my life, I'm taking it back. And it really, really is what happened.

I had come to realize that he was a friend that I was terrified of, and you're not terrified of friends. So for the first time, he wasn't up there and me down here; he was at my level and it really broke the fear and it broke the control.

After listening to Claude Thibault, Father Deslauriers said he was sorry but insisted that he was merely trying to "help" him.

Claude Thibault testified that Father Deslauriers' control over him ended on March 21, 1985, when he told the priest that he was taking back control of his life.

Another parishioner in the Diocese tried to alert Bishop LaRocque to Father Deslauriers' inappropriate behaviour. A woman arranged a meeting with the Bishop in the fall of 1985 concerning her son. She said that Father Deslauriers was manipulative and asked the Bishop to take steps to ensure that her son had no contact with this priest. This parishioner met with the Bishop a second time. Yet Bishop LaRocque did not give serious consideration to the mother's complaint. In his evidence, the Bishop recalled these visits from the woman, who was accompanied at one of them by her sister.

It was in 1986, when this parishioner told the story about her son to an ad hoc committee established by the Bishop to examine Father Deslauriers' conduct, that Bishop LaRocque realized she had tried to approach him to address the priest's behaviour. He had not given her complaints much consideration and had taken no measures to address the situation. The Bishop acknowledged in his evidence at the Inquiry that he had acted unfairly and apologized for his behaviour at the meetings with this woman:

Et ça—je voudrais peut-être profiter de—pour demander pardon de cette dame. Sa soeur moins parce que sa soeur était plutôt là pour l'accompagner, mais je crois que j'ai été très injuste envers elle.

Claude Thibault's Failed Attempt to Disclose Abuse to Bishop

Although Sister Ladouceur continued to be his spiritual advisor, it was not until the end of 1985 that Claude Thibault disclosed the sexual abuse perpetrated on him by Father Deslauriers. He told Sister Ladouceur that he knew he needed to reveal the abuse to Bishop LaRocque but felt it was "too much of a risk" to do so before his ordination. Claude Thibault thought that it was his responsibility to make this disclosure in order to protect other possible victims of Father Deslauriers. Claude Thibault, who was a deacon at this time, considered himself very vulnerable because of Father Deslauriers' "power" and "the trust that the Bishop had towards Gilles." He was fearful that the Bishop would not believe him. He told Sister Ladouceur that within six months of his ordination he would disclose the abuse to Bishop LaRocque:

... I told her that I knew by that time that I had to speak to the Bishop about it, and that I was planning to do so but I felt that I couldn't talk to him about that before my ordination.

I was deacon already at that point, and before being ordained priest, because it was too much of a risk, again, because of the power that Father Gilles, had, and the trust that the Bishop had towards Gilles.

I wasn't sure, first of all, that the Bishop would believe me; that it would be my word against Father Gilles' words, and that I was just kind of a nobody almost. And that I—I felt that after being ordained, I probably would have a bit more leverage.

And so I said to her, I know I have to speak to him, and she agreed with that, definitely. And I said, I'm giving myself six months within my ordination. I had no idea how and when I'd do it. I was very afraid but I knew I had the responsibility to let the Bishop know what had happened.

At that point, I still did not know that there was anybody else that had suffered the same thing, but I was more and more aware that I didn't want anybody else to have to go through what I went through.

Claude Thibault was afraid that if he revealed the abuse before this time and was not believed, he would never become ordained. When he had approached Bishop LaRocque a few years earlier, the Bishop did not appear to believe him, and in fact had chastised Claude Thibault for saying that Father Deslauriers was controlling. This led Claude Thibault to conclude that the Bishop might not believe his disclosure that Father Deslauriers had sexually abused him.

Brisson Family Discloses Abuse of Benoit Brisson to Priests in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall

On January 21, 1986, Father Bernard Ménard received a call from Ms Lise Brisson. She conveyed that she had something painful to share with the priest and asked to meet him. They arranged to meet two days later.

Father Claude Champagne from Ottawa contacted Father Denis Vaillancourt on January 21, 1986, to ask him if he could supervise an R3 weekend in Ottawa. Father Vaillancourt was involved in this spiritual movement at the same time as Father Deslauriers and participated in the weekend retreats for young people between the ages of seventeen and twenty-five. During the course of this telephone call, Father Champagne relayed that he had received information that Father Deslauriers had had sexual encounters with young persons. He added that this had destroyed a man's marriage. This man was Benoit Brisson. Benoit had been a student at La Citadelle High School when Father Deslauriers had been chaplain.

Father Vaillancourt met the Brisson family. Bishop LaRocque was not in the Diocese at that time but was expected to return in a few days. Hubert and Lise Brisson shared with Father Vaillancourt some details of the sexual abuse of their son, Benoit. They told Father Vaillancourt that they had also disclosed the abuse to Father Rhéal Bisaillon and had contacted Father Ménard.

This was the first time Father Vaillancourt and Father Ménard had been presented with allegations of sexual abuse by a priest in the Diocese. The clergy were unprepared. They had no training in such matters and there was no protocol on sexual abuse at that time in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

On January 23, 1986, Father Vaillancourt contacted Father Bisaillon, who was surprised that another priest knew of the Brisson sexual abuse. Father Bisaillon had asked the Brisson family not to discuss this issue with anyone. He wanted the Brisson family to give him time to think about how the Church would deal with this situation. To Father Vaillancourt's knowledge, Father Bisaillon did not report the allegations of abuse.

After Father Ménard spoke with the Brisson family and learned of the sexual abuse by Father Deslauriers, he met with Fathers Vaillancourt and Bisaillon at the Ste-Croix presbytery to discuss what he considered to be a serious issue. Father Ménard was saddened by this disclosure and the impact the sexual abuse had had on Benoit Brisson and his family. At this January 27, 1986, meeting, Father Bisaillon stated that three or four years earlier, Monsignor Aimé Leduc had asked him discreetly whether he had heard that Father Deslauriers was having sexual contact with young people. Father Bisaillon told Monsignor Leduc that he was not aware of this conduct.

Because Father Ménard was from a religious order and was not a priest from the Diocese, Fathers Vaillancourt and Bisaillon thought he should be the person to confront Gilles Deslauriers with the Brisson allegations of abuse. Father Ménard was not a colleague of Father Deslauriers and was considered "neutral." Father Ménard agreed to approach the priest. He considered the Brisson disclosure to be credible. He went to La Nativité Presbytery that day to speak to Father Deslauriers about the allegations. When Father Deslauriers was confronted with the Brisson disclosure of sexual assault, his response was that this was therapy for youths who lacked confidence and self-esteem. Father Ménard replied that this was a serious matter and told the priest that the Bishop should be notified immediately.

Bishop LaRocque had just returned from a two-week vacation. Father Deslauriers went to see the Bishop on January 27, 1986, the day he met with Father Ménard. He told Bishop LaRocque that he had engaged in an indiscretion, that he had touched a youth, but he insisted that it was not a serious matter. As Bishop LaRocque said:

... [I]l m'a dit qu'il avait eu l'indiscrétion de toucher le jeune par-dessus les vêtements, puis c'était vraiment rien et puis qu'il faudrait pas en faire une grosse cause.

Bishop LaRocque testified that he might have told Father Deslauriers to take a thirty-day retreat. Yet the Bishop acknowledged that there was no discussion as to when the retreat should begin or who should make the arrangements.

The Bishop appears to have accepted Father Deslauriers' explanation and took no action at the time to further investigate the matter or to determine whether any other boys or young people in the Diocese had been sexually abused by Father Deslauriers.

The following morning, Father Ménard met with the Bishop to ensure that Father Deslauriers had disclosed his sexual behaviour with Benoit Brisson. Father Ménard was disturbed about the Deslauriers situation. There was no discussion or contemplation by the Bishop at that time about suspending or removing Father Deslauriers from the ministry.

Father Gilles Deslauriers met with Ms Lise Brisson on January 28, 1986, the day after he spoke to Bishop LaRocque. The meeting took place at the Brisson home. The priest explained that he had been administering psychological therapy to her son and that his acts had been misunderstood. Father Deslauriers asked for and received forgiveness but had no repentance. Together they called Bishop LaRocque. According to Ms Brisson, Bishop LaRocque thanked her for proceeding with this issue discreetly because, he cautioned, if it became public knowledge, it would be harmful to the clergy.

Denyse Deslauriers, Benoit Brisson's former spouse, testified that she met with Father Gilles Deslauriers on January 30, 1986. Father Deslauriers had blessed their engagement, married them, and baptized their oldest child. Ms Deslauriers states that she met the priest at the presbytery. She testified that she confronted the priest and told him that he manipulated young people, that he had abused his power, and that he needed treatment. According to Denyse Deslauriers, Father Deslauriers explained that he had had a moment of weakness and he mentioned homosexuality. Ms Deslauriers also met with Father Vaillancourt on January 30, 1986. At the meeting, she described the marital problems that she and her husband had been experiencing.

Lise Brisson Contacts Father Claude Thibault

Father Claude Thibault was ordained at La Nativité Church on February 1, 1986. At the time of his ordination, he was unaware that there were other victims who had been sexually abused by Father Deslauriers. But when he returned to the Cornwall area on February 7, 1986, after a week away, his mother told him that Ms Brisson, Claude Thibault's teacher in grades 7 and 8, had called. It was on that day that Claude Thibault learned that another person had been sexually abused by the same priest, Father Deslauriers.

When Father Thibault returned Ms Brisson's telephone call that evening, she said her son, Benoit, had problems that she wished to share. Lise Brisson also mentioned that she was aware Claude Thibault had had difficulties in the past when he was in the seminary, and inquired if they had been with respect to a "certain priest." Father Thibault asked if he could come to the Brisson home.

That evening, Lise and Hubert Brisson told Claude Thibault that their son, Benoit, had been sexually abused by Father Deslauriers. Ms Brisson said she had disclosed the abuse to Fathers Vaillancourt, Bisaillon, and Ménard.

Claude Thibault had been a classmate of Benoit Brisson in grade 7 and 8, as well as in high school. He said in his evidence that they had both participated in R3 retreats and had been in “therapy” sessions with Father Deslauriers. Claude Thibault testified that they were sexually abused by this priest in the same period.

Father Thibault contacted Sister Myrna Ladouceur, his spiritual advisor. He told her that he felt he needed to reveal the sexual abuse that had been perpetrated on him to the Bishop. Sister Ladouceur encouraged him to make the disclosure to Bishop LaRocque.

Father Thibault decided to speak to Father Vaillancourt, Chancellor of the Diocese, before he disclosed the abuse by Father Deslauriers to the Bishop. As mentioned, Father Vaillancourt had been active in R3 and had worked closely with Father Deslauriers in this spiritual movement. Although Father Thibault was very nervous about the prospect of disclosing the abuse to Father Vaillancourt, he believed this priest could be trusted. Father Deslauriers at that time was a parish priest at La Nativité.

It was immediately apparent to Father Vaillancourt that Father Thibault was anxious to meet him as soon as possible. Because of the urgency of the call and Father Thibault’s mention of the Brisson family, Father Vaillancourt became concerned that there could possibly be other victims.

Father Thibault met Father Vaillancourt at St. Columban’s, the church where he had done his internship. After discussing the Benoit Brisson disclosure, Claude Thibault revealed that he, too, had been sexually abused by Father Deslauriers. Father Vaillancourt’s reaction was compassionate and supportive. Father Thibault explained that he had been very confused and uncomfortable about the sexual contact. He stated that he had gone to confession and that Father Deslauriers had absolved him. Father Vaillancourt encouraged Father Thibault to speak to the Bishop and offered to arrange the meeting.

Father Vaillancourt was worried that the abuse had been committed at La Citadelle High School and that the school board would become involved in this matter. He learned from Father Thibault that Father Deslauriers had had sexual encounters with him in the office at St. John Bosco rectory. Father Vaillancourt was the chaplain of La Citadelle at this time. He did not contact the school board or speak to staff at the school to determine if other children had been sexually abused by Father Deslauriers, the former chaplain of this high school. In the next few days, Father Vaillancourt learned that there were more victims. By February 12, 1986, Father Vaillancourt had seven names and had met with four of the alleged victims.

Father Thibault was extremely nervous when he went to see Bishop LaRocque on February 9, 1986, at the meeting that had been arranged by Father Vaillancourt. He told the Bishop that, like Benoit Brisson, he was a victim of sexual abuse committed by Father Gilles Deslauriers. He explained that Father Deslauriers had told him that the sexual contact was therapy. Father Thibault reminded Bishop LaRocque of their meeting a few years earlier, in 1983, when he had been experiencing difficulties at the seminary; that he had told the Bishop that Father Deslauriers was not truthful, was manipulative, and was playing games. He also reminded Bishop LaRocque of his response at the time. He had cautioned Claude Thibault against making such serious allegations. Father Thibault courageously told the Bishop that this response had ended the discussion and that had the Bishop been more receptive and supportive, he would probably have disclosed the sexual abuse several years earlier:

I said to him, “Now, I’m telling you it wasn’t just an impression; it was more than impression. I knew that was the truth but you responded that way and I shut up.”

I also told him that if he had listened, I probably eventually would have told him ... before ...

Claude Thibault explained to the Bishop that his difficulties in the seminary and confusion were, in large part, attributable to Father Gilles Deslauriers: “I wasn’t becoming a priest for God in God’s Church but for Gilles who was such an important person in my life.” Father Thibault testified that when he revealed that he, in essence, worshipped Father Deslauriers, Bishop LaRocque abruptly said, “That’s idolatry.” The Bishop subsequently apologized and said he did not intend to be critical and accuse Father Thibault of idolatry. Bishop LaRocque testified that Father Gilles Deslauriers had also manipulated him.

Father Thibault stated that he was thankful he was able to understand, prior to his ordination, this complex relationship with Father Deslauriers and to realize the purpose for which he should be entering the clergy: “I was happy that I had cleared that out before being ordained.”

Bishop LaRocque told the newly ordained priest that he wished he had discussed this earlier but then immediately acknowledged that had he been more receptive and listened to what Claude Thibault was telling him three years earlier, perhaps the young man would have revealed the abuse perpetrated by Father Deslauriers sooner.

Bishop LaRocque Learns There Are More Victims: Father Deslauriers Instructed to Leave Diocese

Father Vaillancourt met with Bishop LaRocque on February 12, 1986. By that time, he had the names of seven people who claimed they had been abused by Father Deslauriers and, as mentioned, he had met with four of the alleged victims. When Father Vaillancourt revealed the number of possible victims, the Bishop was shocked and said that action had to be taken.

Bishop LaRocque met with Lise Brisson the following morning, on February 13, 1986. According to Ms Brisson, the Bishop told her that Father Deslauriers was a dangerous man and that he had had the Bishop's confidence in the past, which had clearly not been deserved. Bishop LaRocque said the priest would be treated by the Church since he was a sick man. He also undertook to assist victims abused by Father Deslauriers.

Accompanied by Father Ménard, the Bishop met with Father Gilles Deslauriers at La Nativité. Bishop LaRocque confronted the priest and chastised him for asserting that he had abused only one victim, when in fact he had sexually molested many youths and young adults. He instructed Father Deslauriers to leave the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall immediately. He asked the priest to resign but undertook to support him in a position in another diocese, after Father Deslauriers had completed treatment with a therapist for his problems. Bishop LaRocque believed that Father Deslauriers' conduct could be changed; in the Catholic Church there is no sin that cannot be forgiven, and there can be modification in the orientation of one's life. But the Bishop testified that he now understands that professionals in the field of psychiatry do not subscribe to the view that the sexual behaviours exhibited by Father Deslauriers can necessarily be successfully treated:

... [S]elon la doctrine, il y a toujours possibilité d'une conversion. Dans l'église catholique, on croit qu'il n'y a pas de péché qui ne peut pas être pardonné où on ne peut pas changer l'orientation de notre vie. Ce n'est pas tout à fait ce que les psychiatres nous disent maintenant.

There was uneasiness among parishioners in the Diocese, as it was known that several young people had been abused. According to Father Ménard, there was a perception that the Church was not taking action because Father Deslauriers remained in the Diocese.

Bishop LaRocque and Father Ménard did not discuss whether the police or Children's Aid Society should be contacted regarding the allegations of abuse against Father Deslauriers. Because the victims who had come forward were now in their early twenties, it may not have occurred to these religious figures that there were children possibly at risk in the community. No protocol existed in the Diocese at that time, and the clergy believed that the matter could be handled within the confines of the Roman Catholic Church. As Father Ménard said in his evidence:

... [L]'idée de l'Aide à l'enfance nous est même pas venue comme telle. Et l'idée de rendre ça public à la police ça venait pas—c'était pas dans—y avait aucun protocole à ce moment-là qui était prévu dans ce sens-là. Il n'y avait pas de tradition ou autre chose et on avait confiance encore que ça pouvait se traiter à l'intérieur des mesures dans l'église.

Father Ménard agreed that the Roman Catholic Church at times was very concerned about damaging its image in these situations. The inclination of the institution to keep such matters confidential within the confines of the Church and not discuss them in the public domain, Father Ménard said, caused damage to victims who had been sexually abused by members of the clergy. As mentioned, some bishops and priests believed in 1986 that with therapy, people such as Father Deslauriers could be successfully treated and resume their priestly duties. As Father Ménard acknowledged in his evidence, there was “some naivety to our approach in those years.”

Bishop LaRocque thinks he suggested to Father Deslauriers that he seek treatment for his sexual problems at Southdown Institute, a treatment centre established by the Bishops of Ontario. The priest refused, as therapy was not offered in the French language at that facility. There was a francophone treatment facility in Montreal, the Institut de Formation et de Rééducation, at which Jeannine Guindon, Monsignor Guindon's sister, was the director. But Father Deslauriers was also not receptive to therapy at this centre. Bishop LaRocque also discussed the re-training centre for priests in Pierrefonds, Quebec, under the direction of the former bishop of Hull, Monsignor Charbonneau, but this facility did not offer treatment or therapy for sexual problems. Father Deslauriers was resistant. It is important to note that Bishop LaRocque did not direct anyone in the Diocese to make arrangements to ensure that Father Deslauriers received treatment for his inappropriate conduct with young men.

Father Deslauriers gathered his personal belongings after the meeting with the Bishop. He was prohibited from returning to La Nativité Parish or sleeping at the presbytery. At Father Deslauriers' request, the Bishop allowed the priest to sleep at Bishop Proulx's cottage.

Bishop LaRocque testified that neither he nor other clergy in the Diocese were trained to deal with allegations of sexual abuse. Nor was there a protocol in the Diocese. The behaviour of Father Deslauriers was not reported to any outside agencies—not to the Children’s Aid Society, not to the police, and not to the school board. Nor did the Bishop conduct a formal investigation of the abuse at that time. Bishop LaRocque acknowledged that “one of [his] preoccupations” throughout the Deslauriers matter was avoiding scandal for the Diocese.

Knowledge or Suspicions of Clergy Regarding Father Deslauriers’ Inappropriate Behaviour

Prior to January 1986, comments were made by other priests suggesting that they, too, knew or suspected that Father Deslauriers was having sexual contact with young people. For example, Brother Laflamme, who was with the religious order Frères du Sacré-Coeur, was aware that young people did not want to go to confession with Father Gilles Deslauriers. To Father Vaillancourt’s knowledge, Brother Laflamme did not report this information to the Bishop.

Father Réjean Lebrun lived with Father Deslauriers at the presbytery at St. John Bosco Parish for about seven years, from 1977 to 1984. This occurred as a result of a request by Jeannine Séguin, principal of La Citadelle, after Father Deslauriers was asked to become the chaplain at the high school. Father Deslauriers was responsible for mass at St. John Bosco Parish on weekends.

Father Lebrun knew that Father Deslauriers did not have a good relationship with a number of priests in the Diocese. He was also aware that Father Deslauriers received young people in his office at night as well as on Saturdays. People often called the presbytery to speak to “Father Gilles.” Father Lebrun became irritated with the constant disruptions of their meals and the late-night calls. Benoit Brisson testified that Father Lebrun was sometimes in close proximity to the area where Father Deslauriers was molesting him. On a couple of occasions, Father Lebrun walked down the hall outside the room in which Benoit was being sexually assaulted by the priest.

Father Lebrun testified that the Diocese authorities were initially silent about the Father Deslauriers matter. Bishop LaRocque did not discuss the issue with clergy in the Diocese such as Father Lebrun. Parishioners inquired about the actions that would be taken by the Diocese to deal with this problem and the allegations of sexual abuse against the priest. But as Father Lebrun said, clergy at that time did not question the authority of the Church; the structure of the Roman Catholic Church was strict obedience and matters of sexuality were not spoken about openly, particularly sexual misconduct by a priest.

There was no public announcement by the Diocese of the circumstances leading to the departure of Father Gilles Deslauriers in 1986. No explanation was given to the clergy or to parishioners. Father Lebrun and others thought that the matter was mishandled by the Diocese, with negative repercussions in the Cornwall community for many years.

Father Vaillancourt, another priest involved in the Deslauriers matter, thought that the lack of a policy or written guidelines on sexual abuse was a significant problem when the Diocese was confronted with this issue in the 1980s. And as several priests stressed, what exacerbated the problem was that they had no training in such matters. Father Vaillancourt said that to this day he has not received training on the appropriate response to complaints of sexual abuse. It is important to note that neither he nor, to his knowledge, other priests notified the school board responsible for La Citadelle, where Father Deslauriers had been a full-time chaplain. Father Vaillancourt replaced Father Deslauriers as the chaplain of La Citadelle High School in September 1985.

After Father Deslauriers' departure from the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, members of the clergy wanted to know how they were to respond. At the March 4, 1986, meeting of the Council of Priests, Father Romeo Major asked how priests should respond to the Deslauriers issue. Bishop LaRocque's answer was that priests were to tell parishioners and members of the public that Father Deslauriers left for personal reasons.

Bishop LaRocque testified that he thinks he knew Father Deslauriers was in Hull under the guardianship of Bishop Proulx. By March 6, 1986, there were reports that "Father Gilles" was performing ministerial functions in that Diocese.

Father Deslauriers Celebrates Mass in Hull

After Father Deslauriers left the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, Father Ménard learned from the Brisson family that the priest was celebrating mass in Hull. Another priest had fallen ill and Father Deslauriers was asked if he would perform ministerial functions in the parish.

Father Ménard told Bishop LaRocque that Father Deslauriers was performing ministerial functions in Hull. Father Ménard asked whether Bishop Proulx was aware of the sexual allegations made against Father Deslauriers. At the request of Bishop LaRocque, on about March 18, 1986, Father Ménard travelled to Hull to ensure that Bishop Proulx knew of the complaints of sexual abuse by parishioners in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. Father Ménard testified that his purpose in visiting Bishop Proulx was twofold: (1) to persuade the Bishop to remove Father Deslauriers from his clerical functions in the Diocese of Gatineau-Hull; and (2) to ensure that Father Deslauriers was receiving therapy, as Father Ménard believed that consistent and good treatment could change the priest's sexual behaviour with children and young people.

When Father Ménard met with Bishop Proulx, it was apparent that the Bishop had some knowledge of Father Deslauriers' inappropriate conduct but was unaware of the magnitude. Bishop Proulx asked Father Ménard to meet with Father Deslauriers, who was at the parish of Notre-Dame de Lorette. Father Deslauriers was very surprised to see Father Ménard. Father Ménard was direct; he said there were several allegations of sexual misconduct against him and that it was inappropriate for Father Deslauriers to perform clerical functions and to have contact with young people. Father Ménard told the priest that he thought he should leave the area. Father Deslauriers assured Father Ménard that he was seeing a therapist weekly. But Father Ménard had no confidence that the therapist actually knew about the sexual abuse allegations. It was also Father Ménard's opinion that Father Deslauriers should be receiving more than weekly therapy. Father Ménard shared his concerns with Bishop LaRocque in correspondence.

Father Ménard met with a group of lay people around March 21 or 22—several families and three couples. They were impatient. They were upset at the slow pace at which the Church was responding to the sexual abuse allegations and greatly concerned that Father Deslauriers was performing clerical functions in Hull. Dr. Denis Deslauriers, Benoit Brisson's father-in-law, suggested that there might be a requirement for Father Deslauriers' abusive conduct to be reported to the civil authorities. However, some of the people at the meeting expressed the desire that this issue be addressed within the confines of the Church.

On March 22, 1986, Mr. and Ms Brisson sent a letter to Bishop LaRocque, Bishop Proulx, the Apostolic Nuncio, the Prefect of the Congregation for Bishops, and Archbishop Spence. They wrote that Father Deslauriers had been seen celebrating mass in Hull one week after he left Cornwall. They also stated that Father Deslauriers had travelled to the Cornwall area and had been seen on several occasions, at the hospital and at the Caisse Populaire. Hubert and Lise Brisson complained that the Church did not appear to have taken any measures either to assist the young victims or to treat Father Deslauriers.

It was clear to Bishop LaRocque that people outside the Diocese now had knowledge of the sexual abuse allegations against Father Deslauriers and that the situation was escalating. The Bishop was disappointed and upset with the Brissons for maintaining that he was not taking action to address the situation. In correspondence to Mr. and Ms Brisson on March 25, 1986, Bishop LaRocque expressed his disappointment in them:

Que vous vous êtes sentis obligés de faire appel à tous les niveaux de la responsabilité hiérarchique indique la profondeur de votre angoisse, mais me déçoit beaucoup. Ce manque de confiance à mon endroit me blesse énormément.

The Bishop clearly did not offer support to Mr. and Ms Brisson, whose son, Benoit, was an alleged victim of childhood abuse by a priest.

Father Ménard Sends a Report on the Deslauriers Matter to the Bishop

After meeting with the aggrieved victims and distressed families, Father Ménard wrote a letter and submitted a report to Bishop LaRocque. Before sending it to the Bishop, he shared the contents of the report with Fathers Bisaillon and Vaillancourt.

In the March 25, 1986, correspondence to the Bishop, Father Ménard explained that he had prepared the report because the Gilles Deslauriers matter was escalating. More people in the Cornwall area had become aware of the priest's alleged sexual misconduct and dissatisfaction with the Church's failure to initiate measures to prevent further victimization was growing. Father Ménard stressed that it was important to listen to the victims and families to learn the truth, and to promote justice and healing. He maintained that the faith of these young people and their families was at stake. He informed Bishop LaRocque that dissatisfied people in the Diocese had sent letters regarding Father Deslauriers to Church superiors: to the Apostolic Nuncio, to the Archbishop for the region of Cornwall, and to Rome. Father Ménard had supported the initiative of the victims and their families.

In his report, Father Ménard described the details of abuse conveyed to him by the alleged victims of Father Deslauriers. He wanted the Bishop to fully understand the seriousness of the situation. Father Ménard also described the spiritual manipulation of consciences, which included the abuse of power by Father Deslauriers. He discussed Father Deslauriers' deception and dishonesty in telling these alleged victims that his "therapy" would help them. As Father Ménard commented in his evidence, the commission of the acts of abuse is serious, but when the perpetrator denies or does not regard the acts as improper or wrong, it is much graver:

C'est que quelqu'un fasse du tort, c'est grave. Mais quand quelqu'un en toute apparence n'arrive pas à voir qu'il fait du tort ou en tout cas le nie, c'est plus grave. C'est encore plus grave. Fait que là c'est une question de conscience faussée là. Alors, ça, ça m'inquiétait.

Father Ménard made several recommendations in the report he submitted to the Bishop. In his view, Father Deslauriers should be prohibited from engaging in pastoral work; only after completing treatment and receiving a suitable evaluation from the therapist was Father Deslauriers to be allowed to return to clerical functions. It was Father Ménard's understanding that Father Deslauriers was undergoing therapy with Father Jacques Jobin. He asked the Bishop to ensure that the priest was attending appointments and following the prescribed treatment. Father Ménard also recommended that Father Deslauriers receive more intense treatment—group as well as individual therapy. He suggested Southdown and the rehabilitation centre operated by Jeannine Guindon in Montreal, but as mentioned, the latter did not have the expertise to treat individuals for sexual abuse. Father Ménard did not recommend the centre in Pierrefonds because it was not a treatment centre for psychological problems, but Bishop LaRocque suggested that Father Deslauriers attend there for three months.

Father Ménard also suggested to the Bishop that Father Deslauriers undergo a process of absolution and, if required by canon law, suspension. As Father Ménard explained in his evidence, if a priest abuses the sacred seal of confession by committing the crime of solicitation during confession, he must seek absolution from Rome.

Father Ménard recommended that Father Deslauriers leave the Diocese of Hull immediately. He also stressed that any diocese that received Father Deslauriers should be fully apprised of the priest's past conduct with young persons. Furthermore, he stated that the priest should be prevented from communicating with any of the victims whom he had allegedly abused.

Finally, Father Ménard proposed that the Church establish a committee, an ecclesiastical tribunal, to hear from the victims and their families as well as priests, and to make recommendations to the Bishop. The costs of therapy for victims of abuse should be defrayed by the Church, wrote Father Ménard in his report.

Bishop LaRocque travelled to Hull to meet with Bishop Proulx. Although he intended to meet alone with Bishop Proulx, to his consternation Father Deslauriers was present during the entire meeting. Bishop Proulx defended Father Deslauriers throughout the discussion.

Bishop LaRocque asked Bishop Proulx to remove Father Deslauriers from ministerial duties at the parish. Some of the young people who had been victimized by Father Deslauriers lived in Ottawa, which is near Hull. Bishop Proulx was not receptive to Bishop LaRocque's suggestion.

At this meeting, Bishop LaRocque discussed the seriousness of the sexual acts, but Gilles Deslauriers insisted that his conduct was "therapy." Bishop LaRocque was aware at this time that there were between eight and twelve alleged victims. He left the Diocese of Gatineau-Hull without any commitments by Bishop Proulx and considered his meeting unsuccessful. Bishop LaRocque still did not consider contacting the police, despite the fact that Father Deslauriers was continuing to exercise his ministry in another diocese and had contact with young people—other possible victims of sexual abuse.

Father Ménard decided to bring a copy of his March 25, 1986, report to Bishop Proulx in Hull. He wanted to ensure that Bishop Proulx was aware of his recommendations.

The Establishment of the Ad Hoc Committee

After reading Father Ménard's report and conferring with Monsignor Bernard Guindon, who had a degree in Canon Law, Bishop LaRocque agreed in early April 1986 to establish an ad hoc committee. Father Ménard had recommended that the members of the committee not include the Bishop. Bishop LaRocque decided that the committee should consist of Jacques Leduc, the Diocese lawyer, who had a Bachelors degree in Canon Law from Saint Paul University, and Sister Claudette Pilon, whom the Bishop mistakenly thought was a psychologist but who in fact was in the process of pursuing a Masters degree in Pastoral Studies and Matrimonial Counselling at Saint Paul University at the University of Ottawa. In addition, the Bishop selected Monsignor Guindon to chair the Ad Hoc Committee on the Father Gilles Deslauriers Case. Members of the committee were asked to listen to the testimony of witnesses designated by the Bishop and to make recommendations. Bishop LaRocque testified that at the time he established the Ad Hoc Committee, he was morally certain that Father Deslauriers had engaged in sexual acts with young people, considered "one of the worst crimes" by the Church. By letter dated April 3, 1986, Bishop LaRocque informed Mr. and Ms Brisson that the Ad Hoc Committee under the direction of Monsignor Guindon had been established to address the Deslauriers matter. The Bishop requested that they appear before the committee.

Bishop LaRocque asked Father Gilles Deslauriers to testify before the Ad Hoc Committee. In a letter dated April 6, 1986, the Bishop also requested Father Deslauriers to continue his treatment in Pierrefonds with Father Jobin. However, Father Deslauriers refused to stay in Pierrefonds for the three months proposed by the Bishop, and left after a short time. Bishop LaRocque told the priest in the April letter that he had received correspondence from Rome that indicated Father Deslauriers should be prohibited from hearing confessions. Church officials in Rome had stated that although no crime in canon law had been committed, it was advisable to withdraw Father Deslauriers' faculties from hearing confessions. Bishop LaRocque asked Father Deslauriers to leave the region of Hull.

Father Jobin, Father Deslauriers' therapist, communicated with Bishop LaRocque on April 18, 1986. He told the Bishop that in his opinion, Father Deslauriers should continue to hear confessions as it was part of his rehabilitation. Father Jobin was a priest and a psychotherapist. Father Deslauriers had been referred to Father Jobin by Bishop Proulx. It was Bishop LaRocque's belief that Father Deslauriers had also manipulated his therapist.

Father Deslauriers responded to the Bishop's letter on April 16, 1986. He challenged the composition of the Ad Hoc Committee, and made it clear that he would not complete the three-month retreat in Pierrefonds.

Testimony Heard by the Ad Hoc Committee

The Ad Hoc Committee heard evidence from alleged victims of Father Deslauriers, members of their families, and priests.

Bishop LaRocque had made a list of witnesses whom he thought should give evidence at the Ad Hoc Committee. The list included alleged victims and their parents, such as Benoit Brisson and Mr. and Ms Brisson. It also included clergy, such as Father Ménard, Father Vaillancourt, Father Bisailon, and the alleged perpetrator, Father Gilles Deslauriers. It is noteworthy that Father Claude Thibault's name was crossed out. This priest, an alleged victim, was not requested by the Bishop to testify before the committee.

Monsignor Guindon, Chair of the Ad Hoc Committee, and Mr. Leduc, the Diocese lawyer, asked the witnesses questions to collect facts on the allegations against Father Deslauriers. Sister Pilon helped the victims and families to tell their stories and listened to the individuals who gave evidence at the committee.

Members of the Ad Hoc Committee were asked to take an oath of secrecy. Sister Pilon said that she was requested to take an oath of confidentiality on the Bible each day of her involvement in this committee. She swore that she would not disclose the contents of the meetings. Similarly, Monsignor Guindon told Cornwall police officers Herb and Ron Lefebvre, who later investigated the Deslauriers allegations, that he was sworn to secrecy and would not divulge any information heard at the Ad Hoc Committee. When Sister Pilon became involved in this Inquiry, it was the first time she had revealed information about the Ad Hoc Committee, of which she was a member twenty-three years earlier.

The Ad Hoc Committee members learned from the priests who appeared before them that some of Father Deslauriers' alleged victims were minors under the age of eighteen. Although Father Deslauriers told Father Ménard that he had had contact with about fourteen youths, it became clear from the alleged victims who testified at the diocesan committee that the number of people who had been sexually molested by the priest was much greater. It also became apparent to members of the ecclesiastical committee that Bishop Proulx, formerly the bishop of Cornwall, had a close relationship with Father Gilles Deslauriers.

Despite the fact that Father Deslauriers had been a chaplain at La Citadelle High School and had worked at other schools, Monsignor Guindon, Sister Pilon, and Jacques Leduc did not discuss the importance of notifying the schools or school boards. Nor did they pursue whether they should report Father Deslauriers' inappropriate sexual behaviour to the Children's Aid Society or to the police, according to Sister Pilon. In fact, Dr. Denis Deslauriers, Benoit Brisson's father-in-law, had expressed concern at the Ad Hoc Committee that a crime had taken place that had not been reported to the civil authorities. Jacques Leduc, the Diocese lawyer, agreed that the evidence heard by the Ad Hoc Committee indicated there was a serious breach of trust between Father Deslauriers and his alleged victims. Father Bisailon suggested to the committee members that the Diocese pay for therapy for the victims allegedly abused by Father Deslauriers as well as for their family members. It was estimated that the number of victims who required such therapy could be as high as forty.

The Ad Hoc Committee heard evidence from alleged victims, their families, and their spouses. Most of the alleged victims were now young adults in their twenties.

Many of these witnesses were both shocked and outraged that Father Deslauriers was being permitted to exercise ministerial functions in another diocese. Some strongly argued that the priest should be prohibited from pastoral work and contact with children or young people.

A parishioner who testified before the Ad Hoc Committee proposed that a canonical inquest of the allegations against Father Deslauriers and Bishop LaRocque's handling of the matter be undertaken. It was clear to the committee that people in the Diocese were not only very disturbed by Father Deslauriers' behaviour but also deeply upset at the failure of Bishop LaRocque to address this serious situation. Bishop LaRocque considered this parishioner's accusations very insulting and did not give any consideration to a canonical inquest. An inquest did not take place.

Recommendations of the Ad Hoc Committee to Bishop LaRocque

The Ad Hoc Committee completed its report to Bishop LaRocque on May 23, 1986. It was signed by the Chair, Monsignor Guindon, Jacques Leduc, and Sister Pilon. The report contained six recommendations.

The first recommendation was that Father Deslauriers be suspended "a divinis" and that a competent authority (l'autorité compétente) uphold his exclusion from the Diocese. A suspension "a divinis" was a decision that Church authorities in Rome had to make. This meant that the priest would not be permitted to exercise any public ministry.

The second recommendation was excommunication, followed by incardination into another diocese with conditions. It was proposed that Father Deslauriers undergo therapy by a qualified psychologist who was fully cognizant of the behaviour engaged in by the priest, with the proviso that Father Deslauriers be prohibited from any pastoral functions until the competent authority was convinced that he was fully rehabilitated. A copy of the Ad Hoc Committee report was to be sent to the therapist.

The third recommendation of the Ad Hoc Committee was addressed to the people who wished to undergo counselling and treatment as a result of the acts of Father Deslauriers. It proposed that the Diocese assume the cost of such therapy and that Father Deslauriers be responsible for these costs.

A further recommendation was that serious consideration be given to Father Ménard's report.

Nowhere in the recommendations did the Ad Hoc Committee propose that the Diocese try to seek out other possible victims to ensure that they, too, received therapy for the sexual abuse committed by the priest. The Ad Hoc Committee also did not make recommendations to the Bishop on the importance of contacting outside agencies such as the Children's Aid Society, the school boards, or the police to alert these institutions to the sexual conduct of Father Deslauriers with boys and young people. Mr. Leduc, the Diocese lawyer, explained that because the victims were now in their early twenties and were young adults, and because the sexual assaults were historical, the Ad Hoc Committee did not recommend that the Diocese contact outside agencies. Clearly, thought was not given to other victims or to the risk of abuse of other children or other young people with whom Father Deslauriers came into contact after he left the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

After the Ad Hoc Committee submitted its report to the Bishop on May 23, 1986, the Bishop did not meet with the committee members to discuss the information gathered from the priests, victims, and victims' families. Nor did the Bishop discuss the recommendations put forth by Monsignor Guindon, Sister Pilon, and Mr. Leduc.

No investigation was undertaken by the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall to determine whether other children were abused at the schools or at other locations or with other groups at which Father Deslauriers had been involved. Nor did the Bishop himself consider contacting agencies outside the Church to alert these institutions to the sexual misconduct by Father Deslauriers.

Although one of the recommendations of the Ad Hoc Committee was payment for counselling for the alleged victims of Father Deslauriers, Bishop LaRocque did not send any written material to the alleged victims to alert them to the availability of counselling. Nor did the Diocese make any efforts to find other victims to let them know that the Church would absorb the cost of their counselling, such as former students at La Citadelle High School.

The Brisson Family Contacts the Media

It was in May 1986 that the Brisson family decided to contact the media to publicize the abuse allegedly committed by Father Gilles Deslauriers on young persons in the Cornwall community. Ms Brisson testified that they did not think that the matter was adequately progressing and that Benoit was not satisfied with the response of the Diocese. She contacted Charlie Greenwell, who agreed to come to the Brisson home. Mr. Greenwell arrived with a camera operator and interviewed Benoit Brisson and his parents. The following day, May 19, 1986, the story was broadcast on television as well as on the radio: CJOH and Radio-Canada.

Bishop LaRocque agreed that when the Brisson family went public with their story, the Deslauriers matter became scandalous for the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

Cornwall Police Interview Bishop LaRocque, Father Thibault, and Other Members of the Clergy

In May 1986, Sergeant Ron Lefebvre and Constable Herb Lefebvre of the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) were assigned the investigation of the allegations of abuse against Father Deslauriers. Sergeant Ron Lefebvre was the lead investigator. On May 27, 1986, they met with Monsignor Guindon. He informed the CPS officers that he had been on the committee set up by the Bishop to inquire into the allegations against Father Deslauriers. Monsignor Guindon told the officers that he had taken an oath of secrecy and could not reveal any information on the committee's findings to the CPS.

Later that day, the CPS officers met with Bishop LaRocque. The Bishop acknowledged that Father Deslauriers had a forceful character and that he could be manipulative. The Bishop told the officers that Father Deslauriers had explained to him that what he had done was therapy, "although not the type taught at the seminary." The Bishop also stated that he had transferred the priest. In the Bishop's opinion, Father Deslauriers did not recognize that he had a problem. Bishop LaRocque refused to provide information regarding the Ad Hoc Committee's findings, as he claimed they were confidential. He indicated that there was a 180-page transcript at his residence of the committee's findings.

Sergeant Ron Lefebvre and Constable Herb Lefebvre continued to conduct interviews and take statements throughout May and June in relation to the Deslauriers investigation.

On June 3, 1986, Sergeant Ron Lefebvre and Constable Herb Lefebvre arrived at a rectory in Alexandria, where the Bishop and priests from the Diocese were meeting at that time. The police officers asked to speak to Father Claude Thibault.

Father Claude Thibault had learned from Lise Brisson that the police were investigating allegations of sexual abuse by Father Gilles Deslauriers. But the young priest did not become involved, and was somewhat taken aback and “self-conscious” when the CPS officers arrived at the church on that day to interview him. He was not prepared to disclose the sexual abuse.

CPS officers Ron and Herb Lefebvre told Father Thibault that they either suspected or had reason to believe that he had been sexually abused by Father Deslauriers. Father Thibault immediately “panicked,” “felt torn inside,” and denied the abuse. One of the officers became irritated and said to the young priest, “What angers me most is the apparent attempt of the Church to cover up.” Father Thibault assured the Cornwall police officers that they were on the “right track” and that they needed to continue their work.

Father Thibault contacted Jacques Leduc. He knew that Mr. Leduc had a canon law degree and had studied at Saint Paul University. Mr. Leduc advised Father Thibault not to lie and explained that the priest could be held in contempt of court if he was not truthful with members of the judicial system. At Father Thibault’s request, Mr. Leduc contacted the CPS and told the police that the priest wished to withdraw his statement that he had not been abused by Father Gilles Deslauriers.

Father Thibault was prepared to participate in the police investigation. In Mr. Leduc’s presence, he gave a statement to Sergeant Ron Lefebvre and Constable Herb Lefebvre at the Cornwall police station. As I discuss later in this section, Father Thibault gave evidence at the preliminary inquiry of Father Deslauriers on September 15, 1986.

The Cornwall police officers also took statements from other priests in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. Jacques Leduc was present for the June 1986 police interviews of Father Ménard and Father Vaillancourt. His role was to provide these clergy with legal advice, should it be required.

The Cornwall police officers contacted Mr. Leduc to arrange a meeting with Bishop LaRocque, as they wished to take a statement. When Constable Herb Lefebvre and Sergeant Ron Lefebvre arrived at Bishop LaRocque’s residence on June 16, 1986, the Bishop refused to give a written statement to the police. The Bishop told the officers that he did not want to lose the trust of the priests in his Diocese, and he refused to answer any police questions or divulge any information that was not already public. The Bishop made it clear to Sergeant Ron Lefebvre that “should he be called to court, he would not answer questions, he would go to jail first. With that said, the interview was completed.” Jacques Leduc was present at this meeting between the Bishop and the CPS officers.

As mentioned, the CPS officers had previously met with the Bishop on May 27, 1986, and had asked for the report of the Ad Hoc Committee. Bishop LaRocque had refused. He has stated that the report was confidential and could not be released by the Diocese.

Chief Claude Shaver testified that the two officers approached him near the end of their investigation and asked if he, as the Chief of Police, could do anything to help. The officers had relayed to him the Bishop's unwillingness to co-operate. The Chief recalled that there were issues surrounding Father Deslauriers' whereabouts and the Bishop's refusal to provide a document from the meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee. Chief Shaver described the officers as emotional and distraught. They told him that they were Catholics and this might affect their faith. Chief Shaver testified that the information relayed to him by the officers concerned him and that he decided to call the Bishop. Chief Shaver testified that the CPS officers could have obtained a warrant in relation to the document but that they did not believe they needed one as they were obtaining the information for their investigation through other means, witnesses.

Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet also testified that he had been made aware of the difficulties the officers had with the Bishop. During the Silmsier investigation, Staff Sergeant Brunet recalled Sergeant Ron Lefebvre telling him that there was little point in dealing with the Diocese. Based on his experience in the Deslauriers investigation, Sergeant Lefebvre advised Staff Sergeant Brunet not to expect co-operation from the Diocese.

Mr. Leduc had advised the Bishop that he was not required to give a statement to the police. However, Mr. Leduc explained that if subpoenaed to court, there was no privilege that would protect the Bishop from having to divulge information disclosed to him by priests in the Diocese. When he gave his evidence at the Inquiry, Bishop LaRocque said that he no longer agrees with the position he took in 1986. He now believes that a Bishop must take the risk of losing the trust of priests in his Diocese in cases such as that of Gilles Deslauriers. The former bishop of Alexandria-Cornwall said that if such a situation arose today, he would be prepared to cooperate with the civil authorities.

It is noteworthy that Mr. Leduc did not discuss with the Bishop that his refusal to speak to the CPS might hinder the criminal investigation. Nor did he have any recollection of suggesting to the Bishop that La Citadelle High School or the school board should be contacted regarding the sexual abuse allegations and criminal investigation of Father Deslauriers. This was despite the fact that Jacques Leduc was a trustee on the Catholic school board for about six or seven years and held other positions on the board. Jacques Leduc testified that he never discussed the duty to report with the Bishop.

It is also noteworthy that at a meeting requested by the Bishop, Ms Brisson had a recording device that had been requested by the CPS. According to the evidence of Inspector Richard Trew, Sergeant Ron Lefebvre had obtained a warrant to allow Lise Brisson to carry a recording device in her meeting with the Bishop. Sergeant Ron Lefebvre was the lead investigator on the Father Deslauriers case. Inspector Trew was the Officer in Charge of the CIB at the time. The CPS officers involved in the Father Deslauriers investigation were concerned that the Bishop was not being cooperative regarding this case. The listening device carried by Ms Brisson did not yield information of concern to the Cornwall police.

Incardination Into Another Diocese

On June 3, 1986, Father Deslauriers sent Bishop LaRocque a letter requesting his excardination from the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. Bishop LaRocque contacted Bishop Proulx to ask him if he was prepared to incardinate Father Deslauriers into his diocese with certain conditions. Bishop LaRocque explained that, according to canon law, excardination and incardination must be done simultaneously.

In a letter to Bishop LaRocque on June 20, 1986, Bishop Proulx wrote that he wanted to wait until the criminal matter was resolved before he considered the incardination of Father Deslauriers into the Diocese of Gatineau-Hull. Bishop Proulx was well aware of the CPS criminal investigation and did not want to make a decision on the incardination of Father Deslauriers at this time. Bishop Proulx asked Bishop LaRocque to pay Father Deslauriers' salary for June, July, and August 1986.

Bishop LaRocque instructed the Reverend Gordon Bryan to make arrangements to pay Father Deslauriers' salary. The Reverend replied in a memo to the Bishop that he could not justify writing a cheque to "Gilles." In a routine audit, he had discovered a bank account of over $150,000 in Father Deslauriers' name, which the bursar referred to as a "nest egg." This was a great concern to the bursar of the Diocese. Neither the Bishop nor Reverend Bryan had been aware of this fund. The memo to the Bishop stated:

After a great deal of thought and prayer I feel in conscience I cannot justify making up a cheque for Gilles. The reason originally for continuing Gilles' salary was because he needed money to live. After "discovering" his nest egg of over one hundred and fifty thousand I am sure you agree his survival is assured.

Although I cannot prove it, I am morally certain that these funds were solicited and collected to assist diocesan vocations.

Bishop LaRocque was surprised to learn about the existence of this fund. Father Deslauriers had never apprised the Bishop of this money and the funds and account had not been recorded in the Diocese's financial books.

As I discuss, several months later, on November 10, 1986, the date of Father Gilles Deslauriers' sentence in criminal court, Bishop LaRocque wrote and asked him to return the money that belonged to the Diocese in the fund discovered by Reverend Bryan. Father Deslauriers was not yet excardinated from the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. Bishop LaRocque wrote to Bishop Proulx on December 9, 1986, to advise him that the criminal matter was now resolved and that he wished to proceed with the excardination and incardination of Father Deslauriers. He listed some of the conditions of Father Deslauriers' probation order.

In his December 1986 correspondence to the Bishop of Gatineau-Hull, Bishop LaRocque wrote that Father Deslauriers' manipulation was more serious than his behaviour in the past with young people—in other words, the sexual abuse by Father Deslauriers:

Bishop LaRocque acknowledged at the Inquiry that although he may have thought at the time that Father Deslauriers' manipulation was more serious than the sexual abuse of youths and other people in the Diocese, he no longer held this view: "[C]'est peut-être ma pensée à ce moment-là, mais ce n'est plus ma pensée maintenant."

In this letter to Bishop Proulx, Bishop LaRocque stated that Father Deslauriers should not be permitted to exercise ministry in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall or in parishes bordering on or in close proximity to it. Bishop LaRocque enclosed a copy of the December 9, 1986, excardination with conditions signed by him and Chancellor Denis Vaillancourt. This had also been sent to Father Deslauriers.

Bishop LaRocque had previously consulted Monsignor Guindon and Chancellor Vaillancourt, who were well versed in canon law; they were of the view that the excardination with conditions for Father Deslauriers conformed with canon law. As discussed, the Ad Hoc Committee had asked Bishop LaRocque to include conditions in the excardination of Father Deslauriers.

Bishop Proulx was resistant to excardination with conditions for Father Deslauriers. In a letter dated December 16, 1986, he indicated that he had consulted Father Frank Morrissey, a Professor of Canon Law at Saint Paul University, who said that no conditions could be attached to an act of excardination. But this was contrary to the advice received by Bishop LaRocque from the experts in canon law in his Diocese. Bishop LaRocque was insistent. But again in correspondence the following month, on January 15, 1987, Bishop Proulx argued that excardination must be without conditions. Bishop Proulx also wanted information on the criminal charges against Father Deslauriers removed from the act of excardination.

Bishop LaRocque relented and agreed to sign an act of excardination without conditions. This was accepted by Bishop Proulx. As mentioned, the Ad Hoc Committee had recommended that conditions be attached to Father Deslauriers' incardination into another diocese. Bishop LaRocque was unsuccessful. In February 1987, Father Deslauriers was incardinated into the Diocese of Gatineau-Hull without conditions.

As I discuss, Father Deslauriers did not remain in the Diocese of Gatineau-Hull for very long. After Bishop Proulx died in July 1987, Father Deslauriers went to the Diocese of Saint-Jérôme. Bishop LaRocque wrote to Monsignor François Valois of the Diocese of Saint-Jérôme and advised him that Father Deslauriers was manipulative.

Father Deslauriers Is Criminally Charged

The Preliminary Inquiry

Bishop LaRocque made it clear that he did not want to be involved in the criminal process. On September 3, 1986, the Bishop was served with a subpoena to testify on behalf of the Crown at the preliminary inquiry. He wrote a letter to Father Deslauriers on the same day. The Bishop was upset about the subpoena and critical of a process that had the effect of breaching confidentiality between a Bishop and his priests. The Bishop told Father Deslauriers that he had no intention of testifying either for or against Father Deslauriers or the victims:

Ce matin deux officiers m'ont servi une assignation pour témoigner à la demande de la couronne. Je dois te dire qu'une telle procédure va contre toute confidentialité qui doit exister entre l'évêque et ses prêtres; je n'ai nullement l'intention de témoigner ni pour ni contre toi ou les jeunes.

At the Inquiry, Bishop LaRocque claimed that he would not take this position today. The former bishop of Alexandria-Cornwall stated that he now would be willing to cooperate with authorities in a situation similar to that of Father Deslauriers. As he explained at the hearings, "I would not do so now because I have learned differently, but this is where I was at the moment."

As I discuss in Chapter 11, the preliminary hearing took place from September 15 to September 18, 1986. Alleged victims, such as Claude Thibault, received subpoenas to give evidence. When Father Thibault met with Crown Attorney

Rommel Masse, to his surprise and embarrassment he saw other alleged victims who had been his classmates or who had been involved in the R3 movement. Father Thibault did not feel adequately prepared for the preliminary inquiry. He said that the Crown did not discuss with him the availability of a publication ban or victim assistance. Other alleged victims of Father Deslauriers also testified. Bishop LaRocque attended the preliminary inquiry but was not required to give testimony.

Jacques Leduc was retained by the Diocese to follow the preliminary inquiry, what the lawyer described as a “watching brief.” During the course of Benoit Brisson’s cross-examination, Mr. Leduc spoke to this witness. He approached Mr. Brisson because he thought some of the information he was being asked to divulge in questioning by the defence lawyer was in the context of a confession. After speaking to the Crown, Mr. Leduc told Benoit Brisson that if the statements were made in a confession, he could advise the court of this. The preliminary inquiry and Mr. Leduc’s interaction with Benoit Brisson are further discussed in the chapter on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Father Deslauriers Pleads Guilty—No Incarceration

On September 18, 1986, Father Gilles Deslauriers was committed to stand trial on seven counts of indecent assault and four counts of gross indecency. He had initially been charged with eight counts of indecent assault and eight counts of gross indecency. A few days prior to his scheduled trial, Father Deslauriers pleaded guilty to some of the criminal charges. He was convicted on November 10, 1986, of four counts of gross indecency contrary to section 157 of the Criminal Code.

Victims abused by the priest were upset at Father Deslauriers’ sentence. He was given a suspended sentence and two years probation. He was not ordered to serve a term of imprisonment. The convicted priest was simply placed under the supervision of Bishop Proulx for two years and required to undergo therapy. Father Deslauriers was ordered by the court to continue treatment with a therapist, Father Jobin, on a schedule to be determined by the priest’s probation officer.

Bishop LaRocque, to his recollection, was not informed or consulted about the supervision of Father Deslauriers by either the Crown or Bishop Proulx.

Father Thibault testified that he would have liked to have been involved in the sentencing process. He was both disappointed and dissatisfied with the terms in the probation order and in particular, the treatment ordered for Father Deslauriers:

I was very disappointed. I knew that there was a risk that our prosecution of him would lead him to go to jail. That was not my intent at all. I basically had two motives, to make sure that nobody else would go through what I went through and also I was aware that he needed help big time. What I had done previously in confronting him in all of this I felt didn't lead to anywhere, so collaborating with the investigation and the prosecution I was hoping that he'd be forced to get that help, which was not the case. I was disappointed. I felt that he didn't get the help that he wanted and he was still dangerous ...

... [P]ersonally I believe that the therapy he was asked to do once a week or something like that was not what he needed. I felt he needed something intense, full time, for a while.

Benoit Brisson's mother, Lise Brisson, and his former wife, Denyse Deslauriers, testified that they were frustrated by the inadequacy of the sentence. Chief Shaver stated that he contacted Crown Attorney Don Johnson because he, too, was upset about Father Deslauriers' sentence; he thought it was "way too lenient."

Father Deslauriers' guilty plea and sentence are further discussed in Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

The Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall Offers to Pay the Costs of Therapy for Victims of Father Deslauriers

After Father Deslauriers pleaded guilty to the criminal sexual offences, Bishop LaRocque asked Father Thibault to act as his representative in notifying victims of Father Deslauriers that the Church would provide financial assistance for the cost of therapy or counselling. Because Father Thibault himself was a victim of Father Deslauriers, Bishop LaRocque thought that the priest could better communicate and discuss these issues with people in the Diocese who needed such therapy. The Reverend Gordon Bryan was instructed by the Bishop to reimburse individuals for these costs.

Father Thibault himself sought professional help for a few years from a therapist in Ottawa and these costs were paid by the Diocese. As mentioned, the Diocese did not send out any written notification to victims of the priest that counselling was available, nor did the Diocese make efforts to find other victims who had been abused by Father Deslauriers.

Father Deslauriers Moves to a Different Diocese

In Father Thibault's opinion, Father Deslauriers was a "manipulator," a "liar," and a danger to youths. Prior to Bishop Proulx's death, Father Thibault met with the Bishop in Hull. Father Thibault felt that Bishop Proulx was protecting the priest, "taking on Gilles under his wings." He wanted the Bishop of Gatineau-Hull to listen to an abused victim, an ordained priest who "loves the Church":

I had felt that his taking on Gilles under his wings was like saying, oh, don't—"faitez-lui pas mal"—don't hurt him, and so I wanted him to hear our side of the story. I knew he had heard Gilles' side and I had a pretty good idea what kind of stories Gilles could have told him based on the lies that I had heard him tell me, so I made an appointment with him and I told him basically: I want you to hear the side of one of the victims and not somebody who's angry at the church, who wants to destroy the church; I come here as a priest who loves the church and I want to tell you my side of the story ...

After sharing his perspective of Father Deslauriers with Bishop Proulx, it became clear to Father Thibault that he and the Bishop "weren't really on the same wavelength."

Knowing that "Gilles was on the loose," Father Thibault met with Bishop LaRocque. He asked the Bishop to remove Father Deslauriers' faculties, to prevent the priest from celebrating the sacraments. He told Bishop LaRocque that Father Deslauriers was "dangerous" and should not be involved in ministry. Bishop LaRocque's response was that he could not take these measures, as it would "destroy" Gilles Deslauriers. Father Thibault said at the hearings:

I did not express to him my real feeling, but when I heard that I was not impressed and I felt how many lives has he destroyed.

Father Thibault learned that Father Deslauriers was in the Diocese of Saint-Jérôme. People on holiday in Quebec saw Father Deslauriers in this diocese and relayed this information to Father Thibault.

Father Thibault then made arrangements to meet with Bishop Valois of the Diocese of Saint-Jérôme. They met at the office of the Canadian Bishops, as Bishop Valois had travelled to Ottawa for a meeting. But Bishop Valois was also not receptive and assured Claude Thibault that Father Deslauriers was being watched in his diocese. Father Thibault was not satisfied with this response:

I did not feel comfortable at all at that meeting. He told me: don't worry, we're watching him. I said: you cannot watch that man; I know, I've been through it. But we parted and he stayed there.

Father Deslauriers continued to wear a collar, celebrate mass, and have contact with young people. As Claude Thibault testified, "I was told he was watched, but I know that he can't be watched."

Chief Shaver received information that after Father Deslauriers had been sentenced, he was seen serving mass in Quebec. The Chief did not recall if he asked Sergeant Ron Lefebvre or Constable Herb Lefebvre to look into this. Chief Shaver stated that he called Bishop LaRocque because he thought this might have been a breach of Gilles Deslauriers' probation. The Chief testified that he was unable to reach the Bishop. Chief Shaver did not ask anybody to contact individuals in Quebec to deal with the matter.

Gilles Deslauriers, in my view, should have been removed from ministry and not be permitted to move to different dioceses. He was a risk to parishioners in the Gatineau-Hull area and to those in the Diocese of Saint-Jérôme. As Father Thibault testified:

... [H]e was a repeat offender. He's a man that I still believe is dangerous and my recommendation was definitely that in that type of case he be totally removed from ministry, any kind of ministry interaction with people, not only with adolescents but with adults because he caused problems for a number of adults, also abused their trust, manipulated them and—but that he not be left on his own.

Conclusion

In Father Lebrun's view, the Father Deslauriers matter was mishandled by the Diocese and resulted in bad feelings among parishioners and members of the community in Cornwall for a long period. Father Thibault similarly thought that Father Deslauriers should have been removed from ministry and not permitted to work in another diocese.

The old philosophy remained entrenched at the time of the Deslauriers matter. The Diocese did not take active measures to report a priest's behaviour to civil authorities and was focused on avoiding scandal in the Diocese. Bishop LaRocque acknowledged that Catholic bishops would transfer priests "in difficulty" to other dioceses to avoid scandal and embarrassment to the Roman Catholic Church. As mentioned, there was also a belief by Roman Catholic bishops that if a priest confessed and was sent on a retreat, there would be a moral transformation after the retreat, at which time the priest would be reassigned to another diocese.

It is clear from the evidence of witnesses regarding the Father Gilles Deslauriers matter that the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall and Bishop Eugène LaRocque failed to provide training on sexual abuse of young persons by the clergy to individuals in the Diocese assigned to deal with such allegations: clergy, diocesan personnel, and volunteers. It is also evident that the Diocese and Bishop LaRocque at that time had not developed or adopted policies, guidelines, or protocols to respond to allegations of sexual misconduct of young persons by members of the clergy. Furthermore, the Diocese and Bishop LaRocque failed to take appropriate action to ensure that young people in the community would not be at risk of inappropriate contact by Father Gilles Deslauriers. The Diocese and Bishop LaRocque failed to advise the police and Children's Aid Society in relation to the allegations of sexual abuse by Father Deslauriers of young persons. And significantly, they did not adequately cooperate with the Cornwall Police Service with respect to the investigation of the allegations of sexual misconduct by Father Deslauriers. It is also my finding that the Diocese and Bishop LaRocque did not take appropriate action to identify other potential victims of Father Deslauriers. Moreover, the Diocese and Bishop LaRocque failed to monitor the treatment of Father Gilles Deslauriers. It is also evident that the Diocese and Bishop LaRocque failed to ensure that sufficient conditions were applied in the incardinating dioceses with regard to Father Gilles Deslauriers, and by allowing Father Deslauriers to leave the Diocese and excardinating him they failed to maintain supervision of this priest.

Father Carl Stone

Father Carl Stone was in Cornwall in the Diocese of Alexandria between 1957 and 1963. He was a priest at St. John Bosco Parish on Ninth Street. The Bishop at that time was Rosario Brodeur. Prior to joining the St. John Bosco Parish, Father Stone was a priest in the Diocese of Ogdensburg in New York. As I discuss in this section, Father Stone was asked to leave several dioceses, including Cornwall, because of sexual and other inappropriate conduct.

Father Stone served as a priest in different dioceses in Canada and the United States. He returned to Cornwall in 1981. Eugène LaRocque was the Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall at that time.

History of Sexual Relations With Boys and Young Men

According to correspondence between Church officials in the 1950s and 1960s, Father Carl Stone had sexual relationships with children and young adults. When Father Stone was instructed by Church officials to leave a diocese for his inappropriate conduct, he simply moved to another diocese, where he continued to engage in sexual behaviour with boys and young adults.

Father Stone joined St. John Bosco Parish in Cornwall in June 1957. The Bishop of the Diocese, Rosario Brodeur, received a letter in August from Monsignor William Argy, the Chancellor of the Diocese of Ogdensburg in New York. In the August 3, 1957, correspondence, Bishop Brodeur learned that Father Stone had a history of sexual misconduct. He became aware that Father Stone had engaged in inappropriate behaviour with children and young adults, referred to as cum pueris, both before and during his years in the Diocese of Ogdensburg. Father Stone had been asked to leave the New York diocese and was designated a “refugee religious.” In the letter, the Chancellor of the Diocese of Ogdensburg wrote that “all faculties withdrawn for all time.” The Chancellor knew that Father Stone was in Cornwall and had not been reporting to his superior as required. Father Stone was considered by the Church to be vagus, that is, in a location without the permission of his superior. The 1957 letter from the diocese in New York states:

It has been brought to our attention that the Reverend Carl V. Stone, formerly in the Diocese of Ogdensburg Ad Experimentum, is residing at St. John Bosco’s Rectory in Cornwall. Considering all the circumstances, His Excellency, Bishop Navagh, felt you should be advised of the following:

1. Father Stone was asked to leave because of certain evidence of trouble “cum pueris.” This actually took place in Malone and he has been returning to Malone from Cornwall. He was told to leave the Diocese and all faculties withdrawn for all time. There is a past history to this trouble before he came to this Diocese.
2. Ordered by his Superior to return to the Provincial House at Ozone Park he advised that his services were being expected at Cornwall for a couple of week-ends. Consent was given to him to go on condition that he reported to his Superior as soon as he reached his destination. As of July 23 he had not yet reported to his Superior. It was about June 16 that he was ordered to leave the Diocese. He is therefore in a sense a refugee religious.

It is regrettable to have to advise you of the above facts concerning a priest but Bishop Navagh felt you should know. (Emphasis added)

Bishop LaRocque agreed in his testimony at the Inquiry that the comments about Father Stone were very serious, that it was clear the priest had engaged repeatedly in sexual misconduct with children, and that the New York diocese was warning Bishop Brodeur of the problems with this priest.

Bishop Brodeur confirmed in a letter in December 1957 to the Reverend Frank Setzer of the Montfort Fathers in New York that Father Stone had been at St. John Bosco Parish in Cornwall for the past six months. He wrote that Father Poirier of St. John Bosco believed that Father Stone had been a “victim of rash and unfair judgment,” and had invited him to his rectory with the permission of Bishop Brodeur. Father Stone was accepted to this parish for one year ad experimentum, that is on a temporary basis.

The December 20, 1957, letter from the Bishop of Alexandria states:

Yes Reverend Carl Stone has been in our midst for the last six months. A Pastor of the diocese, Reverend H.A. Poirier of St. John Bosco Parish in Cornwall, Ontario, who knew him and beleived [sic] him to be a victim of rash and unfair judgement, invited him to his rectory. He asked me to give him the necessary jurisdiction to act as his assistant, which I did.

Recently I was asked by Father Poirier to sign a letter by which I would accept Father Stone for one year "ad experimentum." I had no objection, as Father Stone, since his coming here, gave no cause of anxiety; on the contrary his conduct was that of a good priest and his ministry most serious, zealous and efficient; but I made it clear that I would not incardinate him. The main reasons are that this diocese is small, that three of my seminarians are to be ordained this year and three more next year.

If you agree, Father Stone may stay here for the year, during which he may look about for a bishop.

With the hope of being some help to you and to Father Stone, I am

Yours devotedly in O.I.,
Bishop of Alexandria

This one-year stay was extended further by Bishop Brodeur at the request of Father Poirier. Father Stone remained a priest in Cornwall from 1957 until August 1963.

A second letter of concern was sent by the Diocese of Ogdensburg in April 1958. Father Stone had been seen in Malone, New York, wearing his collar. Church officials from the Diocese of Ogdensburg asked the Diocese of Alexandria to take measures to ensure that Father Carl Stone did not come to the New York diocese. Church officials were worried that the priest could be arrested by police for having relations with young men in the community. As Bishop LaRocque said in his testimony, this request from the Diocese of Ogdensburg was highly unusual. The letter from the Vice Chancellor of the Diocese of Ogdensburg reads:

Bishop Navagh has asked me to inform you that the Reverend Carl V. Stone, formerly in the Diocese of Ogdensburg ad experimentum and reportedly residing at a Catholic Rectory in Cornwall, has recently been seen in Malone, New York, wearing a collar and tie.

The Bishop of Ogdensburg is greatly concerned, as there is danger that the civil authorities would apprehend Father Stone if they thought he were trying to contact certain young men of that community. I believe the situation was explained somewhat in a letter of Monsignor Argy, Chancellor of Ogdensburg, to Bishop Brodeur under the date of August 3, 1957.

If Father Stone is at present in any way under the jurisdiction of the Diocese of Alexandria, any measures taken to keep him from returning to the Diocese of Ogdensburg would be most sincerely appreciated.

Regretting the necessity of seeking your assistance in a matter of this kind, but with every good wish, I am

Sincerely yours in Christ,

Very Rev. Msgr. John M. Waterhouse
Vice Chancellor

The Diocese of Ogdensburg was concerned about a scandal in its community.

In correspondence in May 1958, Bishop Brodeur explained to the Bishop of Ogdensburg that he had been “tolerat[ing] the presence of Father Stone in the Diocese” of Alexandria for the following reasons. First, there was a “very pressing need for priests” in the Cornwall area. Second, Bishop Brodeur stated that he had been “instrumental in saving 18 out of 20 unfortunate priests from despair and enabling them to resume their ministry.” The Bishop thought he might be able to change Father Stone’s improper behaviour. Third, Father Carl Stone was being supervised by a pastor.

In this letter, Bishop Brodeur said that Father Stone had been cautioned that he would be expelled from the Diocese of Alexandria if he visited the Diocese of Ogdensburg and in particular, Malone. An exception was made for contact with his mother, an elderly and ill woman, who lived in Malone. In such circumstances, Father Stone was obliged to obtain permission to visit his mother and was required to be accompanied by a priest from the Diocese of Alexandria for the trip to the

New York diocese. Bishop Brodeur ended the letter with optimism that Father Stone would adhere to these conditions, and that his inappropriate behaviour would cease:

So, Your Excellency, with those conditions clearly understood and willingly accepted by Father Stone, I feel confident that you will have no more cause to worry about him, that I'll not be forced to throw him out on the street, that he will profit by this chance, either to return to his Community or go and do good work in some distant diocese. I might be all wrong, but I pray your Excellency to bear with me in this attempt to help an unhappy priest.

Unfortunately, however, Father Stone did not comply with the conditions imposed by Bishop Brodeur. The priest was found in New York in the Diocese of Ogdensburg with boys at night. These encounters had occurred several times. The police were "checking" the situation. Monsignor Argy again wrote to Bishop Brodeur on October 31, 1958:

I have the unfortunate duty of advising you that the Reverend Carl V. Stone was in the Diocese of Ogdensburg and brought boys to his camp. They have been there at nighttime. This took place on at least two occasions during the summer and again recently. We have also been advised that the police are checking on the situation. (Emphasis added)

Although Bishop Brodeur had assured Church officials at the Diocese of Ogdensburg that he would take immediate action and expel Father Stone if he travelled without permission to the New York diocese, the Bishop of Alexandria failed to carry through with these measures. Instead, Father Stone remained a priest in Cornwall for almost another five years. It was not until 1963 that Father Stone was required to leave the Diocese of Alexandria as a result of a "misdemeanor" for which the Cornwall police had "threatened to intervene." In October 1963 correspondence, Bishop Brodeur wrote:

To my regret, I must inform you that Father Carl Stone has left Alexandria Diocese sometime in August when the Cornwall Police threatened to intervene after his misdemeanor.

The Bishop further stated that he was "very sorry" and that he "highly appreciated" Father Stone for his good work.

Father Stone Returns to Cornwall in 1981

At the request of Father Gary Ostler, a priest at St. John Bosco Parish, Bishop Eugène LaRocque interviewed Father Carl Stone in October 1981. He had become the Bishop in 1974. Father Ostler asked the Bishop to permit Father Stone to work in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

It is important to understand features of the relationship between Father Ostler and Father Carl Stone. There was a significant age difference between the two priests. Gary Ostler had been an altar boy in Father Stone's parish. Bishop LaRocque was aware of this. When Father Stone arrived in Cornwall in 1957, Gary Ostler was eleven years old, and when the priest left the Diocese in 1963, he was seventeen.

Bishop LaRocque read the Church files on Father Stone and spoke to Father Ostler about Father Stone's background. He examined the correspondence between the Diocese of Ogdensburg and Bishop Brodeur, and learned that Father Stone had a history of sexual relations with teenage boys. Bishop LaRocque testified that he thinks he may have also spoken to Bishop Brodeur, who lived with him at that time.

Bishop LaRocque knew that Father Stone had a sexual problem and that his victims were often teenaged boys. He was aware of the difficulties in the Diocese of Ogdensburg as well as in the Diocese of Alexandria in 1963. Bishop LaRocque was also well aware that Father Stone had been convicted of a sexual offence in New York. As he wrote on October 14, 1981, Father Stone "has been working in the diocese of Albany, N.Y. but had to leave because of an affair with boys." Bishop LaRocque refers to Father Stone's "life-long weakness" and his sexual relations with teenaged boys, known as ephebophilia. The Bishop knew that Father Stone had been undergoing treatment at the Southdown Institute, where priests in North America seek counselling and treatment for various problems such as alcoholism, drugs, and sexual problems. The Southdown Institute was sponsored by the Bishops of Ontario.

Father Stone had been staying with Father Ostler at the St. John Bosco rectory since he left Southdown. Bishop LaRocque knew that Father Stone was on probation and was required to report to a probation officer in Cornwall. That probation officer may have been Ken Seguin. Mr. Seguin was copied on correspondence from Immigration officials concerning Father Stone, and Mr. Jos van Diepen testified that he believes that Mr. Seguin was Father Stone's probation officer.

Bishop LaRocque did not contact either the diocese in Albany, New York, to discuss the conviction or the Southdown treatment facility to seek information on the diagnosis and progress of Father Stone's treatment. The Bishop agreed at the hearings that as Bishop of Alexandria-Cornwall, he was the shepherd of the flock for the parishioners in his Diocese and was responsible for protecting people in the community as much as possible from physical and spiritual dangers.

Bishop LaRocque testified that he had reservations about allowing this priest to work in his Diocese after interviewing Father Stone and reading the Church files. He instructed Father Stone in the October 1981 interview “never to be alone with a boy(s) in a room or a car.” Bishop LaRocque sought work for Father Stone as a full-time chaplain at St. Joseph’s Villa and on a part-time basis at Mount Carmel House. St. Joseph’s Villa is a retirement home in Cornwall under the supervision of the Religious Hospitallers of St. Joseph. Sister Dolores Kane was the administrator at St. Joseph’s Villa. Mount Carmel House was an alcoholic rehabilitation centre in St. Raphael’s, about twenty minutes from Cornwall. Unlike St. Joseph’s Villa, Mount Carmel House was operated by lay people. The Bishop needed to seek permission from the Canadian government for Father Stone to work at these two institutions in Ontario.

Mount Carmel was located next door to Iona Academy, an elementary school operated by the Catholic school board for children up to grade 8. The eldest students were thirteen or fourteen years old. Father Stone was permitted to wear his collar. He was considered a trusted figure in the community because of his religious position. Yet Bishop LaRocque did not warn the administration of the school of Father Stone’s background and that he would be working in very close proximity to the school. He did not inform school officials of Father Stone’s history of sexual activities with children. Bishop LaRocque acknowledged at the hearings, “[T]hat should have been done.” The Bishop appeared to be preoccupied with avoiding scandal in the Diocese and was less focused on the protection of children. His response to a question on that subject by counsel at the Inquiry follows:

COUNSEL: Is it fair to say that the balance between avoiding scandal and other considerations, such as in this case, the safety of the children, at that time, it was more balanced towards avoiding scandal?

MSGR. LAROCQUE: It would seem so.

One of the priest’s alleged victims of sexual abuse, Fernand Vivarais, testified that he was eleven or twelve years old when Father Stone sexually assaulted him, around 1958 or 1959. Mr. Vivarais alleged that Father Stone had invited him to an Ice Capades show in Montreal and that the sexual assaults occurred in a motel in Montreal. Mr. Vivarais testified that he met Father Stone at St. John Bosco Church.

Other priests in the Diocese were aware of Father Stone's past inappropriate behaviour with youths. Father Réjean Lebrun knew that Father Stone had left St. John Bosco Parish very suddenly in 1963. When he asked Father Desrosiers the reason for the quick departure of the priest, he was told that Father Stone had problems with young boys, "les petits gars." About two years later, when Father Lebrun was the chaplain of St. Lawrence High School in 1965, a student disclosed that Father Stone had committed acts of sexual misconduct on him. Father Lebrun simply advised the student to speak to the vocational (guidance) counsellor. Father Lebrun did not report the disclosure of abuse or try to determine whether Father Stone at that time was serving in another diocese. Father Lebrun explained at the hearings that he had not been trained in matters of sexual abuse and that as a young priest, who had been ordained only three years earlier in 1962, he would not have pursued this issue further:

À cette époque-là, on ne posait pas de questions. L'autorité l'avait remis et avec seulement trois ans de service, on posait pas de questions ... J'étais tout à fait pas préparé pour ça. Je me suis senti dépourvu.

Father Lebrun stated that he did not comprehend at the time the devastating effects of sexual abuse on young victims.

Father Lebrun was surprised that Father Stone returned to the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall in 1981. There was no discussion among the priests or by the Bishop to the effect that Father Stone should be monitored. When Father Lebrun asked Church officials why Father Stone was returning to Cornwall, he was told that the priest had been undergoing therapy and was now able to serve in the Diocese.

Bishop LaRocque testified that when he contacted St. Joseph's Villa and Mount Carmel House to seek work for Father Stone, he was likely to have disclosed the priest's sexual misconduct and "life-long weakness." He also stated that he would probably have discussed the conditions imposed on Father Stone, which included a prohibition on being alone with boys. Bishop LaRocque testified that he would have asked the individuals operating these institutions to contact him if a problem arose.

Bishop LaRocque was successful in finding chaplaincy work for Father Stone at both St. Joseph's Villa and Mount Carmel House. In a December 8, 1981, note to Father Stone confirming the positions, the Bishop reminded the priest that he was not permitted to be alone with youths:

Fr. Stone, I also include this personal and confidential reminder of our conversation: it is understood that you will not be alone with any youth in your car, or room in this diocese or in Malone and area. (Emphasis added)

Father Stone was required to continue his treatment as an outpatient at Southdown and to report to his probation officer.

Bishop LaRocque wrote to Immigration in June 1982, asking the federal government to grant permission to Father Stone to allow him to work in Cornwall as a chaplain. He also wrote on October 12, 1982, to Ed Lumley, the Member of Parliament for Stormont-Dundas, as Father Stone's permit to remain in Canada was due to expire in seventeen days, on October 29. Mr. Lumley was a former mayor of Cornwall. Father Stone was required to return to Albany, New York, to apply for landed immigrant status. This could take up to six months. In the letter, Bishop LaRocque informed the federal politician that Father Stone had been convicted of a sexual offence in Albany and had received a suspended sentence. He stated that the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office was supervising Father Stone. Bishop LaRocque also conveyed the information that the priest had been treated at Southdown in Aurora, Ontario, and that he continued to see a psychiatrist at this treatment facility each month.

In the letter to Ed Lumley, Bishop LaRocque stated that the New York conviction for the sexual offence in Albany was "the first time that Father Stone was convicted on this or any other charge." Bishop LaRocque knew that there had been multiple incidents of inappropriate sexual conduct with young persons, including those reported by the Diocese of Ogdensburg, yet this was not communicated to the MP for Stormont-Dundas. The Bishop did not mention the problems in the 1950s or '60s, or Father Stone's sexual misconduct prior to Ogdensburg. When he gave his evidence, Bishop LaRocque acknowledged that it probably would have been "more prudent" to disclose the other incidents of sexual misconduct. The Bishop agreed that this letter to Mr. Lumley did not contain a complete account of Father Stone's past. This, he said, is known in the Roman Catholic Church as "mental reservation"—limiting the amount of information that is disclosed.

In the concluding paragraph of the letter, Bishop LaRocque argued that Father Stone's case "warrants special consideration" and asked the federal politician to take appropriate measures to ensure that the priest could continue his excellent work at St. Joseph's Villa and Mount Carmel House. He also stated that the loss of Father Stone would place him in a difficult position, as there were no other priests in the Diocese to replace him. The Bishop wrote:

He has shown himself responsible both in his personal conduct and in his ministry. Due to his role in the community, I would ask you to keep this matter confidential. I believe his case warrants special consideration and I would ask you to do whatever you can to assist in this matter. We both realize that as I ask this, there is a time factor of 17 days at play.

My sincere thanks for whatever you can do to help me in this matter. If he were to go, I have no priest to replace him in the work he is doing.

In my view, the Bishop seemed more concerned with retaining Father Stone than with the protection of children and youths in the community.

Bishop LaRocque met with Minister Lloyd Axworthy in Ottawa on December 22, 1982, to seek permission for Father Stone to remain in Canada on a Minister's Permit, which was renewable each year. Mr. Axworthy was the Minister of Employment and Immigration at that time. Bishop LaRocque testified that this was the first and only occasion on which he contacted a Cabinet minister with regard to the work status of a priest in the Diocese.

A Minister's Permit for Father Stone was granted. However, Minister Axworthy imposed the following seven conditions in his correspondence to the Bishop in January 1983:

1. You will be personally responsible for Father Stone and his behaviour in Canada and are willing on all occasions to answer for it;
2. Father Stone will remain in the same or similar duties in the Cornwall area, i.e., working only with geriatric cases or alcohol rehabilitation cases;
3. Father Stone will not be allowed to work with young people;
4. Father Stone will continue to undergo his rehabilitative therapy on a regular basis as he is presently;
5. Father Stone will continue to enjoy the support of a group of religious Fathers as he does presently;
6. You will be responsible for maintaining a strict control on Father Stone;
7. Decision to renew the Minister's Permit will be made following an annual review.

Minister Axworthy made it clear in this correspondence that the Canadian Immigration Centre in Cornwall had been notified of the conditions attached to this Minister's Permit and would be interviewing Father Stone.

Bishop LaRocque informed the Minister of Employment and Immigration by letter a few days later that he accepted these conditions. Bishop LaRocque agreed to be personally responsible for Father Stone's behaviour while he was in Canada. The Bishop knew that Father Stone had been convicted of a sexual offence involving minors in the United States, that Church officials in the Diocese of Ogdensburg did not want Father Stone in their area, that Father Stone had brought boys to a camp several times in Ogdensburg, and that the priest had engaged in sexual misconduct prior to serving in the Diocese of Ogdensburg. Bishop LaRocque also knew that Father Stone had committed a "misdemeanor" in Cornwall in 1963. Yet despite this priest's history of misconduct and his sexual activities with boys and young men, Bishop LaRocque spent considerable effort and took extraordinary steps to ensure that Father Stone could remain in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. The Bishop agreed at the hearings that this was "very unusual."

When asked to explain why he went to such lengths to ensure that Father Stone remained in the Diocese, the Bishop replied that he wanted to give Father Stone "a chance" and that a very well-respected priest, Father Ostler, had asked him to find work for the priest. In my view, these were not convincing reasons. Bishop LaRocque was willing to risk the protection of children and youths because Gary Ostler, a highly regarded priest, had recommended Father Stone and the Bishop wanted to give Father Stone another "chance." In view of Father Stone's behaviour over more than two decades of sexual relations with young people, there was a serious risk that this priest would continue to sexually assault young persons.

Bishop LaRocque devoted additional time and effort over the next few years to ensure that the Minister's Permit for Father Stone was extended. In February 1985, Mr. Fern Lebrun, manager of the Canadian Immigration Centre in Cornwall, sent a letter to Father Stone indicating that it was very unlikely that the Minister's Permit would be extended beyond January 24, 1986. Mr. Lebrun told Father Stone to make the necessary arrangements to leave Canada by that date. Father Ostler was copied on this government letter, as was Ken Seguin, a probation officer in the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office. As discussed in Chapter 5, on the institutional response of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services, there were allegations by several witnesses at the Inquiry that Mr. Seguin had sexually abused young people, including his probationers.

Bishop LaRocque responded to Mr. Lebrun's letter and sent a copy of his correspondence to Flora MacDonald, Minister of Immigration at that time. The Bishop wrote that it was unusual to respond to "copied letters," but that he "must make an exception" because of the great importance of Father Stone to the Church. Bishop LaRocque acknowledged at the hearings that he expressed very strong concerns to the Minister and to the manager of the Canadian Immigration Centre in Cornwall regarding the federal government's decision not to extend Father Stone's permit to remain in Canada:

Dear Mr. Lebrun:

Re: File 3105-11107

Usually I do not answer copied letters, but the matter of your February 12th letter to Father Stone is of such importance to me and the Church of Alexandria-Cornwall that I must make an exception.

I wish to inform you that I am totally satisfied with the work of Father Stone; he has proven to me and I would hope to others that he is a responsible person at the service of a very important group of elderly people who would be deprived of pastoral services were your permission for him to continue his stay in Canada to be effected [sic] January 24th 1986.

I wish to inform you that I will take every measure possible to see that Father Stone be allowed to stay among us in order to continue his ministry.

If I may comment on your final sentence of Father Stone, it seems rather ironical that you should state "hoping that this will not cause you any inconveniences," since it will not only inconvenience Father Stone, but myself, and especially the over 100 elderly people, the patients at the General Hospital at Cornwall and the priests of the diocese to whom he renders great service.

Sincerely yours,

+ Eugene P. LaRocque

Bishop Receives Complaints About Father Stone: Priest Instructed to Leave the Diocese

Two months after Bishop LaRocque wrote to the federal government praising Father Stone and urging that his Minister's Permit be extended so that the priest could remain in Canada, Bishop LaRocque received a number of complaints about the priest.

Sister Kane, the administrator of St. Joseph's Villa, met with Bishop LaRocque to advise him that Father Stone was receiving young men at his apartment. This was clearly in breach of the conditions under which Father Stone was permitted to work in the Diocese. Sister Kane also complained that Father Stone was quick tempered with staff at the Villa.

The Bishop confronted Father Stone with these allegations, but the priest denied that he had engaged in improper behaviour with young men. This was conveyed to Sister Kane by the Bishop. Sister Kane was disappointed and upset by the Bishop's response. Sister Kane had verified the information regarding Father Stone's inappropriate conduct and she urged the Bishop to take measures to address the situation. In her June 9, 1985, letter to Bishop LaRocque, she wrote, "Everyone is hesitant to say anything about a priest." Sister Kane stressed that this was a serious matter and that she was concerned about the reputation of St. Joseph's Villa as well as the negative repercussions for the Bishop if he failed to take any action. Sister Kane reminded Bishop LaRocque that he had promised the federal government he would ensure that Father Stone did not engage in inappropriate behaviour. Sister Kane wrote:

I was disappointed in your telephone response to me on Friday. It was very difficult for me to go to see you and discuss the matters I did with you on last Wednesday. As a religious of many years, I am very conscious and aware of the seriousness and delicacy of the situation and information which I was reporting. Serious effort was made to check the related facts in the matter.

Although I knew the past history of the person involved, I wanted to be fair in his regard. Your Grace, I do have to be concerned when I receive complaints and concerns for the reputation of the Villa, but my concern is no less for the reputation and well-being of this priest and for you too, since you did state that you had to vouch for him to the government.

As we discussed, everyone is hesitant to say anything about a priest. I have incident reports to share with you, but not everyone is willing to sign their name to a report—again because he is a priest. I am enclosing a few, as well as a list of those who would be willing to discuss these matters with you personally.

If you would be willing to meet with the department heads, I will gladly arrange a date and time agreeable to you. They are willing to meet with you regarding the rudeness and unacceptable behaviour shown to their staffs. This also includes the parade of young visitors with earrings who visit the area in back of the Chapel.

You stated that the priest denied everything. I can appreciate his response. It would be very difficult for him to do otherwise. So your Grace, I am coming to you once again to ask you to review in depth this full matter. I know you will take the appropriate action.

Sister Kane sent incident reports from staff at St. Joseph's Villa, as well as a list of employees who were willing to discuss Father Stone's conduct with the Bishop. Bishop LaRocque inscribed the following on Sister Kane's letter: "Seen at—frequenting St. Hubert restaurant with young men ... 17 to 19 years old appearance of ... homo ... using side door ... twice in nude in front of young girl ... going on for one year; more blatant in last 6 months."

Father Stone had lied to him. Bishop LaRocque decided he needed to take measures to deal with the priest's behaviour and his violation of the conditions of his stay in the Diocese. In his letter to Father Stone in early June 1985, Bishop LaRocque wrote that young men between seventeen and twenty-one years old had been visiting the priest's room and had been in the company of Father Stone in restaurants. The Bishop instructed Father Stone to leave the Diocese and the country "as soon as possible":

After our meeting last Wednesday I have received written and verbal corroboration of the fact that three young men between 17 and 21 years of age have been up in your room, one after another and that this has been going on blatantly for the last six months. You have also been seen in the company of the same individuals in various eating establishments.

I am therefore morally certain that you did not tell me the truth last Wednesday. Since you know how far I went to obtain permission for you to remain in Canada, I feel a tremendous "let-down."

From the time that you read this letter you no longer have the faculties of this Diocese; you are not to offer Mass to-morrow morning and you are to leave the Villa and Canada as soon as possible.

I am sorry that you did not take advantage of the opportunity that was offered you. I pray that not too much harm has been done to the faith of the people who have witnessed your “modus vivendi.” And I pray and shall continue to pray for your salvation.

Disappointedly yours,

+ Eugene P. LaRocque
Bishop of Alexandria-Cornwall

In his resignation letter to Sister Kane on June 10, 1985, Father Stone did not apologize or express any regret. Nor did the priest admit any wrongdoing or acknowledge that he had been instructed to leave the Diocese. Father Stone simply writes: “Another pastoral year has come to an end and I believe that the time has come for me to retire from active ministry.” As Bishop LaRocque said at the hearings, Father Stone “didn’t tell the whole truth.”

But Bishop LaRocque himself did not disclose to the government the reason for Father Stone’s departure from the Diocese. In the June 21, 1985, letter to Mr. Lebrun of the Canadian Immigration Centre in Cornwall, Bishop LaRocque simply states, “Father Carl Stone has resigned as Chaplain of St. Joseph Villa and has returned to live in New York State.” He explains that it is therefore not necessary to extend the Minister’s Permit for Father Stone beyond the January 1986 expiry date. Bishop LaRocque did not inform the government that Father Stone had breached one of the conditions stipulated by the Minister of Immigration. Bishop LaRocque also did not contact the local police. Nor did the Bishop advise the Montfort Fathers of Father Stone’s misconduct and his return to the United States. Bishop LaRocque acknowledged in his evidence that “in retrospect,” it would have been prudent to advise the Montfort Fathers of the misconduct of Father Stone. The Bishop also agreed that “it certainly would have been the proper thing” to advise the Ministry of Immigration of the reason for Father Stone’s resignation and departure from the Diocese. Nor did the Bishop contact the Ministry of Correctional Services to inform Father Stone’s probation officer of the reason for the priest’s departure. And significantly, the Bishop made no effort to contact the potential victims of Father Stone to assess whether they required counselling or other support and resources to deal with the alleged sexual abuse perpetrated by the priest. Bishop LaRocque made no effort to determine if Father Stone joined another parish in Canada or in the United States after he left Cornwall. He took the position that “it was not really my responsibility ... [W]hile he was here he was my responsibility, but not after he left my diocese ... I was relieved that he was gone.”

This was also the case when the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) requested information from the Bishop during the Project Truth investigation. As I have discussed in fuller detail, the OPP asked Bishop LaRocque in 1998 to provide background information on a number of priests to assist the police in its investigation. One of the priests was Father Carl Stone. Bishop LaRocque simply provided the OPP with tombstone data, that is, the places at which Father Stone had worked. When Bishop LaRocque was asked by Commission counsel why he had not disclosed Father Stone’s history of sexual misconduct with youths and young men, the Bishop responded, “I would have willingly given it to them if they had requested it, but I didn’t think that that was part of their request.” Bishop LaRocque clearly understood that the mandate of the OPP and Project Truth was to investigate sexual abuse by priests in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. Yet the Bishop failed, in his written response to the OPP, to divulge important information on priests such as Carl Stone. The Bishop acknowledged in his testimony that “in hindsight,” perhaps he should have communicated this information to the police.

The Reverend Gordon Bryan was the assistant chaplain at St. Joseph’s Villa from 1972 to 1989. The Villa was a religious hospital, not administered by the Diocese. Prior to Father Stone’s appointment, Bishop LaRocque did not discuss with Gordon Bryan the priest’s inappropriate and sexual conduct. Bishop LaRocque did not convey the circumstances under which Father Stone was returning to the Diocese in 1981. Nor was Gordon Bryan asked to monitor Father Stone’s behaviour at the Villa. He knew that Father Stone had been in the Diocese in the late 1950s and early 1960s. He was aware that Carl Stone was American and that he had been in the United States for quite some time. When Father Stone left the Diocese in 1985, Gordon Bryan was unaware of the reasons for the priest’s departure from Cornwall.

In my view, Bishop LaRocque and the Diocese failed to sufficiently investigate allegations of inappropriate contact with young people by Father Stone. It is also my conclusion that Bishop LaRocque and the Diocese failed to inquire into Father Carl Stone’s background: with the Montfort Fathers religious community about his past sexual conduct, and with Southdown about his assessment and treatment. The Diocese and Bishop LaRocque also omitted to take appropriate action to identify potential victims in relation to the allegations of inappropriate contact with young persons involving Father Stone. Finally, the Diocese and Bishop LaRocque ought to have informed the Montfort Fathers religious community of the occurrences at St. Joseph’s Villa involving young persons and that Father Stone had left Canada.

Father Charles MacDonald

When Bishop Eugène LaRocque arrived in the Diocese of Alexandria in 1974, Father Charles MacDonald was a priest at St. Columban's Parish in Cornwall. Father MacDonald was ordained in June 1969 by Bishop Adolphe Proulx and was appointed assistant priest at St. Columban's. He worked with Father Kevin Maloney and Father Donald McDougald.¹⁴ In 1970, he assumed responsibility for the training of altar boys at St. Columban's and came into contact with David Silmser, John MacDonald, and C-3. He also became involved with week-end retreats for some of the youth groups in the Church. In February 1974, Bishop Proulx asked Father MacDonald to assume responsibility for the Cursillo Movement¹⁵ in the Diocese.

Questions were raised by Church officials even before Father MacDonald was ordained. Charles MacDonald attended Saint Paul Seminary from 1963 to 1969. At this time, he met Ken Seguin, a fellow theology student who, as previously discussed, became a probation officer in the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office. Many young people in the Cornwall community alleged that Mr. Seguin had sexually abused them, although Mr. Seguin took his life in November 1993 and was not criminally prosecuted. The institutional response of the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office and the Ministry of Correctional Services is discussed in detail in Chapter 5.

Charles MacDonald entered Saint Paul Seminary as a mature student. He had previously taught in elementary school for ten years. He was in his thirties when he attended Saint Paul Seminary; other theology students were twenty-one or twenty-two, more than ten years younger. A 1967 report from the seminary contained information that was critical of Charles MacDonald's conduct. Contrary to the rules of the seminary, Charles MacDonald was visiting the rooms of other seminarians: "Conduit moins satisfaisante que les années passées, en ce qui a trait aux visites aux chambres entre séminaristes."

In this report, the rector of Saint Paul Seminary, Rosaire Bellemare, wrote that Charles MacDonald was aggressive, overbearing, did not readily accept correction, did not forgive easily, and had a spirit of revenge. This was clearly not a positive evaluation. In fact, the rector did not give Charles MacDonald any assurance that he would be accepted into the seminary the following year:

14. He became Monsignor McDougald in December 1980.

15. The Cursillo Movement focuses on training lay people to become effective leaders and to communicate Christian teachings and principles. Generally over the course of weekends, priests and lay people make presentations to individuals who are expected to participate further in the movement.

VUE D'ENSEMBLE: Défavorable. Je serais étonné qu'il persévérât.
De toute façon, je ne serais pas prêt pour le moment à donner l'assurance que nous l'accepterions pour une autre année.

Charles MacDonald spent the summer with Monsignor Proulx, improved his attitude, and returned to the seminary. He completed his years of study and, as mentioned, was ordained in 1969. At that time, there was no trial period before ordination. Bishop LaRocque explained in his testimony that once a student completed his studies at the seminary, he was ordained.

When Father MacDonald became responsible for the altar server program at St. Columban's Parish in 1970, there was no screening or interviews by the Church for priests who would be interacting with these young boys. Nor was there additional supervision of these priests. Screening was implemented in the Diocese in 2000.

In 1975, Bishop LaRocque appointed Father MacDonald pastor of St. Anthony's Parish in Apple Hill and Monkland. It was a smaller parish than St. Columban's and Father MacDonald was the sole priest. He was responsible for all the programs and activities at the church, including the altar boys. Father MacDonald also became involved in the COR Movement, the English equivalent of the French "R3" Rencontre Movement. Youths entered the program in high school as early as grade 9. Initially, Father MacDonald and Father Kevin Maloney shared responsibility for the anglophone youths, but Father MacDonald soon became solely responsible for this Church program. Father Gilles Deslauriers and Father Denis Vaillancourt were responsible for the francophone counterpart, the R3 program.

In 1983, Father Charles MacDonald was appointed chaplain of Bishop MacDonell School. He had been moved in 1982 from St. Anthony's to St. Mary's Parish in Williamstown. Again, he was the sole priest of that parish. Bishop MacDonell School, a Catholic school for grade 9 and 10 students at that time, was scheduled to open in the fall of 1983. Father MacDonald was the first chaplain of this school, where he worked on a part-time basis. He continued to be the pastor of St. Mary's Parish. When grades 11, 12, and 13 were added to this high school, it was renamed St. Joseph's Secondary School.

In 1988, Bishop LaRocque appointed Father MacDonald pastor of St. Andrew's Parish. The priest remained at that church until his resignation in October 1993, which occurred as a result of allegations of sexual abuse of young persons.

David Silmsen Contacts the Church: Allegations of Sexual Abuse by Father Charles MacDonald

It was in December 1992 that thirty-four-year-old David Silmsen decided to contact the Roman Catholic Church to disclose that a priest, Father Charles MacDonald, had sexually abused him when he was a boy.

Mr. Silmser initially made contact with Mr. Guy Levac, assistant to the Bishop in Ottawa, who referred him to the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

David Silmser called Mr. Levac back and told him that the person to whom he spoke at the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall was not interested in helping him. Mr. Levac decided to contact Monsignor Peter Schonenbach, the Bishop's delegate for the Archdiocese of Ottawa. Monsignor Schonenbach offered to assist Mr. Silmser even though this matter did not fall within his jurisdiction.

Monsignor Schonenbach spoke to David Silmser on December 9, 1992. Mr. Silmser disclosed that when he was an altar boy at St. Columban's Parish, Father Charles MacDonald had sexually molested him. He said that Ken Seguin, a probation officer, had also sexually abused him. Mr. Silmser told Monsignor Schonenbach that he had been in and out of prison for ten years. He mentioned that he had contacted the police about the allegations. Mr. Silmser said that when he contacted the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, Monsignor Bernard Guindon had not been receptive and had responded, "What do you expect me to do?" Monsignor Schonenbach considered the allegations serious and had no reason to believe the story was fabricated.

Monsignor Schonenbach decided to call the Chancellor at the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, Father Denis Vaillancourt, after speaking to David Silmser. On December 9, 1992, he spoke to Father Vaillancourt, who did not appear to be aware of the Silmser allegations. The Cornwall priest asked Monsignor Schonenbach to contact Monsignor Donald McDougald, the Bishop's delegate for issues of this nature. This was done on the same day. It was decided that Monsignor Schonenbach would obtain further information on the Silmser allegations and forward them to Monsignor McDougald.

Monsignor Schonenbach testified that when confronted with David Silmser's allegations, either Father Vaillancourt or Monsignor McDougald responded, "It's simply not possible because Charles is such a wonderful priest." It was evident to Monsignor Schonenbach that clergy in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall were "having real difficulty in coming around to realizing that this good priest could have done this." As Monsignor Schonenbach testified, "The real horrible thing about it is you can have a man who is doing wonderful pastoral work and hiding all of this."

Monsignor Schonenbach met with David Silmser at the Diocesan Centre in Ottawa the following day to discuss his allegations of abuse. On December 11, 1992, he wrote a letter to Monsignor McDougald, providing details of his meeting. His intention was to communicate that he considered these allegations to be serious and that he thought Monsignor McDougald should meet with Mr. Silmser.

In the letter, Monsignor Schonenbach conveyed the following. As a boy, David Silmsr was a devoted altar server at St. Columban's Church in Cornwall. When the boy was thirteen, Father Charles MacDonald took an interest in him and invited him to his office to talk. On one such occasion, Father MacDonald told David Silmsr that he sometimes "masturbated in front of a window when girls were passing by." When David was fourteen years old, Father MacDonald invited him to go for a drive in the country. The priest parked his car at an isolated location and suggested that they have "sex together." David Silmsr told Monsignor Schonenbach that he ran from the car but was caught by Father MacDonald, who forcibly pushed him to the ground and "violated" him.

Mr. Silmsr told Monsignor Schonenbach that the sexual abuse by the priest radically changed his life. He began to drink and became involved in petty crimes. David Silmsr said that when he disclosed the abuse to his parents, he was not believed.

Mr. Silmsr stated that his life had somewhat improved in the past few years; he was married and had two children and a job managing a trailer park. He explained to the Church official the reason why, as an adult, he was now contacting the Church. Monsignor Schonenbach wrote the following in the December 1992 letter to Monsignor McDougald:

He told me he was raising the matter at this time because he wanted to lose the label of being a bad person, he said: "for starters, I would like a letter from Father MacDonald acknowledging what he did so that I could show this to my mother." (Emphasis added)

Mr. Silmsr was focused on receiving a letter from Father MacDonald that acknowledged the abuse. It was apparent to Monsignor Schonenbach that this man had serious problems and wanted his mother to understand the reason for his behaviour. In his correspondence to Monsignor McDougald, Monsignor Schonenbach indicated that David Silmsr appeared to be a "credible person."

Monsignor Schonenbach explained to Mr. Silmsr that Monsignor McDougald was responsible for matters of this nature in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. He gave him Monsignor McDougald's telephone number and encouraged David Silmsr to contact him. This is documented in the December 11, 1992, letter to Monsignor McDougald.

Monsignor Schonenbach sent a copy of the December 11, 1992, letter by registered mail to Bishop LaRocque. He wanted the Diocese to take this allegation seriously and for Monsignor McDougald to deal with Mr. Silmsr's concerns. As Monsignor Schonenbach testified, he wanted to ensure that "nothing was swept under the rug.” Monsignor Schonenbach also sent by fax a copy of the December 11, 1992, letter to his Bishop, Archbishop Gervais.

Bishop LaRocque’s “first reaction” to the allegations in the letter was that this behaviour was “utterly out of character” for Father MacDonald. David Silmsers was pursuing this complaint in large part because he wanted his aging mother to understand his conduct in the past as a youth and as a young adult. He wanted his mother to change her view that he was a “bad person.” It was Bishop LaRocque’s recollection that after he read the correspondence from Monsignor Schonenbach, he would have instructed Monsignor McDougald to follow the 1992 protocol drafted by Father Vaillancourt about six or seven months earlier.

In an interview with the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) in 1994, Monsignor McDougald indicated that he spoke to David Silmsers after receiving the December 11, 1992, letter from Monsignor Schonenbach. Mr. Silmsers reiterated that he was seeking an apology from Father MacDonald. However, Church officials at the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall did not make any arrangements to meet with Mr. Silmsers for two months. Monsignor McDougald claimed that he and other clergy at the Diocese were preoccupied with other matters such as the birth of Christ ceremonies and therefore did not address Mr. Silmsers’s concerns at that time. While I understand that the birth of Christ ceremonies are important to the Church, a two-month delay to meet Mr. Silmsers was clearly too long. The 1992 protocol states that the designated person is to meet the complainant within forty-eight hours.

On December 17, 1992, Monsignor McDougald met with Father Charles MacDonald. Father MacDonald was accompanied by his lawyer, Malcolm MacDonald. The meeting took place at the parish house at St. Andrew’s. Monsignor McDougald showed them the December 11, 1992, correspondence from Monsignor Schonenbach, detailing Mr. Silmsers’s allegations of sexual abuse by Father MacDonald.

According to the protocol, Monsignor McDougald was required to write a report of his meeting with the alleged aggressor and send it to the Bishop. However, Bishop LaRocque testified that he never read a written report of the meeting between Monsignor McDougald and Father Charles MacDonald, nor did he know if a written report had been filed in accordance with the protocol. Monsignor McDougald was also required, according to the protocol, to instruct Father MacDonald that he was not to have any contact with the victim or the victim’s family.

A few days later, Malcolm MacDonald wrote a letter to Monsignor McDougald restating that Father MacDonald denied the allegations made by David Silmsers. He also said that Mr. Silmsers’s allegations were vague, and he requested a detailed statement under oath from the complainant. Malcolm MacDonald stated that his client was prepared to take a polygraph test and suggested that Mr. Silmser also undergo one. He wrote that Mr. Silmser had a criminal record for the following offences when he was a youth: theft of money from the Church, theft of a car when he was seventeen or eighteen years old, and embezzlement from his employer. Malcolm MacDonald also told Monsignor McDougald in this December 21, 1992, letter that he had contacted Bishop LaRocque to keep him apprised of this matter. According to Malcolm MacDonald, the Bishop told him to continue dealing with Monsignor McDougald with regard to the Silmser complaint. The Bishop testified at the Inquiry that he had no recollection of speaking to Malcolm MacDonald at this time about the Silmser matter.

It appears that the priest's lawyer was taking the lead on the issue and providing suggestions to the Diocese on how to proceed. The protocol states that the person designated by the Bishop is to receive and record the complaint. Mr. MacDonald, the priest's lawyer, wanted Monsignor McDougald to obtain a detailed statement from Mr. Silmser. It was after this was communicated to David Silmser that he decided he did not want to co-operate and made contact with the police.

Malcolm MacDonald also contacted Monsignor Schonenbach. In correspondence from the Monsignor to the lawyer, it was evident that Mr. Silmser was not prepared to take a polygraph test or swear a statement. Monsignor Schonenbach made it clear to Father MacDonald's lawyer that "under the circumstances outlined," David Silmser "does not want to cooperate further" and that the complainant "intends taking matter to the Police."

The Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall continued to involve Monsignor Schonenbach in the Silmser matter. In January 1993, Monsignor McDougald asked Monsignor Schonenbach to facilitate a meeting between Mr. Silmser and the alleged perpetrator, Father Charles MacDonald. Monsignor Schonenbach, in strong language, told Monsignor McDougald that he would not do so. He felt that he had become too involved in this matter and that this was the responsibility of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. This ended his involvement in the Silmser complaint. Bishop LaRocque acknowledged in his testimony that if Church officials in his Diocese had suggested that the victim meet with the alleged perpetrator, this was not appropriate and was contrary to the protocol.

According to the diocesan protocol on sexual abuse, the Children's Aid Society (CAS) was to be notified if a minor was involved. If the CAS was not notified, the complainant was to be told the reason for this decision. In the Silmser matter, the CAS was not notified. Bishop LaRocque stated that confusion existed as to whether it was necessary to contact the CAS in cases of historical sexual assault. Monsignor McDougald, according to the protocol, should have notified Mr. Silmser to give him the reason for the decision not to contact the CAS. Bishop LaRocque agreed that if this did not occur, there was a breach of the protocol.

Bishop LaRocque testified that he considered the protocol a “serious guideline” for the Diocese. Initially, the Bishop took the position at the Inquiry that his delegate rather than he was responsible for ensuring compliance with the provisions in the protocol. However, the Bishop agreed in his testimony the following day that it was in fact his responsibility to ensure this protocol was followed. At the hearing, Bishop LaRocque said:

... I want to take full responsibility for the policy, the protocol, whatever we call it, and its—and the following of that protocol, and in no way do I want to blame my former Vicar General, Monsignor McDougald, for any of this.

I should have realized—that was the first time we were using the protocol and I should have monitored it much more closely.

Bishop LaRocque agreed that the allegations against Father MacDonald in December 1992 were serious. He had received Monsignor Schonenbach’s report on his meeting with David Silmsner and knew that Father MacDonald had denied the sexual molestation. The Bishop testified that he applied the test of “moral certitude” to decide whether to remove Father MacDonald from the ministry. He claimed that in December 1992, he did not have the moral certitude that Father MacDonald had had sexual contact with David Silmsner and was therefore not prepared to remove or even temporarily suspend the priest from his ministry. As the Bishop said at the hearings:

... I didn’t have the moral certitude that I needed at that time.

... I have to know—have at least the moral certitude that what is being said is true because remember I was dealing also with other accusations that came later but it was the same thing. I mean, if you remove a priest on the mere accusation of someone without having a moral certitude that it’s correct, I mean, I would have no priests left in the parishes.

Bishop LaRocque asserted that he had doubts about the credibility of David Silmsner’s allegations because Mr. Silmsner had not made his complaint earlier. More than seventeen years had passed before the former altar boy at St. Columban’s Parish made his complaint to the Church. Bishop LaRocque explained:

... [Y]ou can imagine why I had a sort of a doubt as to whether this accusation, made so late in history, why it had not been made sooner.

It would not have the effect that a—if it had been made sooner, then I think I would have been more convinced.

Clearly the Bishop did not understand the difficulties of disclosure of child sexual abuse. As discussed at the Inquiry by the expert witnesses on child sexual abuse, disclosure is particularly difficult when the alleged perpetrator is a priest, a revered person in the community, a person in a position of great trust and authority.

Bishop LaRocque did not suspend the priest pending the investigation of the Ad Hoc Committee. Nor did he impose restrictions on Father MacDonald's contact with children, teenagers, or young adults. As I discuss in this section, from late 1992 until October 1993, the Bishop took no action with regard to removing Father MacDonald from his ministry.

Church Officials in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall Meet With David Silmsen, February 9, 1993

On February 9, 1993, David Silmsen met with Church officials at the Diocesan Centre in Cornwall. Monsignor McDougald, Father Vaillancourt, and Diocese lawyer Jacques Leduc were present. The purpose of the meeting was to receive details of Mr. Silmsen's complaint, to offer him psychological assistance, and to advise the Bishop.

David Silmsen introduced himself. He told the Church officials and Diocese lawyer that he was a father and that he came from a good family, but that because of traumatic experiences during his youth, he had served time in jail.

Jacques Leduc asked Mr. Silmsen most of the questions. David Silmsen told the Church officials that Father Charles MacDonald had sexually molested him several times when he was a teenager. The first assault, he alleged, took place when he was an altar boy, in the sacristy of St. Columban's Church. Further sexual assaults allegedly took place on Church retreats and in a deserted area north of the City of Cornwall, to which Father MacDonald drove David Silmsen in his car. The Church officials asked Mr. Silmsen to describe Father MacDonald's aggression and other details of the sexual assault, but he either refused or could not remember the requested details. Neither Mr. Leduc nor the Church officials had training on interviewing alleged victims of sexual assault.

As Father Vaillancourt stated, in 1992, there still was no training for clergy in the Diocese on issues of sexual abuse. This was despite the fact that there had been complaints of sexual abuse in the Diocese in the past, and Bishop LaRocque himself had been involved in dealing at an earlier time with the allegations of sexual abuse by Father Carl Stone and Father Gilles Deslauriers.

Mr. Silmsen made it clear that he wanted a letter of apology from Father MacDonald to be sent to his mother. There was no discussion or request on his part for any financial compensation from the Church for the alleged sexual assaults perpetrated by the priest nor, as Jacques Leduc acknowledged, was there any threat by Mr. Silmsen that he would sue the Diocese. Inscribed in Father Vaillancourt's notes of the February 9, 1993, meeting is: "He stated that all he wanted was a letter of apology from Fr. MacDonald to be sent to David's mother."

Without having previously discussed this with the two clergy, Jacques Leduc asked Mr. Silmsen if he would meet with the alleged perpetrator, Father MacDonald. This request surprised Father Vaillancourt. Father Vaillancourt had drafted the 1992 protocol "Diocesan Guidelines on Sexual Abuse by Priests, Deacons, Seminarians and Pastoral Assistants." Although these guidelines had not been officially adopted by the Council of Priests, Father Vaillancourt relied on them for the Silmsen complaint. As Father Vaillancourt said in his evidence, arranging a meeting between the victim of a sexual assault and the alleged perpetrator was clearly not one of the steps in the 1992 guidelines. It was threatening, intimidating, and frightening for an alleged victim who had mustered the courage to disclose the sexual abuse to the Diocese and who sought a public apology from the priest for the molestation so that his mother could understand his past conduct. I agree with Father Vaillancourt's assessment. Not surprisingly, David Silmsen did not want to meet with Father Charles MacDonald, the perpetrator who he alleged had sexually abused him.

Church officials offered David Silmsen psychological counselling to help him deal with his personal problems.

After the meeting and deposition of Mr. Silmsen, Father Vaillancourt, Monsignor McDougald, and Jacques Leduc discussed his complaint. Details had not been provided by Mr. Silmsen on some issues. They thought that David Silmsen either did not remember these details, was fabricating the complaint, or was simply refusing to provide the requested information. It did occur to Father Vaillancourt that Mr. Silmsen might not be comfortable sharing this information with the Diocese lawyer and clergy who were priests in the Diocese with Father Charles MacDonald. Monsignor McDougald suggested that contact be made with Father MacDonald's lawyer, Malcolm MacDonald, and possibly the Crown. Father Vaillancourt's notes say:

After he left, we shared on what we thought of his statement. We felt that some details were not given possibly because he didn't want to or that they had slipped his mind or that perhaps many things had been dreamed up. It was thought that Fr. Charles would never walk around in a group only dressed in his underwear. It was decided that we contact Fr. Charles' lawyer and he could talk with the accused and possibly the Crown Attorney.

Similarly, Jacques Leduc stated in a 1994 document to Diocese lawyer Peter Annis:

After hearing the complainant's story, we, as members of the Committee, agreed that his anguish appeared real and that he was extremely emotional by what occurred. We felt that he was either telling the truth or was one of the best actors possible. There was no doubt that we had some sympathy for his situation, but had a problem with his credibility as a result of his refusal to provide details or occurrences.

It was decided that Monsignor McDougald would report the meeting with David Silmsen to the Bishop.

There was no discussion regarding the preparation of a written report. According to the 1992 protocol, a written report of the meeting was to be prepared by the designate, who in this case was Monsignor McDougald. This was not done. Nor was a file opened as mandated by the 1992 protocol. Bishop LaRocque acknowledged that this violated the protocol. He also conceded that it was contrary to the principles of transparency and openness. Bishop LaRocque was well aware at that time that From Pain to Hope stressed the importance of openness and transparency. The Bishop also acknowledged that in the past, the Church had not always been forthright or transparent in cases of sexual abuse by priests and other clergy.

None of the Diocese officials at the February 9, 1993, Silmsen meeting suggested speaking to the Bishop about the removal of Father Charles MacDonald from his position as parish priest at St. Andrew's Church. They knew that the priest continued to have contact with children and youths. Nor did Bishop LaRocque consider removing Father MacDonald from active ministry. He claimed that he did not have the "moral certitude" that Father MacDonald had committed the acts alleged by Mr. Silmsen.

Bishop LaRocque was concerned about the perception of scandal in the Church. As discussed, From Pain to Hope describes how fear of scandal by Church officials in the past has resulted in inappropriate responses to allegations of sexual abuse:

... The fear of scandal often conditions our instinctive reactions of inadvertently protecting the perpetrators and a certain image of the Church or the institution we represent, rather than the children, who are powerless to defend themselves.

Bishop LaRocque acknowledged that fear of scandal raised in him an instinctive reaction of protection of the Church. He agreed in his testimony with the following statement in From Pain to Hope:

... The ideal breeding ground for the development and repetition of child sexual abuse is a general conspiracy of silence, motivated by the fear of scandal and of major repercussions for the institutions directly or indirectly concerned.

From about February 1993 until August 1993, the Silmsers matter essentially remained dormant.

Pressure on the Bishop to Settle With David Silmsers: A Difficult August Meeting With Bishop LaRocque

In a call in August 1993, Malcolm MacDonald, Father MacDonald's lawyer, told Jacques Leduc, the Diocese lawyer, that he wished to meet with the Bishop to discuss the David Silmsers matter. On August 25, 1993, Malcolm MacDonald and Jacques Leduc met with Bishop LaRocque in his office. There are no notes of the meeting. As I discuss in this section, it is noteworthy that there do not appear to be written documents or recorded notes of many of the discussions and meetings that took place with Diocese officials regarding the Silmsers matter. The Bishop testified that at this time, both Jacques Leduc and Malcolm MacDonald "were putting pressure on me" to settle the case.

According to Bishop LaRocque, these two lawyers argued that the benefits of entering into a monetary settlement with Mr. Silmsers were avoiding scandal in the Diocese and ensuring that Father Charles MacDonald's reputation was not adversely affected. It would enable Father MacDonald to continue his ministry. The two lawyers also maintained that this had been done in other dioceses of the Catholic Church. They told the Bishop that they thought David Silmsers would agree to a civil settlement.

Bishop LaRocque was initially resistant to the prospect of a civil settlement. The confidentiality of the settlement also concerned him. He understood that by settling, David Silmsers would be abandoning his right to sue the Diocese and also would be compelled to sign an undertaking not to disclose the settlement. The Bishop was worried about the perception that the Diocese was offering money to an alleged abuse victim for the purpose of silencing him. As Bishop LaRocque said, "[M]y thought process was that it would appear that the Diocese was giving this money in order to buy off and to shut up the victim."

Bishop LaRocque asked whether a civil settlement by the Diocese with Mr. Silmsers would have an impact on the criminal investigation by the police. He testified that the lawyers assured him that a civil settlement would have no effect on the criminal process. However, Jacques Leduc conceded at the hearings that it was his hope that the civil settlement would resolve all matters, including the criminal issues surrounding this case.

Bishop LaRocque knew that a prime purpose of David Silmsen's contact with the Church in December 1992 and his disclosure of the sexual abuse, was to obtain a written apology to give to his mother to explain his past behaviour. Yet no discussion took place between the Bishop, Jacques Leduc, and Malcolm MacDonald regarding an apology to Mr. Silmsen by Father Charles MacDonald or the Church. Nor did the Diocese lawyer, testified Bishop LaRocque, discuss at that time whether a proposed monetary settlement with David Silmsen would be covered by insurance or whether the Church insurer should be notified. At the August 1993 meeting, there was also no discussion about the amount of money that would be offered to Mr. Silmsen.

According to Bishop LaRocque, "a very heated argument" between him and the lawyers took place at the August meeting. Malcolm MacDonald and Jacques Leduc pressured him to agree to a civil settlement but the Bishop was not persuaded: "[T]hey were arguing strongly that I should do so, and I absolutely refused."

Mr. Leduc was angry at the meeting because Bishop LaRocque would not agree to the civil settlement. He thought a monetary settlement with Mr. Silmsen would help to "resolve a messy situation," protect Father Charles MacDonald's reputation, and avoid legal costs if David Silmsen decided to sue the Diocese. He said the following in a statement to Mr. Annis:

The Bishop was adamant against settling. He was concerned about being seen as covering up and felt that the truth should come out in the criminal proceedings if that was the case. At the end of the meeting he told us that the Diocese would not participate in any settlement.

I left the meeting feeling very angry. I thought from my experience in these matters that settlement represented a good opportunity to resolve a messy situation, to protect the reputation of the priest, which would be destroyed by any legal proceedings, regardless of his innocence, and to avoid incurring unnecessary costs in defending the civil suit.

In the spring or summer of 1993, Jacques Leduc had learned that there had been other complaints of inappropriate sexual behaviour by Father Charles MacDonald in the past. Monsignor McDougald had conveyed this information to the Diocese lawyer. But Mr. Leduc did not raise this issue with the Bishop either at the late August meeting or at a second meeting with the Bishop in early September 1993, when they discussed the prospect of a civil settlement. I would have expected a lawyer concerned with the best interests of his client to have advised the Bishop of the existence of these other claimants, who also alleged they had been victims of inappropriate sexual behaviour.

Advice for Bishop LaRocque at the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops

A couple of days after the meeting in August 1993 with lawyers Malcolm MacDonald and Jacques Leduc, Bishop LaRocque attended the annual meeting of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops (CCCCB). As mentioned, the report From Pain to Hope had been released the previous year. It stressed the principles of transparency and openness by the Church, the need for the Diocese to conduct investigations of allegations of sexual abuse, notification to the appropriate authorities, and compassion for the victims of abuse. From Pain to Hope contained the following statement: “We would like to see our Church guided by a spirit of openness and truth when responding to allegations of child sexual abuse by a priest or a religious.”

There had been allegations of sexual abuse by clergy in Newfoundland and in Ontario at that time, some of which had been publicized in the media. In a closed session at the CCCC, child abuse by clergy and the responsibilities of bishops in such cases were discussed. Bishop LaRocque decided to raise the Silmsner matter at this closed session, without identifying the priest or the alleged victim. Bishop LaRocque told the bishops that he had a case in his Diocese in which a person alleged that he had been abused twenty years earlier by a priest. He explained that the Diocese lawyer as well as the lawyer for the priest were trying to convince him to settle the matter by offering money to the alleged victim. About ninety bishops attended this closed session. Bishop LaRocque was strongly urged by his fellow bishops not to enter a monetary settlement. As the Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall said at the hearings, the bishops “advised me against it because it would be seen as ... trying to buy the silence” of the victim. The bishops agreed with the position Bishop LaRocque had taken in his first meeting with lawyers Jacques Leduc and Malcolm MacDonald a few days earlier. But as Bishop LaRocque acknowledged at the Inquiry, “My regret has been ever since that I didn’t keep the same decision in the second meeting.”

A Second Meeting With the Bishop: Agreement to Settle Civilly With David Silmsner

Father MacDonald’s lawyer, Malcolm MacDonald, was intent on pursuing a civil settlement with the Diocese. He contacted Jacques Leduc after the August 25, 1993, meeting, and asked the Diocese lawyer to arrange a second meeting with Bishop LaRocque to further discuss the Silmsner case. He told Mr. Leduc that he had contacted Mr. Silmsner, who was prepared to agree to a settlement for $32,000.

A meeting with Jacques Leduc and Malcolm MacDonald was arranged for September 1, 1993, after Bishop LaRocque returned from the CCCB. The Bishop, in hindsight, regretted that he had not asked the bursar, the Reverend Gordon Bryan, to attend this meeting, at which he was ultimately persuaded by the two lawyers to enter a civil settlement with David Silmser. Again, there are no notes of this meeting.

The lawyers told the Bishop that David Silmser needed money for psychological treatment and counselling. Bishop LaRocque agreed that an offer to provide financial assistance to Mr. Silmser for counselling and psychological therapy should be made, as the Diocese had done so in the past for some of the sexual assault victims of Father Gilles Deslauriers. According to the Bishop's recollection, Malcolm MacDonald said that contact had been made with Mr. Silmser, who needed $20,000 for counselling costs and $12,000 as compensation for damages for the alleged sexual abuse. Malcolm MacDonald said he would find the other $12,000, but did not provide details. The Bishop was not told how that amount was arrived at, nor that Malcolm MacDonald had negotiated this sum with David Silmser, who did not have legal representation when this discussion of the settlement costs occurred. Both Malcolm MacDonald and Jacques Leduc were anxious for the Diocese to enter this settlement. Mr. Leduc "in very forceful terms" tried to persuade the Bishop to agree to the settlement. It is noteworthy that the Diocese lawyer did not suggest that payment for psychological treatment for David Silmser could be made on a "without prejudice" basis.¹⁶ This in fact had been done for victims of Father Deslauriers.

Bishop LaRocque testified that his principal concern, which he stressed to the two lawyers, was that the civil settlement entered into by Mr. Silmser have no effect on the criminal investigation by the police or on the criminal process as a whole. At the hearings, the Bishop maintained that he was persuaded to enter the settlement on the basis that the Church needed to fulfil its undertaking to pay Mr. Silmser for counselling and psychological treatment. The Bishop also conceded that he had agreed to the civil settlement because he wanted Father MacDonald to continue exercising his ministry. The lawyers also discussed with the Bishop the importance of avoiding scandal with respect to the Church and ensuring that Father MacDonald's reputation was not adversely affected. Bishop LaRocque knew that Mr. Silmser would be asked by the lawyers to sign a release to the effect that in exchange for the monetary payment, he would not sue the Diocese. He was also aware that a confidentiality provision would be included in the settlement documents to prevent Mr. Silmser from discussing the settlement with third parties.

16. "Without prejudice" means without implying an admission of liability or without abandoning a claim, privilege or right.

The Bishop understood that the civil settlement would take place soon after this meeting. “That is where,” Bishop LaRocque said, “I made my mistake. I should have consulted with Mr. Bryan ... and I suppose Monsignor McDougald since he was my delegate. But I did not do so and I left that in the hands of the lawyers.”

It was Bishop LaRocque’s understanding that the total settlement with David Silmsen would be in the amount of $32,000: $20,000 for counselling to be paid by the Diocese and $12,000 that Malcolm MacDonald would obtain from other sources. This was contrary to the information conveyed by the Bishop to Chief Claude Shaver of the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) that the funds were from three parties. A cheque in the amount of $27,000, not $20,000, was sent to Mr. Leduc’s law firm from the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall on September 2, 1993. The contributors and the amounts in the settlement were never satisfactorily explained at the Inquiry.

Bishop LaRocque thought that it was necessary to receive approval from the finance committee of the Diocese for payments that exceeded $10,000. In fact, the Bishop was incorrect; committee approval for payments that exceeded a specified monetary amount was applied to the parishes, not the Diocese. The finance committee consisted of priests and lay persons who advised the bursar on the finances of the Diocese. Bishop LaRocque believed that if this permission had been sought, the committee would not have approved the civil settlement negotiated by Malcolm MacDonald and Jacques Leduc on behalf of the Diocese. The Bishop thought, in hindsight, that he should have sought the advice of the bursar and the financial committee before the cheque from the Diocese was issued.

Bishop LaRocque testified that he had no involvement in the preparation of the documents for the civil settlement. He knew that the release would be drafted but did not know who was responsible for preparing it, nor its precise wording. The Bishop had made it clear to the lawyers that the civil settlement should have no effect on the ongoing criminal process. Bishop LaRocque never asked Diocese lawyer Jacques Leduc to review the civil settlement documents before they were signed by Mr. Silmsen. The Bishop testified that he would never have authorized the settlement with David Silmsen if he had known that the documents contained a clause that imposed a halt to the pursuit of criminal proceedings.

Jacques Leduc testified that he advised the Bishop that $32,000 was a good settlement and that it would cost that amount or more for the Diocese to defend such an action civilly.

Jacques Leduc knew from Monsignor McDougald prior to the September 1 meeting with the Bishop that there had been other complaints of inappropriate sexual conduct by Father MacDonald. Yet the Diocese lawyer does not recall discussing these complaints at the meeting with the Bishop, at which he argued forcefully for the Bishop to enter a civil settlement with David Silmsen. It should have been evident to Mr. Leduc that had he provided this information to Bishop LaRocque, the Bishop may not have agreed to the settlement. The Bishop claimed that he became aware of the other alleged victims only in October 1993, when Chief Shaver met with him in his office.

Despite the fact that Bishop LaRocque had raised the Silmsers case at the CCCB and had been advised not to agree to a civil settlement, the Bishop of Alexandria-Cornwall succumbed to the pressure of Father Charles MacDonald's lawyer and Diocese lawyer Jacques Leduc. "I've regretted it ever since," said Bishop LaRocque in his testimony at the Inquiry.

As I discuss later in this Report, Jacques Leduc claimed that prior to the signing of the release, Malcolm MacDonald told him that he had advised the local Crown, Murray MacDonald, about the preparation of the civil settlement and that the Crown Attorney had no concerns with it. Mr. Leduc also testified that he saw Murray MacDonald in the hallway of the Provincial Court, probably in the last week of August 1993, and that the Crown confirmed that Malcolm MacDonald had apprised him of the proposed settlement between the Church and Mr. Silmsers and "he had no problems with this." By contrast, Murray MacDonald testified that this discussion did not take place at the courthouse but rather that Mr. Leduc telephoned him to inform him of the settlement. The Crown attorney said he made it clear to Mr. Leduc that the criminal process would continue. This is discussed further in the chapter on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Preparation of the Release Signed by David Silmsers

Mr. Leduc left the Bishop's office with Malcolm MacDonald, with instructions to proceed with the civil settlement. The lawyer for the Diocese discussed with Malcolm MacDonald the documents that needed to be drafted. He testified that he also told Mr. MacDonald that David Silmsers must obtain independent legal advice prior to signing the release and the undertaking not to disclose. Mr. Leduc told Father MacDonald's lawyer that a certificate of independent advice should be attached to the documents signed by David Silmsers.

Mr. Leduc testified that it was agreed that Malcolm MacDonald would prepare the civil settlement documents. But Mr. Leduc received a call from Father MacDonald's lawyer requesting his help, as Malcolm MacDonald practised principally in the area of criminal law. Mr. Leduc had previously acted for victims of abuse by clergy in Quebec, and agreed to search for a legal precedent that could assist in the drafting of the release and the undertaking not to disclose.

Mr. Leduc testified that he dictated a draft of the release, which was typed by his secretary. There was no reference to withdrawing from the criminal investigation. He sent the document to Malcolm MacDonald by fax, who returned it with changes. The document altered by Mr. MacDonald contained references to criminal proceedings, which Mr. Leduc stroked out. Mr. Leduc testified that he wanted all references to criminal matters removed from the document as Bishop LaRocque had made it clear in his instructions that the settlement was in no way to affect the criminal investigation or criminal proceedings. Mr. Leduc stated that he called Malcolm MacDonald to confirm that all references to criminal proceedings were deleted from the document. Mr. Leduc knew that inserting a clause that impeded the criminal process would be void and against public policy.

Mr. Leduc also testified that the document he drafted was not the document that was signed by David Silmsen. He testified that the release he prepared did not contain a clause that referred to the criminal process. However, it is essential to note that the document signed by David Silmsen and witnessed by his lawyer, Sean Adams, on September 2, 1993, contained a clause that stipulated that Mr. Silmsen could not undertake “any legal proceedings, civil or criminal” and was to “immediately terminate any actions that may now be in process.”

It is important to note that Mr. Leduc gave different accounts of this in a January 1994 press release, a February 1994 statement that he prepared, and an August 1994 interview with the OPP. For example, in the January press release, Mr. Leduc said that he did not see the offending section. In the February statement, Mr. Leduc said that he had prepared a draft release that did not contain a reference to a release against criminal actions, that Malcolm MacDonald had made amendments to the document, and that Mr. Leduc had then called Mr. MacDonald to ask him to ensure that references to criminal matters were removed. When Mr. Leduc was interviewed by the OPP in August 1994, he said that the word “criminal” may have appeared but that he did not notice it. Mr. Leduc further stated in the OPP interview that had he noticed the reference to criminal matters, he would have asked Malcolm MacDonald to remove it.

I find it curious that Mr. Leduc did not open a file at his law office for the Silmsen matter. Mr. Leduc claimed that he has no notes of meetings or discussions that took place with respect to the Silmsen settlement. When asked how he knew how much time was spent on the file for the purposes of billing, he replied that he would “guesstimate” and rely on his memory.

Did Malcolm MacDonald, Jacques Leduc, or Sean Adams Contact Duncan MacDonald at the Time of the Settlement With David Silmsen?

Karen Derochie worked as a legal assistant for Cornwall lawyer Duncan MacDonald from approximately late 1992 or early 1993 until 1997. Duncan MacDonald’s legal practice was predominantly real estate and estate law. He was a sole practitioner.

Ms Derochie's employment with Duncan MacDonald ended in 1997 when Mr. MacDonald suffered a stroke. Mr. MacDonald died in 2000.

When Karen Derochie testified at the Inquiry, she recalled a meeting Duncan MacDonald had with Malcolm MacDonald and Jacques Leduc. According to Ms Derochie, the meeting took place in Duncan MacDonald's office and lasted about ten to fifteen minutes. It should be noted that Ms Derochie was familiar with both Mr. Adams and Mr. Leduc. Ms Derochie could not remember the precise date of this meeting but recalled that it was in either late 1992 or in 1993, shortly after she began working at Mr. MacDonald's law office. Ms Derochie testified that when the meeting concluded, Duncan MacDonald's face was red and he was visibly upset, unusual behaviour for her boss. According to Ms Derochie, he uttered something to the effect that "some things shake your faith in institutions or what you believe in." He also told Ms Derochie that if Mr. Sean Adams telephoned the office, he did not want to respond to the call. When Garry Guzzo testified at the Inquiry, he discussed a call he received from Duncan MacDonald regarding the Church's involvement in a financial settlement. Duncan MacDonald, he stated, was concerned about the settlement and sought the MPP's assistance. Duncan MacDonald wanted the government to look into the matter. As Mr. Guzzo related in his evidence, Duncan MacDonald said "the Church was involved, that we as Catholics should be concerned and I as a Conservative should be concerned."

Ms Derochie testified that she did in fact receive calls from Sean Adams either that day or the next, and conveyed the message that Duncan MacDonald was unavailable.

Karen Derochie further stated that a few weeks after Duncan MacDonald had the meeting with Jacques Leduc and Malcolm MacDonald, four people arrived at his office. They had not arranged an appointment. These four people, Ms Derochie testified, were Malcolm MacDonald, Jacques Leduc, Sean Adams, and an adult male whom Ms Derochie did not know. She asked the men to wait as Duncan MacDonald was not in the office at this time. When he arrived and observed these men, Duncan MacDonald promptly went upstairs to an office and called Ms Derochie. He told her that he did not intend to meet with these individuals and that they should be asked to leave the premises. This was the first time Ms Derochie had encountered such a situation. She complied with Duncan MacDonald's instructions and asked the men to leave the lawyer's office.

The testimony of Karen Derochie was inconsistent with the evidence of Jacques Leduc and Sean Adams. Mr. Leduc testified that he never went to Duncan MacDonald's office with Malcolm MacDonald. Nor, he said, did he visit Duncan MacDonald's office with Sean Adams and David Silmser. He maintained that he never went to Duncan MacDonald's office to discuss the Silmser settlement. According to Mr. Leduc, the events described by Karen Derochie simply did not happen.

Sean Adams also testified that he did not attend a meeting at Duncan MacDonald's office relating to the Silmsers matter. Nor was he aware of a meeting between Duncan MacDonald, Malcolm MacDonald, and Jacques Leduc in the summer of 1993. Sean Adams also stated that he had no recollection of attempting to contact Duncan MacDonald by telephone. It is not for me to determine if and when these meetings took place but to point out some of the evidence that would have been available to explore had an in-depth investigation taken place.

Sean Adams' Involvement in the Silmsers Matter, Settlement Documents Are Signed

Sean Adams testified that he was reluctant to act for David Silmsers when he received his call. Mr. Silmsers explained that the Church was settling with him civilly in a case of sexual abuse by a priest but that the settlement funds would not be released unless he had a lawyer representing him to give independent legal advice. He asked Mr. Adams to meet him the following day at Malcolm MacDonald's office. Mr. Adams at that time practised solely as a solicitor. He testified that he told Mr. Silmsers he would recommend another lawyer, but Mr. Silmsers was anxious to settle the matter and wanted Mr. Adams to represent him. Sean Adams did not disclose to Mr. Silmsers that he had previously represented clergy in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. For example, in June 1992, Mr. Adams had done legal work for Father Gary Ostler at St. Columban's Church and also for priests at his parish, St. Clement's.

Mr. Adams decided to discuss the Silmsers request with Tom Swabey, a senior partner at his law firm. Mr. Swabey had previously done work for the Anglican Church. The senior partner suggested that Mr. Adams make it clear to David Silmsers that his retainer for independent legal advice was limited to witnessing Mr. Silmsers's signature on the settlement documents and giving him advice with respect to the release and undertaking not to disclose.

Mr. Adams agreed to represent Mr. Silmsers. He testified that there was urgency in Mr. Silmsers's voice and he wanted to help him.

Mr. Leduc testified that about a day before the civil settlement documents were signed, he became aware that Sean Adams was providing independent legal advice to David Silmsers. Mr. Leduc knew that Mr. Adams had previously done legal work for the Diocese. But Mr. Leduc did not raise with the Bishop or others that Sean Adams could possibly be in a conflict of interest with regard to representing Mr. Silmsers in this matter.

Mr. Adams met with Mr. Silmsers privately in Malcolm MacDonald's office on September 2, 1993. Mr. Adams read the release and undertaking not to disclose, as well as the certificate of independent legal advice. These documents had been prepared prior to Mr. Adams' arrival at the office:

FULL RELEASE AND UNDERTAKING NOT TO DISCLOSE

FROM: David Silmsers, Hamlet of Hammond, in the Counties of Prescott & Russell

TO: Father Charles MacDonald and to the Most Reverend Eugene
P. Larocque, Bishop, and to his successors and assigns, and to The Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation for the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall in Ontario.

1. In consideration of the payment to me, of the sum of—Thirty Two Thousand—($32,000.00)—00/100 DOLLARS receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, I, David Silmsers, of the Hamlet of Hammond, Province of Ontario, ... hereby release and forever discharge Father Charles MacDonald, The Most Reverend Eugene P. Larocque and the Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation for the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall in Ontario, from any and all actions, causes of actions, claims and demands, for damages incurred or to be incurred, foreseen and unforeseen, for any loss, or injury, both physical, emotional or other, howsoever arising, which heretofore may have been, or may hereafter be sustained by me in consequence of any conduct, behavior or act done to me directly or indirectly by Father Charles MacDonald or by any other agent or employee of The Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation for the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall in Ontario, including all damage, loss or injury not now known or anticipated but which may arise in future and all effects and consequences thereof.
2. In addition to the aforesaid release and for the said consideration, I hereby undertake not to take any legal proceedings, civil or criminal, against any of the parties hereto and will immediately terminate any actions that may now be in process.
3. In addition to the aforesaid release and for the said consideration I further hereby undertake not to disclose or permit disclosure directly or indirectly of any of the terms of this settlement or of any of the events alleged to have occurred. Breach of this undertaking will constitute a breach of settlement agreement as evidenced by this release and I will refund all amounts paid to me forthwith.

4. And for the said consideration, I further agree not to make a claim or take any proceeding or participate in same, against any other person or corporation who might claim contribution or indemnity under the provisions of The Negligence Act and the Amendments thereto from the person, persons or corporations discharged by this release.
5. It is further understood and agreed that the said payment is deemed to be no admission whatsoever of liability on the part of the said Father Charles MacDonald, The Most Reverend Eugene P. Larocque, Bishop, his successors and assigns and The Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation for the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall in Ontario.
6. I hereby authorize and direct the releasees to pay the said consideration to me.
7. I also acknowledge having received independent legal advice prior to executing this full and final release as evidenced by the Certificate of Independent Legal Advice signed by my solicitor and myself, attached hereto.

IN WITNESS whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this 2nd day of September, 1993.

David Silmser

CERTIFICATE OF INDEPENDENT LEGAL ADVICE

I, SEAN ADAMS, of the City of Cornwall, County of Stormont, Barrister and Solicitor, DO HEREBY CERTIFY that I was this day consulted in my professional capacity by David Silmser, named in the annexed Full Release and Undertaking not to Disclose, dated the 2nd day of September, 1993 as to his obligations and rights under the said Full Release and Undertaking not to Disclose, that I acted solely for him explained fully to him the nature and effect of the said Full Release and Undertaking not to Disclose and he did acknowledge and declare that he fully understood the nature and effect thereof and did execute the said document in my presence and did acknowledge and declare and it appeared to me that he was executing the said document of his own volition and without fear, threats, compulsion or influence by the releasees or any other person or persons.

DATED at Cornwall, this 2nd day of September 1993.

Sean Adams

ACKNOWLEDGMENT

I, hereby acknowledge that Sean Adams fully explained the nature of the Full Release and Undertaking not to Disclose and the effect of my signing it. I confirm that I understand the nature and effect of the document, I have executed it freely and voluntarily, I have given complete disclosure and I am satisfied with the disclosure provided by the release and confirmed by my solicitor.

DATED at Cornwall, this 2nd day of September, 1993.

David Silmsr

ACKNOWLEDGMENT

I hereby acknowledge that I have retained Sean Adams only to review and explain the nature of the full Release and Undertaking not to Disclose to me and that I have not sought legal advice from Sean Adams with respect to the amount of compensation I am receiving from the Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation for the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall in Ontario, nor have I disclosed to him the full facts concerning my claim against the said Diocese, and as such I hereby release Sean Adams and his firm for any actions or claims I may have should I determine that the compensation paid to me is insufficient.

Dated at Cornwall, Ontario, this 2nd day of September, 1993.

David Silmsr

Mr. Adams testified that he reviewed the settlement documents with Mr. Silmsers. The amount of the settlement seemed low to the lawyer.

Mr. Adams was told that Mr. Silmsers was also required to sign the following document, addressed to Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet and Constable Heidi Sebalj of the Cornwall Police Service, before the settlement money would be released. Mr. Adams testified that it was his belief that Malcolm MacDonald had drafted the following document:

TO: Cornwall City Police
AND TO: Det. Sgt. Luc Brunet
AND TO: Cst. Heidi Sebalj

I, DAVID SILMSERS, hereby states as follows:—

I made a complaint with Cornwall City Police concerning Charles MacDonald. I received a civil settlement to my satisfaction and before accepting it, I received independent legal advice.

*Now, I do not want to proceed further with any criminal charges.
You may take this statement as a direction to you to close your file and stop further proceedings as far as I am concerned.*

DATED at Cornwall this 2nd day of September, 1993.

David Silmsers

Malcolm MacDonald made it clear that Mr. Silmsers was required to go to the Cornwall police station to advise the police that he did not wish to proceed with the criminal charges.

Sean Adams understood that if Mr. Silmsers signed the documents, he was agreeing not to pursue either a civil or criminal action against Father MacDonald. Mr. Adams claimed that it did not occur to him that the settlement document his client was asked to sign was not, in fact, a legal document. He testified that he had never seen a settlement document that contained a provision requiring the termination of a criminal matter. Thus, Mr. Adams did not advise his client that the release he was asked to sign was illegal.

On September 2, 1993, Malcolm MacDonald wrote this letter to Mr. Adams:

Dear Sir:

Please find enclosed my trust account cheque payable to David Simser [sic] in the amount of $32,000.00, being the settlement that he signed today in connection with Father Charles MacDonald and Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

This cheque is being given to you and to be held in escrow until we are advised by the City Police that David Simser [sic] has attended at the Police Station and he advised them that he does not want to proceed with any of these charges.

Yours truly,

A.M. MACDONALD

Mr. Adams testified that in retrospect, it would have been “wise” for him to inform Mr. Silmsen that he could not represent him in this file with the Diocese. There were other lawyers in Cornwall who practised in this area of law, who knew more about settlement documents of this nature, and who had not previously acted for priests in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. Mr. Adams reiterated that he was simply trying to help Mr. Silmsen obtain his money so that he could begin the healing process. Moreover, Mr. Adams stated that, in hindsight, a warning light should probably have gone off regarding the provision that required Mr. Silmsen to terminate his involvement in the criminal action: childhood sexual abuse by a priest, a person in a position of trust and authority.

Instructions to Bursar of Diocese to Issue a Cheque in the Amount of $27,000

On September 2, 1993, Mr. Leduc instructed the bursar for the Diocese, the Reverend Gordon Bryan, to write a cheque in the amount of $27,000, payable to his firm in trust. When the Reverend asked the purpose of the cheque, Mr. Leduc responded that it was for a claim brought against Father Charles MacDonald. The bursar then asked about the nature of the claim, to which Mr. Leduc replied, “You really don’t want to know.” Gordon Bryan considered the lawyer’s response unusual as the bursar was accustomed to being briefed about financial matters involving the Diocese. It was evident to the Reverend that this matter was confidential. He understood that this cheque was for the settlement of a claim against the Diocese.

It was Gordon Bryan's practice to seek Bishop LaRocque's authorization for cheques issued by the Diocese in such amounts. He met with Bishop LaRocque to discuss this matter. When the bursar asked Bishop LaRocque if he approved the $27,000 payment, the Bishop replied, "Reluctantly, yes." The Bishop did not provide further details.

The Reverend Bryan issued the cheque to Mr. Leduc on September 2, 1993, in the amount of $27,000. The payee on the cheque was Jacques Leduc's law firm, Leduc, Lafrance-Cardinal.

On September 2, 1993, Mr. Leduc received a cheque from the bursar in the amount of $27,000. He deposited this cheque from the Diocese into his trust account and then issued a cheque in that amount to Malcolm MacDonald in trust. Mr. Leduc testified that he assumed from his discussions with Malcolm MacDonald that Father Charles MacDonald would contribute $5,000.

Mr. Silmsier received a cheque on Malcolm MacDonald's trust account for the total amount of the civil settlement, $32,000. It was not apparent from the face of the cheque that $27,000 had been paid by the Diocese.

After Mr. Silmsier signed the release and undertaking and was given the cheque, Malcolm MacDonald brought the executed documents to Mr. Leduc's office in a brown envelope. Mr. Leduc testified that he did not read the executed documents. When asked at the hearings why he failed to review the documents, his response was, "There is no excuse professionally that I can give for that."

Mr. Leduc asked Gordon Bryan to pick up the release and undertaking and place the documents in a confidential file. As I discussed in Chapter 7 of this Report, Malcolm MacDonald was subsequently charged by the Ontario Provincial Police with attempt to obstruct justice regarding the release signed by Mr. Silmsier. Mr. MacDonald pleaded guilty and on September 12, 1995, he received an absolute discharge from the Ontario Court of Justice Provincial Division. This is further discussed in the Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

On September 2, 1993, the day he signed the release, David Silmsier wrote a note to the Cornwall Police Service to the effect that he had received a civil settlement to his satisfaction and did not wish to proceed further with any criminal charges against Father MacDonald. This is discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service.

About one week after receiving the cheque from the Reverend Bryan, Mr. Leduc gave him a brown envelope that contained the settlement documents. On the envelope was a label addressed to Jacques Leduc of Leduc, Lafrance-Cardinal, 340 Second Street East, Cornwall, with the notation "Personal & Confidential" and Malcolm MacDonald's return address in the corner of the envelope. Mr. Leduc explained to Gordon Bryan that this was a full release, and the bursar assumed that the money had been received. Mr. Leduc instructed him to seal the document well and to inscribe on the envelope “Private & Confidential—To Be Opened by Bishop Only.” The Reverend Bryan placed tape on the sealed envelope and filed it in the office. He testified that he did not notify Bishop LaRocque that he had received the settlement documents. He states that in retrospect, he ought to have given these highly confidential settlement documents to the Bishop to review.

Cornwall Police Meet With Bishop LaRocque

Five or six weeks after Bishop LaRocque agreed to the civil settlement with David Silmsen, Cornwall Chief of Police Shaver and Staff Sergeant Brunet met with the Bishop. As I discuss in Chapter 6, Chief Shaver and Staff Sergeant Brunet had met on October 7, 1993, with the Papal Nuncio in Ottawa, who had suggested that the CPS arrange a meeting with Bishop LaRocque. This was the first time the Bishop had been contacted by the CPS since David Silmsen had made his complaint to the police in December 1992. The Bishop had been told by Monsignor McDougald that Mr. Silmsen had contacted the police and had alleged that he had been sexually abused by Father MacDonald in his youth.

Bishop LaRocque met with the Cornwall police officers in his office. He told Chief Shaver and Staff Sergeant Brunet that he had authorized a payment of $32,000 to David Silmsen and that the settlement had been negotiated with Malcolm MacDonald and Jacques Leduc. The settlement documents were not reviewed at the meeting. Chief Shaver expressed his discontent that the Church had failed to contact the police. As Chief Shaver testified, “I also expressed my displeasure that the Church had not contacted the police during their negotiations and that surely the Church was interested in justice and not the possibility of hampering a police investigation.” The Bishop replied that Father Charles MacDonald had denied the allegations of sexual abuse and that he believed the priest had not committed these acts. Chief Shaver told Bishop LaRocque that David Silmsen was not the only person who had alleged abuse by the priest. He informed the Bishop that two other people had claimed that Father MacDonald had engaged in sexually inappropriate behaviour with them.

Bishop LaRocque became visibly upset when he learned that there were additional victims who had alleged they had been sexually abused. This changed his view about the seriousness of the situation. Mr. Silmsen’s complaint had become more credible to the Bishop, as others were making similar allegations against the priest. In his testimony, Bishop LaRocque did not deny that he may have told Chief Shaver at the meeting that he had made a large mistake in the payment of the money.

Bishop LaRocque testified that he met with Father Charles MacDonald that evening. The priest denied that he had sexually assaulted Mr. Silmsen or other people. He stated that if he had sexual relations, it was always on a consensual basis. Father MacDonald then conceded that he had had sexual relations with more than one person.

Bishop LaRocque called Chief Shaver that night. He relayed his discussion with Father MacDonald to the police chief. According to Chief Shaver, the Bishop said the priest had admitted the assault, and then abruptly said that it was not an assault but rather an isolated homosexual relationship. This is discussed in further detail in Chapter 6. It is noteworthy that the Bishop's account of his conversation with Father MacDonald differed when he spoke to the CAS executive director on October 12, 1993, and to the OPP when he was interviewed in 1994.

Bishop LaRocque was very upset. Father MacDonald was asked to leave the parish and was sent to Southdown two days later for an assessment. Approximately ten months after David Silmsen had disclosed to the Church that Father Charles MacDonald had sexually abused him, the priest was finally removed from his ministry.

Monsignor McDougald had known about previous complaints of sexually inappropriate behaviour by Father MacDonald before the Silmsen disclosure. He knew in late 1991 or early 1992 that the priest had gone on a holiday with a twenty-eight-year-old man and had made sexual advances.

The Children's Aid Society Arranges to Meet the Bishop

A few days after Bishop LaRocque met with the Chief of Police and Staff Sergeant Brunet, he was contacted by the Children's Aid Society (CAS). On October 12, 1993, the Bishop met at his office with CAS Executive Director Richard Abell, Bill Carriere, and Angelo Towndale. Bishop LaRocque had been told by Chief Shaver that the CAS was aware of the Silmsen allegations of sexual abuse and that the agency was initiating an investigation.

Mr. Abell explained to the Bishop that the CAS was concerned about abuse of children and that the agency intended to investigate the Silmsen matter. The CAS wished to interview the altar boys and parishioners in Father MacDonald's parish. It wanted to ensure that Father MacDonald was "out of the parish" during its investigation. Bishop LaRocque was surprised by this request. He told the CAS officials that he wanted to monitor the investigation. He was worried about the publicity associated with the CAS investigation and "the harm that would be done to the faith of the people." Although the 1992 From Pain to Hope report had stressed the principles of transparency and openness, Bishop LaRocque was clearly resistant to the CAS investigation and worried about the effects of it on parishioners and on the Diocese as a whole. Mr. Abell's notes state, "We say we want him out of the parish—to allow us to investigate—Bishop very reluctant—finally agrees to two weeks.” As Bishop LaRocque tried to explain at the hearings, “[A]t that time it was still a very confusing type of situation.”

Father MacDonald was at Southdown undergoing an assessment. Mr. Abell told the Bishop that it was his understanding that David Silmsner had contacted the Ottawa Diocese and that the clergy who spoke to Mr. Silmsner at that time had found him credible. When the CAS officials asked for a copy of the letter from Monsignor Schonenbach, Bishop LaRocque refused, claiming the correspondence was “confidential.” At the Inquiry, the Bishop could not give a reasonable explanation for his reluctance, but stated that if this request were made now, he would be much more forthcoming with documents and would provide a copy of such a letter to the CAS for its sexual abuse investigation.

Bishop LaRocque told the CAS officials that “he didn’t want to pay off Silmsner” but had been “advised to do so by Jacques Leduc,” the Diocese lawyer. According to Mr. Abell’s notes of the meeting, the Bishop said that Father MacDonald was “strongly denying Silmsner allegation” but “admitting to being a homosexual.” The Bishop stressed that such acts had not occurred for the past four years and the priest had had relations “only with teens/adults.” Bishop LaRocque considered sexual acts between a priest and a teenager a breach of celibacy and violations of trust and authority.

The CAS agreed to start its investigation at St. Andrew’s Parish, where Father MacDonald had served for the past several years. Officials from the agency intended to interview current altar boys as well as others who had recently served as altar boys. The CAS representatives told the Bishop that they would be discussing the case with the OPP, which would decide whether to initiate a criminal investigation. Mr. Abell’s notes of the October 12, 1993, meeting conclude with “ended positive note. Bishop looked worried.” Bishop LaRocque confirmed in his testimony that he was anxious about the outcome of the investigations “where the scandal and what the effect on the parish is and on the whole Diocese.”

The notes of Richard Abell the following day record a call he had with Jacques Leduc. Inscribed is, “Says he will talk to Greg rather than Fth McDougal [sic] ... can’t betray priestly confidences (?)” Bishop LaRocque maintained that he never instructed Mr. Leduc or Monsignor McDougald to refrain from speaking to the CAS because of priestly confidences. The Bishop stated that only comments made in the confessional would not be disclosed.

At the end of October 1993, Jacques Leduc told the executive director of the CAS that Father MacDonald would not be returning to his parish, as the priest would be undergoing six months of treatment at Southdown. Mr. Abell told the Diocese lawyer that David Silmsner had refused to discuss the matter with the CAS, as he was concerned he would forfeit the money from the civil settlement. Jacques Leduc undertook to assure Mr. Silmsner that he could speak to the CAS “without penalty.”

A detailed discussion of the CAS investigation of the Silmser allegations is in Chapter 9, on the institutional response of the Children's Aid Society.

On October 30, 1993, at Bishop LaRocque's request, Father MacDonald sent a letter of resignation from his parish to the Bishop. The Bishop wanted to appoint a new pastor to St. Andrew's Parish, and for that to occur, it was necessary for Father MacDonald to resign the position. According to the Bishop, the letter was strangely worded and did not mention either the allegations by David Silmser or the fact that the priest was undergoing treatment at Southdown. The letter said:

The Most Reverend Eugene P. LaRocque, D.D., Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall has announced the resignation of Rev. Charles F. MacDonald as pastor of Saint Andrew's Parish effective immediately. Father MacDonald has asked for time for rest and personal renewal before accepting re-assignment.

Approximately eleven months after Mr. Silmser had disclosed to the Church that he had been sexually molested by the priest, the Bishop decided it was time to ask Father Charles MacDonald to resign from his position as pastor at St. Andrew's Church.

The response by the Bishop to Father Charles' letter the following day said:

Dear Father Charles:

I wish to thank you for the work that you have done at St. Andrews and for your resignation as Pastor of this Parish in order to find time for rest and personal renewal before you accept a new assignment.

I hope that your stay at Southdown may be profitable to you personally and to your future ministry.

Be assured of my prayers on your behalf, especially as I visit the tomb of the Apostles, Peter and Paul.

Fraternally yours in Christ,

+ Eugene P. LaRocque,
Bishop of Alexandria-Cornwall

Denis Vaillancourt, Chancellor

Father MacDonald continued to be paid as a full-time priest.

The Diocese Issues a Press Release

On January 6, 1994, a newspaper article entitled “Reports of Sex-Abuse Complaint Involving Church, Police Surface” appeared in the Standard-Freeholder. It stated that a male, who alleged he had been abused twenty years earlier by a priest when he was a boy, may have been paid $30,000 in 1993 “to drop his criminal complaint.” An excerpt of the newspaper article follows:

The male victim of a sexual abuse about 20 years ago may have been paid more than $30,000 in 1993 to drop his criminal complaint against a local priest.

Allegations that both Alexandria-Cornwall Diocese Bishop Eugene LaRocque and city police had some involvement in a settlement have been circulating for weeks.

The reports surfaced Wednesday in an Ottawa television news program.

The source said that during the investigation, the victim told police he was negotiating with the church for compensation and that he might want to drop the case. The source said police were not happy with those developments, but that without a complaint they had no choice but to drop the case.

Bishop LaRocque decided to issue a media release the following day. In the January 7, 1994, press release, the Bishop stated that the Diocese had acted in accordance with the “Diocesan Guidelines on Sexual Abuse by Priests, Deacons, Seminarians and Pastoral Assistants,” which he attached. But, as mentioned, these guidelines were not strictly followed by the Diocese in the Silmser case. For example, the written report required by Phase 1 of the protocol on receipt of the complaint was not prepared. Also, the notification procedures to the CAS delineated in Phase 5 were not followed. Bishop LaRocque acknowledged at the hearings that unbeknownst to him, at the time he issued the press release in January 1994, the guidelines had not been strictly adhered to in the Silmser allegations of sexual abuse by Father MacDonald. The guidelines, he said, were “followed to some extent.”

The January 7, 1994, press release discusses the principles of compassion and healing for victims of abuse. It also discusses the need for the perpetrator to admit the truth and, if need be, “seek pardon and conversion.” The Diocese in the media release urged victims to disclose clergy sexual abuse and stated that it was prepared to cooperate with the police and other agencies, and as well to be involved in the healing process:

January 7th, 1994

MEDIA RELEASE

In view of recent media allegations of sexual aggression on the part of a member of the Clergy of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall let it be known that the Diocese had acted in accordance with the Guidelines accepted and promulgated for the immediate and serious attention demanded by such a complaint. (copy enclosed).

The Guidelines are a practical plan of action “for the maximum reconciliation of the following three principles:

- justice towards all who are implicated
- diligence
- respect for civil authorities and their proper jurisdiction in these matters.” (From Pain to Hope, Report from the Ad Hoc Committee on Child Sexual Abuse, CCCB, p. 43).

Two attitudes are essential for a truly Christian response to such a grave situation: 1) compassion toward the victim(s) of abuse who have suffered a grave injustice and are in need of healing, as well as to the accused who is in need of admitting the truth and, if need be, seek pardon and conversion. The Church, all believers, must manifest this compassion of Christ;

2) responsibility in seeking the truth of a difficult situation, while firmly maintaining the important social principle that a person is innocent until proven guilty; also in searching for appropriate remedies, forms of response and eventually, reconciliation. (cf. From Pain to Hope, CCCB. p. 43).

We are all agreed that a morally evil act is an offense against God and His plan for our happiness and also “a violation of man’s humanity, in the one perpetrating it even before the one enduring it.” (Splendour of Truth, Pope John Paul II, no. 92)

If there are victims of sexual abuse by clergy, we want to know about it. We are prepared to cooperate with the police and/or other agencies and also in the healing process, as we have done in the past.

+ Eugene P. LaRocque,
Bishop of Alexandria-Cornwall

Bishop LaRocque stated that if he were drafting the press release today, he would probably include a contact person for victims of abuse to call, and perhaps additional information on support and counselling available. This would encourage victims to seek the therapy needed for the abuse.

On January 13, 1994, an article entitled "Church Paid to Silence Alleged Victim of Abuse Despite Its Policy on Openness" was published in the Ottawa Citizen. It contrasted the principle of transparency advocated in the 1992 Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops report From Pain to Hope, with the $32,000 Silmsen settlement offered by the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall:

The Roman Catholic Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall paid a man $32,000 after he promised to remain silent about his claim a Cornwall priest molested him as a child, despite the church's national policy for openness on sexual abuse.

In June 1992, the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops formed an ad hoc committee to determine the church's policy in handling cases of child sexual abuse by members of the clergy.

An excerpt from that report, entitled From Pain to Hope, reads:

"Another contributing factor to child sexual abuse is a Church that too readily shelters its ministers from having to account for their conduct; that is often tempted to settle moral problems behind a veil of secrecy which only encourages their growth."

However, a 35-year-old former altar boy says the Cornwall diocese offered him money in exchange for his secrecy. The man, who now lives outside Ottawa, says a parish priest in Cornwall sexually abused him from the time he was nine until he was 12.

The following day, Bishop LaRocque held a press conference. Jacques Leduc, the Diocese lawyer, was present. At the press conference, the Bishop maintained that he had “reluctantly” agreed to a settlement of a civil dispute in which both the Diocese and the priest in question had contributed funds. He acknowledged that this was “not the prudent way” to handle this situation and that he “should have maintained [his] original position” and not agreed to the civil settlement. He asserted that “in no way did I or would I wish to impede the police investigation.” Bishop LaRocque had not yet seen the settlement documents and claimed that he was unaware of the offending clause that prohibited David Silmsen from involvement in the criminal investigation of Father MacDonald. Bishop LaRocque stated that there was “zero tolerance” in the Roman Catholic Church for sexual abuse by priests, and he encouraged victims to come forward. The January 14, 1994, press release further stated:

The Diocese by this decision settles a civil dispute and does not as has been implied, pay the complainant to withdraw criminal complaints.

There was no interference with the criminal justice system in that the investigating officers and the Crown Attorney were advised of the proposed settlement and of the settlement and no criminal charges have been laid.

As had been stated, a settlement was made but the Diocesan authorities have cooperated fully with City Police and with other agencies in their ongoing investigations.

After issuing the January 14, 1994, statement, Bishop LaRocque had an opportunity to read the settlement documents. At this time, the Bishop realized that the information he had conveyed to the public was inaccurate. He testified that he was shocked to see the clause prohibiting Mr. Silmsen from continuing his involvement in the criminal process:

... I’m not a lawyer but as soon as I saw it that second paragraph jumped out in my eyes.

... [W]hen I saw it; dropped all criminal proceedings, I mean it just—I couldn’t believe my eyes because it was exactly what I warned them that I didn’t want in the document at all.

This clause, he said, was contrary to the instructions he gave to the Diocese lawyer, Jacques Leduc and to Father MacDonald’s lawyer, Malcolm MacDonald, in the September 1993 meeting at which he agreed to enter a civil settlement with Mr. Silmsr.

Jacques Leduc, the Diocese lawyer, claimed that he had still not read the settlement documents delivered to him in early September 1993 at the time of the January 14, 1994, press release. He testified that he trusted Malcolm MacDonald, Father MacDonald's lawyer, that he did not read the final documents, and that he had simply transported them to the Diocese, to the Reverend Gordon Bryan. He claimed that it was not until January 19, 1994, when Mr. Silmsr's lawyer notified him by letter, that Mr. Leduc became aware that the release contained the offending clause. Mr. Leduc contacted Gordon Bryan and asked him to fax a copy of the settlement documents. Mr. Leduc informed the Bishop of the contents of the clause on the same day.

Mr. Leduc acknowledged at the hearings that he had never previously been involved, to his recollection, in a case in which he had not read the final documents on behalf of his client. Mr. Leduc stated that his trust in Malcolm MacDonald was misplaced and that he had relied on Mr. MacDonald's representation, with the consequence that this was "very embarrassing" both to him and to the Bishop. It damaged his reputation. Mr. Leduc said that the consequences of his reliance on Father Charles MacDonald's lawyer were "disastrous."

Bishop LaRocque issued another press statement on January 23, 1994, in which he acknowledged that the settlement entered into by the Diocese with David Silmsr had interfered with the criminal investigation by the Cornwall Police Service. This was a great embarrassment to the Bishop and to the Diocese. In this statement, the Bishop maintained that he learned this only after the January 14 press release. He apologized for "unwittingly misrepresenting this fact" and stated that this offending provision in the settlement document was "morally unjust." The Bishop said that he had retained new legal counsel for the Diocese, whom he had instructed to make clear to the alleged victim that the Diocese had no intention of interfering with the criminal process:

At the Press Conference of Friday, January 14th, 1994, I stated that the joint "understanding" of settlement out of court was to settle a civil dispute and did not interfere with the criminal investigation. I made this statement in accord with the instructions received from our Diocesan Counsel.

However, I have since learned that the signed release does in fact rule out both civil and criminal action (article 2). This is morally unjust and does not reflect the basis on which the Diocese cooperated with this action.

I have instructed our newly engaged Diocesan legal Counsel to advise the alleged victim that the Diocese does not wish to interfere with his right to proceed criminally and we consider him free to do so in order that we may know the truth of the present situation.

If there are other possible victims in this case, I urge them to contact Msgr. D.B. McDougald, my delegate and/or the Cornwall Police.

I am sorry for unwittingly misrepresenting this fact in the Press Conference and I again assure you of my desire to bring about a Christian reconciliation of the accused priest and the alleged victim based on the truth.

+ Eugene P. LaRocque,

Similarly, on January 24, 1994, Jacques Leduc issued the following press release:

On January 14th, at a press conference, I made repeated representations to members of the press that the settlement with the complainant in question did not include as a condition that he withdrawn his criminal complaint. I stressed on a number of occasions that it was never the intention of the Bishop or myself to interfere with the criminal justice system.

However, on Wednesday of last week, January 19th, I received a letter from the solicitor for the complainant indicating that the document containing a release made specific reference to the plaintiff undertaking "not to take any legal proceedings, civil or criminal, against any of the parties hereto and will immediately terminate any actions that may now be in process."

I was, needless to say, disappointed to discover that the mention of criminal proceedings had been included in the settlement document. The document was prepared by other parties and I did not review it before it was signed. In addition once the document was signed and the document was delivered to my office in a sealed envelope and I delivered it to the Diocesan authorities without reading it at the time.

As you can imagine I feel very foolish this morning and embarrassed for having made representations to the press and the general public without having reviewed the document in question. I certainly assume responsibility for any confusion or misrepresentations arrived at as a result of my omission.

I can assure you that I regret this error and that I deeply regret having caused embarrassment to our Bishop and to other Diocesan authorities.

In conclusion I would like to say that it has been and is my position that this settlement in question was a settlement of a purely civil matter and had I exercised prudence the settlement would not have made any reference to criminal action.

Thank you for your attention.

The Bishop understood that the clause in the settlement document was not only “morally unjust”—it was illegal. The Bishop ended the Diocese’s retainer on this matter with Jacques Leduc and hired David Scott of Scott and Aylen.

Assessment and Treatment for Father MacDonald at the Southdown Facility

Father Charles MacDonald was sent to Southdown by Bishop LaRocque for an assessment in October 1993. On October 22, 1993, the Bishop received a report from the facility, recommending treatment at its residential program. The report stated that Father MacDonald had admitted he had a “homosexual orientation” but denied that he had engaged in sexual activity with minors. Father MacDonald had told the Southdown professionals that his sexual partners had been in their early twenties to mid-thirties. According to the Southdown report, “Charles had crossed professional boundaries” and has been “involved with parishioners.”

Bishop LaRocque received a follow-up report of Father MacDonald’s treatment on December 20, 1993. The priest continued to deny the allegations made against him and maintained that he had never sexually abused any person. He was very upset about the police and CAS investigations. Father MacDonald also claimed that he had had no sexual relations for the past eight years:

... Charles spoke with conviction about the falsity of the charges against him and the injustice of the current police and Children’s Aid Society’s investigation. He maintains his innocence and has assured [sic] me that no further charges are possible because there was never any abuse in the first place.

The therapist wrote “Charles does not appear to be as confident in accepting his homosexual orientation and this should be an area for in-depth therapy.” Some of the goals for his therapy at Southdown included the following:

- to become better able to integrate the emotional aspects of his sexual orientation
- to deal with anger regarding the accusations placed against him; and
- to deal with issues relating to authority.

Bishop LaRocque replied to the January 19, 1994, letter. In correspondence to Sister Donna Markham, the executive director at Southdown, the Bishop disclosed that two other people had claimed that Father MacDonald had sexually assaulted or made sexual advances toward them. One had been an altar boy at the time and the other a young man.

Approximately a week earlier, Bishop LaRocque had received a letter from a former altar boy at St. Columban’s Parish, C-3, who wrote: “Fr. Charles was always trying to grab at my groin when no one was around.” He told the Bishop that as a result of this sexual behaviour, he had “lost all faith in the Catholic Church.” His letter concludes with these words:

I don’t know how many other people were subject to what David and I went through but I can only hope there were not any others.

The Bishop sent this letter to Southdown and to the Diocese lawyer. He did not send the letter or convey the information to the Children’s Aid Society. The Bishop concludes his January 19, 1994, letter with the following words:

I share this with you in the hope that I may help Father’s treatment and lead him to seek pardon from those he has scandalized and offended. Only then can we contemplate the healing that true reconciliation can bring.

In March 1994, Bishop LaRocque received correspondence from Southdown recommending that discussions soon begin regarding Charles MacDonald’s return to the Ministry:

Sometime, during the upcoming month of April, it would be helpful for Charles and myself to discuss with you the prospects for his return to ministry in the Diocese.

Father MacDonald's six-month treatment program ended in May 1994. The therapist stated that she was amenable to discussing Father MacDonald's progress with the Children's Aid Society:

If the Childrens' [sic] Aid Society would like a description of the Southdown Program, and Charles' progress in it, I would be happy to provide it. Charles has shared with me their offer of therapy. It is important that they understand Charles is in therapy here.

Father MacDonald was not permitted to return to ministry by the Bishop. Bishop LaRocque was not satisfied with the treatment received by Father MacDonald at Southdown. In a letter to the executive director in March 1995, the Bishop writes:

I must also, in all frankness, tell you that I am not satisfied with your dealings with Father Charles MacDonald. The fact that you did not give him the tests for pedophilia, the fact that the Children's Aid, after their examination, feel that there is reasonable and probable grounds to believe that the abuse did occur, leaves me, to say the least, perplexed.

After the investment of so much time and money, I would hope that, if Father Charles is blocking this out of his memory, there should be some way in which he could be helped to face the truth.

In the following year, the Bishop learned that another former altar boy at St. Columban's Parish, John MacDonald, alleged that he, too, had been sexually abused by Father Charles MacDonald. John MacDonald disclosed the abuse in a letter to Father Kevin Maloney in August 1995. In the conclusion to his letter, John MacDonald writes:

Please don't make me push this any further than between us. I do not want to go through what Dave is. Father Charlie knows what has taken place, and it is time that healing begins for all involved.

C-4 was another former altar boy who alleged that he was also sexually abused by Father MacDonald. It was evident to the Bishop that many boys and other young men in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall claimed that they, too, had been sexually abused by this priest. The OPP investigation and the prosecution of Father Charles MacDonald are discussed in detail in Chapters 7 and 11 of this Report.

Father Charles MacDonald Not Asked to Resign From Ministry Until 1998

In January 1995, Richard Abell wrote to Bishop LaRocque to inform him that as a result of the investigation, there was reasonable and probable cause to believe that Father MacDonald had abused a child and that he might continue to constitute a risk to both children and young adults. The CAS alerted the Bishop to this information because the agency was concerned with future clerical assignments of Father MacDonald in the Diocese. The January 6, 1995, from Richard Abell stated:

Your Excellency:

Re: Abuse Allegation Against Father Charles MacDonald

Further to our meeting of yesterday, I am writing to confirm the position of our Society with respect to the above-mentioned allegation.

Based on our investigation of the allegations, we have reached the position that there are reasonable and probable grounds to believe that the abuse of a child did occur. Our view is supported by the result of our inquiries into the specific allegation, as well as statements of other individuals who claim victimization by Father MacDonald.

Given this position, and in the absence of a full sexual behaviours assessment of Father MacDonald, it is our view that he may present a risk to children and young adults under his care and control. We are therefore concerned that any further assignment of Father MacDonald in the Diocese be done with this information in mind.

I would like to thank you for your cooperation throughout this very difficult matter. I am extremely pleased that we can now move ahead to establish a collaborative protocol for dealing with abuse allegations against members of the clergy.

Please call if you have any questions regarding the above.

Yours sincerely,

Richard J. Abell
Executive Director

But despite this letter, Father MacDonald remained incardinated in the Diocese. The prospect of initiating canonical proceedings to remove him from priesthood “didn’t enter” the Bishop’s “mind at that time,” but the Bishop commented, “It probably would with the knowledge that I have now and procedures that are taking place at present.”

It was not until the end of January 1998, over five years after the Silmsen complaint, that Bishop LaRocque asked Father MacDonald to retire officially from active ministry. Father MacDonald was sixty-five years old. The January 29, 1998, letter from the Bishop stated:

Dear Fr. Charles,

A belated Happy Birthday—your 65th!

Since it will be impossible, no matter the outcome of the criminal charges against you, to reassign you to active ministry in this Diocese or in any other, I would ask you to retire officially from active ministry. A letter from you to this effect would be greatly appreciated.

As you readjust to a new form of income, I assure you that we shall continue to support you in prayer, in friendship and financially with your court case.

Union de prieres!

+ Eugene P. LaRocque
Bishop of Alexandria-Cornwall

Bishop LaRocque knew that a number of individuals, some of whom did not want to become involved in the criminal process, had disclosed that they had been sexually abused by Father MacDonald. The Diocese continued to fund Father MacDonald’s legal costs, Bishop LaRocque said, in accordance with the 1996 protocol. Bishop LaRocque, as mentioned, never considered initiating a canonical proceeding to laicize Father MacDonald. And it was not until 1998 that the Bishop asked Father MacDonald to retire from active ministry.

Conclusion

As I discuss in Chapters 7 and 11, Father Charles MacDonald was criminally charged by the OPP in 1996 in relation to three complainants: David Silmser, C-3, and John MacDonald. The preliminary inquiry took place in 1997, and Father MacDonald was committed for trial on seven counts. In January 1998, the OPP charged Father MacDonald on a second set of eight charges regarding complainants C-4, C-8, Robert Renshaw, C-5, and Kevin Upper. In 2000, four additional counts were laid against the priest in relation to C-2. Father MacDonald was not convicted of any of these criminal charges.

These criminal charges against Father MacDonald are discussed in further detail in the chapters on the institutional response of the OPP and of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Bishop LaRocque made this statement at the conclusion of his testimony:

I want to take this final opportunity to apologize to the community of Cornwall, to all the faithful of the Diocese and to all the people in it who were hurt by mistakes I made during my administration. I also want to apologize to anyone who was hurt by the actions of any priest in this Diocese, or by any errors which I or the Diocese may have made in handling any such cases.

I hope, at least, that my coming here to participate in this Inquiry will contribute to the fulfilment of the Commission's mandate and promote healing and reconciliation to all concerned. And I promise to keep all in my prayers and in my daily mass.

It is clear from the evidence that the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall and Bishop Eugène LaRocque delayed investigating the allegations of inappropriate contact with young persons by Father Charles MacDonald. They failed to take appropriate action to identify potential victims with respect to the allegations against Father MacDonald. They also failed to take appropriate action to ensure that young persons in the community would not be at risk in relation to Father MacDonald. Moreover, the Diocese and Bishop LaRocque did not advise either police agencies or the Children's Aid Society of the allegations of sexual abuse involving Father MacDonald and young people.

It is my view that the Diocese and Bishop LaRocque did not provide adequate training for diocesan personnel and clergy on the appropriate response to allegations of sexual misconduct by clergy involving young persons. Monsignor McDougald failed to follow the policies and guidelines in place to respond to allegations of misconduct.

Furthermore, it is evident that Jacques Leduc did not act appropriately when representing the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall in the settlement between the Diocese, David Silmsen, and Father Charles MacDonald by delegating the handling of the settlement to Malcolm MacDonald, counsel for Father Charles MacDonald, and failing to read the release and undertaking either before or after it was signed by David Silmsen on September 2, 1993. He also failed to follow practices and procedures to ensure that files, notes, and records of allegations of clergy sexual abuse were properly stored and were retrievable.

Father Romeo Major

Father Romeo Major was a priest in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. He was incardinated in 1964, ten years before Bishop Eugène LaRocque arrived in Cornwall. Father Major remained a priest in the Diocese when Paul-André Durocher became the Bishop in 2002.

Eugène LaRocque testified that when he was the Bishop of the Diocese, he received several complaints over the years about Father Major. He knew that Father Major was difficult to get along with, but maintained that he never received a complaint of sexual abuse regarding this priest.

It was in October 1999 that the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), as part of the Project Truth investigation, contacted Bishop LaRocque with a request for information. The investigation of Father Major by the OPP is discussed in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police. In correspondence on October 28, 1999, Detective Inspector Pat Hall asked the Bishop for a copy of Father Major's curriculum vitae as well as information on his former postings as a priest and the addresses of his residences. The OPP also wanted a photograph of Father Major, preferably taken in the mid-1970s. Detective Inspector Hall told Bishop LaRocque that the OPP would be contacting altar boys and girls in the 1975 to 1979 period, in locations "where Father Major was a priest." The OPP officer asked the Bishop to provide a list of the names of the altar boys and girls as it would assist the police and, moreover, would avoid unnecessary inquiries of people in the community.

Inscribed on this correspondence from the OPP, Bishop LaRocque wrote "no list available." However, the Bishop acknowledged in his evidence that bulletins from St. Martyr's Church, at which Father Major was a pastor, would often list the names of the altar boys and girls who participated in the services at the church. When Commission counsel asked Bishop LaRocque whether he mentioned this to the OPP, the Bishop claimed that he could not remember.

Bishop LaRocque was aware at this time that there was an allegation of abuse by Father Major with a girl. According to the notes of CAS worker Lorne Murphy, Mr. Murphy received a telephone call on November 1, 1999, from Bishop LaRocque, who asked to speak to Richard Abell, the executive director of the Children's Aid Society (CAS) of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry. Mr. Murphy explained to Bishop LaRocque that Mr. Abell was away from the office. The Bishop told Mr. Murphy that OPP Detective Inspector Hall had spoken to him about an investigation into allegations of sexual touching of a girl committed about twenty-five years earlier by Father Major of St. Martyr's Church. Mr. Murphy stated that he would convey this information to Mr. Abell and to Mr. Bill Carriere.

On April 10, 2000, Father Major wrote to the Bishop to advise him that he had been arrested by the police that morning. The priest was charged with indecent assault of a young girl that allegedly took place between 1974 and 1976. The matter had now become public and Father Major asked the Bishop to relieve him of his duties as pastor of his parish.

The Bishop accepted the resignation of Father Major pursuant to the requirements of the 1996 "Diocesan Guidelines on Sexual Abuse by Priests, Deacons, Seminarians and Pastoral Assistants." He told Father Major that he hoped the matter would soon be resolved in the courts. In correspondence on April 11, 2000, Bishop LaRocque assured the priest that the Diocese would continue to pay his salary. The Bishop allowed Father Major to continue to live in the rectory without public functions. The Bishop prepared a media statement, which he copied to Huguette Burroughs, the editor of French newspaper le Journal de Cornwall. It stated:

Re: Charge of Indecent Assault against Rev. Roméo Major of Sts Martyrs [sic] Parish.

After consultation with the Personal Committee of the Diocese and with the Director of the Children's Aid, I have accepted Fr. Major's resignation, according to our Protocol, and have named Rev. Réal Lévêque, p.s.s. as administrator. The matter is now before the courts.

C.C. Huguette Burroughs

According to the notes of Detective Constable Don Genier, a man disclosed to the OPP on April 13, 2000, that his sister had been abused by Father Major when she was a teenager and that she had disclosed this to him ten years earlier, in 1990. This man told the OPP that he had contacted Bishop LaRocque in 1990 to ask if the Church had received complaints of sexual abuse or other complaints about Father Major. The Bishop replied that he did not recall a complaint of sexual abuse against this priest. However, at the hearings Bishop LaRocque maintained that until the OPP investigation and the laying of criminal charges against Father Major in 2000, he could not recall any complaints of sexual assaults by this priest.

Prior to the scheduled preliminary inquiry, the Bishop decided that he would send Father Major to Southdown Institute for an assessment after the preliminary inquiry was completed. It was originally scheduled for November 2000 but did not take place until September 2001. The criminal case concerned an allegation of sexual abuse of a girl between eight and eleven years old. It was a historical sexual abuse case. Father Major denied that he had committed sexual improprieties on this alleged victim.

Father Major told Bishop LaRocque that he had previously been involved in children's groups such as Boy Scouts and Cubs. He explained to the Bishop that children would sit on his lap, which he acknowledged may have been indiscreet. However, as the Bishop said in his evidence, Father Major maintained that he could not recall intentionally "touching anyone in this way."

In a letter sent to Bishop LaRocque in May 2001, Mr. Raymond Dlugos, a psychologist at Southdown Institute, wrote that an objective of Father Major's "treatment is to explore sexuality and address issues related to allegations of sexual misconduct." The psychologist stated that although the priest had denied the allegations, "he acknowledges the possibility that he was not as prudent in maintaining professional boundaries at the time the misconduct is alleged to have occurred." Bishop LaRocque and the Diocese did not take adequate measures to investigate the allegations against Father Major when this information was received.

Criminal Charges Withdrawn Against Father Major Due to Illness of Complainant, Bishop Returns Priest to Ministerial Duties

On October 10, 2001, charges were withdrawn by the Crown as a result of a serious illness suffered by the complainant, a malignant brain tumour. As I discuss in Chapter 7, the disease and treatment of the illness affected the woman's memory. It was for this reason that the Crown contacted the complainant and the OPP to inform them that it had decided to withdraw the charges against Father Major. At the request of Father Major, Bishop LaRocque wrote a letter to the parishioners of St. Martyr's Church a few days after the withdrawal of the criminal charge. The Bishop said that it was with joy that he was reinstating Father Major in his position as priest of the parish. He told parishioners that after a year and a half, the court had found that there was no legal case against the priest. The October 13, 2001, correspondence says:

C'est avec joie que je remets le P. Roméo Major en fonction comme votre curé. Après un an et demi la cour trouve qu'il n'y a pas de cas juridique.

Bishop LaRocque knew that the criminal charges had been withdrawn as a result of the illness of this woman. He knew that the matter was never adjudicated by the courts. Yet the Bishop told parishioners in Father Major's church that the courts had concluded that there was no legal case. And he told parishioners that it was with joy that he was reinstating Father Major to his ministerial functions at the parish. Despite the fact that criminal charges had been laid against the priest for indecently assaulting a young girl, the Bishop decided that Father Major did not present a risk to other young girls in the community or other young people in his parish. Bishop LaRocque came to this conclusion without an internal investigation by the Diocese of the allegations of abuse against Father Major.

Father Major continued his ministerial functions until his retirement at his parish. The Bishop of the Diocese at the time of his retirement was Bishop Paul-André Durocher, who assumed this position in 2002. Although the new Bishop knew of the circumstances surrounding the withdrawal of the charges against Father Major, he maintained the status quo. He stated that at this time, he was focused on developing a protocol. Bishop Durocher did not review the decision made by Bishop LaRocque allowing Father Major to continue ministering in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. Bishop Durocher testified, "It was not my intention to review Bishop LaRocque's decisions. Furthermore, nobody ever approached me to review that." In Bishop Durocher's opinion, Bishop LaRocque's decision regarding Father Major had been accepted by the community:

... [W]hen Father Major was exercising ministry, there was not a single person who suggested that he should not be there ... not just parishioners, but any other people; victims' groups; protest groups; nobody suggested that I review that decision so I felt it was a decision that was accepted by the community.

... Anybody could have sent me a letter that said, “Bishop, we feel really awkward with the fact that this Priest is exercising ministry and no determination was made; we think you should look into this.”

It was clear that the charges against Father Major were withdrawn for reasons other than the merits of the case. In such circumstances, the employer, in this case the Diocese, should automatically conduct a review of the incident to determine whether the priest constitutes a risk to the people with whom he has contact and whom he serves.

In my view, the Diocese and Bishop LaRocque failed to sufficiently investigate allegations of inappropriate contact of Father Romeo Major with young persons. Moreover, the Diocese, Bishop LaRocque and Bishop Durocher failed to take appropriate action to identify potential victims of Father Major in relation to allegations of inappropriate contact with young persons. It is also clear that Bishops LaRocque and Durocher, as well as the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, did not take appropriate measures to ensure that young persons in the community were not at risk in relation to Father Major.

Bishop LaRocque testified that he did not believe that a policy or process existed in the Diocese to ensure that it monitored the preliminary inquiries or trials of priests who had been criminally charged with sexual crimes. It is my recommendation that the Diocese monitor preliminary inquiries or trials of priest and other clergy charged with sexual offences.

Father Paul Lapierre, Father René Dubé, and Father Don Scott

Allegations Against Father Lapierre and Father Dubé

Father Paul Lapierre was incardinated in the Diocese of Alexandria in 1959. Although he left the Diocese before Eugène LaRocque became the Bishop in 1974, Father Lapierre remained incardinated in the Diocese of Alexandria.

Church officials in the Diocese testified that in the late 1950s or early 1960s, there were rumours circulating about Father Paul Lapierre. Father Réjean Lebrun testified that there were rumours about Father Paul Lapierre’s sexual involvement with a young man in his parish. Similarly, the Reverend Gordon Bryan heard rumours about Father Paul Lapierre in that period as well. He testified that he did not discuss these allegations with Church officials in the Diocese.

Father Lapierre was investigated by the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) and criminally charged as part of Project Truth. As I discuss in this Report, Claude Marleau was one of the alleged victims interviewed by the OPP who disclosed that a number of priests and other men had abused him, including Fathers

Paul Lapierre, Don Scott, and René Dubé. Mr. Marleau alleged that he was sexually abused by Father Paul Lapierre on a number of occasions. In a statement to the OPP, he said that he was abused by Father Lapierre at a retreat house in Alexandria, in Father Lapierre's car, and at cottages.

On March 17, 1998, Detective Constables Don Genier and Joe Dupuis interviewed Father Lapierre. The investigation and criminal charges against Father Paul Lapierre are discussed in fuller detail in Chapters 7 and 11, on the institutional responses of the Ontario Provincial Police and the Ministry of the Attorney General.

One year later, in March 1999, Detective Sergeant Pat Hall contacted Bishop LaRocque to inform him that Fathers René Dubé and Paul Lapierre were also under criminal investigation by the Montreal police. The Bishop testified that although he was surprised to learn about Father Dubé, he was not shocked to hear this information about Father Lapierre. As he said in his evidence, "I knew from his background that it could be possible."

As mentioned, although Father Lapierre was incardinated in the Diocese of Alexandria, he left in the late 1960s before Eugène LaRocque became the Bishop. From approximately 1968 until the mid-1980s, Father Lapierre was a freelance mission retreat preacher in Canada and the United States according to Bishop LaRocque. He spent most of his winters in Florida. Bishop LaRocque had received information regarding Father Lapierre from Bishop Nevin, who was in the Diocese of Naples in Florida. There was information about Father Paul Lapierre in the media. According to Bishop LaRocque, a newspaper article reported that Father Lapierre had been picked up by a male police officer to whom he had made sexual advances. Bishop LaRocque testified that he could not recall whether he provided this information to the OPP.

Bishop LaRocque recalled that Father René Dubé contacted him as soon as he became aware of the police investigation. Father Dubé, a priest at Ste-Croix Parish in Cornwall was very concerned. People in his parish had learned about the charges against him and were upset. Father Dubé was well known in the community and had been a priest in the Diocese for many years. He was charged for sexually assaulting a teenaged boy in Quebec in 1965, when Father Dubé was in the seminary. Father Paul Lapierre was also charged with gross indecency and indecent assault with regard to this youth. Father Lapierre and Father Dubé were co-accused in the Quebec prosecution. Father Dubé tendered his resignation to the Bishop on June 20, 1999.

Bishop LaRocque contacted Father Lapierre between June 20 and June 23, 1999, to assess whether there was any veracity to the allegations. Father Lapierre told the Bishop that Father Dubé was innocent and had not been involved in the sexual abuse. Father Lapierre informed the Bishop that he and another priest had participated in this incident. He identified the other priest as Father Don Scott, who had been incardinated in the Diocese before Eugène LaRocque was installed as Bishop.

Bishop LaRocque claimed at the hearings that he was concerned about former parishioners who might have been sexually abused by Father Don Scott. But the Bishop did not take any steps after he received the information from Father Lapierre in June 1999 to identify these individuals. The Bishop did not contact Claude Marleau, a victim of sexual abuse, who was at that time practising law in Quebec City.

Claude Marleau testified at the Inquiry that Roch Landry¹⁷ had introduced him to Father Paul Lapierre, who, he said, became the most important figure in his adolescence: “Paul Lapierre est devenu la figure la plus importante de mon adolescence.” Mr. Marleau stated that he was first abused by Father Lapierre in the priest’s room. He testified that the sexual abuse occurred many times. Claude Marleau also testified that he was brought to Father Don Scott’s residence by Father Lapierre and that the two priests had sexually abused him. He stated that both priests were present at the time of the alleged sexual abuse. Mr. Marleau said that Father Paul Lapierre and Father Scott were good friends. The connection between Mr. Marleau’s alleged perpetrators is further discussed in the chapters on the institutional responses of the Ontario Provincial Police and the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Bishop LaRocque met with both the Parish Council and the Finance Council of the Diocese after he spoke to Father Lapierre. The Bishop told the council members that he was morally certain, from a conversation with a “reliable source,” that Father Dubé was innocent of the charges of sexual assault. He asked the members if he could breach the protocol and allow Father Dubé to continue to exercise his ministry.

On June 26, 1999, the following article appeared in the Cornwall Standard-Freeholder. Entitled “Priest Tells Parishioners He’s Innocent: Charged With Sex Crime,” it says the following:

A Cornwall Roman Catholic priest charged with a sex crime said he’s innocent and that the truth will set him free.

Rev. René Dubé, 54, pastor of Sainte-Croix parish on Anthony Street in east-end Cornwall, announced to his shocked parishioners at mass last weekend he had been charged in connection with an alleged assault against a 14-year old boy in 1967.

17. Roch Landry was one of Claude Marleau’s alleged abusers.

“I hope that the truth will make me free, because I’m innocent,” he said Friday.

Dubé is alleged to have sexually assaulted the teen when he was a 23-year-old seminarian in Montreal. Dubé said he doesn’t know the complainant and is completely mystified by the charge.

Dubé said he first heard of the charge when he opened his mail recently to find a court summons from the Montreal courthouse. He also said he’s never been interviewed by a police officer.

He’s receiving strong support from Bishop Eugene LaRocque who refused to accept Dubé’s resignation.

“This is a case of mistaken identity,” said LaRocque Friday. “I’m not going to add a second injustice,” by having Dubé removed from the parish.

The church established a protocol for priests who are charged with crimes. But LaRocque said he’s not “shackled” by the protocol.

“I am not shackled to a protocol especially when my conscience comes into play,” said LaRocque.

The bishop said he’s not concerned about the public’s perception, especially in light of a police probe into allegations that priests and other prominent people sexually abused children in the Cornwall area dating back over the last 40 years. Instead, LaRocque said he was “concerned about what God sees.”

Dubé makes his first court appearance June 29 in Montreal.

As I discuss in Chapters 7 and 11, Father Lapierre was convicted of abusing Claude Marleau in Montreal but was acquitted in the Cornwall trial, at which Mr. Marleau was also one of the alleged victims. Bishop LaRocque testified at the Inquiry that he did not know that Father Paul Lapierre had appeared before the Ontario courts on charges of sexual abuse involving Claude Marleau. But he acknowledged that an article was published in the Ottawa Citizen at that time regarding the Lapierre trial in Cornwall and that this matter had been brought to his attention.

Bishop LaRocque did not contact either the police or the Crown's office to provide the information that had been imparted to him by Father Lapierre that he and Father Don Scott, priests in the Bishop's Diocese, had been involved in a sexual incident. The Bishop agreed at the hearings that "in hindsight, I should have let people know ... I didn't think of it." In retrospect, he acknowledged that this information might have been of assistance to Mr. Marleau and to the police and prosecutors dealing with these sexual abuse cases.

In approximately late June or July 1999, Huguette Burroughs, the editor of le Journal de Cornwall, a French newspaper, wrote an article on the issues involving Father René Dubé, which she provided to Bishop LaRocque. Ms Burroughs was a parishioner at Nativité Cocathédral. She wanted to consult the Bishop before publishing the article in the newspaper. The article discussed the injustice to Father Dubé and other priests in the Diocese who had been subjected to allegations of indecent acts. Ms Burroughs was critical of people who complained to authorities many years after the alleged event. She stated that these alleged victims should not be permitted to pursue their complaints years after the alleged acts and suggested that a limitation period should exist for such accusations. Ms Burroughs said that allegations such as those against Father Dubé were unacceptable and that such complaints against priests were orchestrated to financially ruin the Church as an institution. The article stated that people should not wait thirty-two years to allege abuse against clergy in the Church. It suggested that those alleging abuse were interested in money and that their psychologists were trying to get these alleged victims to retrieve old memories.

Bishop LaRocque testified that he was in agreement with the contents of the article when it was written by Huguette Burroughs in 1999. Yet at this time, the Bishop knew about the sexual abuse perpetrated by Father Stone, Father Deslauriers, Father Lapierre, and Father Scott. Bishop LaRocque agreed in his testimony that in retrospect, he should have conveyed the message that some priests in the Diocese were "problems."

Bishop LaRocque was aware from his discussion with Father Lapierre that both Father Don Scott and Father Paul Lapierre had been involved in the sexual abuse of a boy several years earlier. However, the Bishop told Ms Burroughs that he endorsed the contents of the article she had authored. Father Lapierre had admitted to the Bishop that he had sexually abused this boy and had identified the other priest who had also perpetrated these acts. Yet the Bishop did not raise any objections to the contents of the article.

In his testimony, Bishop LaRocque gave two reasons why he did not report to the police the information relayed to him by Father Lapierre: (1) Father Scott was dead; and (2) the police were already investigating the sexual assault allegation against Father Lapierre. I do not find these reasons convincing. Father Lapierre had admitted to Bishop LaRocque that he had sexually abused a boy. Moreover, another bishop in the United States had discussed his concerns about Father Lapierre's inappropriate behaviour, and Bishop LaRocque knew there were allegations that the priest had propositioned an undercover officer. Bishop LaRocque agreed that he could have been more forthcoming and communicated this information about priests such as Father Lapierre and Father Scott to the police. He further acknowledged that the institutional response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall when he was the Bishop could have been better.

After the trials against Father Lapierre had concluded and he was convicted in Montreal, Bishop LaRocque did not contact Claude Marleau.

As mentioned, Father René Dubé sent a letter of resignation to Bishop LaRocque on June 20, 1999. Bishop LaRocque indicated on June 23, 1999, that he was not required to accept the priest's resignation and that he was morally certain that Father Dubé was innocent. The Bishop took the position that he was not breaching the diocesan protocol. In his testimony, Bishop LaRocque said that he had been advised by Father Denis Vaillancourt that he was not violating the protocol by refusing to accept Father Dubé's resignation.

The 1996 "Diocesan Guidelines of Sexual Abuse by Priests, Deacons, Seminarians and Pastoral Assistants" stated:

... If the situation warrants it (because there is a risk to the alleged aggressor, or the possibility of a risk to other members of the community, because the events have become public, because charges will be laid, because a trial will take place) the Bishop removes the suspected aggressor from Church duties.

Protocol for priests who are the subject matter of criminal proceeding or civil litigations

3. Should there be an allegation of an indictable offense, with one or more of the following conditions present:

- a) risk to the alleged aggressor;
- b) possibility of risk to members of the community;
- c) because the events have become public;
- d) because charges will be laid;
- e) because a trial will take place;

the accused priest will be removed from his position and placed on a leave of absence. After six month [sic], the removal becomes permanent. (Emphasis added)

Charges had been laid and the matter was public. The conditions were present. Yet Bishop LaRocque took the position that he was not contravening the protocol by refusing to remove the priest from Church duties. Bishop LaRocque maintained that he was morally certain Father Dubé was innocent because of his telephone conversation with Father Lapierre.

Bishop LaRocque explained that he did not follow the diocesan guidelines with respect to Father Dubé because he did not want the priest to be doubly punished by the criminal system and by the Diocese. I do not find this a persuasive reason. The Bishop relied upon the conversation he had with Father Lapierre. The Bishop did not undertake any investigation or conduct other interviews to inform himself of the credibility of the allegations made against Father Dubé.

A few days after the article was published in the Cornwall Standard-Freeholder, Richard Abell, executive director of the Children's Aid Society (CAS), wrote a letter to the Bishop urging him to accept Father Dubé's resignation and to have him refrain from parish duties until the resolution of the court proceedings. Mr. Abell was clearly concerned about the protection of children and youths in the community. The June 30, 1999, letter stated:

Dear Bishop LaRocque:

Re: Father Rene Dube

I have been hoping to speak to you regarding the recent developments in this matter that were reported in last Saturday's Standard Freeholder. In case we are not able to connect by phone in the near future, I'm writing you with some thoughts.

I fully understand your wish to support your priest. However, I also come to this issue with the perspective of public safety. Criminal charges of sexual misconduct against a youth are in themselves very serious, and warrant a careful attention to the safety and protection of children, whatever personal positions may be held about the allegations.

On that basis I urge you to accept Father Dube's offer to step down from his parish duties until such time as a court has given it's [sic] judgment on the allegations against him. A reading of your protocol informs me you have discretion in these circumstances, although four of the five situations cited which would support the decision to suspend ("... a risk to other members of the community ...," etc.) are relevant to the present situation.

In the event you should decide to maintain Father Dube in his present assignment, I ask that you put in place measures to ensure that there can be no risk to children or youth while you await the outcome of the charges.

Please call if you would like to discuss any of the above.

Yours truly,

Richard Abell
Executive Director

Bishop LaRocque acknowledged in his testimony that he did not take Mr. Abell's advice. The Bishop did not instruct Father Dubé to refrain from parish duties until the courts had rendered judgment on the allegations of abuse. However, in early July 1999, Bishop LaRocque asked Father Dubé not to be in the company of youths without adults present.

It is noteworthy that Bishop LaRocque could not recall monitoring Father Lapierre's trial in Cornwall or his joint trial with Father Dubé in Montreal to keep himself informed of the criminal prosecution of priests in his Diocese.

A story on the Cornwall trial of Father Lapierre entitled "Catholic Priest Admits Others in Diocese Confided in Him About Abuse of Boys in Cornwall" appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on September 8, 2001. It stated that Father Lapierre had testified at his criminal trial that he was aware for some time that people in the Cornwall community were abusing youths. Father Lapierre denied taking part in the sexual abuse but acknowledged that priests in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall had confided in him about the sexual abuse of boys in eastern Ontario:

A prominent Roman Catholic priest charged with sex crimes under Project Truth confessed in court yesterday that he has long been aware of a group of pedophiles in the Cornwall community.

Under cross-examination while testifying in his own defence, Father Paul Lapierre, 72, repeatedly denied taking part in a sex ring, but told court that priests in the tightly knit diocese, along with others, confided in him over the years about the sexual abuse of boys in Eastern Ontario.

At his trial, Father Lapierre stated that he had received information during confessions regarding the abuse by priests. As I discuss in Chapter 11, this was not pursued by the Crown at the Lapierre trial, which took place in September 2001. Father Lapierre stated that he had communicated this information to Bishop Rosario Brodeur. At the Inquiry, Bishop LaRocque denied that Father Lapierre had discussed the sexual abuse of boys in the Cornwall area with him. Father Lapierre was acquitted on September 13, 2001, on the grounds that the Crown had not proved its case beyond reasonable doubt.

Father Don Scott

Father Don Scott was also a priest in the Diocese of Alexandria when Eugène LaRocque became the Bishop. Father Scott was a pastor in a parish in Maxville. The Bishop decided to move Father Scott in 1975 to St. Raphael's Parish, which was next to Williamstown. Within a short time, Father Scott asked the Bishop to assign him to another parish. In a strained meeting, Bishop LaRocque made it clear to Father Scott that he was to remain in his parish in St. Raphael's. Father Scott subsequently decided to join the Dominican Brothers. In correspondence in 1976 to the Bishop, Father Scott refers to the "unraveling of [his] life."

Bishop LaRocque knew that Father Paul Lapierre and Father Don Scott were friends.

In June 1984, Father Scott wrote to Bishop LaRocque to inform him that he had left the Dominican Brothers and was living in Montreal with a man. Bishop LaRocque visited him. In his correspondence, Father Scott wrote, "Soyez assuré aussi que le style de vie que nous avons discuté est—pour moi—plutôt une question de la position du Magisterium que d'un engagement personnel." As Bishop LaRocque explained, Father Scott was referring to the fact that he was gay and that it was not in accordance with the teachings of the Church. The priest remained incardinated in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

Father Scott sent further correspondence to Bishop LaRocque in June 1986, after the Father Gilles Deslauriers matter. The priest wrote: "When I told you why I knew I needed time, you at least knew that I had spared the Diocese and the Church." He further stated:

... I have been made aware of the recent unfortunate happenings that have touched the Diocese with scandal which will if past patterns are repeated, touch the brother priests who are innocent.

Bishop LaRocque testified he did not know what the priest meant by "past patterns are repeated." When he was shown the letter at the Inquiry, Bishop LaRocque reiterated, "I have no idea what was being referred to there."

In the June 1986 correspondence, Father Scott refers to priests who were living double lives—clergy who were not adhering to their priestly vows and who came to Montreal to live a second life:

... I see former colleagues [sic] here in the city taking advantage of what they see as the best of both worlds and I know that they will return to their parishes the next day and they are secure and their future assured.

Bishop LaRocque testified that he did not at that time explore this issue further with Father Scott, nor connect this with priests engaging in sexual relations with young people. Father Scott wrote:

I don't understand—those who hurt the Church are protected and embraced (as well they should be), but one who distants [sic] himself in order to assure himself that he is doing the will of God and who thus protects the Church is forced to live in insecurity and uncertainty.

I know this is not a good time to be honest with you, but I've never been less than honest with you. If I can't speak clearly with you, than [sic] with whom? This is a time of healing and searching that I'm passing through and I just want you to know that I feel badly that I am treated differently than the others.

Father Don Scott died in 1988. His funeral was held in Montreal at St. Dominic's Church. Bishop LaRocque was the celebrant at the funeral. When Father Lapierre told Bishop LaRocque in June 1999 about the sexual abuse committed by Father Scott, Father Scott had been dead for over ten years.

As mentioned, Claude Marleau testified that Father Lapierre had introduced Father Scott to him and that both priests sexually abused him. Father Scott passed away before Project Truth and consequently was not charged for the alleged sexual abuse perpetrated on Claude Marleau.

Bishop Durocher Learns of Criminal Charges

When Paul-André Durocher was installed as Bishop in June 2002, Father Dubé was exercising his ministry without limitations, as he had been acquitted of the criminal charges. Father Paul Lapierre, who was still incardinated in the Diocese, had retired in Montreal. Father Lapierre had been acquitted of the charges in the Ontario prosecution. However, the criminal prosecution in Quebec was ongoing. The Bishop met with Father Lapierre's lawyer to learn more about the criminal charges laid against the priest.

Bishop Durocher testified that Bishop LaRocque was mistaken when he told the Inquiry that the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall did not fund the criminal defence of Father Paul Lapierre. The Diocese paid Father Lapierre's legal fees for both the Ontario and the Quebec criminal prosecutions.

Bishop Durocher testified that the Diocese did not seek out the victims of Father Paul Lapierre to determine whether they required counselling. The explanation given was that this was before the 2003 diocesan guidelines came into effect. I do not find this convincing.

Nor did Diocese officials monitor the 2001 trial of Father Paul Lapierre in Cornwall for the purpose of identifying victims of abuse by priests in the Diocese. Eugène LaRocque was the Bishop at that time. In cross-examination at his trial in September 2001, Father Lapierre said that Father Don Scott had discussed with him Father Hollis Lapierre's relationship with Claude Marleau. He was told by Father Scott that Father Hollis Lapierre had Polaroid pictures of naked boys, including photos of Claude Marleau. He said that after Father Hollis Lapierre died in the mid-1970s, Father Scott, the executor of the priest's will, had destroyed the pictures and magazines that had been behind his bed. I discuss this further in this chapter in the section on the allegations of abuse against Father Hollis Lapierre.

Bishop Durocher agreed that it would have been beneficial for the Diocese to monitor the Father Paul Lapierre trial. Victims such as Claude Marleau who alleged that they had been sexually abused by other priests in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall would have been identified.

After Father Lapierre was found guilty in Quebec in June 2004, Bishop Durocher told him that there was a limitation on his faculties. Father Lapierre was not to exercise any public ministry. He was prohibited from preaching and hearing confessions. The Bishop contacted him in Montreal a few months after he was convicted to ensure that the priest was complying with this restriction. Although Father Lapierre resided in Montreal, he was still incardinated in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. Bishop Durocher learned that Father Lapierre was celebrating weekend masses at a church in Montreal, Saint-Pierre-Apôtre. Bishop Durocher instructed the priest to immediately stop exercising his ministerial functions. He also wrote a letter in October 2004 to the Archdiocese to verify that Father Lapierre was not celebrating mass.

Father Lapierre was never "defrocked"; that is, his clerical status was not removed by the Church. Bishop Durocher explained that loss of clerical status can be imposed only in a penal canonical process and that there is a ten-year limitation period. In other words, in canon law, there is a ten-year limitation period on sexual abuse allegations that begins when the victim reaches eighteen years old. The problem that arose in the Father Lapierre situation, explained Bishop Durocher, was that Claude Marleau was older than twenty-eight years of age when he came forward with the allegations of abuse against the priest. The Bishop testified that because the complaint against the priest was made after the limitation period, the canonical process could not be initiated.

Bishop Durocher acknowledged at the hearings that he has come to the conclusion in the past few years that the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall has had a significant problem with clergy sexual abuse.

It is clear that the Diocese and Bishop LaRocque did not sufficiently investigate the allegations of inappropriate contact with young persons by Father Paul Lapierre and Father René Dubé. The Diocese and Bishop LaRocque also knew from Father Paul Lapierre of inappropriate contact by Father Don Scott with a young person. It is also evident that the Diocese and Bishop LaRocque failed to offer counselling and support to Claude Marleau, who alleged he had been abused as a youth by those priests.

It is also my conclusion that the Diocese and Bishop LaRocque failed to take appropriate action to ensure that young persons in the Diocese were not at risk of sexual abuse by these members of the clergy. Moreover, the Diocese, Bishop LaRocque, and Bishop Durocher failed to take appropriate action to identify potential victims in relation to inappropriate contact by these members of the clergy.

Prior to the Inquiry, Bishop Durocher had no knowledge of Father Lapierre's evidence in either the Quebec or the Ontario criminal proceedings.

It is my recommendation that the Bishop and Church officials of the Diocese monitor and/or obtain information on the legal proceedings in which clergy in the Diocese are subject to charges or lawsuits involving sexual abuse of young persons.

Father Ken Martin

Father Ken Martin was ordained in the Diocese of Alexandria in 1958 by Bishop Rosario Brodeur. He served at several parishes in Cornwall, including St. Columban's, Nativity, St. Francis de Sales, and St. Martin de Tours. Father Martin was also a priest at Ste. Thérèse Parish in the Cornwall area before he moved to the province of Quebec.

In July 1997, Claude Marleau reported to Detective Constable Don Genier of the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) that he had been sexually assaulted as a youth by a number of priests and other men, including Father Ken Martin.

In his statement to Detective Constable Genier on July 31, 1997, Claude Marleau described the details of the alleged sexual abuse by Father Martin. Father Martin was a parish priest in the northern part of the Diocese. Mr. Marleau also told the OPP officer that Father Martin was a friend of his other alleged abusers, Fathers Paul Lapierre and Don Scott. Mr. Marleau said that Father Paul Lapierre had introduced him to Father Martin. This is further discussed in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police.

Father Martin asked Claude Marleau if he would like to go on a ski trip. The night before the trip, the priest brought the young Claude to his presbytery. Mr. Marleau testified that the abuse occurred that night. The ski trip, he said, did not take place because of rain.

Claude Marleau thought that the people Father Lapierre introduced him to had the same proclivities and that they knew each other. He described himself as a toy that was passed from one man to another: "C'est sûr que tous les gens qu'il me présentait avaient les mêmes habitudes que lui. J'étais une espèce de jouet qu'on passait d'un à l'autre."

Mr. Marleau testified that he was first abused as a youth by Roch Landry, who worked in a butcher shop and who in turn introduced him to Father Paul Lapierre, who then introduced him to Father Don Scott, Father Hollis Lapierre, Father René Dubé, Father Ken Martin, and George Sandford (Sandy) Lawrence, the owner of a music store. Claude Marleau alleged that he was abused by all these men.

On April 1, 1998, OPP Detective Constables Don Genier and Joe Dupuis interviewed Father Martin. The priest asked if he could make a call to Bishop LaRocque. Although Father Martin had been incardinated into the Diocese of Alexandria in 1958, he had not been in active ministry in the Cornwall area since 1972. Eugène LaRocque became the Bishop of the Diocese in 1974. His predecessor was Bishop Adolphe Proulx and before him, Bishop Joseph-Aurèle Plourde. Father Martin contacted the Diocese and obtained contact information for a lawyer from the Reverend Gordon Bryan.

On April 3, 1998, Crown Attorney Robert Pelletier was provided with a brief on the Father Martin investigation. He was asked to review the brief and provide an opinion on whether criminal charges should be laid. Mr. Pelletier identified consent as an issue but was of the opinion that a preliminary inquiry should be held, after which the case could be re-evaluated.

On May 7, 1998, Crown Attorney Pelletier informed OPP Detective Inspector Tim Smith that he had reviewed the Martin Brief and had come to the conclusion that Claude Marleau was at an age of legal consent in the 1960s. This is discussed in fuller detail in Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

On July 9, 1998, Father Martin was arrested by the OPP for indecent assault and gross indecency committed against Claude Marleau.

On November 23, 1998, the OPP requested from Bishop LaRocque a photograph of Father Martin taken in approximately 1972. Bishop LaRocque complied with the request, but informed the OPP that he could only provide a photograph from what appeared to be 1989.

On March 5, 1999, OPP Detective Sergeant Pat Hall asked Bishop LaRocque to have Father Martin report to the Long Sault Detachment of the OPP on March 11, 1999, to be processed. Although Bishop LaRocque could not recall this request in his evidence, he acknowledged that it was probably made. Bishop LaRocque could not explain the reason for the priest's failure to present himself to the OPP. When Father Martin did not appear for processing, the OPP contacted Bishop LaRocque's office. On March 16, 1999, Father Martin was arrested by the OPP for indecently assaulting C-109, contrary to section 148 Criminal Code.

There was a preliminary inquiry for Paul Lapierre, Sandy Lawrence, Ken Martin, and Arthur Peachey¹⁸ before Justice Gilles Renaud from May 19 to 27, 1999. All of the accused were committed for trial. Claude Marleau testified at the preliminary inquiry, as did C-109. Father Martin was committed to stand trial on May 27, 1999.

The indictment of Father Ken Martin was dated July 29, 1999. The indictment alleged that between January 1, 1966, and December 31, 1967, Father Martin indecently assaulted and committed an act of gross indecency on Claude Marleau, contrary to sections 148 and 149 Criminal Code, and that between January 1, 1971, and June 12, 1972, he indecently assaulted C-109. Father Martin pleaded not guilty to all counts.

The trial of Father Ken Martin for the abuse of Claude Marleau and C-109 took place from September 17 to 19, 2001. Judgment was rendered on November 9, 2001.

At the trial, Father Martin denied sexual encounters with Claude Marleau and with C-109. The issue of consent arose at the trial. This is discussed in further detail in Chapter 11.

Father Ken Martin was found not guilty by Justice Robert Cusson of the Ontario Superior Court. Justice Cusson held that the incident of alleged abuse prior to the skiing trip was a private consensual act between two individuals of consenting age. The judge held:

[The accused] was in a position of trust vis-à-vis the complainant. That does not place him in a position of authority and, of itself, does not show the accused as having exercised such authority to influence Mr. Marleau into submitting or consenting to the sexual activity against his will.

... [T]he evidence was clear that this was a single event. And without more, it was without doubt with his consent. There is no evidence whatsoever that Kenneth Martin did anything to convince or coax Claude Marleau to do the sexual acts in question.

18. All four men were alleged perpetrators of sexual abuse against Claude Marleau.

In those circumstances, the charge of indecent assault against the accused cannot stand.

With respect to the charge of gross indecency, I agree with the defence that, presuming the acts of fellatio took place between the accused and the complainant, in the circumstances, that cannot constitute acts of gross indecency. These were consensual acts held in private, between two individuals who were of consenting age.

... [T]he second count in the indictment is also dismissed.

The charges with respect to the alleged acts perpetrated on C-109 were also dismissed. C-109 alleged that he was indecently assaulted by Father Martin at the rectory at St. Martin de Tours Parish in Glen Robertson between 1970 and 1972.

It took three years, from July 1998, when charges were laid, until fall 2001, for judgment to be rendered. This was a long period for Claude Marleau. He also described the delay of a year after charges were laid for the preliminary inquiry to be held as very lengthy. This is further discussed in Chapter 11.

Response of the Diocese

When Claude Marleau came forward to the OPP in 1997 with his allegations of abuse, Father Martin was incardinated in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall but was working as a chaplain in Montreal in a home for the aged. After he was charged with the alleged abuse of Claude Marleau and C-109, Father Martin continued to be involved in official religious work in Montreal.

At his trial in 2001, Father Martin testified that he was practising as a priest in Pointe Claire, Quebec. He was celebrating mass for people with disabilities and was the chaplain of Villa Marguerite, a convent and a retreat house. Father Martin also stated that he performed baptisms, marriages, and funerals.

Bishop LaRocque testified that Father Martin had left the Diocese of Alexandria in 1972, before he arrived in Cornwall. The Bishop stated that he did not have contact with Father Martin but acknowledged that he may have received letters concerning him.

Bishop LaRocque testified that neither he personally nor anyone acting on his behalf followed the preliminary inquiry or trial of Father Martin. The Bishop explained that Father Martin was not given funds from the Diocese for a lawyer: "Because he had been away from the Diocese for so long, he was not funded by the Diocese." Bishop LaRocque explained that incardination is not necessarily the test for whether the Diocese pays legal fees. He claimed that he was unaware that Father Martin was found not guilty at his trial in Cornwall, Ontario.

Paul-André Durocher, who became the Bishop of Alexandria-Cornwall in 2002, did not recall having discussions with Bishop LaRocque regarding Father Martin. He learned that Father Martin was retired in Montreal and doing replacement ministry in the Diocese of Montreal. At the time of his testimony, Bishop Durocher confirmed Father Martin was still incardinated in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

The 1996 “Diocesan Guidelines on Sexual Abuse by Priests, Deacons, Seminarians and Pastoral Assistants” were in effect at the time criminal charges were laid against Father Martin. Father Martin was not removed from pastoral duties when he was charged. Father Martin testified at his trial that he was still in pastoral positions. As mentioned, the diocesan guidelines state:

... If the situation warrants it, (because there is a risk to the alleged aggressor, or the possibility of a risk to other members of the community, because the events have become public, because charges will be laid, because a trial will take place) the Bishop removes the suspected aggressor from Church duties.

It further states:

3. Should there be an allegation of an indictable offense, with one or more of the following conditions present:

- a) risk to the alleged aggressor;
- b) possibility of risk to members of the community;
- c) because the events have become public;
- d) because charges will be laid;
- e) because a trial will take place;

the accused priest will be removed from his position and placed on a leave of absence. After six month [sic], the removal becomes permanent.

These guidelines remain in effect in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

Bishop Durocher received a letter from Gary Guzzo within a few days of his installation as bishop on June 14, 2002. The letter stated: “When one reviews the admissions that came in the evidence in the Lapierre trial and Martin trial, one cannot help but expect an explanation from the church and the diocese. None has been forthcoming.” Bishop Durocher did not respond to the letter.

In my view, the Diocese and the Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall should have monitored the preliminary inquiry and trial of Father Ken Martin for allegations of sexual abuse against two young people in Cornwall. It is clear that the Diocese and Bishop LaRocque did not sufficiently investigate the allegations of inappropriate contact by Father Ken Martin with these young persons. Given that Father Martin remained incardinated in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, the Bishop and the Diocese ought to have taken measures to ensure that relevant information was provided to outside dioceses regarding the allegations and that Father Martin's faculties were removed. Moreover, the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, Bishop LaRocque, and Bishop Durocher did not attempt to identify other potential victims in relation to allegations of inappropriate contact with young persons by Father Martin. In addition, the Diocese, Bishop LaRocque, and Bishop Durocher do not appear to have provided counselling assistance and support to alleged victims of Father Ken Martin, such as Claude Marleau.

Father Hollis Lapierre

Father Hollis Lapierre was born in the United States. He was ordained in Quebec in 1949 by Bishop Rosario Brodeur. He was at several parishes in the Cornwall area from 1950 until his death in 1975. They included St. John Bosco, St. Columban's, St. Félix-de-Valois, Sacred Heart, Nativity, Greenfield, and Ingleside.

In 1965, Father Réjean Lebrun received a complaint of alleged sexual abuse involving Father Hollis Lapierre. At that time, Father Lebrun was a vicar in a Cornwall parish, St. Francis de Sales.

A young man of about twenty years old came to see Father Lebrun. He disclosed to the priest that he was gay and had a lover, but that his mother objected to this relationship. The young man asked Father Lebrun what he thought about the relationship. The priest responded that it did not conform to Christian morals and that he should not engage in such behaviour. The young man lost his patience and asked Father Lebrun what he would do about Father Hollis Lapierre, who was amusing himself with young people. As Father Lebrun said in his evidence at the Inquiry:

Un jeune homme dans la vingtaine est venu me voir. Il m'a confié qu'il était gai, qu'il avait un amant qui voulait l'emmener chez lui pour coucher avec lui. Et que sa mère s'y objectait. Et qu'est-ce que j'en pensais. Je lui ai répondu que c'était mal aux yeux de la morale chrétienne. Qu'il ne pouvait pas faire ça. Alors ça l'a impatienté. Il m'a répondu "Alors, que faites-vous du père Hollis Lapierre qui s'amuse avec les jeunes?"

The young man did not provide the names of the alleged victims or other identifying information such as their approximate ages. Nor did he provide any details of the incidents, such as the location at which these alleged acts occurred, testified Father Lebrun.

Father Lebrun stated that he did not discuss this matter with Father Hollis Lapierre. Father Lebrun also testified that he did not subsequently receive any complaints from alleged victims of the priest.

After this meeting with the young man, Father Lebrun went to see Joseph-Aurèle Plourde, the Auxiliary Bishop at the time. Father Lebrun related what the young man had told him about Father Hollis Lapierre. Bishop Plourde did not discuss what he intended to do with this information. Father Lebrun testified that after this meeting, his involvement in this matter ended and that he did not encounter the young man again.

At the Inquiry, Claude Marleau testified that during his youth he was abused by several priests, one of whom was Father Hollis Lapierre. As I discuss in Chapter 7, Mr. Marleau disclosed to the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) in the Project Truth investigation that he had been sexually abused by several men, including Father Hollis Lapierre. Mr. Marleau testified that he was introduced to Father Lapierre in the mid-1960s by another priest, Father Don Scott. At that time, Claude Marleau was a high school student. He stated that Fathers Hollis Lapierre, Don Scott, and Paul Lapierre were good friends. Mr. Marleau alleged that all three priests abused him, as did other men in the Cornwall community. As I discuss in this chapter, Father Paul Lapierre was found guilty in Quebec of indecently assaulting Claude Marleau.

Mr. Marleau testified at the Inquiry that Father Hollis Lapierre first abused him in the presbytery where the priest resided, in a garage under his bedroom. He stated that the sexual abuse occurred on several occasions, at least four or five times, all in the same location. Mr. Marleau testified that Father Hollis Lapierre took Polaroid pictures of him naked. He also stated that the priest showed him a series of photographs, and he recognized a schoolmate.

Father Hollis Lapierre died in 1975, prior to the OPP Project Truth investigation.

Approximately thirty years after his alleged sexual abuse, Claude Marleau made a complaint to the OPP regarding Father Hollis Lapierre. OPP Detective Constable Don Genier was assigned by Detective Sergeant Pat Hall to interview Claude Marleau. Although Mr. Marleau could not initially recall Father Hollis Lapierre's name, he was later able to confirm the identity of the priest. Mr. Marleau had interviews with the OPP in 1997 and 1998.

As mentioned in Chapter 7, Detective Sergeant Hall discussed the Project Truth investigation with Bishop Eugène LaRocque on March 20, 1998, and asked the Bishop for information on the location of twenty-seven priests. On June 18, 1998, Detective Sergeant Hall met with Bishop LaRocque to clarify information regarding Father Hollis Lapierre.

In a statement given to Detective Constable Genier on October 20, 1998, Claude Marleau reviewed a document written by Françoise Laflamme that provided information on Father Hollis Lapierre. Mr. Marleau confirmed the identity of Father Hollis Lapierre, the layout of the rectory, and the priest's friends for the OPP in October 1998.

At Father Paul Lapierre's Ontario trial in 2001, discussed earlier, the accused priest testified, "Father Donald Scott ... shared with me ... about Father Hollis Lapierre[']s relationship with Claude Marleau ... how expensive it was ... I was told by Father Don Scott ... that Father Hollis Lapierre kept Polaroid pictures of naked boys." Father Paul Lapierre testified that his conversation with Father Scott took place after the death of Father Hollis Lapierre in 1975. He further testified that Father Scott was the executor of Hollis Lapierre's will and said that Father Scott "had been asked to destroy those pictures and all the magazines behind his bed ... in the little wall."

Father Paul Lapierre testified at his trial in Ontario that he learned through Father Scott that Claude Marleau had been abused by Father Hollis Lapierre. Paul Lapierre further stated at his trial that he did not reveal the information provided to him by Father Scott regarding the abuse by Father Hollis Lapierre because "it was a matter of conscience." This is discussed further in this chapter.

Bishop LaRocque acknowledged that the evidence with regard to Father Hollis Lapierre at the trial of Father Paul Lapierre would have been of concern to him and other Church officials in the Diocese. As mentioned, Father Hollis Lapierre was dead at the time of Father Paul Lapierre's trial. The Bishop acknowledged that this evidence raised several issues. Bishop Paul-André Durocher agreed that it would have been valuable to have someone from the Diocese attend and monitor judicial proceedings such as Father Paul Lapierre's trial. Bishop LaRocque had no recollection of speaking with Father Paul Lapierre after this priest gave evidence at his trial. As discussed, Father Paul Lapierre was acquitted in Ontario by Justice Lalonde in September 2001 for indecent assault and gross indecency of Claude Marleau, but was convicted of these offences in Quebec in 2004 by Justice Garneau.

Paul-André Durocher became the Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall in 2002. Bishop Durocher has no recollection of any discussion with Bishop LaRocque regarding Father Hollis Lapierre. Bishop Durocher did not contact Claude Marleau after Father Paul Lapierre's criminal conviction in Quebec. Perhaps if he had spoken to Claude Marleau at that time, he would have learned about the allegations of sexual abuse perpetrated by Hollis Lapierre in Mr. Marleau's youth. Moreover, Bishop Durocher never offered Mr. Marleau an apology or sent him a note or offered him counselling. As Bishop Durocher said at the hearings, “I didn’t think of it.” Bishop Durocher stated that it is difficult to deal with alleged victims “because we don’t know where the truth lies. It’s made more difficult when there are lawsuits involved in the process.” While that may be true, in this case, the courts had convicted Father Paul Lapierre and Mr. Marleau never commenced a lawsuit against the Diocese arising from these incidents. Bishop Durocher also said that in canon law, there is a ten-year statute of limitations for allegations of sexual abuse that begins to run when the victim reaches the age of eighteen years old. As mentioned, he agreed that there is always the possibility of asking Church officials in Rome for a dispensation of the limitation period.

Mr. Marleau confirmed at the Inquiry that he was never contacted by the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall after the judgment of Justice Lalonde in Father Paul Lapierre’s trial. He said that the Diocese never apologized to him and never communicated with him to discuss the comments regarding Father Hollis Lapierre. To Claude Marleau’s knowledge, Church officials in the Diocese did not conduct an internal investigation on the alleged allegations of priests in the Diocese regarding his abuse. Mr. Marleau believed that Church authorities in the Diocese, such as Bishop Brodeur, were aware of the alleged abuse. Mr. Marleau also stated that Father Hollis Lapierre had a housekeeper, who he thought probably had some information on the improper behaviour of the priest. Mr. Marleau also thought possibly others in the Diocese would have seen Father Hollis Lapierre bring him onto Church property. Yet Claude Marleau stated that others in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall never asked him any questions about his relationship or activities with the priest.

In my view, the Diocese, Bishop LaRocque, and Bishop Durocher failed to take appropriate action to identify potential victims of Father Hollis Lapierre. Had Father Paul Lapierre’s criminal proceedings been followed or the transcript reviewed, potential victims of Father Hollis Lapierre could have been identified. It is also clear that the Diocese failed to provide counselling or assistance to alleged victims abused by Father Hollis Lapierre, such as Claude Marleau.

Father Lucien Lussier

Father Lucien Lussier was born in the United States and studied at Saint-Hyacinthe Seminary in Quebec. He was ordained in 1955 by Bishop Rosario Brodeur at St. Finnan Cathedral in the Diocese of Alexandria.

Father Lussier was a parish priest at St. Martin de Tours in Glen Robertson. On April 29, 1967, parishioner Michel Lalonde wrote a letter to the Diocese of Alexandria, complaining of Father Lussier’s dealing with a young man. In the letter, Mr. Lalonde described his observations as well as the observations of other parishioners at St. Martin de Tours Parish. They were concerned about the relationship between Father Lussier and a boy who was fifteen years old. He was the verger in the parish and assisted during church services.¹⁹

Father Lussier was in the company of this boy so frequently that it had disturbed parishioners. The letter stated that the priest and the youth had become inseparable in the last year and a half. Michel Lalonde, who was a teacher at the village school in Glen Robertson, noted that when the boy attended the school, Father Lussier would sit near the schoolyard during recess and observe and photograph the youths playing ball. He further stated that the young man was now attending high school in Alexandria and that Father Lussier was seen meeting him at the school, waiting for him at the school bus stop, and meeting him at the presbytery, where the young man would go after school. The writer further noted in the letter that Gilles Joannette, the principal of a school, had seen Father Lussier giving the boy a driving lesson. He said the fifteen-year-old boy was sitting on the priest's knees.

Mr. Lalonde stated in the correspondence that he believed the matter merited serious consideration. It was evident that the relationship between the boy and the priest was more than friendly and was in fact abnormal:

Je crois que la situation mérite une très sérieuse consid[é]ration et que c'était mon devoir de vous renseigner à ce sujet. Les paroissiens et les élèves de Glen Robertson ne sont pas fous et il est évident qu'il existe une relation plus qu'amicale et certainement anormale entre [name of boy] et M. le Curé. Des personnes peuvent affirmer les avoir vu presque tous les soirs depuis quelques temps passer des heures seuls dans l'auto de M. le Curé dans la cour des [surname of boy] et cela jusqu'à onze heures et plus tard encore. La situation en est choquante. Ceux qui ont remarqué M. le Curé quitter la cour des [surname of boy] à des heures tardives ont aussi remarqué que M. le Curé n'allumait pas les phares de son automobile, s'[é]clairant des lumi[è]res de la rue, et faisait un d[é]tour pour revenir au presbytère.

People reported seeing the young man and Father Lussier spending time alone in the priest's parked car almost every night until late hours. Mr. Lalonde wrote that the situation was shocking and that the priest would leave the young man's yard with his lights off and take a circuitous route when he returned to the parish. Father Réjean Lebrun, Vice Chancellor for the Diocese, agreed that in 1967 this sort of behaviour was shocking and considered inappropriate.

Joseph-Aurèle Plourde was the Auxiliary Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria from 1964 to 1967. Bishop Adolphe Proulx arrived in the Diocese in June 1967. In April 1967, when the Diocese received the letter from the parishioner at Father Lussier's church, there was no bishop. An administrative vicar had been appointed to administer the Diocese. Bishop Proulx was not familiar with the priests in the Diocese when he arrived in the Cornwall area that summer, according to Father Lebrun.

Bishop Proulx met with a delegation from St. Martin de Tours Parish, in Glen Robertson. They wanted to discuss complaints about their priest, Father Lussier. The Bishop asked Father Lebrun to act as a witness at the meeting with the delegation from the parish. Father Lebrun testified that he was not aware of the April 29, 1967, letter. When asked if he inferred from the discussion that this was a sexual abuse complaint, Father Lebrun responded that it crossed his mind. He testified that he asked himself whether this was a sexual abuse complaint but did not pursue the issue with the Bishop.

At the meeting with Father Lebrun and Bishop Proulx, the parishioners discussed their strained relationship with Father Lussier. Father Lebrun testified that Father Lussier had a somewhat unusual temperament and that he had made a number of enemies in the parish: "Père Lussier a un tempérament un peu spécial et puis il s'était fait plusieurs ennemis dans la paroisse pour ainsi dire." Members of his parish wanted him to leave. They mentioned a friendship between a young man and Father Lussier but did not elaborate or discuss the contents of the April 29, 1967, letter. Father Lebrun testified that when he learned of the friendship, he did not become concerned. He stated that in 1967, he may have been naïve and not sensitive to issues of abuse. He considered the relationship somewhat curious but not more than that. Bishop Proulx did not ask Father Lebrun to follow up after the meeting.

After the meeting with the parishioners from St. Martin de Tours, Bishop Proulx reassigned Father Lussier to another parish. In a letter to Father Lussier on May 21, 1968, Bishop Proulx thanked him for his good service as the pastor of the parish at Glen Robertson. He stated that a group of followers had not accepted him for reasons he did not want to judge, nor had they made life easy for him. Bishop Proulx informed the priest that he would be sent to the St. Guillaume de Martintown Parish:

Je vous remercie pour les bons services que vous nous avez rendus depuis votre arrivée [sic] dans le Diocèse et comme Curé de la Paroisse de Glen Robertson. Comme vous le savez sans doute, un certain groupe de fidèles pour des raisons que je ne veux pas juger, ne vous ont pas toujours accepté ni fait la vie facile. J'ai pensé qu'il était préférable dans les circonstances, de vous nommer ailleurs où vous pourrez faire un travail apostolique dans la paix et la concorde.

This letter was sent more than a year after the parishioners' initial letter of April 29, 1967.

Father Lebrun did not know whether the Bishop conducted an investigation into the allegations set out in Michel Lalonde's letter. He was not aware of a police investigation or any other investigation into the allegations. Father Lebrun testified that he never met the young man referred to in the 1967 letter and did not know if anyone from the Diocese met with him. Nor did Father Lebrun discuss the situation with Father Lussier. Father Lebrun commented in his testimony that what he might recognize as suspicious conduct now, he would not have recognized as such in 1967.

Bishop Proulx met with Father Lussier on January 26, 1972, to discuss difficulties he was having with nuns and parishioners in Martintown. The Bishop wanted Father Lussier to voluntarily resign. Inscribed in Bishop Proulx's notes was that he would await Father Lussier's resignation, which he hoped to receive in June, failing which he would remove the priest from his position. Bishop Proulx made no promises to Father Lussier about another assignment.

On June 28, 1972, Bishop Proulx announced the appointment of Father Lussier to the parish of Dalkeith and Lochiel, in Glengarry County.

It is clear to me that the complaint in 1967 about Father Lussier was not a situation of rumours and innuendo. The parishioners had brought this matter to the Bishop formally in writing and had pursued it vigorously. This was a direct complaint regarding intimate contact of the priest with a fifteen-year-old boy. Even in 1967, parishioners were concerned about such issues and wished to discuss this matter with the Church in order to address the situation.

Problems With the Priest Persist

On October 21, 1993, Gilles Sabourin and René Lalonde sent a letter to Bishop Eugène LaRocque outlining their concerns regarding Father Lussier at his parish in Moose Creek. The letter was also copied to Father Evariste Martin, Father George Maloney, and Father Réjean Lebrun. Bishop LaRocque did not recall receiving the October 21, 1993, letter when he gave his evidence but did remember the great difficulties with Father Lussier at Moose Creek. The Bishop knew that Father Lussier had a difficult temperament. Bishop LaRocque often received complaints about Father Lussier between 1974 and 1993 regarding the content of his sermons and the priest's personality. However, the Bishop claimed that he never received any complaints about sexual misconduct by him.

In the October 21, 1993, letter, the parishioners referred to a meeting Bishop LaRocque had previously had with several members of the parish, on June 30, 1993, at Moose Creek, an area visited by the Bishop on several occasions. The parishioners said they were no longer capable of dealing with Father Lussier's public insults, sexist remarks, and verbal abuse. Bishop LaRocque undertook to address the issue within the next eight to nine weeks. The parishioners offered him a period of three months to find a replacement for the priest.

In the letter, they also referred to a second meeting with Bishop LaRocque, which was held on October 7, 1993. They noted that in the previous three months, nothing had occurred to address the situation and they had not received any communication from the Bishop to advise them of his intervention. The spokespersons for the Moose Creek parishioners noted that when they met with the Bishop for a second time, his reception of them was as cold as at the first meeting. Bishop LaRocque, according to the correspondence, had told them he had more important things to deal with and did not know if he could replace his priest. He mentioned that a priest had to retire at seventy-five years of age. The Bishop had told them that Moose Creek parishioners had the reputation of being the most critical:

Après 3 mois d'attente, rien ne se passé, pas de lettre ni d'appel de notre évêque pour nous aviser de son intervention.

Moi-même, Gilles Sabourin et René Lalonde, à titre de porte-parole des paroissiens, de Moose Creek, rencontrons l'évêque sur rendez-vous, pour une deuxième fois.

Son accueil est aussi froid que la première fois. Il nous dit qu'il a des choses plus importantes à s'occuper et qu'il ne voit pas quand il pourra remplacer notre curé. Il mentionne, par contre, qu'un prêtre doit se retirer à l'âge de 75 ans. Ensuite il nous dit que les paroissiens de Moose Creek ont la réputation d'être les plus "chialeux" et "critiqueux."

Bishop LaRocque recalled a discussion of the nature described in the letter. The Bishop claimed that when he said he had other more important things to deal with, he was referring to all the responsibilities of a bishop. He testified that at the time, he was the president of the Bishops of Ontario. He had meetings in Toronto almost every two weeks and was often absent from the Diocese.

In the letter, parishioners again asked Bishop LaRocque to intervene by the end of the month, October 1993, failing which they would seek recourse in the courts and/or in the media:

Nous sommes arrivés à notre dernière intervention auprès de vous.
Si aucune action n'est prise d'ici à la fin octobre, nous agirons par voie publique et/ou par voie judiciaire. Nous sommes prêts à aider le père Lussier à se retirer d'une façon honorable et digne d'un prêtre, mais nous ne sommes pas prêts à subir ses abus verbaux, ad vitam eternam.

Nous vous prions donc de ne pas attendre que le père Lussier soit obligé de répondre à des accusations judiciaires ou qu'il fasse l'objet des journaux locaux.

Dans votre grande sagesse Mgr. LaRocque, et avec l'aide de l'Esprit Saint, sûrement vous pouvez trouver une solution à notre grave problème qui dure depuis 14 ans, et auquel vous nous avez dit que nous aurions à endurer encore 5 ans à venir.

Bishop LaRocque testified that he does not think he was aware in 1993 of the 1967 letter written by Michel Lalonde regarding complaints about Father Lussier by parishioners. Bishop LaRocque also did not recall discussions with Father Lebrun about Father Lussier but knew that a number of priests were aware of his difficulties with the parishioners.

Father Lebrun denied that he had heard anything about allegations of a sexual nature regarding Father Lussier in 1993. He was aware that Father Lussier was quick tempered and that this often complicated things. Father Lebrun was a parish priest at St. James Church in Maxville, approximately five or six miles from Moose Creek, where Father Lussier was a parish priest. People often came to see Father Lebrun about Father Lussier. He stated that he listened to them but told them he was not Father Lussier's superior and that they should address their concerns with the Bishop.

Father Lebrun was copied on the October 21, 1993, letter to Bishop LaRocque. Gilles Sabourin, whom Father Lebrun knew, taught at the Catholic School of Maxville at this time. He came to see Father Lebrun on a few occasions and made it clear that he wanted things to change in Moose Creek.

Father Lebrun did not attend the meetings with Bishop LaRocque that were discussed in the October 21, 1993, letter. He was provided with a copy of the letter before it was sent to the Bishop but did not take any action since the problem was outside of his domain. Father Lebrun testified that it was very likely that the Bishop and he spoke about the complaints against Father Lussier.

Father Lussier was asked by Bishop LaRocque to retire. Bishop LaRocque met with the priest to discuss the complaints of parishioners. He told Father Lussier that he was approaching retirement age. Father Lussier agreed to resign. By letter dated October 29, 1993, Bishop LaRocque accepted the priest's resignation. Bishop LaRocque indicated that Father Lussier would stay with him while he contemplated his plans for his retirement. Father Lussier remained incardinated in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

Father Lussier Returns to the Diocese

Father Lussier spent several years with his sister in the United States. He returned to the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall in 1997, and Bishop LaRocque asked him to go for an assessment at Southdown Institute.

On July 3, 1997, Bishop LaRocque received a letter from Dr. Ruth Droege, the director of assessment at Southdown, confirming that Father Lussier was to attend for the assessment on July 27, 1997. The letter further stated:

If you have not already done so, I suggest that you share with Father Lucien the information for the assessment that you shared with me, to the extent possible. It would also be helpful for you to have discussed with Father Lucien your need to receive the written assessment report. At the beginning of the week, Father Lucien will be asked to sign a release of information indicating his willingness to communicate to you the assessment findings. The assessment will not proceed until this is one, unless another agreement between you and Father Lucien has been mutually reached.

The feedback session will be held by phone at 2:00 p.m. on Friday, August 1, 1997. Southdown welcomes your participation in the assessment which provides an opportunity for your concerns, together with those of individual assessed, to be heard.

As scheduled, on August 1, 1997, Bishop LaRocque received a telephone call from a therapist at Southdown concerning Father Lussier. Inscribed in notes by Bishop LaRocque are: "In the past was active with men (17+18) & women who approached him first." This note referred to a question the Bishop had asked the therapist about the age of the young people involved. Bishop LaRocque's notes read: "He did not initiate these actions. He has not been sexually active since 60. Avoid contact with young men. This is merely good judgment." Bishop LaRocque could not recall what the therapist meant by this. The Bishop testified that the emphasis appeared to be on the priest's temper and not on his difficulties with youths or sexuality.

Bishop LaRocque could not recall the findings of the assessment or the length of time Father Lussier remained at Southdown. Bishop LaRocque typically received reports from Southdown when he sent a priest to this facility. The priest was asked if he would sign a release, as mentioned in the letter from Dr. Ruth Droege, to permit the Bishop to see the reports.

After his assessment at Southdown, Father Lussier returned to the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall and was appointed by the Bishop as chaplain on August 17, 1998, at St. Joseph's Villa, a retirement home. The Reverend Gordon Bryan was asked by Bishop LaRocque to move Father Lussier into housing close to St. Joseph's Villa. The Reverend was on the board of the Villa at that time. He was aware that Father Lussier had been to Southdown the year prior, as the assessment had been billed to the office at the Diocese. When asked why Father Lussier had been sent to Southdown, Gordon Bryan indicated that it was either for alcohol problems or for anger management. He was aware that the priest angered easily but denied any knowledge of allegations of sexual abuse concerning Father Lussier.

In his letter confirming Father Lussier's appointment as chaplain, Bishop LaRocque stated that at the end of February 1999, the priest would be evaluated and an assessment would be done to determine whether he would continue in this position. Bishop LaRocque did not recall if this evaluation took place but knew that Father Lussier had difficulty there as well. He stated that the priest was arrogant and had insulted people. At a certain point, Bishop LaRocque removed him from the position as chaplain of the St. Joseph's Villa.

Father Lussier's File Not Read by Bishops

Bishop LaRocque confirmed that the 1967 letter sent by Michel Lalonde in Lucien Lussier's personnel file was not provided to the Ontario Provincial Police in 1998 because it was not specifically requested. Bishop LaRocque did not recall reviewing Father Lussier's file. He did not recall seeing Michel Lalonde's letter of April 29, 1967, nor meeting Mr. Lalonde. Bishop LaRocque first saw the letter in preparation for his testimony at the Inquiry. When the Bishop arrived in the Diocese, Father Lussier was in another parish in the north of the Diocese and no longer in Glen Robertson Parish at St. Martin de Tours.

Bishop Paul-André Durocher could not recall any conversations with Bishop LaRocque regarding Father Lucien Lussier but stated that they might have discussed the priest since Father Lussier continued to be involved in replacement ministry, filling in for other priests in the parishes. Bishop Durocher testified that he was not told by Bishop LaRocque that Father Lussier had been sent to Southdown. Bishop Durocher claimed that all the information he obtained regarding Father Lussier came from his personnel file.

Bishop Durocher, as a general rule, did not review the personnel files of priests. However, because of the requests of some priests, the Bishop gradually examined files over the years. Bishop Durocher looked at the files of the individuals involved in the Project Truth cases. He did not read Father Lussier's file at that time. There was no complaint against Father Lussier when Bishop Durocher arrived in 2004, so he saw no reason to read his file.

Bishop Durocher read Father Lussier's file only after a lawsuit was launched. The personnel file contained the April 29, 1967, letter discussed earlier, which outlined the alleged activities of Father Lussier with a young person in the parish.

In my view, the Diocese failed to sufficiently investigate the allegations of inappropriate contact with a young person by Father Lucien Lussier. It also failed to take appropriate action to identify potential victims of Father Lussier. Moreover, the Diocese failed to take appropriate action to ensure that young persons in the community would not be at risk of inappropriate contact by Father Lussier. It is also evident that the Diocese failed to provide training on the appropriate response to allegations of sexual misconduct by clergy involving young people.

It is also my view that Bishop Eugène LaRocque ought to have known of the inappropriate contact with young persons involving Father Lussier. He consequently did not take appropriate action to ensure that young persons in the community would not be at risk. In addition, he failed to take appropriate action to identify potential victims in relation to allegations of inappropriate contact by Father Lussier. Bishop LaRocque also failed to provide training to Church officials in his Diocese on how to respond to allegations of sexual misconduct by clergy.

In my opinion, it is very important that the outgoing Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall inform the incoming Bishop with respect to allegations of sexual misconduct by members of the clergy with young persons in the community. It is also important that bishops and other Church officials be conversant with the material in the personnel files of the priests, particularly with respect to allegations of sexual misconduct. Had this been done, Bishop Paul-André Durocher could have taken appropriate action to investigate the allegation of inappropriate contact by Father Lussier and could have taken action to identify potential victims in relation to these allegations.

Father François Lefebvre

Bishop Eugène LaRocque testified that he first learned of an allegation of sexual abuse against Father François Lefebvre when the complainant, André Gauthier, came to see him in February 1994. Mr. Gauthier told the Bishop that it was on the advice of his psychologist at the Cornwall General Hospital that he was meeting to discuss the abuse he alleged had been perpetrated by Father Lefebvre, a priest in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

After learning of the allegations of sexual abuse, Bishop LaRocque asked Mr. Gauthier for forgiveness on behalf of the Church, as Father Lefebvre was dead. The priest had died many years earlier, in 1978, at the age of seventy-six. According to the Bishop, Mr. Gauthier was aware that Father Lefebvre was dead at the time he made this complaint to the Church. Bishop LaRocque testified that he asked Mr. Gauthier not to blame himself and to pray for Father Lefebvre to help him forgive the priest and to heal. The Bishop further claimed that he told Mr. Gauthier that if he needed additional support or assistance, the Church would be prepared to give him this help. Bishop LaRocque testified that this was in conformity with the diocesan sexual abuse guidelines of offering financial assistance for counselling or psychiatric support to alleged victims of sexual abuse by members of the clergy.

Bishop LaRocque knew that Father Lefebvre had been a chaplain for seven years at Juvénat du Sacré-Coeur, a school for boys in grade 9 and 10 in Summers-town. Bishop LaRocque testified that he thought he asked someone at this institution if they had received any complaints.

Bishop LaRocque received a letter dated May 5, 1995, from lawyer Howard Yegendorf. Mr. Yegendorf wrote that he represented André Gauthier and that Father François Lefebvre had sexually abused his client for twenty years, between approximately 1955 and 1975. He stated that the abuse began when André Gauthier was ten years old and that "Mr. Gauthier has been seriously damaged as a result of the abuse."

On the instructions of Bishop LaRocque, the Reverend Gordon Bryan sent a letter dated May 17, 1995, to the Diocese lawyer, Peter Annis, at the law firm Scott & Aylen. He enclosed Mr. Yegendorf's correspondence and provided some background information regarding Father Lefebvre. He stated that the priest had been a chaplain in the Canadian army from 1943 to 1945 and then served in various parishes, such as Holy Cross, St. Francis de Sales, and St. Joseph's. From 1968 to 1975, he was the chaplain at Juvénat du Sacré-Coeur. From 1975 until his death, he lived at St. Joseph's Villa. He was the chaplain at St. Joseph's Villa until 1977.

The Reverend Bryan had himself been a parishioner of Father Lefebvre when he was a teenager. However, he testified that he had no prior knowledge of any allegations of abuse against Father Lefebvre. The Reverend Bryan was not aware of the outcome of civil litigation against the Diocese and the Estate of François Lefebvre.

In 2002, Paul-André Durocher became the Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. Bishop Durocher read Father François Lefebvre's file when the civil lawsuit was initiated, which was during the time he was Bishop. Although André Gauthier had disclosed his allegations to officials in the Diocese in 1994, a civil lawsuit was not filed until later, when Paul-André Durocher was Bishop of the Diocese.

In my view, notwithstanding the death of Father Lefebvre and the passage of time, the Diocese should have made a concerted effort to try to identify potential victims of Father François Lefebvre in order to offer these alleged victims of sexual abuse any needed support, assistance, or counselling.

I have commented on several occasions that the Diocese did not take steps to identify further potential victims of clergy sexual abuse. As was explained by a number of the context experts, sexual abuse is generally underreported. As a result, there may be victims of clergy sexual abuse of the Diocese who have not yet come forward. Because of this, and because there have been a number of confirmed cases of abuse of young people by clergy in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, as well as other reports of allegations of sexual abuse by diocesan clergy, the Diocese should make a public appeal and consider making an apology. As a part of its appeal, I recommend that the Diocese offer counselling and support to any alleged victims of clergy sexual abuse who come forward.

Recommendations

Encourage Report to Police

1. The Bishop, priests, employees, and volunteers of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall should encourage individuals who disclose the sexual assault/abuse²⁰ of an individual over the age of sixteen years old to report their allegation to the police.

Immediate Report to Children's Aid Society

2. The Diocese should add a provision to its "Diocesan Guidelines on Managing Allegations of Sexual Abuse of Children and of Sexual Assault of Adults by Clergy, Religious, Lay Employees, and Volunteers" (2003) that states that when a bishop is informed of an allegation of sexual assault/abuse made against a clergy member or diocesan employee or volunteer, he should report it to the civil authorities immediately, rather than waiting to make this report until after undertaking a preliminary inquiry.

Settlement Documents

3. The Diocese should carefully review settlement documents that are entered into by the Diocese and alleged victims of sexual assault/abuse to ensure that they contain no confidentiality clauses.

Information Sharing Within the Diocese and Among Dioceses

4. The Diocese should openly exchange information with other dioceses about allegations of sexual assault/abuse. If allegations of sexual assault/abuse arise against a priest who is not incardinated in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall but is working within the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall should inform the diocese within which the accused priest is incardinated or the religious order with which he is affiliated of the allegations, with full particulars. If allegations of sexual assault/abuse arise against a priest who is incardinated within the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall but is working within a different diocese, the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall should inform that other diocese of the allegations, with full particulars.

20. The reference to sexual assault/abuse refers to the sexual abuse of children and young people, whether current or historical, unless defined otherwise.

5. A diocesan protocol should be amended or a new protocol be developed to require that an outgoing bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall inform incoming bishops of allegations of sexual misconduct by members of the clergy, employees, or volunteers in the Diocese with children and young people in the community.

Note Taking and Record Keeping

6. The Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall should maintain accurate records of allegations of sexual assault/abuse made against clergy members, employees, or volunteers in the Diocese.
7. The Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall and other Church officials should be conversant with the material in the personnel files of priests, particularly with respect to allegations of sexual misconduct.

Training

8. All members of the clergy and employees and volunteers of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall should receive ongoing training about sexual assault/abuse. Those individuals delegated by the Diocese to have contact with victims who have been allegedly sexually assaulted/abused by members of the clergy or by diocesan employees or volunteers should receive specialized training on sexual assault/abuse. This training should address child sexual assault/abuse, historical sexual assault/abuse, and male sexual victimization. These individuals should also receive ongoing training and be required to attend regular refresher courses.
9. It is important that the bishop, priests, employees, and volunteers of the Diocese receive ongoing training regarding their statutory reporting duties to the Children's Aid Society under the Child and Family Services Act to ensure that children at risk are protected.

Screening

10. The Diocese should institute rigorous procedures for evaluating the suitability of candidates it plans to present for study at the seminary. It should also institute rigorous procedures to continually monitor and evaluate the suitability of candidates it presented to the seminary throughout the candidates' time there.
11. The Diocese should institute rigorous procedures to continually evaluate the suitability of its priests for ministry.

Diocese's Response to Allegations Against a Clergy Member or a Diocesan Employee or Volunteer

12. The Diocese should amend its existing protocols or create new protocols to address the following issues regarding its response to allegations against a clergy member or a diocesan employee or volunteer:
 - a. Upon being informed of an allegation of sexual assault/abuse against a priest, the bishop should immediately suspend the priest from active ministry. The priest should not be returned to active ministry until a criminal, civil, and/or internal process is completed.
 - b. The bishop must not be present when the individual who allegedly perpetrated sexual assault/abuse is speaking with his lawyer. This information is protected by solicitor-client privilege. The bishop should take a neutral approach because he has responsibilities not only to the alleged perpetrator but also to the alleged victim and the parishioners.
 - c. The "Diocesan Guidelines on Managing Allegations of Sexual Abuse of Children and of Sexual Assault of Adults by Clergy, Religious, Lay Employees, and Volunteers" (2003) states, "If at the conclusion of a Children's Aid Society or police investigation no charges are laid but the Advisory Committee deems the innocence of the accused remains in question, the Committee can direct the Delegate to investigate the allegations in order to make a comprehensive report to the Committee for recommendations to the Bishop" (emphasis added). It is recommended that the word can be replaced with the word shall in this sentence.
13. The Diocese should appoint a representative to monitor any criminal trials involving allegations of sexual assault/abuse against a clergy member or a diocesan employee or volunteer. Knowledge of the criminal proceedings will allow the Diocese to make appropriate decisions regarding how to deal with the accused individual (for example, whether the individual should be allowed to return to his or her post, whether an internal church investigation should be pursued, etc.), and in what ways the Diocese can support and provide assistance to the alleged victim(s). It will also ensure that if other victims are identified or other allegations emerge, the Diocese is able to respond properly and to assist the police, CAS, or other officials in their respective investigations.

14. In circumstances in which charges against a priest for alleged sexual assault/abuse are withdrawn or stayed for reasons other than the merits of the case—for example, the complainant is diagnosed with a terminal illness and is unable to testify—the Diocese should conduct a review of the incident to determine whether the priest constitutes a risk to young people such as parishioners and others with whom he has contact. The Diocese should impose appropriate measures if it concludes that the priest continues to pose a risk.
15. The Diocese should give serious consideration to amending its protocol(s) to provide that a priest who has been found guilty of sexual assault/abuse of a young person is prohibited from resuming ministerial duties. Evidence led at the Inquiry suggests that there is no current prohibition to prevent such resumption of duties. If it is ever decided that a priest who has been found guilty of sexual assault/abuse of a young person is to resume ministerial duties, it is recommended that strict restrictions be placed upon him.
16. The “Protocol for priests who are the subject matter of criminal proceedings or civil litigations” (1996) states that if certain conditions are present, a priest accused of an indictable offence will be placed on a leave of absence, and that after six months, this leave will become permanent. Thus, this provision could provide for the permanent dismissal of a priest who is later found not guilty. It is recommended that this protocol be amended to provide that if a priest is to be permanently removed from ministry, this removal will occur only after the conclusion of a criminal, civil, and/or church investigation.
17. The Diocese should require a priest who has allegedly assaulted/abused young persons who wishes to receive funding for a court appeal to submit a written request describing the reasons for the appeal. The Diocese should then review and assess the request and decide whether such funding should be provided.
18. If an individual who has been accused of sexual assault/abuse chooses to resign, the allegations should still be reported to the civil authorities and/or be fully investigated by the Diocese, and any alleged victims of the accused priest should be offered support and counselling.
19. The Diocese should create a policy that precludes the transfer of a clergy member who has committed an act of sexual misconduct to another diocese or religious order. Although evidence led at the Inquiry suggested that the Diocese would not permit the transfer of a clergy member who had committed an act of sexual misconduct to another diocese or religious order, it also revealed that the Diocese has no written policy precluding such a transfer.

20. The Diocese should create a policy regarding communication with the media on sexual misconduct and that this policy include guidance regarding the leadership role the Bishop is to take regarding the recovery process, as was recommended in the 2005 Catholic Mutual Canada review of the Diocese's policies. This communications policy should provide direction on how information is to be shared with clergy members and employees and volunteers of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, other dioceses, other public institutions such as the school board, members of the parish where the accused individual served, and the public at large, following disclosure, charges, or convictions related to incidents of sexual assault/abuse of young people by a clergy member or diocesan employee or volunteer. These plans should balance the rights of the alleged victims to privacy with the broader public interest of encouraging other alleged victims to come forward and to receive support.

Treatment of Accused Priests

21. In seeking therapeutic options for priests who have committed or who are alleged to have committed sexual abuse of young people, the Diocese should use only qualified treatment centres that specialize in treating sexual disorders and that evaluate patient outcomes in a disinterested, professional manner.

Public Appeal and Apology

22. The Diocese should make a public appeal, urging any victims of clergy sexual assault/abuse to come forward. Given that there have been a number of confirmed cases of sexual assault/abuse by clergy in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, that there have been other allegations of sexual assault/abuse reported against diocesan clergy, and that sexual assault/abuse is known to be generally underreported, it is likely that there are still victims of clergy sexual abuse within the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall who have not yet come forward. Therefore, the Diocese should convey the message that any individuals who come forward with allegations of clergy sexual assault/abuse will be treated with respect, dignity, and compassion. The Diocese should offer counselling and support to any alleged victims of clergy sexual assault/abuse who come forward.

23. The Diocese should consider making a public apology to all confirmed victims of sexual assault/abuse by clergy in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall and that this apology be delivered by the Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. Given that the Apology Act, which came into force in Ontario in April 2009, allows institutions to make apologies without admitting civil liability, it is also recommended that the Diocese consider extending such an apology to alleged victims who have reported allegations that have not been confirmed through a civil or Church process and to victims who have either opted not to come forward or who are yet to come forward. During the hearings, an apology from Bishop Paul-André Durocher to Lise Brisson, the mother of one of the victims of Father Gilles Deslauriers, was read by counsel. It was clear that this apology meant a great deal to Ms Brisson and provided a step toward healing for her. Such an apology could be a positive step toward healing for many of the victims and alleged victims of sexual assault/abuse by clergy in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

Recommended Proposal to the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops

The Bishop of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall is encouraged to propose the following measures to the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops.

24. A uniform national protocol for addressing allegations of sexual assault/abuse for dioceses in Canada should be developed. The national protocol should:
- a. be premised on the principles of transparency and openness discussed in From Pain to Hope and the 2005 Report of the Special Task Force for the Review of From Pain to Hope;
 - b. focus on prevention of sexual assault/abuse as well as care and counseling for victims allegedly assaulted/abused;
 - c. contain a provision prohibiting confidentiality clauses from being included in any settlements entered into between a diocese and an alleged victim of sexual assault/abuse;
 - d. contain guidance on the sharing of information regarding allegations of sexual assault/abuse between dioceses; and
 - e. contain guidance on either the prohibition of or the strict restrictions placed upon the transfer of a clergy member who has committed an act of sexual misconduct from one diocese to another.

Recommendations for the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall and Other Public Institutions

Child Protection Protocol, 2001

25. The Diocese should ask the current institutional partners in the Child Protection Protocol: A Coordinated Response in Eastern Ontario that was promulgated in 2001 to be included as a full party. The Diocese and its institutional partners shall meet as soon as practicable to review and update the protocol. For those partners actively involved in the investigation and prosecution of sexual assault/abuse cases, consistent roles for the participants should be set out as well as guidance on the sharing of information between investigating bodies. The process of reviewing and updating the protocol should continue triennially.

Institutional Response of the Children's Aid Society

History and Mandate of Children's Aid Societies

J.J. Kelso was a reporter at the Globe newspaper who wrote numerous stories about the plight of children on the streets of Toronto, especially the boys who delivered newspapers. In 1893, he was appointed Superintendent of Dependent and Neglected Children for Ontario. In this position, he created child protection legislation and travelled around Ontario speaking to citizens about establishing organizations to carry out the legislation. By 1907, there were about sixty Children's Aid Societies in Ontario; in 2006, there were fifty-three.

John Liston, an expert in the response of child welfare agencies to allegations of child sexual abuse, testified that, although the legal description of the mandate of Children's Aid Societies has changed over the years, their fundamental role has always been "investigation, counselling, guidance, care of children, adoption, supervision of children."

The mandate of a Children's Aid Society (CAS) was addressed in Ontario legislation in the 1960 Child Welfare Act. This Act stated:

A children's aid society may be established having among its objects the protection of children from neglect, the care and control of neglected children, assistance to unmarried parents, the placement of children in adoption, the supervision of children placed in adoption until an order of adoption is made and generally the discharge of the functions of a children's aid society under this Act, but no society shall act as such until it has been incorporated under The Corporations Act or a predecessor thereof and until it has been approved by the Lieutenant Governor in Council.¹

1. R.S.O. 1960, c. 53.

The 1970 Child Welfare Act stated:

- Every children's aid society shall be operated for the purposes of,
- (a) investigating allegations or evidence that children may be in need of protection;
 - (b) protecting children where necessary;
 - (c) providing guidance, counselling and other services to families for protecting children or for the prevention of circumstances requiring the protection of children;
 - (d) providing care for children assigned or committed to its care under this or any other Act;
 - (e) supervising children assigned to its supervision under this or any other Act;
 - (f) placing children for adoption;
 - (g) assisting the parents of children born out of wedlock or likely to be born out of wedlock and their children born out of wedlock; and
 - (h) any other duties given to it by this or any other Act.²

Significant changes to the legislation came with the 1984 Child and Family Services Act, which came into force on November 1, 1985 and which defined a child as an individual under sixteen years of age, thereby limiting Children's Aid Societies to dealing with persons under the age of sixteen. Section 15(3) of the Act stated that the functions of a Children's Aid Society were to:

- (a) investigate allegations or evidence that children who are under the age of sixteen years or are in the society's care or under its supervision may be in need of protection;
- (b) protect, where necessary, children who are under the age of sixteen years or are in the society's care or under its supervision;
- (c) provide guidance, counselling and other services to families for protecting children or for the prevention of circumstances requiring the protection of children;
- (d) provide care for children assigned or committed to its care under this Act;
- (e) supervise children assigned to its supervision under this Act;

2. R.S.O. 1970, c. 64, s. 6(2).

- (f) place children for adoption under Part VII; and
- (g) perform any other duties given to it by this or any other Act.

This description of functions was unchanged in the 1990 Child and Family Services Act,³ which is the legislation currently in force.

The 1984 Child and Family Services Act also contained a list of purposes—the principles upon which Children's Aid Societies should operate. One of these principles was to recognize that the least restrictive or least disruptive course of action should be followed. According to John Liston, there was concern that this principle was being given excessive weight in the decision-making process, which was seen as potentially contributing to the CAS not intervening firmly enough in some situations. In 2000, the Act was amended to specify that the “best interests of the child” was the paramount purpose. The other purposes listed in the Act are now referred to as “additional purposes.” These purposes can be considered, provided they are consistent with the “best interests, protection and well-being of children.” Section 1 of the Act now states:

Paramount purpose

- (1) The paramount purpose of this Act is to promote the best interests, protection and well being of children.

Other purposes

- (2) The additional purposes of this Act, so long as they are consistent with the best interests, protection and well being of children, are:
 - 1. To recognize that while parents may need help in caring for their children, that help should give support to the autonomy and integrity of the family unit and, wherever possible, be provided on the basis of mutual consent.
 - 2. To recognize that the least disruptive course of action that is available and is appropriate in a particular case to help a child should be considered.
 - 3. To recognize that children's services should be provided in a manner that,
 - i. respects a child's need for continuity of care and for stable relationships within a family and cultural environment,

3. R.S.O. 1990, c. C.11.

- ii. takes into account physical, cultural, emotional, spiritual, mental and developmental needs and differences among children ...⁴

Organization of Children's Aid Societies

Every area of the province is served by a Children's Aid Society. Some areas, such as Toronto, have multiple Children's Aid Societies, some of which serve different religious and ethnic communities. While all Societies share the same legislation and standards, each CAS is an independent corporation with its own Board of Directors and volunteers to assist in its functioning. All Societies are funded completely by the Ministry of Community and Social Services.

The Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry

Cornwall is serviced by the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS of SD&G). In addition to serving the United Counties, this CAS is also responsible for the Ontario section of the Mohawk territory of Akwesasne.

The CAS of SD&G has been in existence since at least 1908. It is a designated bilingual agency, and it functions twenty-four hours per day, 365 days of the year. In the mid-1960s, the CAS of SD&G had approximately fifteen staff members, consisting of an executive director, two supervisors, administrative and clerical staff, and two units of frontline workers. One of these units performed the protection duties of investigation, follow-up services, and looking after the needs of children in the temporary care of the CAS; the second unit looked after foster care, adoption, and the needs of children in the permanent care of the CAS. In 2006, the CAS of SD&G had a budget of $20 million and employed 115 staff members. In March 2006, it had 291 active investigations, 368 children in its care, and 391 cases assigned to family services staff (cases where there had already been a determination that a child needed protection).

4. In 2006, the following subclauses were added:

- iii. provides early assessment, planning and decision-making to achieve permanent plans for children in accordance with their best interests, and
- iv. includes the participation of a child, his or her parents and relatives and the members of the child's extended family and community, where appropriate.

The Board of Directors is the governing body of the Society. Next in the hierarchy is the executive director, followed by the clinical director, and, on the service side, two service managers, who are responsible for blocks of teams. There are three investigation teams, which each comprise about six workers. Family Services carries cases in which there has been a determination that children are in need of protection and ongoing work is needed with the family. The Adoption Service deals with adoptions, and the Child and Youth Service deals with children who are permanent wards of the CAS.

The CAS of SD&G's current mission statement is, "The Children's Aid Society of Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry protects children from abuse and neglect, while supporting the safe and healthy development of children in their families and community."

Funding of Children's Aid Societies

Historically, Children's Aid Societies were community based and operated independently of each other. Initially, they relied on donations from individuals and private bodies such as churches. Over time, they applied to city and county councils for funding. Eventually, grants from the province and municipalities became more fixed and were based on various formulas. By the mid-1960s, the province was contributing 60 percent of the funding, and municipalities were contributing 40 percent. Over the years, the proportion of funding assumed by the province gradually increased until, in or around 1998–2000, the Ontario provincial government assumed 100 percent of the funding of all Children's Aid Societies.

The Relationship Between Children's Aid Societies and the Ministry of Community and Social Services

In the early 1900s, Children's Aid Societies were non-profit, charitable, non-government organizations, regulated under general legislation governing charities. They were granted basic legislative powers related to the protection of children.

The first legislation to govern the protection of children and the organization, membership, and management of Children's Aid Societies in Ontario was the 1927 Children's Protection Act.⁵ This Act authorized the provincial government to approve the formation of Children's Aid Societies and to advise and instruct them regarding how their duties were to be performed.

Amendments to the Children's Protection Act in 1931, 1932, 1934, 1942, and 1949 granted the provincial government the authority to make regulations regarding:

5. R.S.O. 1927, c. 279.

- the mode of incorporation of a Society and the fees, if any, to be paid upon incorporation;
- a standard form of constitution and by-laws, providing for provisions for the proper care, treatment, and inspection of all children of which it was the legal guardian, or who were in its charge;
- the appointment and duties of a local Society superintendent;
- the Society's duties and scope; and
- the required qualifications of members of Society staff.

In 1954, the Child Welfare Act replaced the Children's Protection Act. The two Acts were similar in regard to the establishment and management of Children's Aid Societies. However, the Child Welfare Act provided for the appointment of a Director of Child Welfare, who was to advise, inspect, and supervise Societies.

In the late 1950s and through the 1960s, the government became more involved with the functioning of Children's Aid Societies. Societies continued to provide direct service to parents and children while the Ministry of Community and Social Services provided grants and supervisory, advisory, and consultative services to assist the Societies. During this period, there was movement away from engaging volunteers and towards the hiring of professional staff. Shortly after a new Child Welfare Act was passed in 1965, child welfare supervisors were hired. All of the child welfare supervisors had Masters degrees in Social Work and experience working in Children's Aid Societies. These supervisors visited Societies to assess the quality of service they provided. They based their assessments largely on their own personal experiences rather than specific standards or guidelines.

In the 1970s, the province started introducing standards with respect to abuse. In the late 1970s, the Ministry of Community and Social Services decentralized and established twelve area offices. Ministry program supervisors were assigned to work with specific Societies, and the frequency of contact between the Ministry and Societies was greatly increased.

The 1984 *Children and Family Services Act*⁶ set out that a Ministry director is required to, among other things "advise and supervise societies," "inspect or direct and supervise the inspection of the operation and records of societies," "inspect or direct and supervise the inspection of places in which children in the care of societies are placed," and "ensure that societies provide the standard of services and follow the procedures and practices" required under the Act.

When the Ministry began providing all of the funding for Children's Aid Societies, funding became based on volume of cases. The province also started to specify who was eligible for the service it was funding and began regularly auditing eligibility.

Unlike in provinces that operate child protection agencies through government ministries, Children's Aid Societies in Ontario are governed by community boards. Thus, the Societies still retain some autonomy from the provincial government. The responsibilities of CAS Boards generally include providing overall policy and administrative direction for the organization, approving and monitoring implementation of the policies of the Society to ensure that legislation and regulations are enforced, reviewing and approving budgets, and appointing a local director for the administration and enforcement of the child protection legislation and regulations in the area in which the Society has jurisdiction. According to John Liston, these Boards continue to have a significant responsibility because children in the care of Ontario Children's Aid Societies are wards of the local Society, not wards of the provincial government.

The Ministry of Community and Social Services currently has nine regional offices in Ontario. Within each office there are program supervisors,⁷ who serve as the primary contact between Societies and the Ministry and have the authority to enter Societies and inspect the facilities, the services provided, the books of account, and records relating to the services.

The Ministry has mandated the procedures, practices, and standards for child protection cases, including the use of the Risk Assessment Model for Child Protection in Ontario (ORAM) and the Child Abuse Register. ORAM, which will be discussed in more detail in the next section, is an assessment tool that guides CAS workers in how to manage child protection cases. The Child Abuse Register is a confidential register operated by the Ministry that contains the names of persons who have been verified by a CAS to have abused children within the meaning of the Child and Family Services Act. The Register is used by all Societies as part of their investigations of subsequent abuse allegations.

The Ministry of Community and Social Services requires Children's Aid Societies to report all serious occurrences involving children, such as deaths or serious injuries of children in care or suspicions of abuse or mistreatment of children in care, to a Ministry regional office. The report must also include the steps the Society is taking to deal with the situation or, if possible, to avoid a recurrence of the incident. The Ministry follows up to ensure that the responsible authority within the Society has taken the steps outlined in the initial report.

7. Their authority is granted by the Child and Family Services Act, R.S.O., 1990, c. C.11, s. 6.

Section 34 of the Children and Family Services Act states that the Minister may establish residential placement advisory committees, which are to review certain residential care arrangements and make recommendations. In addition, pursuant to section 66 of the Child and Family Services Act, a Ministry director conducts a yearly review of the status of Crown wards who have been Crown wards for at least two years.

The Relationship Between Children's Aid Societies and the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies

The Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies (OACAS) has been in operation since 1912. It represents Children's Aid Societies and can liaise with government about their concerns, including concerns regarding government legislation. Membership in this association is voluntary. As of 2006, fifty-two of the fifty-three Children's Aid Societies of Ontario, including the CAS of SD&G, were members.

The OACAS is involved in research and special projects and assisting in government policy development. It also administers an Accreditation Program, which a number of Children's Aid Societies have participated in since the mid-1990s. The OACAS is also responsible for the delivery of child protection training, which is funded by the Ministry of Children and Youth Services.

The next section will provide a summary of the evolution of policies, protocols, and procedures for the CAS of SD&G and will provide comments on the duty to report, the Child Abuse Register, and the Dawson Review. Following the policies section, I will examine the response of the CAS of SD&G to reported allegations of sexual abuse of young people in the Cornwall area. I will comment on the investigation of matters brought to the attention of the CAS of SD&G involving young people in the community who fell within its mandate, and complaints made by those placed in foster homes and group homes that were supervised by the Society. I will look at allegations made against caseworkers, foster parents, and staff, or persons otherwise associated with the CAS of SD&G. I will make recommendations on issues such as the duty to report to the CAS, the training of personnel, the screening of staff and foster parents, the reporting of allegations to police and employers for investigation, the provision of counselling for victims, and the review of policies and protocols. I will comment on the importance of communication, the sharing of information, the conducting of joint investigations with the Cornwall Community Police Service and the Ontario Provincial Police, and the interactions of the CAS of SD&G with other public institutions.

The Development of Protocols and the Relationships Between the Children's Aid Society of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry and Other Agencies and Organizations

The Development of Protocols With Other Agencies

The Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS of SD&G) has collaborated with a variety of agencies and organizations to develop protocols and policies related to child sexual abuse. The development of the first child sexual abuse protocol involving the CAS of SD&G began in 1985. A protocol covering Stormont, Dundas, and Glengarry, "Child Sexual Abuse Protocol: A Co-ordinated Response in the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry," was finalized in 1992. Development of this protocol involved several agencies, including the local Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), the Cornwall Community Police Service (CPS), local school boards, and public health and health care organizations.

In July 2001, the "Child Protection Protocol: A Coordinated Response in Eastern Ontario" was finalized. It covered Eastern Ontario, including four area Children's Aid Societies, some health care services and agencies, as well as several police forces in the area.⁸ The scope of this protocol was broader than the 1992 protocol in that it included all forms of child maltreatment. It also included a brief reference to "historical abuse."

The CAS of SD&G also has a collaboration agreement with women's shelters in the area, largely dealing with domestic violence but also containing information on the duty to report child abuse and the definition of a "child in need of protection."

In 1995, the CAS of SD&G assisted the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall in drafting its guidelines, "Diocesan Guidelines on Sexual Abuse by Priests, Deacons, Seminarians and Pastoral Assistants." Subsequent to the development of these guidelines, the CAS of SD&G provided a training session to the Diocese in October 1995. The CAS of SD&G has continued to be involved with the Diocese to provide advice on development of Diocese policy in the area of sexual abuse.

Bill Carriere, who held several positions with the CAS of SD&G over the course of his thirty-three-year career with the Society, testified that, in 2006, the CAS of SD&G was meeting with local OPP representatives and the CPS to update local child protection protocols, noting that updates were needed to deal with risks associated with the Internet. In addition, the Society is working with the Cornwall Community Hospital on a protocol concerning the local medical examination of child victims of abuse, so that such children need not be transported to Ottawa.

There are no policies, standards, or guidelines at the CAS of SD&G regarding the disclosure of allegations of child sexual abuse to an alleged abuser's employer with the exception of cases involving individuals employed in a school or child-care setting. This requirement was included in the 2001 "Child Protection Protocol: A Coordinated Response in Eastern Ontario." When Richard Abell, who was the executive director of the CAS of SD&G from 1990 until 2007, testified, he said that he was not aware of any legislation or regulations requiring the CAS to notify an alleged abuser's employer of allegations of abuse.

Policies on Making Claims for Compensation

In 1984, Children's Aid Societies across Ontario received a memorandum from the Ministry of Community and Social Services pointing out that they can make civil claims for compensation for abuse or apply to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board. Recently, the CAS of SD&G has implemented a process to look at available compensation. Initially, the CAS of SD&G did not include Crown wards who may have been abused in care in this process, but I am informed that this policy has changed and applications for compensation to victims of verified abuse will be made in every case. This action is appropriate, and I commend the CAS of SD&G for this initiative.

Intake and Investigation Procedures for Protection Services

Protection Services is divided into three areas: intake, investigations, and family services. As explained by Bill Carriere, intake is the "gate into the Agency" and is the point where the agency determines whether a referral fits within its mandate. Formal guidelines with respect to intake of child abuse cases were introduced in 1979 with a document provided by the Ministry of Community and Social Services, "The Standards and Guidelines for the Management of Child Abuse Cases under the Child Welfare Act (1978) by the Children's Aid Societies." According to Mr. Carriere, these standards and guidelines did not provide as much information as the current standards about what should be included in an intake referral. They did not, for example, cover reports of historical abuse.

In 1992, the Ministry of Community and Social Services eliminated the 1979 standards and guidelines and created a set of mandatory standards. The introduction of these standards meant that there was some standardization of the intake process among all Children's Aid Societies across Ontario. Unlike the previous standards and guidelines, the 1992 standards did refer to historical abuse, indicating that Children's Aid Societies should encourage historical abuse victims over sixteen years of age to report the abuse to police and to avail themselves of community resources.⁹ In addition to Ministry guidelines and standards, the CAS of SD&G adopted, with some modification, the Risk Factor Matrix from Washington State. This risk assessment tool was used in the 1980s and 1990s until the introduction of the Risk Assessment Model for Child Protection in Ontario (ORAM) in 1998.

ORAM provided detailed standards and assessment tools for the investigation of cases of abuse of children. It has three major components: an eligibility spectrum, a safety assessment, and a risk assessment. The eligibility spectrum allows intake staff to assess the referrals received and determine whether they are eligible for agency involvement. It also assists in determining the level of severity of referrals and the required response time. For severe cases, intervention could be within twelve hours; in moderately severe cases, the standard at the CAS of SD&G is seven days. It also gave greater prominence to historical cases of child sexual abuse in that it had a category for historical abuse. The safety assessment focuses on immediate safety and may be used to inform a decision to apprehend a child. The third component is a risk assessment instrument, which is used to predict risk of future harm and to support decisions regarding the need for ongoing services or appropriate future actions. This three-part model involved eleven risk decision points for a CAS in cases referred to it.

From time to time, various aspects of the risk assessment tools have been modified; for example, the eligibility spectrum was modified and augmented in 2000 and more decision points were added. The most significant development was that the 2000 ORAM made the standards applicable to all forms of maltreatment of children, not just abuse cases.

The second area of Protection Services is investigations. If a referral is assigned for investigation, depending on the severity of the case, the staff of the CAS of SD&G may see all the children in the family under the age of sixteen within twelve hours. A worker also meets with family members, witnesses, or others who may have information that would help determine if a child is in need of protection. The structure afforded by the Ontario Risk Assessment Model is considered useful in making decisions at various points in an investigation. Currently, the CAS of SD&G has a two-part roster system for assigning cases at the investigation stage. There is an Emergency Response System, which applies if an immediate response is needed within twelve hours; these cases would go to on-call workers. The second-stage roster consists of those cases that do not require immediate assignment. Those cases are assigned to an investigator within seven days. In addition to the degree of urgency, there are other considerations in assigning staff, such as gender, worker expertise, prior contact with a family, and language capacity. Bill Carriere testified that, increasingly, two workers are being assigned to an investigation.

In all investigations, there is a standard question in the safety assessment that requires a worker to explore with any young person who is under the age of sixteen whether he or she is at risk of sexual abuse.

In the Cornwall area, management staff of the CAS of SD&G noted that it has a working relationship with the Children's Treatment Centre, which provides counselling to children who have suffered sexual abuse. The centre, which opened in 1996, was a result of an initiative of Angelo Towndale, who worked for the CAS of SD&G for thirty years. Mr. Towndale testified that approximately 40 percent of the cases that the Centre receives are referred from the CAS. From 1986 to the early 1990s, the CAS of SD&G offered its own specialized sexual abuse treatment program, called the Family Sexual Abuse Treatment Program, but it was discontinued in the mid-1990s due to budget pressures and a reduced caseload of sexual abuse cases.

The third area of Protection Services is family services. If a decision is made that a child is in need of protection, the file is moved to the family service unit. This unit works with the family to reduce protection concerns to the point that the family can function on its own. If such work is not successful, the Society may seek a court order and the children may become Crown wards or permanent wards of the CAS of SD&G. The file is then transferred to the child and youth team.

If an allegation of historical abuse is received, the CAS of SD&G encourages the person involved to report the incident to the police, and the person may be directed to community victim-assistance services. However, the CAS of SD&G initiates an investigation only if there is an allegation or evidence that a child under the age of sixteen is at risk or may have been abused. Unless a young person is already subject to a child protection order, a Children's Aid Society takes the position that it cannot investigate allegations of abuse regarding sixteen- or seventeen-year-olds.

Screening and Supervision of Employees

Since April 1989, all staff recruited by the CAS of SD&G are required to have a current police record check. In addition, applicants must submit two or, preferably, three references, which are checked before employment is confirmed. There are two tools, however, that Ontario Children's Aid Societies are not permitted to use to screen potential employees: the Child Abuse Register and the provincial Child Protection Fast Track Information System. The Fast Track system is a database containing names of individuals who have had any contact with an Ontario CAS. The Child Abuse Register, which will be discussed in greater detail later in this chapter, comprises confidential records of the names of persons who have been verified by a CAS as having abused children within the meaning of the Child and Family Services Act. In some provinces, such as Nova Scotia and Manitoba, child welfare organizations are able to use the equivalent of the Ontario registries to screen potential child welfare workers. Bill Carriere testified that access to the Ministry Fast Track System would permit the agency to obtain information about a prospective employee's past involvement with an Ontario CAS. In this way, a CAS could avoid hiring individuals who could be attracted to the position because of the access to vulnerable children.

I agree that access to the Fast Track System and the Child Abuse Register for checks on potential CAS employees is a needed change for Ontario and that it would provide an extra mechanism to protect children. All Children's Aid Societies are in a particular position of trust with respect to children, and every safeguard should be available to ensure that those working in Children's Aid Societies are not themselves a risk to children. As other Canadian provinces already have this capacity in place, the change is overdue.

Staff at the CAS of SD&G are usually required to have specialized educational qualifications. For example, child and youth care workers have community college diplomas in social services or child and youth care. Efforts are being made to recruit staff with a Bachelors or Masters degree in Social Work, and considerable senior management effort goes into extensive interview and role-playing processes to determine theoretical knowledge and practical experience.

Newly hired staff are on probationary employment for at least six months prior to being confirmed as permanent employees. Less experienced workers may have a nine-month probationary term. All workers receive regular supervision through weekly or bi-weekly meetings with their supervisor or manager. Supervision notes are produced for these sessions. In addition, units or teams have regular meetings, the minutes of which are maintained. Managers also use tracking forms to assist in overseeing work, and frontline staff also track matters such as documentation completion, client contact, and supervision of cases. All documentation must be reviewed and approved by managers. There is a process of annual performance review.

Starting in 2001, senior management has conducted regular file audits. Audit results are shared with staff, the management team, and the governing Board of Directors of the Society. In addition, the Ministry of Community and Social Services performs an annual review of Crown wards. And, since November 2004, the CAS of SD&G has had a Quality Assurance Committee.

Training of CAS of SD&G Employees

Newly hired staff are required to complete a New Worker Training Program, which includes sections on child sexual abuse. This training program extends over three or four months, covers fundamental aspects of child protection, and is funded by the Ontario government. Effective June 2005, prior to being assigned a child sexual abuse case, a worker must complete training on forensic interviewing. The CAS of SD&G has recently provided internal training on forensic interviewing for management staff. In addition, the CAS of SD&G has a statement validity analysis tool for staff and provides training on this tool on a discretionary basis.

The CAS of SD&G has a Staff Training Committee, which develops an annual training calendar, including written materials and major training events for front-line staff, foster parents, and community partners. It continues to consider relevant training topics, such as training by a psychologist on how to manage sexualized behaviours by children in a foster home setting.

In the past, the CAS of SD&G had access to excellent joint police–CAS training offered by the Institute for the Prevention of Child Abuse (IPCA) and by the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies (OACAS). This training afforded the opportunity for child welfare workers to be trained with police officers, which also increased understanding of the interactions between police and child welfare workers as partners in protecting children and built useful networks. As well, the training involved mock interviews with children, a particularly practical learning component.

This valuable training ceased to be available in 1995, but management staff of the CAS of SD&G indicated that they made every effort to have their staff enrolled when it was available. In my view, it is imperative that joint training of a calibre provided by IPCA in the past be re-instituted in Ontario and be widely available across the province. The program should incorporate training on reports of historical sexual abuse.

Procedures When Complaints Are Made About the CAS

The CAS of SD&G has complaints procedures in place and a pamphlet to outline this procedure. If clients believe that the CAS is treating them unjustly, there is an internal complaint process available to them. If dissatisfied with the CAS response, they can take their complaint to the Child and Family Services Review Board.¹⁰

10. The authority for the Board to receive complaints is found in the Child and Family Services Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.11, s. 68.1.

Policies and procedures were formally introduced by the CAS of SD&G in 2001 to address allegations of child maltreatment by staff or management. Even prior to that, there was an established practice to call on neighbouring Children's Aid Societies to investigate internal allegations of child abuse. When such an allegation is made, all relevant material is provided to the CAS that is asked to investigate, and the CAS of SD&G takes a "hands off" approach to the case.

In the late 1970s and early 1980s, if the CAS of SD&G received a complaint regarding a foster home or group home, it would notify the police and conduct a joint investigation. If the alleged perpetrator was in the home, children were removed and statements recorded and shared with police. Results of the investigation were rarely shared with the foster home. While this practice may have been in place during that period of time, it was not always followed. I examine specific complaints in later sections of this chapter.

Since 1992, the practice has been that, if there is an allegation of abuse in a foster home, the CAS of SD&G will convene a planning meeting, notify the police, and develop a safety plan for the victim and other children in the home. The foster home is notified of the review within twenty-four hours. Interviews are scheduled with the family and an investigator designated. Following an investigation, there is a disposition conference, and a summary report, with conclusions and recommendations made by the investigators and confirmed by management, which is provided to the foster home.

Record Keeping and Access to Records

Case notes are produced for all activities associated with a case. The case notes are, in turn, the basis for the production of other required documentation, including documentation required by provincial legislation, regulations, standards, and guidelines. For example, in 2000, the Ministry of Community and Social Services introduced a child protection standard on record keeping. It provided that contemporaneous notes of any contact related to a child and families should be kept by child protection workers and any child protection summary recordings should be signed and dated by the child protection worker and approved, signed, and dated by the child protection supervisor.

Over time, a variety of recording formats have been used for case notes and other documentation. In 1998, the Intake and Family Recording System (IFRS) came into effect. It is a provincial recording system consisting of a series of modules that workers complete. The IFRS ensures greater consistency across the province; on the other hand, it has also been criticized as being too compliance driven and for not providing a good case history.

Some documents must be completed within specified times, such as the safety assessment, which is required to be completed within twenty-four hours of contact. Other required documents include a document outlining whether an allegation is substantiated and if any other allegations have emerged during the investigation. Disposition reports must reflect whether the child is in need of protection and any determination made on whether to close the file. The comprehensive assessment report looks at the details of risk and factors such as available support systems. If the case remains open, this latter document also leads to a plan of service, often involving other community partners and clients. Ninety days after the initial plan of service is developed, there is another eligibility assessment to determine if CAS involvement is still warranted. There is an ongoing process of reassessment of open files and plans of service, with updating every six months.

Records are retained on a permanent basis from the inception of the CAS of SD&G. There is no policy related to record destruction. Some earlier records were microfiched because of the disintegration of old paper records. Since 1985, foster parents have been trained on maintaining notes for records.

There are no across-the-board standards for the disclosure of case records to former wards or those subject to protection orders. Neither are there standards regarding counselling or other supports that people may need when they see their records. Bill Carriere testified that a policy on record requests by adults was established within the past decade by the CAS of SD&G. The agency still has a significant backlog in meeting requests.

The government of Ontario should develop standards and provide guidance to all Children's Aid Societies on disclosure of records and the type of records those in care should have access to. This process should include review of provisions of Part VIII of the Child and Family Services Act,¹¹ which deals with confidentiality and access to records. Some of these provisions are unproclaimed. Knowledge of one's history is fundamental to one's development as an adult and, in some cases, is needed to support legitimate civil litigation or applications to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board. Ian MacLean of the CAS of SD&G had some useful suggestions for the kind of records that should be disclosed, such as a full school and medical history, school reports, certificates earned, recreational activities, and churches attended. I will discuss the issue of records further in examining specific cases of records requests made by individuals who were in the care of the CAS SD&G as children.

The CAS of SD&G keeps statistical records about child sexual abuse cases, which contain a lot of useful information including:

- the number of referrals received;
- the number of cases referred that were investigated; and
- whether a file was new or was re-opened for investigation.

Bill Carriere testified that a high number of cases being re-opened could raise concerns about the service provided previously.

Statistics also provide records on whether the CAS of SD&G is meeting its requirements to contact children within twelve hours, the level of police involvement, the number of cases in which abuse is verified by the Society, and the number of cases where a report was made to the Child Abuse Register.

The maintenance of publicly available statistical information is useful for community partners and the public to better understand the incidence of and response to abuse in their community. I would urge the CAS of SD&G to continue to develop statistical reporting and analysis as an additional tool to understand past activities and improve future response.

Foster Homes

Recruitment of Foster Parents

The Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS of SD&G) has never had enough foster homes to meet the needs of children entrusted to its care.¹²

From the 1950s to the 1970s, the Homefinding Department at the Society was staffed by a single worker. In 1980, the Society hired a second worker for this department. Workers in the Homefinding Department were responsible for responding to inquiries about fostering and for performing assessments of foster parents and homes, as well as some recruitment activities. However, prior to 2000, the Society depended largely on word of mouth to assist in recruiting foster parents. Other strategies included advertisements run in the newspaper and newspaper articles addressing the need for foster homes.

12. According to Ian MacLean's statistics and trends analysis, as of December 2005, 74.7 percent of the children in the care of the CAS of SD&G were placed in family settings. In September 2005, the statistics indicate that only 61.4 percent of CAS of SD&G children in care were being cared for by the foster care system, while 91 children (26 percent) were being cared for in outside paid group or foster resources, 60 (17 percent) of which were outside the jurisdiction of the CAS of SD&G. In 2001, the agency's goal was to have 200 foster homes. This goal remained as of 2006. This number of approved foster homes would allow for clinically based placement decisions.

In 2000, the CAS of SD&G established a Recruitment Committee. This committee comprises foster parents, staff, and representatives from the community and is responsible for assessing the Society's need for foster parents and for producing an annual recruitment plan and budget.

Prior to 1985, few policies or regulations governed the recruitment and screening of foster parents. A November 1976 memo from the Ministry of Community and Social Services to all Children's Aid Societies, entitled "Screening of Individuals and Families for the Care of Children," stated:

There is a general need for each Society to review it's [sic] policies and procedures used to screen individuals entrusted with supervision or care of children. For our part, we are presently exploring with the Ministry of the Solicitor-General the whole question of a search of criminal records for applicants for fostering, adoptions or volunteer services. As soon as these discussions are concluded, we will be writing to you again. Meanwhile we recommend that the question of a criminal record should be explored in the screening interview. If any convictions are acknowledged, their relevance and implications for the role of caretaker of children should be carefully assessed.

The minutes from a February 1977 CAS of SD&G staff meeting stated:

[a] recent Memo from Branch suggested obtaining of criminal records on persons responsible for care of CAS wards. Since then Mr. Ken MacDonald has met with people from the Office of the Attorney General and the Police Association who have agreed to refuse to supply such information to CAS. Therefore, request in departmental memorandum cancelled.

There were no police checks performed on prospective foster parents until around 1984.

In 1979, the CAS of SD&G released a foster home policy that provided the following instructions, which are an extract from the Child Welfare Act, 1965, as amended, for foster home workers:

- a) The Society shall, within thirty days after receiving an application to board a child, begin an investigation of the application.

- b) The Society shall, interview separately and jointly the male and female applicants and assess the consequences for other children in the home of the applicants of granting the application.
- c) The Society shall, record description of the home and an assessment of its competence and suitability as a foster home; and,
- d) re-assess each foster home at intervals of not less than six months and record the re-assessment.
- e) Prospective foster parents shall provide names and addresses of persons who can give character references such as: clergyman, doctor, 3 persons other than doctor or minister who have known applicants intimately at least 3 years, and one relative. However, if applicants do not attend church of their faith, they may give the name of another professional in place of the clergyman.
- f) Applicants should be required to show evidence of a thorough medical examination to assess physical and mental health.

Ian MacLean, former director of Residential Services at the CAS of SD&G, testified that, although the provisions of the Act were seen as good practice, no provisions were considered mandatory until 1985, when the licensing of foster homes and corresponding standards and guidelines were introduced.

Prior to 1985, inquiries regarding fostering were followed up with a phone call or visit. The next step was the completion of an application to foster. Three references were requested, from a priest or minister, friend, neighbour, or family member. In some cases, parents of applicants were used as references. Ian MacLean testified that using such references was not considered unusual at the time and is still done today. Each prospective foster parent would also undergo a medical examination.

The next step was an internal cross-reference check of applicants. Before the system was computerized in the 1990s, this check was completed using the CAS of SD&G's index-card system. This check would reveal if there were a protection file related to the foster parents. However, the cross-reference alerted the Society only to CAS-related issues within families, and, as there were no police checks performed until around 1984, there was no way of checking on issues not involving the CAS.

After these steps were taken, a home visit and an interview with the applicant(s) were completed. The home study was short—the form was about two pages in length—and had no structure. The record would describe the physical aspects of the home, state that the marriage licence had been examined, provide a summary of the references and medical reports, and provide a brief description of the parents and their children (if applicable). The worker would briefly interview the father and mother separately and then together. Ian MacLean testified that, starting in the 1970s and until 1985, “[t]he visit to the home was to see that there was a bed and that there was sort of food and water on the table, and the basics of life,” but there was no assessment of safety. He agreed that these visits “could be seen as superficial.”

The Child and Family Services Act, 1984, which came into force in 1985, required the CAS to apply for a licence to operate its foster parent system and introduced more stringent standards regarding foster care.¹³ In 1985, the CAS of SD&G developed a foster care policy that required police checks of applicants, pre-service training, interviews with birth children, separate interviews with each applicant, an interview with the couple together, and a health and safety check of the applicants’ home.

In 1990, Joyce Cohen, a professor at the University of Toronto School of Social Work, was hired by the CAS of SD&G to provide training in conducting home studies. She introduced the McMaster model, which provided guidelines designed to examine the inner workings of the family. The guidelines were meant to determine factors such as who made the decisions in the family and the style of communication and discipline in the home. The McMaster model was used by the CAS of SD&G until 2006, when the Parent Resources for Information, Development, and Education (PRIDE) model (discussed further below) was introduced.

In 2005, the CAS of SD&G introduced a new foster care policy that stated that all individuals who inquire about fostering will be contacted and invited to attend an information session. This session provides an overview of the Society and its services and an opportunity to discuss questions and concerns with a CAS resource worker. The policy also states that arrangements will be made for an approved foster parent to contact potential applicants to provide a realistic perspective on fostering.

The 2005 foster care policy states that applicants who have a record of verified or substantiated child abuse and neglect will not be approved as foster parents. It also states that the CAS may reject any applicants if there is a suspicion that they are guilty of neglect or abuse.

The policy requires that a police reference check be completed on all adults in a prospective foster family. Ian MacLean explained that the criminal record check with the Cornwall Community Police and the Ontario Provincial Police is much broader than in the past. The intent is to detect not just criminal charges but any police involvement that an individual has had. There is a release that allows the police to provide information regarding any history of sexual abuse. Ian MacLean testified that RCMP fingerprinting is now also a requirement.

The Child Protection Fast Track Information System (Fast Track) is a province-wide database of CAS client activity that first came into operation around 1998. Through Fast Track, a CAS can quickly determine if a particular client has a history of child protection involvement. However, a CAS is not permitted to use Fast Track or the Child Abuse Register in the screening of foster parent applicants.

In 2005, the Structured Analysis Family Evaluation (SAFE) was approved by the Ministry of Community and Social Services to be used during home assessments for foster families. It is designed to ensure uniformity of home assessments, prevent worker bias, and detect psycho-social indicators of risk. It includes standardized questionnaires intended to assess the competency of families to care for children. It requires background checks to be conducted on all individuals over eighteen years old that live in the foster home and requires that references be obtained from each adult child of an applicant family.

Training and Support for Foster Parents

Prior to 1985, the CAS of SD&G offered no training for foster parent applicants and practically no training to active foster parents.

In the late 1970s and early 1980s, Ian MacLean met with eight or nine families involved in parent-model group homes and specialized foster parent groups for a full day every month. These days included training and a support session. Parent-model group homes are discussed in further detail later in this section. Specialized foster homes are homes that care for children with special needs.

From 1982 to 2001, the CAS of SD&G hosted the Community Family Care Program. This program shared responsibility with Laurencrest, a group home for adolescent males, for providing open custody residential services to Phase I young offenders. This program consisted of six community homes, one full-time counsellor, and a part-time supervisor. Staff were seconded from the CAS of SD&G. The program carried its own licence, which was separate from the CAS of SD&G foster parent licence. Originally, the program had a separate budget from that of the CAS of SD&G, but the program grew larger than the approved funding so, from the late-1980s, it was subsidized by the Society. The program continued with its original mandate but was also used by the CAS of SD&G as an alternative to group home placements outside the jurisdiction. Participants in this program received bi-weekly in-service training and were considered highly trained therapeutic foster parents. The program was terminated in 2001 due to lack of funding.

From 1985 to 2004, a mandatory pre-service training program existed for those in the applicant stage. This program initially started with nine sessions of three hours each but was later divided into six sessions of pre-service training and six sessions of core training. Applicants who successfully completed the pre-training moved on to the core training program before they were officially approved.

The pre-service training topics included:

- an introduction to the Society
- the child's family
- loss and separation
- discipline and behaviour management
- placement
- policies and procedures

The core training topics included:

- the effects of physical abuse
- failure to thrive
- child sexual abuse
- child development
- communication with children
- child management
- enhancing the partnership and plans of care

The pre-service and core training periodically included in-service training and joint training with staff.

In 2001, the Child and Youth Care Worker Program was introduced. Child and youth care workers (CYCWs) are not child protection workers and do not carry a caseload. CYCWs have diplomas in social services or child and youth care. Their functions are to assess the skills of the foster family and the needs of the child, develop programs to address the child's needs using the skills of the foster parent, model the desired interaction with the child for the foster parent, and be available to the foster parent for consultation and intervention after hours and on weekends and holidays. The CAS of SD&G originally hired four CYCWs. In 2004, with the development of the Foster Success Program, discussed later in this chapter, four more CYCWs were hired.

A Joint Education Committee comprising foster parents and CAS staff has developed an annual training calendar since 2001. The calendar lists both mandatory training sessions and optional sessions. Foster parents earn credits for attendance at training sessions, and these credits affect the daily rate foster parents receive for fostering.

In 2004, the CAS of SD&G began to implement the Parent Resources for Information, Development, and Education (PRIDE) initiative, a program approved and required by the Ministry of Community and Social Services for the recruitment, development, support, and retention of foster parents.¹⁴ By December 2005, the Society had its entire resource staff, who are the staff members responsible for foster homes, trained in the program's practices. The new practices were implemented by the Society in January 2006 with a new group of foster parent applicants.

PRIDE provides processes, tools, and a training curriculum designed to achieve the goals of meeting children's developmental, protective, cultural, and permanency needs and strengthening the quality of foster care.

The PRIDE program has established the following six essential competency categories:

1. protecting and nurturing children
2. meeting children's developmental needs and addressing developmental delays
3. supporting relationships between children and their families
4. connecting children to safe, nurturing relationships intended to last a lifetime
5. participating as a member of a professional team
6. reinforcing a child's heritage and cultural identity.

PRIDE includes ten mandatory pre-service training sessions for all applicants. This training is designed to allow applicants to gain insight into the needs of children and their own abilities to parent. PRIDE also provides core training. PRIDE training is delivered by Society personnel who have undergone training and certification by the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies. The implementation and ongoing evaluation of PRIDE is the responsibility of the OACAS.

The CAS of SD&G organized an internal training session for staff and foster parents on dealing with children's sexual behaviours in a foster home setting, which was scheduled to run in spring 2006.

14. PRIDE was originally developed in 1993 by the Illinois Department of Children and Family Services and is copyrighted by the Child Welfare League of America. The Ontario Ministry of Children and Youth Services purchased a licence to offer the PRIDE program in Ontario in 2000 and began piloting it in 2002.

Working Relationship Between Children's Aid Societies and Foster Homes

Service Agreements

Since 1985, foster parents have been required to sign a service agreement annually with the CAS. This agreement addresses the roles and duties of the CAS and the foster parents, how complaints will be handled, the reimbursement of the foster parents, and foster parents' rights.

Plans of Care

Child protection workers develop plans of care that address the individual needs of each child. These plans involve the child, the foster parents, the worker, and other professionals. Within the first seven days of placement, a preliminary plan of care is established. This plan applies through the first thirty days of placement and addresses the immediate needs of the child, such as medical exams, school registration, and the child's access to his or her natural family. The plan of care is revised "and that Plan of Care carries the child for the next 60 days, and then from that, it's the end of the first 90 days from placement and then it's every 90 days thereafter." Each time the plan of care is reviewed, it is signed by the CAS worker, a CAS supervisor, the foster parent, and the child if he or she is over twelve years of age.

The plan of care established in 1985 recorded the contacts between the worker and other parties, the current situation, the goals that were achieved, and the needs of the child. In 2000, a more detailed plan of care was established, which set out objectives in the areas of health, education, identity, family and social relationships, social presentation, emotional and behavioural development, and self-care. The 2005 plan of care set out the same objectives as the 2000 plan but also included a long-term vision for each of these areas as well as tasks and activities to be performed in relation to each of them.

Each of the plans of care requires certain documentation, including documentation regarding when worker visits were made, dates of medical and dental visits, the latest rights and responsibilities review (discussed in more detail under "Rights and Responsibilities of Children in Care" later in this chapter), and any medications the child is taking.

Partnership Statement

In the past, foster parents were simply advised to raise CAS wards as they would their own children. This was an "exclusive" model of fostering in which the foster parents received little input or assistance from the CAS or the community.

In 1985, with the introduction of licensing standards for foster parents, the model changed from an “exclusive” to an “inclusive” model of fostering, which means the child and foster parents now have more contact with and assistance from professionals and the community.

In 1992, the CAS of SD&G created a partnership statement that addressed the relationship between the Society and foster parents, which was included in the 2005 CAS foster care policy. This statement sets out the respective roles of the CAS and foster parents and stresses the need for “close cooperation” to achieve the goal of ensuring that children are individually equipped “with the means to maximize their potential in the development of meaningful and fulfilling life styles.” The statement says:

... The agency is mandated to act as the “legal guardian” of children in alternate care. As the child’s legal guardian, the agency is ultimately responsible and accountable for the well being of, and planning for children it has removed from their families. The foster parents are seen as “agents of the Society” contracted to provide the daily life experiences for the child ... As we work together, there must be a sense of equity and common purpose.

The statement sets out the importance of each party knowing and understanding its own rights and responsibilities and those of the other party. It comments on the need for the CAS and the foster parents to continually update their service agreement.

Supervision of Foster Homes

Placement Committee

The Placement Committee was established in 1982. This committee meets weekly and reviews all admissions to care made the previous week. It reviews the children’s needs and the skills and abilities of the current placement to determine whether to leave the child in the placement or move the child to a more appropriate placement. CAS workers are required to review placements with the Placement Committee after thirty days from the date of the placement.

Mandatory Visits to Foster Home

In 1985, the CAS of SD&G hired its first resource support worker to meet the requirements of section 114 of Ontario Regulation 550/85. This section stated that all foster home licensees must assign a staff person to supervise and support every foster family approved by the licensee.¹⁵ The resource support person is required to visit the foster family and consult with at least one foster parent within seven days of a child being placed in the home, then within thirty days of the placement and every three months thereafter.¹⁶ The plan of care is reviewed and updated, as necessary, at each visit. The worker is required to meet with the child alone during each ninety-day visit. The ninety-day visits are tracked and reported to the director of Residential Services. Workers are disciplined for failure to comply with the visiting requirements. Ian MacLean testified that, beginning in the fall of 2009, the CAS of SD&G will introduce unscheduled visits to foster homes.

As of 2006, the CAS of SD&G had six resource support workers, who were responsible for 140 foster homes. The main job responsibilities of these workers include:

1. assisting in recruiting foster parents;
2. screening and conducting home studies on foster parent applicants;
3. signing service agreements with foster parents;
4. taking part in orientation sessions and training for approved homes;
5. assisting with the placement and coordination of children and youth;
6. liaising with and providing ongoing support and counselling to foster parents;
7. conducting annual reviews of foster homes;
8. arranging relief and screening babysitters;
9. maintaining standards for foster care; and
10. running support groups and other groups as required.

Annual Reviews

Since 1985, when Children's Aid Societies began to require a licence to operate a foster parent program, the Ministry of Community and Social Services has conducted random home site visits and interviews with staff, foster parents, and children. It also conducts an annual review that examines CAS policies and procedures.

CAS resource support workers conduct annual reviews of foster homes. This review allows foster parents to provide feedback about their CAS worker and allows wards to provide feedback about their foster homes. It also allows the CAS worker to assess the foster parents and home, including the foster parents' ability to provide physical and emotional care and communicate with CAS staff and comply with CAS policies and procedures. During the annual review, all the children in the home over the age of ten, including foster children and natural children, are interviewed. At the end of the review, a new service agreement is signed.

Crown Ward Reviews

Crown wards are children who are permanently in the care of the CAS. The goals of Crown ward reviews include:

- ensuring that an adequate plan of care is developed for each Crown ward;
- monitoring compliance with the legislation and regulations relating to the care of each Crown ward and issuing directives regarding any non-compliance;
- looking for adequate assessment of needs, suitable placement and support services, and realistic planning with regard to wards;
- making recommendations regarding particular cases and general policies and practices and monitoring their implementation;
- allowing Crown wards to comment on the care they are receiving, their contacts with their biological families, their current situation, and case plans.

The Ministry of Community and Social Services has conducted Crown ward reviews since the 1970s. However, they have become more formal. Every December, a team of five Ministry representatives reviews the files of all Crown wards who have been in care for more than two years. Then, Ministry representatives interview the foster parents or staff and management with regard to the child's placement. All children being reviewed receive a confidential questionnaire that the child returns directly to the Ministry by mail. These questionnaires provide wards with an opportunity to request an interview with a Ministry representative. Any disclosure of abuse in a review is immediately relayed to senior managers, and an investigation is undertaken immediately.

Serious Occurrence Reports

The Ministry of Community and Social Services' 1981 Standards and Guidelines on Child Abuse required Children's Aid Societies to report all serious occurrences involving children in care to the Ministry's regional office. Serious occurrences include deaths; serious injuries; allegations of abuse or mistreatment, including injuries suspected to have been caused by abuse or mistreatment by CAS staff and injuries caused by the neglect of the caretaker; grievances made by or about children, including grievances about the inappropriate use of detention; and all serious allegations against staff, foster parents, volunteers, babysitters, and temporary caregivers of children. In reporting to the Ministry, the agency was to indicate what had occurred and what steps it had taken to protect the child. If an investigation was warranted, the agency was to undertake the investigation and report back to the Ministry.

The requirement for child protection workers to supply serious occurrence reports to the Ministry was included in the 1984 Child and Family Services Act. The report was to indicate not only what happened but also what corrective measures were being taken.

The 2005 CAS foster care policy also contained a requirement to report all serious occurrences. This provision is prefaced by this statement: "Serious occurrence reporting provides the Ministry and, more importantly, the service provider with an effective means of monitoring the appropriateness and quality of their service delivery. This monitoring includes provision for the ongoing review of our practices, procedures and training needs." The 2005 policy requires all serious occurrences to be reported to the Ministry within twenty-four hours of the CAS's being alerted of the occurrence.

Rights and Responsibilities of Children in Care

Since 1985, it has been the responsibility of the CAS worker assigned to a child in care to discuss the child's rights and responsibilities with the child annually and within thirty days of any new placement. If a child is under six years old or lacks capacity, the rights and responsibilities are explained to the caregiver. Children are provided with a pamphlet that describes their rights and responsibilities and are told generally what they can expect in care, including the approved manner of discipline.

Among others, the rights mentioned in the pamphlet include the right to reasonable privacy and the right to receive a written plan of care within thirty days of placement and to participate in the development of and changes to this plan. The pamphlet also informs a child that he or she is not to be disciplined through the use of corporal punishment or by being locked in a room.

The pamphlet states that, if a child feels his or her rights are not being respected, he or she should talk to the social worker, foster parent, or staff at the placement, and, if still not satisfied, the child can ask that the CAS review team hear his or her complaint. After this, if he or she remains dissatisfied, the child can send a written complaint to the Ministry or his or her ombudsman or Member of Parliament.

The pamphlet states that, between the 14th and 21st day of a child's placement, he or she can request that the placement be reviewed by the Residential Placement Advisory Committee (RPAC), which will review the placement and make recommendations. If the child is still unhappy after this process, he or she can request a further review by the Children's Services Review Board, which will decide either that the child should be moved or left at his or her placement. Ian MacLean testified that no child in the care of the CAS of SD&G has ever requested a RPAC review.

Discipline of Children in Care

Bill Carriere, the former director of Protection Services at the CAS of SD&G, stated that he believed that in Children's Aid Societies in the 1970s, corporal punishment was seen as an acceptable form of discipline for children.

In January 1978, the CAS of SD&G Board of Directors approved a child care policy. This policy cautioned social workers "to always watch for and guard against over-zealous foster parents whose disciplinary measures border on, or are brutal in severity."

In May 1978, the Society's Board of Directors approved another document, entitled "Principles of Care for Children in Placement," which stated:

Severe punishment of a child should only be used as a last resort and should it be considered or if it has been administered, the substitute parent should inform the worker who will discuss the circumstances with the supervisor.

If it appears that punishment is being used too frequently, it is the responsibility of the placing agency to discuss these problems promptly with the substitute parents and to act in the best interests of the child.

At this time, spanking was permissible. "Principles of Care for Children in Placement" defined what constituted "spanking" and set out cautions regarding the negative effects of its use. This document also stated that the purpose of punishment should never be to humiliate or disgrace the child.

In 1983, the CAS of SD&G Board approved a "Group Home Policy Manual." This manual set out "Approved Disciplinary Procedures" for group homes, which expressly prohibited the use of corporal punishment for a resident by group home parents, employees, or residents.

In 1984, the Board approved a policy entitled "Child Care Policies and Procedures." A discipline policy was approved as part of this policy in April 1985. In the discipline policy the CAS took the position that certain types of discipline should never be used against children in its care, including "any striking or assaulting of a child" or "the use of deliberate or harsh or degrading measures that could humiliate a child or undermine a child's self-respect." It also outlined the consequences of violating the policy. Very similar principles of permitted and prohibited discipline are set out in the 2005 foster care policy and 2005 child care policies, which continued to apply at the time of the Inquiry.

The McMaster model of foster home screening, which was employed by the CAS of SD&G from 1990 to 2006, included questions meant to determine the style of discipline within a family. Ian MacLean commented that this helped workers determine whether the family members would agree with the CAS's discipline policy. He stated, "if they didn't agree with the discipline policy, we didn't open. It was clear."

Use of Restraint in a Group or Foster Home

Although foster parents have been prohibited from using any corporal punishment on Crown wards since 1985, physically holding a child, also referred to as "restraining," is allowed if it is part of the plan of care prepared by the parent and CAS worker and if the foster parent is trained in the restraint procedure. Ian MacLean explained that restraint is not a method of discipline but rather a method of control for safety reasons. He stated that restraint could be used on children through to adolescence. However, he pointed out that different methods should be employed depending on the age of the child, because the holding a four- or five-year-old is not the same as holding a ten-, twelve-, or fifteen-year old.

CAS documents from the mid-1980s have stated that restraining a child is permitted only if the child is "totally out of control and is about to do damage to himself [or] to someone else." While older documents also allowed for restraint if the child were about to damage property, the 2005 foster care policy allows restraint only if the child is already "engaged in severely destructive damage to property." Ian MacLean explained that the CAS has tried to steer away from employing restraint to prevent damage to property because there are other methods of achieving this end.

Since 2005, a serious occurrence report must be completed in response to any use of restraint on a CAS ward. Ian MacLean stated that this reporting allows the CAS to identify trends and respond in order to improve its services to children.

Group Homes

In the early to mid-1970s, the CAS of SD&G established three group homes that were staffed by CAS employees. As of 1977, all of these homes had been closed and four parent-model group homes had been created. These parent-model group homes were developed, approved, and supervised by the CAS of SD&G and were in operation from 1977 to 1981. These homes were run by approved foster parents with a good working history with the Society. After the Ministry of Community and Social Services introduced group home standards and licensing requirements in the early 1980s, one of these homes became a licensed parent-model group home for complex-needs children, operating until 1992, and the others became specialized foster homes.

Some privately operated group homes have operated and are continuing to operate within the jurisdiction of the CAS of SD&G. Sunrise Home for children with severe handicaps opened in 1976 and closed in the 1980s. It was open for private placements and placements from the CAS of SD&G. Open Hands is a home for developmentally delayed children. It was initially privately owned and operated, from the 1970s to early 1980s, but was later licensed by the Ministry. As of 2006, the CAS of SD&G did not have any children placed in that home. The Akwesasne Group Home is a home for First Nations adolescents that has been operating since the mid- to late 1990s.

A CAS of SD&G Group Home Policy issued in 1983 stated that “[t]he purpose of group homes is to provide skilled, effective parenting to a group of children who cannot remain or function in their own home or in a foster home, but who have some ability to function as members of the community.” It stated that CAS of SD&G group homes were parent-model group homes, which were intended to care for children who have had poor relationships with adults and would feel threatened by a close relationship with an adult. These homes were staffed by resident house parents, who were not employees of the CAS but who had signed a contract with the CAS to offer services in the group home. The CAS and group home parents were jointly responsible for the operation of these homes.

From the early 1980s to around 2000, there was only one local group home.¹⁷ Around 2000, the CAS of SD&G began to develop local group homes. As of 2006, there were six local group homes that were participating in the CAS of SD&G Outside Paid Resource Support and Development Group.

Around 2004, the philosophy of the CAS of SD&G changed, such that the focus was on attempting to place wards in foster homes rather than in group homes, also known as outside paid resources (OPRs). Rather than placing children permanently in outside paid resources, the CAS may place children temporarily in OPRs to stabilize and assess them, after which a decision will be made as to whether the child should be placed in a foster home or a local group home.

17. A boy's residence known as Laurencrest.

In 2004, the Foster Success Program was launched, with the goal of moving children placed in OPRs to foster homes. Four more child and youth care workers were hired to assist with this program. At the time of the Inquiry, twenty wards had been successfully moved from OPRs to foster homes.

In a report to the CAS Board of Directors about the CAS of SD&G's serious occurrence reports in 2004, Ian MacLean stated that the clear majority of reported restraints of wards in 2004 involved Crown wards in OPRs. In fact, he found that none of the restraint incidents involved children in foster homes. The report stated that "[t]he Agency continues to place youth in Outside Paid Resources when their behaviours are high risk or such that would jeopardize a foster family placement."

CAS resource workers are responsible for overseeing contracts with OPRs. The CAS meets with its OPRs every six weeks, and programs are adjusted to ensure that needed services are provided and beds are used to capacity. The CAS conducts annual reviews of OPRs, similar to those it conducts of its foster homes. When a child is placed in a group home containing more than eight children, the CAS Residential Placement Advisory Committee conducts mandatory review of his or her placement.

A number of policies, protocols, and procedures have been adopted in recent years regarding the establishment of foster homes and the screening, training, and supervision of foster parents. These recent amendments have provided much-needed structure to the foster care system. Prior to 1985, there were few, if any, formal policies and procedures, which in part explains some of the reported allegations of abuse within foster and group homes in the specific case files I comment on in this chapter. Although there has been significant improvement in the foster care system to date, there is always room for further improvement. On the issue of foster parent screening, I recommend that all Children's Aid Societies in the province be provided access to the Fast Track System for the purpose of screening potential foster parents. I comment on further recommendations in the following sections.

Duty to Report

Child Welfare Act, 1965

The first evidence of a duty to report did not emerge until 1965. Section 41(1) of the 1965 Child Welfare Act, proclaimed in force in 1966, stated: "Every person having information of the abandonment, desertion, physical ill-treatment or need for protection of a child shall report the information to a children's aid society or Crown attorney.”¹⁸ There was no reference to sexual abuse. However, Kevin Morris, a former Senior Policy Analyst at the Child Welfare Branch of the Ministry of Community and Social Services, stated that it could be argued that sexual abuse should be included within physical ill-treatment.

Section 41(2) of the 1965 Act made it clear that the duty to report existed regardless of the confidential status of the information. It stated: “Subsection 1 applies notwithstanding that the information is confidential or privileged, and no action shall be instituted against the informant unless the giving of the information is done maliciously or without reasonable and probable cause.”

Child Welfare Act, 1978

Section 49(1) of the 1978 Child Welfare Act, which came into force in 1979, stated, “Every person who has information of the abandonment, desertion or need for protection of a child or the infliction of abuse upon a child shall forthwith report the information to a society.”¹⁹ The option to report to a Crown attorney was removed, leaving Children’s Aid Societies as the sole agencies to which reports were to be made. Furthermore, the reporting duties were expanded to include anyone who had information regarding the “infliction of abuse upon a child.”

Section 47(1) defined “abuse” for the purpose of the reporting provisions as:

a condition of,

- a) physical harm;
- b) malnutrition or mental ill-health of a degree that if not immediately remedied could seriously impair growth and development or result in permanent injury or death; or
- c) sexual molestation.

The 1978 Act introduced a duty on professionals to report suspected abuse. Section 49(2) stated that:

Notwithstanding the provisions of any other Act, every person who has reasonable grounds to suspect in the course of the person’s professional or official duties that a child has suffered or is suffering from abuse that may have been caused or permitted by a person who has had charge of the child shall forthwith report the suspected abuse to a society.²⁰

18. Child Welfare Act, 1965, S.O. 1965, c. 14, s. 41.

19. S.O. 1978, c. 85, s. 94(1(f)(ii)).

It did not identify which professionals were subject to this duty. Unlike section 41(1), which required every person who had “information” regarding the mistreatment of a child to report it to a Children’s Aid Society, this section required professionals to report if they had “reasonable grounds to suspect” that a child was being abused. This section also differs from section 41(1) in that it requires professionals to report suspicions of past abuse.

The 1978 Child Welfare Act made it an offence for professionals to contravene the duty to report suspicions of child abuse found in subsection 49(2) of the Act and set out a penalty for this offence. Kevin Morris explained that the particular obligation on professionals was included because there was a recognition that people who were trained, had professional credentials, and were working with children were in a position to be more aware of and sensitive to the conditions of children.

Bill Carriere testified that the Children’s Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS of SD&G) does not have a policy regarding what to do if someone fails in his or her duty to report. However, he said that the practice was to contact the individual and explain reporting obligations. He stated that the Society took this same educational approach to professionals. He said he was not aware of any cases in which the Society reported to the police about a failure to report.

Section 49(3) of the 1978 Child Welfare Act stated that the duty set out in section 49(1) and (2) applied:

... [N]otwithstanding that the information reported is confidential or privileged and no action for making the report shall be instituted against any person who reports the information to a society in accordance with subsection 1 or 2 unless the giving of the information is done maliciously or without reasonable grounds to suspect that the information is true.²¹

However, section 49(4) stated that “Nothing in this section shall abrogate any privilege that may exist between a solicitor and the solicitor’s client.”²²

Ministry Training Materials, 1979

Kevin Morris testified that, after the 1978 Act was proclaimed, the Ministry of Community and Social Services recognized that Children’s Aid Societies needed a solid understanding of physical and sexual abuse. Thus, in 1979, the Ministry created training materials regarding how Societies were to carry out investigations of abuse. These materials defined sexual molestation for the purpose of the reporting provisions as “any improper sexual activity between a child and the adult who has his care or custody.” They also stated:

The consent of the child is irrelevant, as is the absence of physical injury. Incestuous relationships are included in the intent of the definition. Improper or excessive sexual activity between children may constitute molestation if an adult in charge of either child knows about it and does nothing. The definition is not intended to encompass normal sexual experimentation between children.²³

The materials did not provide guidance regarding what kind of sexual activity would constitute sexual molestation.²⁴

Ministry Standards and Guidelines on Child Abuse, 1981

Neither the 1965 nor the 1978 Child Welfare Act mentioned a duty to report a risk of abuse. The duty set out in these Acts was in regard only to a child who was suffering or had suffered abuse. A document entitled “Standards and Guidelines: Child Abuse,” published by the Ministry of Community and Social Services in 1981, contained a definition of a “child at risk” as “a child who is exposed to the danger of incurring probable injury through child abuse.” Kevin Morris testified that this definition was an indication that the Ministry was beginning to deal with the possibility of abuse rather than just past or current abuse.

The 1981 standards and guidelines stated that the definition of abuse included in the 1978 Child Welfare Act could be interpreted so broadly that it could include all protection cases. However, the document stated, “[a]ll but the most severe ... are excluded as incidents to which the reporting law and penalty provisions would apply.”

The document explained that the legal approach to child abuse was to consider serious harm or the potential for serious harm to the child, which should be substantiated by specific evidence. The document stated that, for the purposes of the Child Welfare Act, “this usually occurs in the context of a relationship between the child and the parent(s) or caretaker(s).”

The document explained that the social work approach was to see child abuse as a condition or a continuum, rather than a single incident, and that often substantial evidence would be lacking.

23. Ministry of Community and Social Services, “Protection & Care of Children, The Child Welfare Act, 1978, Part II: Training Materials: Abuse” (1979), p. 3.

The document then went on to explain:

In determining whether a situation is child abuse for purposes of The Child Welfare Act the legal requirements of substantiated evidence and social work understanding of behaviour and environment are blended. Therefore, the determination of child abuse is made on a case by case basis rather than by clearly defined categories of situations or conditions.

The document stated:

Although many factors are considered in each case, the major ones are:

- the conditions of the child
- the circumstances surrounding the incident(s) of alleged or potential abuse
- the history of the child and family
- the potential danger to the child
- the potential of the family to provide a safe and healthy environment for the child.

Child and Family Services Act, 1984

The 1984 Child and Family Services Act, which came into force in 1985, set out the public duty to report in section 68(2) as follows: "A person who believes on reasonable grounds that a child is or may be in need of protection shall forthwith report the belief and the information upon which it is based to a society."²⁵ Kevin Morris explained that this revised duty introduced a concept beyond merely reporting past or current abuse: someone who was aware of a situation that raised a concern that something may happen to a child would be obliged to report.

The duty to report for professionals was set out in section 68(3):

Despite the provisions of any other Act, a person referred to in subsection (4) who, in the course of his or her professional or official duties, has reasonable grounds to suspect that a child is or may be suffering or may have suffered abuse shall forthwith report the suspicion and the information on which it is based to a society.

Section 68(4) included a non-exhaustive list of professionals who had a specific duty to report any suspicions of child abuse. The list included:

25. S.O. 1984, c. 55.

- (a) a health care professional, including a physician, nurse, dentist, pharmacist and psychologist;
- (b) a teacher, school principal, social worker, family counsellor, priest, rabbi, clergyman, operator or employee of a day nursery and youth recreation worker;
- (c) a peace officer and a coroner;
- (d) a solicitor; and
- (e) a service provider and an employee of a service provider.

Section 68(1) stated that, for the purposes of the reporting requirements of the 1984 Act, “to suffer abuse,” which is the language used in regard to the reporting requirements of professionals, means to be in need of protection within the meaning of clause 37(2) (a), (c), (e), (f), or (h). The relevant clauses are as follows:

A child is in need of protection where,

- (a) the child has suffered physical harm, inflicted by the person having charge of the child or caused by that person’s failure to care and provide for or supervise and protect the child adequately;

- (c) the child has been sexually molested or sexually exploited, by the person having charge of the child or by another person where the person having charge of the child knows or should know of the possibility of sexual molestation or sexual exploitation and fails to protect the child;

...

- (e) the child requires medical treatment to cure, prevent or alleviate physical harm or suffering and the child’s parent or the person having charge of the child does not provide, or refuses or is unavailable or unable to consent to, the treatment;
- (f) the child has suffered emotional harm, demonstrated by severe,
 - i anxiety,
 - ii depression,
 - iii withdrawal, or
 - iv self-destructive or aggressive behaviour, and the child’s parent or the person having charge of the child does not provide, or refuses or is unavailable or unable to consent to, services or treatment to remedy or alleviate the harm;

- (h) the child suffers from a mental, emotional or developmental condition that, if not remedied, could seriously impair the child's development and the child's parent or the person having charge of the child does not provide, or refuses or is unavailable or unable to consent to, treatment to remedy or alleviate the condition.

Kevin Morris explained that his understanding was that the terms "sexual molestation or sexual exploitation" in section 37(2)(c) included more than just physical contact. They included situations where a person was gratifying themselves to the detriment of the child.

Bill Carriere pointed out that, as section 68(3) did not refer to the duty to report a suspicion that a child was at risk of suffering sexual molestation or exploitation, professionals did not technically have an obligation to report a suspected risk of sexual molestation or exploitation.

The 1984 Act maintained the same penalty for professionals who did not report suspected abuse as was contained in the 1978 Act, which was a fine not exceeding $1,000.

Section 68(6) of the 1984 Act stated that "[a] society that obtains information that a child in its care and custody is or may be suffering or may have suffered abuse shall forthwith report the information to a Director."

Section 68(7) stated that reporting was required regardless of whether the information was confidential or privileged and that no action could be taken against a person acting in accordance with the reporting provisions unless the person acted maliciously or without reasonable grounds for the belief or suspicion, as the case may be. Section 67(8) stated that nothing in the Act was meant to violate solicitor-client privilege.

Ministry Revised Standards, 1992

In 1992, the Ministry of Community and Social Services released "Revised Standards for the Investigation and Management of Child Abuse Cases by the Children's Aid Societies Under the Child and Family Services Act." These standards stated:

... To be considered a person in charge of the child one need not be a parent or person exercising parental rights, but may also be anyone having responsibility for caring for a child. The determination of whether or not a person is in charge of the child will depend on the facts of each situation. Examples of persons who may fall into this category could include baby-sitters, teachers, Big Brother/Sister, recreation worker.

The abuse of a child by a person who is not in charge of the child is not reportable child abuse as defined by the CFSA. The most common example of this sort of a situation is sexual molestation by a stranger. This kind of occurrence is dealt with under the Criminal Code...

Child and Family Services Amendment Act, 1999

Section 22(1) of the 1999 Child and Family Services Amendment Act (Child Welfare Reform),²⁶ which was proclaimed in force on March 31, 2000, set out a new version of a duty to report, which continues to apply today.

Sections 72(1) through (6) of the Child and Family Services Act, 1990 were repealed and replaced with new provisions. Section 72(1), entitled “Duty to report child in need of protection,” now states:

Despite the provisions of any other Act, if a person, including a person who performs professional or official duties with respect to children, has reasonable grounds to suspect one of the following, the person shall forthwith report the suspicion and the information on which it is based to a society:

1. The child has suffered physical harm, inflicted by the person having charge of the child or caused by or resulting from that person’s,
 - i. failure to adequately care for, provide for, supervise or protect the child, or
 - ii. pattern of neglect in caring for, providing for, supervising or protecting the child.
2. There is a risk that the child is likely to suffer physical harm inflicted by the person having charge of the child or caused by or resulting from that person’s,
 - i. failure to adequately care for, provide for, supervise or protect the child, or
 - ii. pattern of neglect in caring for, providing for, supervising or protecting the child.
3. The child has been sexually molested or sexually exploited, by the person having charge of the child or by another person where the person having charge of the child knows or should know of the possibility of sexual molestation or sexual exploitation and fails to protect the child.

26. S.O. 1999, c. 2.

4. There is a risk that the child is likely to be sexually molested or sexually exploited as described in paragraph 3.
5. The child requires medical treatment to cure, prevent or alleviate physical harm or suffering and the child's parent or the person having charge of the child does not provide, or refuses or is unavailable or unable to consent to, the treatment.
6. The child has suffered emotional harm, demonstrated by serious,
 - i. anxiety,
 - ii. depression,
 - iii. withdrawal,
 - iv. self-destructive or aggressive behaviour, or
 - v. delayed development,and there are reasonable grounds to believe that the emotional harm suffered by the child results from the actions, failure to act or pattern of neglect on the part of the child's parent or the person having charge of the child.
7. The child has suffered emotional harm of the kind described in subparagraph i, ii, iii, iv or v of paragraph 6 and the child's parent or the person having charge of the child does not provide, or refuses or is unavailable or unable to consent to, services or treatment to remedy or alleviate the harm.
8. There is a risk that the child is likely to suffer emotional harm of the kind described in subparagraph i, ii, iii, iv or v of paragraph 6 resulting from the actions, failure to act or pattern of neglect on the part of the child's parent or the person having charge of the child.
9. There is a risk that the child is likely to suffer emotional harm of the kind described in subparagraph i, ii, iii, iv or v of paragraph 6 and that the child's parent or the person having charge of the child does not provide, or refuses or is unavailable or unable to consent to, services or treatment to prevent the harm.
10. The child suffers from a mental, emotional or developmental condition that, if not remedied, could seriously impair the child's development and the child's parent or the person having charge of the child does not provide, or refuses or is unavailable or unable to consent to, treatment to remedy or alleviate the condition.

The amendments to section 72(1) made significant changes. These changes were:

- 1) introducing the notion of a pattern of neglect (sections 72(1)1.ii and 2.ii);

- 2) stating that a report must be made if there is a risk that a child is likely to suffer physical harm or be sexually molested (section 72(1)4);
- 3) adding a requirement to report situations of children suffering emotional harm caused by their caregiver (section 72(1)6); and
- 4) lowering the threshold for when emotional harm had to be reported by using the term “serious” as opposed to “severe” in relation to anxiety, depression, etc. (section 72(1)6).

Section 72(2) now makes the duty to report an ongoing duty, so that even after a report is made about a particular child, another report is required whenever there are additional reasonable grounds for suspicion that the child may be in need of protection.

Section 72(3) specifies that the report must be made by the person with the reasonable grounds for suspicion and may not be delegated to another person. Kevin Morris explained that this addition was made because, in the past, some people, especially those in large institutions, would make the report to their supervisors, but the information was not passed on to the Society.

Section 72(4) states that it is an offence if a professional referred to in subsection (5) fails in his or her duty to report a suspicion under subsection (1) and the information upon which the suspicion was based was obtained in the course of his or her professional or official duties. The penalty for this offence remained the same as in the previous legislation—a fine of not more than $1,000.

The list of professionals who had a particular duty to report remained unchanged.

In section 72(7), which stated that no action could be taken against a person acting in accordance with the reporting provisions unless the person acted maliciously or without reasonable grounds for the belief or suspicion, the word “belief” was removed. Bill Carriere explained that the threshold for suspicion is lower than the threshold for belief. He stated that the intention was to ensure that people were not waiting too long to report or collecting more information than required before reporting.

The provision that a Society that obtains information that a child in its care and custody is or may be suffering or may have suffered abuse must report the information to a director was moved to section 72.1(1).

The definition of what it means “to suffer abuse” was moved to section 72.1(2). It states that, “In this section ... ‘to suffer abuse,’ when used in reference to a child, means to be in need of protection within the meaning of clause 37(2) (a), (c), (e), (f), (f.1) or (h).”

Clauses (f.1) and (g.1) were added to section 37(2) as part of the 1999 amendments, such that section 37(2) currently states:

A child is in need of protection where,

- (a) the child has suffered physical harm, inflicted by the person having charge of the child or caused by or resulting from that person's,
 - (i) failure to adequately care for, provide for, supervise or protect the child, or
 - (ii) pattern of neglect in caring for, providing for, supervising or protecting the child;
- (b) there is a risk that the child is likely to suffer physical harm inflicted by the person having charge of the child or caused by or resulting from that person's,
 - (i) failure to adequately care for, provide for, supervise or protect the child, or
 - (ii) pattern of neglect in caring for, providing for, supervising or protecting the child;
- (c) the child has been sexually molested or sexually exploited, by the person having charge of the child or by another person where the person having charge of the child knows or should know of the possibility of sexual molestation or sexual exploitation and fails to protect the child;²⁷
- (d) there is a risk that the child is likely to be sexually molested or sexually exploited as described in clause (c);
- (e) the child requires medical treatment to cure, prevent or alleviate physical harm or suffering and the child's parent or the person having charge of the child does not provide, or refuses or is unavailable or unable to consent to, the treatment;
- (f) the child has suffered emotional harm, demonstrated by serious,
 - (i) anxiety,
 - (ii) depression,
 - (iii) withdrawal,
 - (iv) self-destructive or aggressive behaviour, or
 - (v) delayed development, and there are reasonable grounds to believe that the emotional harm suffered by the child results from the actions, failure to act or

(c) the child has been sexually molested or sexually exploited, including by child pornography, by the person having charge of the child or by another person where the person having charge of the child knows or should know of the possibility of sexual molestation or sexual exploitation and fails to protect the child;..."

pattern of neglect on the part of the child's parent or the person having charge of the child;

- (f.1) the child has suffered emotional harm of the kind described in subclause (f) (i), (ii), (iii), (iv) or (v) and the child's parent or the person having charge of the child does not provide, or refuses or is unavailable or unable to consent to, services or treatment to remedy or alleviate the harm;
- (g) there is a risk that the child is likely to suffer emotional harm of the kind described in subclause (f) (i), (ii), (iii), (iv) or (v) resulting from the actions, failure to act or pattern of neglect on the part of the child's parent or the person having charge of the child;
- (g.1) there is a risk that the child is likely to suffer emotional harm of the kind described in subclause (f) (i), (ii), (iii), (iv) or (v) and that the child's parent or the person having charge of the child does not provide, or refuses or is unavailable or unable to consent to, services or treatment to prevent the harm;
- (h) the child suffers from a mental, emotional or developmental condition that, if not remedied, could seriously impair the child's development and the child's parent or the person having charge of the child does not provide, or refuses or is unavailable or unable to consent to, treatment to remedy or alleviate the condition ...

Recent Amendments

In 2006, mediators and arbitrators were added to the list of professionals set out in section 72(5) of the Child and Family Services Act, 1990.²⁸ However, even with this addition, the list of professionals is not considered exhaustive. All professionals who have reasonable grounds for suspicion of abuse that arise in the course of their work with children must report, regardless of whether their profession is on the list in section 72.

I will review a number of investigations and cases involving the CAS where the duty to report was an issue. I will make recommendations regarding amendments to the duty to report in the conclusion to this chapter.

Child Abuse Register

The Child Abuse Register (CAR) is administered by the Ministry of Community and Social Services. The Register comprises confidential records of the names of persons who have been verified by a Children's Aid Society (CAS) as having abused children within the meaning of the Child and Family Services Act. The data in the CAR consists of the name of the alleged abuser, his or her address(es), particulars about the abuse, and the relationship of the abuser to the victim. The CAR is used by all Children's Aid Societies as part of their investigations into alleged abuse.

Prior to the inception of CAR in 1979, there was a central registry of child abuse. However, in the 1970s, there were concerns arising about its operation. For example, because there were no standard requirements around the investigation of abuse, and agencies were operating on their own best practice, and, because reporting was not mandatory, there was much inconsistency in placements on the registry. Some issues also arose concerning civil liberties and the security of information. One of the initial rationales for the registry was that it would be useful for tracking an alleged abuser travelling from community to community. Research showed, however, that abusers did not move around very much, so the registry also had limited value.

The Child Welfare Act, 1978 came into force June 15, 1979. At that time, amendments to the Act establishing the new CAR were proclaimed into force. Section 52(2) of the Act set out the duty to report to a Ministry director any verified allegations of abuse of a child, including a child in care of a Society. In November, reference to reporting to the CAR was included in the "Standards and Guidelines for the Case Management of Child Abuse Cases" training materials.

In February 1981, the Ministry published "Guidelines for Reporting to the Register: Child Abuse." The maintenance of the central register was now mandatory. The former registry was maintained only as an administrative convenience not required by law. The guidelines instructed that every person who was registered must be notified in writing of his or her registration. Further, the 1981 guidelines indicated that "[r]egistered persons have the right to inspect the Register; to request removal of their names and, if this is denied, to have a hearing to review their request. If such a hearing recommends the name(s) stay on the Register, there is the right to appeal the decision to Divisional Court."

The central register was "intended to be a useful tool in the overall effort to protect children and prevent child abuse." Some of the specific reasons for its establishment were:

1. to learn more about child abuse in Ontario, both for research and practice purposes;
2. to assist in tracking abused children, their families, and suspected abusers so that protection efforts may continue uninterrupted;
3. to monitor child abuse case management and programs of the Children's Aid Societies.

Some social workers report that notification of registration may underline the seriousness of their actions to alleged abusers, and act as a deterrent.

Reporting to the Child Abuse Register

The 1981 guidelines state that, in accordance with the Child Welfare Act, 1978, “all verified cases of child abuse are to be reported to the Central Register.” However, it was noted that defining and verifying abuse was difficult. Not all cases of suspected abuse were to be reported to the CAR.

For the purpose of the reporting requirements, the Child Welfare Act, 1978 defines “child abuse” as a condition of: physical harm; malnutrition or mental illness of a degree that, if not immediately remedied, could seriously impair growth and development or result in permanent injury or death; or sexual molestation.

Normally, cases to be reported are those in which there is a “perceived pattern of abusive behaviour.” The guidelines indicate that “[t]he situation should be serious enough to warrant a report to the Child Abuse Register and should not just be a single accidental injury.” However, if a child’s injuries are serious, an isolated incident of abuse may warrant reporting to the Registry. Bill Carriere testified that the CAS of SD&G has taken the position that an isolated incident of sexual abuse warrants registration. A visible injury is not required before reporting. Continued threats of harm to the child may create emotional abuse that should be reported.

Physical harm is to be reported to the Registry if a child has been injured or is at risk of being injured by a person who has “care, custody, control or charge of him, or if that person has permitted the injury.” Mental ill-health is to be reported if the child’s emotional needs have been or are being so neglected or interfered with that his or her normal development has been seriously affected and he or she is likely to be “impaired.” Sexual molestation is to be reported in cases where sexual activity has occurred or is occurring between an adult and a child and in cases of inappropriate or excessive sexual activity between children that goes beyond normal experimentation and where there is a significant difference in the ages of the children.

Not only a parent but anyone who has the responsibility of caring for a child on a short-term or long-term basis can be an alleged abuser. Persons without formal responsibility for the care of a child may also be identified as alleged abusers. The abuse of a child by a person unknown to him or her (that is, a stranger) is not reportable child abuse as defined by the Act and is dealt with, instead, under the Criminal Code.

Alleged abuse is “verified” and reportable to the CAR once the director of the CAS, on the basis of investigation and consultation, has reasonable grounds to believe that the child is or has been abused. The judgment as to whether to report the alleged abuse to the CAR is made after the verification procedure is complete. Verification does not require proof beyond a reasonable doubt that abuse has occurred. As noted in the guidelines, "[t]here frequently will be no external corroboration of the facts upon which the CAS is basing its opinion."

If the decision is made to report to the CAR, the Society must tell the alleged abuser of its intention and, ideally, explain the purpose of the CAR.

The law requires that the CAS report verified information concerning abuse of a child to the CAR within fourteen days after the information is verified by the Society. Once the name has been recorded in the Registry, the alleged abuser will be advised and informed of the right to inspect the information and of the procedure available for correction of false information or expunction. A name recorded in the CAR will be retained for a minimum period of twenty-five years. The guidelines require the submission of a follow-up report:

- 1) four months after the initial report if the case is still active.
- 2) on each anniversary of the initial report until the case is closed.
- 3) when there is a significant change in circumstances, e.g. disappearance of a family, etc.
- 4) when a case has been referred or transferred to another Society or child protection agency.
- 5) with the initial report ... if a case is being closed or transferred at the same time that a Form 6 is being submitted.

The CAR was maintained under the 1984 Child and Family Services Act. In August 1987, the guidelines for reporting to the Register were revised to reflect appropriate references to provisions in the new legislation. There were no significant changes, however, as around this time a review of the CAR was being undertaken because of contentious issues being raised about the nature and functioning of the Register and there would potentially be significant revisions to the CAR as a result of that review.

Review of the Child Abuse Register

Professor Nicholas Bala conducted some studies with respect to the Ontario CAR in 1987 and prepared a report in 1988. He testified at the Inquiry that one of the issues with the CAR is that the obligation to report applies only when the alleged abuser has charge of a child, and it is not clear exactly what it means to have charge of a child and who properly falls under that category. Professor Bala also discussed the fact that the CAR in Ontario cannot be used as a screening tool by employers and therefore is of limited use. He recommended that the CAR be dramatically changed or shut down. Professor Bala testified that the Ontario government announced it would accept the recommendations in his report, but they had not yet been fully implemented.

In the 1999 amendments to the Child and Family Services Act, the sections related to the CAR were repealed. These provisions, however, have not yet been proclaimed, and the CAR is still functioning.

Utilization of the Child Abuse Register

As of March 31, 2005, there were 26,988 names of alleged abusers on the CAR. Data from the CAR is uploaded daily to the Ministry of Children and Youth Services' Child Protection Fast Track Information System (Fast Track) and can be accessed by Societies that are conducting investigations. The CAS of SD&G registered 429 verified cases between 1977 and 2006. The largest number of registrations by the CAS of SD&G was in 1986, when thirty-six names were registered, and the lowest number was in 1981, when only one registration was made. Of the verified cases registered by the CAS of SD&G, 317 were for verified sexual abuse cases.

The Child Abuse Register is of particularly limited value in respect to historical child sexual abuse cases. Because it is not within the CAS mandate to investigate reports of historical abuse made by an adult unless there is a concern that the alleged abuser may still be abusing children, these allegations would not be verified, and the CAS could not register the alleged offender on the Child Abuse Register.

The decision of the CAS whether to register a person with the CAR is independent of whether the individual was found guilty in a criminal proceeding. As long as the CAS is satisfied on a balance of probabilities that the abuse occurred, it will make the registration. There is no relationship between when the Society makes a registration to the CAR and the timing of the outcome of the criminal process. In most cases, the registration occurs well before any criminal conviction. In reviewing registrations, Bill Carriere noted that, from 2000 to April 2006, 91 percent of the CAR registrations for sexual abuse also had a corresponding criminal charge.

Is the CAR Still a Useful Tool?

As mentioned in the section dealing with policies and protocols of the CAS, Children's Aid Societies in Ontario are not permitted to use the Child Abuse Register to screen their potential applicants for employment.

Mr. Carriere testified that he didn't think the CAR was utilized frequently across the province. He stated that he had not found it particularly useful and said, "I do not see it as a tool to protect people." He noted his concern that the forms have so much information regarding the victims. He felt that the description required of the victim has discouraged them from consenting to the use of the process.

As discussed above, Professor Bala testified that the CAR needs to be changed, in part because it cannot be used for employment screening. He also noted that, given the existence of the Fast Track System, he would anticipate that agencies would rely less on the Child Abuse Register.

Dr. Nico Trocmé noted that, although there are concerns with the reliability and consistency of reporting to the CAR, especially since 1986, when it was subject to widespread criticism, the CAR provides the only data regarding child abuse reporting dating back to the late 1970s that distinguishes between physical and sexual abuse. Dr. Trocmé noted, however, that for the past five or six years, Children's Aid Societies have been connected by a computer system and so can easily find out if people had previous contact with a Society. Therefore, he concluded that the Children Aid Societies no longer need the Child Abuse Register.

I have heard evidence from expert witnesses and employees of the CAS criticizing the Child Abuse Register. The implementation of the Fast Track System now permits the tracking of individuals who have had contact with any Children's Aid Society in the province. Witnesses have also indicated that the CAR has a very limited use, because Societies cannot access it to screen employees or foster parents. I have also heard evidence that comparable child abuse register systems in other provinces have more practical application. I recommend that the government of Ontario reassess the Child Abuse Register to determine if it is still useful, given the new systems and tools that are now in place. If it does, the Child Abuse Register should be revised to address some of the deficiencies that I have highlighted in this section.

The Dawson Review and Report

The "Review of the Management of Child Abuse and Child Protection Cases by the Children's Aid Society of Stormont, Dundas and Glengary [sic]" (the Dawson Review) was conducted in 1988 by Ross Dawson, a former executive director of a Children's Aid Society who was selected to participate by the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (the CAS of SD&G), and Brit James, also a former executive director, selected by the Ministry of Community and Social Services (MCSS). The two conducted an audit and review of the protection services offered by the CAS of SD&G at the request of the parties and made fifty-six recommendations to improve the quality of services offered. They randomly selected files to review and had access to staff. A report of their findings and recommendations (the Dawson Report) was completed and submitted to the CAS of SD&G in December 1998.

The Dawson Review was initiated following a written complaint by an official at the Ontario Attorney General's Office reported to the MCSS. The concern related to the management of a particular child sexual abuse case, involving Ron Locey, a known sex offender, which had been handled by the CAS of SD&G.

The Case of Ron Locey: A Failure in Child Protection

The CAS of SD&G first became involved with Mr. and Ms Pharand in 1970, when Ms Pharand's mother, the maternal grandmother of the child in question, reported that her daughter was not caring for her child, who suffered from a severe case of cerebral palsy. Ms Pharand separated from her husband in 1971 and developed a relationship with Ron Locey sometime in 1972. In 1975, Mr. Locey was convicted on charges of rape and gross indecency and was sentenced to a period of incarceration of six years. Ms Pharand married Mr. Locey on August 1, 1976, while he was in custody. Mr. Locey was eventually paroled but was incarcerated again in 1980 following his conviction of a charge of gross indecency involving his eight-year-old stepdaughter. On June 11, 1982, shortly before Mr. Locey was to be paroled from this sentence, the CAS file on the family was re-opened. Mr. Locey was released from the Kingston penitentiary on June 21, 1982, with no restriction on contacts with children. Case recordings indicate that the CAS worker was concerned that Mr. Locey could again sexually abuse a child because he had refused treatment while in prison. The CAS developed a plan with the family, which required Mr. Locey to live apart from his family until the CAS of SD&G was satisfied that he had made significant gains from treatment. By the fall of 1982, Mr. Locey was living with his wife and the children. In 1983, Mr. Locey was once again charged and convicted of indecent assault involving his stepdaughter and sentenced to four years of imprisonment.

Following his release, in 1986, the mother resumed her cohabitation with Ron Locey. The stepdaughter, who had been living in Guelph, returned to Cornwall at age sixteen but was not living with her mother and Mr. Locey. The CAS of SD&G were asked by the Guelph CAS to supervise her. Mr. Locey had been paroled with a condition that he was not to associate with females less than eighteen years of age. The CAS worker was aware, however, that Mr. Locey was in contact with the victim. Bill Carriere did not know if the CAS contacted the local police or the Ontario Provincial Police at that time. Mr. Carriere admitted that, in hindsight, he and his colleague should have contacted the police, as they were aware of the parole violation. In March 1987, Mr. Locey was convicted of a third sexual assault of his stepdaughter. He was sentenced to a further period of incarceration of four years.

Mr. Carriere acknowledged that Mr. Locey had broken the conditions imposed and that the CAS had not enforced them. He testified that "the tragedy in this situation" was that he had not read the worker's notes to see that Mr. Locey had broken his parole violation and was in contact with his stepdaughter. Mr. Carriere admitted that things were unfolding contrary to the best interest of the young girl, but the worker took no steps to intervene. The worker in the Locey case, who had substantial contacts with the family, thought Mr. Locey was permitted to be in contact with the victim, with supervision. This was incorrect. Mr. Carriere said that he learned from the case the importance of exact language and of ensuring that workers understood conditions. He acknowledged that they could have attached Mr. Locey's probation order to the front of the file and met with the probation officer to avoid any confusion. I agree, and it is unfortunate that this was not done.

In October 1987, the Ministry of the Attorney General wrote to MCSS, outlining concerns about the handling of the Locey matter by the CAS of SD&G. As a result of these concerns, the MCSS conducted a thorough review of the case, which was completed in March 1988. The review concluded that the case was "improperly managed," and ten recommendations were made. One of the recommendations was that the Board "have a review conducted across the agency, of existing methodology, protocols and handling of a cross section of child sexual abuse cases in order to assure itself and MCSS Area office that appropriate protocols, case management processes and decision making processes are in place."

The Dawson Review Is Undertaken

In response to this recommendation, from the March 1988 review, the CAS of SD&G and the MCSS met to determine the terms of reference for this new review. The work, which came to be known as the Dawson Review, was completed in September 1988. The terms of reference for the Dawson Review were as follows:

- I. the review of the adequacy of case management related to a sample of:
 - a. child abuse cases (both physical and sexual abuse)
 - b. court ordered child protection cases involving child protection concerns other than physical and sexual abuse.
 - c. general child protection cases (excluding those covered in a and b above)
 - d. protection services to native children and families on the Reserve under the auspices of Akwesasne Child and Family Prevention Program.

- II. the review of the adequacy of information gathering, clinical assessment, case planning and decision making processes including agency management practices.
- III. the review of the adequacy of the systems utilized by Society's Board and management to ensure an acceptable level of service.

A Steering Committee was established to guide the review, resolve operational issues, and receive and review the report. Each file was reviewed regarding compliance with the Child and Family Services Act, Ministry policy, and the Society's policies and procedures. Each file was also reviewed regarding clinical adequacy of initial response, assessment, case planning, service provision, case transfer, and termination. In total, 104 cases were reviewed, which accounted for approximately 18 percent of the total number of CAS of SD&G open family cases as of September 1, 1988. In addition to a case file review, Mr. Dawson also reviewed agency policies and procedures, management systems, board systems, staffing, and Native services.

The Dawson Report Findings and Recommendations

A number of findings and recommendations were made in the Dawson Report, a few of which will be discussed briefly below. In particular, those relating to worker/supervisor caseloads, policies and procedures, management, quality control, and record keeping will be highlighted.

The Dawson Report began by noting that "the Children's Aid Society of Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry provides services to a significant number of severely troubled families."

The report stated that "[i]t is not possible to provide a high level of service to child protection case [sic], and in particular cases with severe psycho-social pathology, if caseloads exceed 20 cases per social worker." It was found that the supervisor to social worker ratio at the CAS of SD&G was significantly above the provincial average for Children's Aid Societies. In addition, the supervisor to staff ratio was also "well above generally accepted social work standards which advocate an ideal ratio of 1-6 and a maximum ratio of 1-8." This placed excessive demands on supervisors and also contributed to some of the quality control and case management deficiencies identified in the Report. Mr. Carriere agreed that the supervisor to staff ratio at the CAS of SD&G was above accepted standards and that the demands placed on supervisors were excessive. He noted that, at one point, he was supervising ten people.

Mr. Carriere acknowledged that the caseloads for each worker have to be of a reasonable size so as to allow them the time to effectively work with families. When caseworkers carry too many cases and are responsible for the well-being of too many children, they can run into difficulties. Mr. Carriere agreed with the suggestion that the caseloads for supervisors were impossibly high.

The Report found that the staff turnover observed at the CAS of SD&G dictated a need for current and accessible policies and procedures. Although staff were aware of the existence and general content of the agency's policy and procedure manual, they were not fully aware of the details contained in the manual. The manual was found to be outdated and incomplete. It contained no policy and procedures with respect to several critical areas such as child abuse and child protection services. A number of protocols and manuals developed by the Society, including the child abuse manual and sexual abuse protocol, had not been formally adopted by the agency or incorporated into its policy and procedure manual.

The Report noted that little had been done to develop policies and procedures that reflected the introduction of the 1984 Child and Family Services Act, whose introduction required major changes to the way child welfare agencies provided services.

The Dawson Report recommended that the Board establish a three-year schedule to review and develop agency policy in a number of areas, that the Board monitor the implementation, and that intensive training be given to all staff on child protection and child abuse policies and procedures. It also recommended that comprehensive and revised child protection and child abuse policies and procedures be developed immediately. The Report also directed the executive director to assume full control of the process of policy review and development.

The Dawson Report found that the management team and supervisors at the CAS of SD&G had extensive child welfare and child protection experience. The experience level of management staff was found to be "on average, higher than their management counterparts in other Children's Aid Societies." Morale in the management group was found to be positive "despite the excessive workload." However, it was unclear who was ultimately responsible for directing clinical work at the agency. There was a need identified for one person to have this overall responsibility. There was also a lack of recent clinical training for key management personnel. There was no established system for investigating, assessing, and managing child protection and child abuse cases. The Dawson Report noted: "Overall the quality of clinical direction provided by the agency is considered to be seriously flawed."

In discussing the Locey case, Bill Carriere recognized a need for tighter risk management and more face-to-face work between the worker and supervisor, with fixed meetings. He acknowledged the lack of supervision.

Concerns related to quality control were also identified. Performance evaluations of all staff and management were not completed annually. There was inadequate orientation for staff. Existing procedures for case documentation, planning, and case transfer were seldom followed. There was limited statistical tracking with respect to services. The Dawson Report recommended the following: the establishment of the position of clinical director; training for management in clinical supervision, the identification, dynamics, assessment, and treatment of child abuse and high-risk cases, and risk assessment and risk management; a uniform system of case management; a system of risk assessment; clinical supervision; and a new orientation program for staff.

Non-compliance with case documentation was a noted problem. Most child abuse files were found to be “woefully lacking with respect to the documentation required.” The initial response to allegations of abuse was found to be “good.” The follow-up performed within one to two weeks after referral was described as “well done,” but many investigations were incomplete and did not comply with Ministry guidelines.

Due to “insufficient documentation,” many files could not be assessed with regard to the clinical work performed. A lack of information gathering at the initial referral was noted. Few clients or collaterals were interviewed face-to-face by the worker receiving the initial complaint. Client contact at the point of referral was found to be “generally sufficient,” but it became inadequate after the first few weeks of the file. There was not a consistent process of investigation, assessment, or risk decision-making followed by staff. Overall, case documentation was found to be “seriously deficient.” Recommendations included training on case documentation and agency policy and procedures.

In cases where children had been ordered in need of protection by a court and the agency was ordered to supervise care, the level of service was superior to that in other cases. However, in several cases, lack of contact with the child placed the agency at risk of legal action for “failing to supervise.” Of the general protection cases, the cases opened and closed at intake that were reviewed were very well managed. The cases reviewed that were opened by the Intake Unit and transferred to the Protection Unit were adequately serviced and documented at the onset but became deficient once transferred. The Dawson Report recommended that the assistant director review all court-ordered supervision cases, implement policies for management of these cases, revise policies on case documentation, identify and monitor the status of all cases, and review intake systems.

The Report also recommended that the assistant director implement a system to identify and monitor the status of all case recording on a monthly basis and that the agency revise its policies on case documentation and review its intake systems.

Bill Carriere was involved with the implementation of some of the recommendations made in the Dawson Report. He noted that there “definitely was an impact” on how the CAS performed investigations as a result of the Report.

Richard Abell confirmed that the position of clinical director was created as a result of a recommendation in the Dawson Report. The clinical director position was meant to bring together all of the services being provided by the CAS. The Review had identified concerns about coordination and oversight of the service delivery system, and it was felt that the new position would assist in addressing these concerns. Mr. Abell was hired as the first clinical director for the CAS of SD&G in late 1989. As clinical director, he had "ultimate responsibility for service delivery." He reported directly to the executive director.

Mr. Abell was involved in the implementation of strategies recommended in the Dawson Review. He commented that the difficulties identified in the Report were "not unique" to this CAS. Mr. Abell noted substantial changes to both policies and procedures as a result of the Dawson Review. He observed an emphasis on systems and procedure to ensure that necessary steps at all stages were identified and carried out. A new and "very extensive" documentation system was also introduced and there were changes in staffing.

It is unfortunate that it took such a horrific case before a comprehensive review of the policies and procedures of the CAS SD&G was undertaken. The Dawson Review was conducted some twenty years ago. The deficiencies it noted may explain to some extent some of the failings of this institution in cases that I will comment on later in this chapter. I have heard evidence and reviewed documents that suggest that, since the time of the review, policies, procedures, and protocols have been updated, modified, or drafted and adopted. I recommend that an internal review mechanism be put in place to ensure that these policies, practices, and protocols are subject to a comprehensive review on a regular basis so that amendments are not simply a reaction to disturbing cases.

The Cieslewicz Foster Home

Dora and Hans Cieslewicz applied to become foster parents on November 12, 1972. A foster home investigation was conducted by Mary Gratton, who was a foster home finder for the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS of SD&G), and the first child was placed in their home on January 5, 1973. Their home remained a foster home until November 14, 1977, when it was made a receiving home. A foster home receives children through the CAS in a planned manner. Foster parents are contacted and the case is discussed with them prior to the child coming into the home. It is a very systematic process. A receiving home is different. It receives children who are taken out of a crisis situation. They stay for a short period of time until they can be placed into the care of a foster home. The stress level and degree of flexibility required by the family is much greater in a receiving home than a foster home. Bryan Keough, who worked for the CAS of SD&G as both a child protection worker and a childcare worker for nineteen years, testified that he expected that there would be higher standards or requirements for receiving homes than for foster homes.

The Cieslewicz receiving home was closed effective November 18, 1977, after the Cieslewiczs resigned. This resignation followed a number of sexual allegations made against Mr. Cieslewicz by several girls who were placed in the home.

Allegations of Sexual Abuse Against Hans Cieslewicz

On September 22, 1978, case worker Françoise Lepage made an entry in the Cieslewicz foster home case file indicating that several teenagers who had spent time in this home had made allegations of a sexual nature against Mr. Cieslewicz, including C-77, C-78, C-79, and C-76. Some of these allegations had been made five years prior to this recording and were never investigated.

C-77's Allegations

C-77 was adopted in 1964. On September 24, 1973, C-77 attended at a police station with her brother and complained that her adoptive father had been molesting her. She was admitted to the care of the CAS of SD&G after refusing to return home and was placed in a receiving home the same day. C-77's adoptive father eventually admitted that he had made advances towards her on several occasions, although her case file indicates that her case worker, Cam Copeland, felt that C-77 was not totally innocent in these episodes.

C-77, born on August 2, 1958, was placed in the Cieslewicz home on October 19, 1973, and she remained there until November 15, 1973. Françoise Lepage became C-77's worker in June 1975. As noted, Ms Lepage's September 22, 1978, entry in the Cieslewicz foster home files indicated that several teens had made allegations against Mr. Cieslewicz, including a complaint from C-77. She had complained to Ms Lepage that Mr. Cieslewicz had fondled her breasts. The date of this complaint is not noted. Ms Lepage wrote that the complaint was not investigated because C-77 was known to lie frequently. The allegation of sexual abuse was first recorded in the foster home file in September 1978. There is no record of it in C-77's child file.

On October 27, 1973, Ms Cieslewicz left the home with two of the foster children, leaving C-77 and another foster child in the care of Mr. Cieslewicz, and went to her daughter's home in Montreal. The reason provided at the time was that she had a disagreement with her husband about the teenagers in the home not assisting with the house cleaning. Given the timing, it is natural to wonder whether the departure of Ms Cieslewicz from the home had anything to do with C-77's allegations. As will be discussed below, Ms Cieslewicz once again temporarily left the home with the children approximately two and a half years later because of allegations of sexual molestation made by a foster child against Mr. Cieslewicz.

C-77 was moved from the home on November 15, 1973. According to C-77's file, the placement in the Cieslewicz home broke down because of C-77's stealing and her inability to get along with other adolescents in the home because of her arrogance and attitude of superiority.

C-78's Allegations; Ms Cieslewicz and the Children Leave the Home

C-78 was born on May 17, 1961, and came into the care of the CAS of SD&G on May 27, 1967. At the time of her admission, she was diagnosed as suffering from a convulsive disorder, mental sub-normality, and secondary behaviour problems. C-78 was placed in the Cieslewicz home on February 23, 1976. Shortly thereafter, C-78 complained to Ms Cieslewicz that Mr. Cieslewicz had asked her to remove her sweater and bra in order to ensure that she was physically in good condition. She complied and, after he had finished looking, Mr. Cieslewicz left the room. Ms Cieslewicz questioned her husband about the incident, and he responded that the girl was lying.

On March 9, 1976, Ms Cieslewicz attended at the CAS office to meet with Bryan Keough and request his advice about the situation. She advised Mr. Keough that her plan was to immediately move out of the home with the children, explaining to them that she and her husband were having marital problems and were giving each other time to think things over. Mr. Keough thought this was a feasible plan, and he assured Ms Cieslewicz that the children would not be removed, on the condition that she remained apart from her husband until the situation was resolved. Mr. Keough discussed the situation with supervisor Dave Devlin and acting director Angelo Towndale. They approved of the proposed manner of dealing with the situation.

That day, Ms Cieslewicz took the foster children and her natural daughter and moved to her daughter's home in Apple Hill. She returned to the home with the three girls on March 15, 1976, after C-78 retracted her allegations and admitted that she had lied. Despite the retraction, Mr. Keough was still not satisfied and so he undertook to complete an investigation. Mr. Keough advised Ms Cieslewicz that he still had to conduct an investigation into the matter. This proposed step was approved by Mr. Towndale. Bryan Keough met Mr. and Ms Cieslewicz on March 25, 1976, and reached the following conclusion:

It is possible that the above may have occurred, however, if so, I doubt if it ever will again. Mr. Cieslewicz denies it right down the line, and because of the tremendous asset this home has been to our agency in the past, I believe the man should be given the benefit of the doubt. I therefore recommend that this home remains [sic] open.

Mr. Towndale reviewed and initialled Mr. Keough's recording about the investigation. He explained that, at the time, in the 1970s, there was a tendency not to believe children.

On March 26, 1976, C-78 was removed from the home. Had she not been removed, Ms Cieslewicz would have requested her removal due to her misbehaviour.

Bryan Keough did not recall any discussion about contacting the Cornwall Police Service or the Ontario Provincial Police about C-78's allegations. He testified that, had this allegation happened today, the police would be contacted. It does not appear that Mr. Keough interviewed anyone else except the Cieslewiczs. The only reference to another foster child being asked about these allegations or about Mr. Cieslewicz more generally was in Ms Lepage's recording in September 1978. She wrote that Mr. Keough said that C-76 had initially supported C-78's allegations but she had later withdrawn her statement. Mr. Keough testified that, at the time, CAS workers did not have training on how to deal with allegations of sexual abuse. He testified that, if this situation had arisen in the 1980s, when workers had received some training, the matter would have been handled differently.

Complaint About the Care of C-78

After being removed from the Cieslewicz home, C-78 was placed in the Anson Group Home in Minden, Ontario, on March 29, 1976. In early 1978, David Phillips, the director of the Anson Group Home, wrote a letter to the Child Welfare Branch of the Children's Services Division of the Ministry of Community and Social Services concerning the treatment of the CAS wards while in foster care, including C-78's treatment in the Cieslewicz foster home. As a result, Tom O'Brien, the executive director of the CAS of SD&G and Dave Devlin met with Robert Penny, a supervisor with the Child Welfare Branch, on February 14, 1978, to discuss this matter. Notes describing the meeting indicate that Mr. Penny was told that the allegation made by C-78 had been investigated, that the CAS could neither prove nor disprove the accusation, and that C-78 had been removed from the home. Mr. Penny was also advised that C-76, another ward living in the home at the time, had never suggested that Mr. Cieslewicz had made any improper advances against her. The notes conclude that Mr. Penny seemed satisfied with the explanations provided.

C-79's Allegations

C-79, aged fifteen, was picked up after running away from a group home in Quebec and was placed in the Cieslewicz home on September 16, 1978, for two nights. C-79 told workers Françoise Lepage and Cam Copeland that Mr. Cieslewicz had come to her bedroom on both nights that she was in the receiving home. On the first night, Mr. Cieslewicz touched her breast but did nothing else once she indicated she would not cooperate. On the second night, Mr. Cieslewicz came to her bed and indicated that he wanted to have sexual intercourse with her. She refused and then practised oral sex on him for a short period of time before he masturbated and ejaculated on her abdomen. C-79 wiped the semen from her abdomen with the sleeve of her blouse. Workers at the interview held the next day observed that a substance had dried on her sleeve. According to the recordings, these allegations were given some consideration, but, in view of her bad reputation, they were not investigated. It was decided that, should another allegation of a sexual nature be made against Mr. Cieslewicz, the matter should be given serious consideration.

Bryan Keough did not recall being at the interview. Although he heard about this allegation in September 1978, he did not consider removing C-76, the foster girl he was responsible for in the home. Mr. Keough testified that, had this same scenario occurred in the 1980s, it would have had far different results:

... I'm not seeking to excuse anybody.

We had not been given any training in child sexual abuse. We had no idea about what indicators to look for. We all had high case loads.

And like I said yesterday, we made mistakes, but none of those mistakes were "intentional." We were trying to do the best that we could.

Although I appreciate that the training and resources available in the 1970s were not the same as they were subsequently, in my view the way in which these girls' allegations were dismissed was inexcusable, even in the 1970s. This is especially so given that, in the case of the third girl, C-79, there was potential physical evidence of the abuse and still no steps were taken to investigate the matter. To simply say that it was a different period of time is not acceptable. The sexual molestation of young girls by adults in positions of trust and responsibility has never been accepted in our society. The fact that three girls had come forward with allegations should have led to an internal investigation by the CAS as well as a police investigation.

C-76 Comes Forward With Allegations

C-76 was born on October 16, 1960, and entered the care of the CAS of SD&G on November 22, 1968. She was placed in the Cieslewicz foster home on July 26, 1973, and remained there until October 20, 1978. C-76's case file indicates that she was a child of below-average intelligence and was considered by the CAS to be "a trainable retardate with an I.Q. of 59."

On October 16, 1978, C-76 confided to her worker, Bryan Keough, that Mr. Cieslewicz had been involved sexually with her for some time but that this did not include sexual intercourse. She told Mr. Keough that the abuse involved fondling and usually happened when she was going to the barn to help him with chores. According to Mr. Keough, this allegation is what closed the foster home. It was the fourth allegation of sexual abuse against Mr. Cieslewicz. On the same day, Ms Cieslewicz wrote a letter to CAS Executive Director Thomas O'Brien indicating that, effective November 18, 1978, she would be closing her receiving home.

According to the file recording, on October 19, 1978, C-76 accused Mr. Cieslewicz, in the presence of Ms Cieslewicz, of having sexual play with her, which he denied. Mr. Cieslewicz called Bryan Keough on October 20, 1978, and requested that C-76 be removed from their home. She was removed on the same day.

I question why C-76 was not removed from the home by Bryan Keough on October 16, 1978, after she alleged that she had been abused by Mr. Cieslewicz. In my opinion, she should have been removed immediately or steps should have been taken to ensure that Mr. Cieslewicz would not be alone with her until an investigation could be conducted. It does not appear from the file recordings that Mr. Keough discussed that matter with the Cieslewiczs prior to C-76 making an accusation against Mr. Cieslewicz on October 19, 1978.

The CAS Report to the Child Welfare Branch and Meeting With the Crown Attorney

On October 25, 1978, Mr. O'Brien wrote to Mr. and Ms Cieslewicz acknowledging receipt of Ms Cieslewicz's letter of October 16, 1978, and thanking them for their help and for the tenderness exhibited towards the children.

Following a discussion between Angelo Towndale and Robert Penny, a field consultant with the Child Welfare Branch, on or around October 31, 1978, Mr. Penny wrote a letter to Mr. O'Brien. He indicated that the Child Welfare Branch was very concerned about the events that had apparently taken place at the Cieslewicz home and thought that the Crown Attorney's Office should be "fully involved at the earliest possible date."

Mr. Towndale testified that the CAS was reporting to the Ministry to keep them informed and ask for advice. The Ministry suggested that the CAS report to the Crown and did not suggest reporting to the police. According to Mr. Towndale, the Crown, in a subsequent meeting, also did not suggest reporting to the police.

On October 31, 1978, Mr. O'Brien wrote to Barry Dalby, the director of Child Welfare, Child Welfare Branch, providing a report on the Cieslewicz receiving and foster home and describing the four complaints of sexual abuse made against Mr. Cieslewicz over the years. He characterized the three complaints prior to C-76's coming forward as follows:

... The first girl who made an allegation against the foster father was not only promiscuous but had made allegations of the same nature against her own father. She was also mildly retarded and known to be a compulsive liar.

The second complaint was a severely retarded adolescent girl ... When this complaint was brought to our attention, the worker assigned to this home immediately investigated. Mr. Cieslewicz denied the allegations ... We also learned at this time that the complainant had previously made allegations of this type against staff and residents of past placements, including our own staffed group home.

The fourth complaint came from a ward of the Province of Quebec who had run away from a group home in St. Hyacinthe, and was placed in the Cieslewicz home for two days ... She was questioned at our office but we had doubts as to her credibility since she had quite openly made sexual advances while in the car towards the male worker who apprehended her. During the investigation she related very casually many sexual experiences she had had in the past.

Mr. O'Brien testified that he had received the information to write this letter from Françoise Lepage. In fact, he testified that she wrote the letter and that he read and signed it. Mr. O'Brien did not recall meeting with any of the girls before writing this letter and did not think he should have because he knew the case worker very well and had full confidence in what she told him.

Mr. O'Brien agreed that the letter was not as complete as it ought to have been. For example, the letter did not state that the allegations C-77 had made against her father had been admitted to by her father. This was, in my view, a serious omission. He acknowledged that, with respect to the allegation of C-79, the fact that there had been potential physical evidence of that abuse should have been included in the letter. Mr. O'Brien testified that he had not been aware of the existence of this physical evidence. The tenor of the letter appears to be more accusatory towards the four alleged victims than towards the alleged perpetrator.

The letter to Mr. Dalby noted that a meeting had been held with the workers involved with the home, and the result was that the Cieslewicz home was to be closed as a receiving home. Mr. O'Brien further advised that he would be meeting with the Crown attorney later that day.

A meeting took place on October 31, 1978, between Crown Attorney Don Johnson, Assistant Crown Attorney Guy DeMarco, Tom O'Brien, Angelo Towndale, and Bryan Keough. According to a letter Mr. O'Brien wrote to Mr. Dalby the following day, after considering the facts presented by the officials of CAS of SD&G, Mr. Johnson was of the opinion that there was insufficient evidence to proceed with any charges against Mr. Cieslewicz. Mr. O'Brien further clarified in this letter that the Cieslewicz home had been closed as both a receiving home and as a foster home.

This is another instance in which Mr. O'Brien met with the Crown attorney instead of contacting the police. Mr. O'Brien explained that the reason he went to the Crown attorney so often was because he knew him both professionally and personally and had a lot of respect for his knowledge and professionalism. He testified:

Cornwall then and now is still a small community in terms of population and for years we only had one Crown Attorney and I knew them all.

And when it came to a matter of wanting to understand the law better to make sure I was doing what I should have been doing, I would discuss it with the Crown Attorney and, as I said before, if the Crown felt that I should be going to the police they would tell me in no uncertain terms.

In hindsight, Mr. O'Brien remained comfortable with the decision to go to the Crown rather than referring the matter to the police to conduct an investigation.

As I have previously indicated, all allegations of sexual abuse brought to the attention of the CAS should have been reported to the police, regardless of whether the Crown attorney recommended that the police be contacted or not. I note that, today, the 2005 Foster Care Policy provides that, if a serious occurrence is reported, the police are to be notified if appropriate. In my view it is always appropriate to report the matter to police if the serious occurrence is an allegation of sexual abuse. I discuss the role of the Crown attorney in this matter in Chapter 11, dealing with the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

The Cieslewicz Home Is Closed

The closing summary for the Cieslewicz home was prepared by Françoise Lepage on November 1, 1978. The summary indicated that, over the years, the CAS had received four complaints of a sexual nature against Mr. Cieslewicz and that this was one of the negative aspects of the home.

The response of the CAS to the allegations of sexual abuse at the Cieslewicz foster home was entirely unacceptable, even by the “standards” of the 1970s. Before considering this issue in more detail, I wish to make some comments about how the Cieslewicz home was operated and supervised, as I feel there were some problems in this regard that could have contributed to the lack of knowledge CAS workers seemed to have about alleged incidents in the home.

There were a number of children placed in the Cieslewicz home who had different CAS workers. At one point, there were as many as three child protection workers involved—Bryan Keough, Françoise Lepage, and Cam Copeland. Mr. Keough testified that, at the time, there were no meetings among the workers who had children in the same home. These circumstances can lead to one worker not being aware of information another worker has about the situation in the home. This potential problem was exacerbated in this case by the fact that there was a gap in the recordings in the foster home file between 1973 and 1976. Each foster home has a file and each child also has a file. In this case, the foster home file did not contain any recordings between November 21, 1973, and April 6, 1976. When asked about this, Angelo Towndale testified that he had no explanation for the gap but thought it might have occurred due to a lack of resources. It is critical that foster home files be kept up to date, especially when there are various workers involved with children in the home. This will allow each worker to review the foster home file and have a firm understanding of what has been occurring in the home.

There were four allegations of sexual abuse made against Mr. Cieslewicz before this home was closed. Only two of these allegations led to any investigation by the CAS. The other two were dismissed as a result of the reputation and perceived dishonesty of the complainants. At the conclusion of the first investigation, which did not result in the home being closed, Bryan Keough placed a lot of emphasis on what an asset the Cieslewicz home had been to the CAS of SD&G over the years. He denied, however, that any cost-benefit analysis had been done such that, regardless of whether the sexual abuse had occurred, the home would stay open because it was too valuable for the CAS to close it. Tom O'Brien also disagreed with the suggestion that the allegations of the girls in the foster home were not heeded because the CAS could not afford to lose the foster home. Rather, he testified:

Our problem with the children coming to us about certain allegations was over the years you found from experience that certain children lied for various reasons; one in a petty way to get back at the foster parents for something; one is to—another one would be to get the Agency to move them into another home that they think they might like better than the one they're in ... [A] lot of these children were somewhat disturbed, so you couldn't always have the confidence in what they were saying that you would like to have. That doesn't mean that they didn't tell you the truth but it's hard to be clear in your mind.

In my opinion, although there were resource issues that may have contributed to a reluctance to close a foster home on the basis of allegations of abuse, the primary reason for the result in the Cieslewicz case was a tendency to disbelieve the complainants. Angelo Towndale testified that, in the 1970s, the tendency was not to believe children. I heard from a number of CAS witnesses that, in the 1970s, it was not believed that sexual abuse happened and that these foster children were thought to be “troubled,” with a tendency to lie. I accept that this attitude has changed, and I understand that a situation such as what occurred at the Cieslewicz home would be handled very differently today.

According to Mr. Towndale, in the 1970s, it was also not the practice to report these types of incidents to the police and, in this case, the Ministry had advised the CAS to go to the Crown attorney. Mr. Towndale testified that the CAS should have seen this as a police matter; however, he felt that the Crown attorney had an obligation to advise the CAS on how to deal with the situation properly.

As I said earlier, even by the standards of the 1970s, the institutional response of the CAS of SD&G to allegations of abuse against young people was seriously deficient. The CAS as an institution, Executive Director Tom O'Brien, and Françoise Lepage all failed to investigate sufficiently or delayed in investigating allegations, obtaining information, or noting indications of abuse of young people involving Hans Cieslewicz. In addition, the CAS, Tom O'Brien, and Françoise Lepage failed to take or delayed in taking appropriate actions to ensure that young people would not be at risk of abuse from Hans Cieslewicz. In addition, the CAS failed to advise or delayed in advising proper police authorities of allegations or information relating to abuse of young people involving Hans Cieslewicz, and it failed to offer and/or provide sufficient counselling, assistance, and support to alleged victims of abuse involving Hans Cieslewicz.

Roberta Archambault and the Lapensee Group Home

Roberta Archambault (née Judd)²⁹ was born on May 15, 1965, the youngest of seven children. She and her siblings were brought into the care of the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS of SD&G) in 1970, when she was five years old. Ms Archambault was admitted into care on September 3, 1970. She became a permanent ward of the Crown in 1972, when she was seven years old, and remained in the care of the CAS until she was nineteen.

Ms Archambault lived in a number of foster homes growing up. She lived in the Hubert foster home for ten years, the Lapensee group home for a couple of years, briefly at the Lalonde home, and finally the deRonde home. She alleged that she was physically, mentally, and sexually abused while in the care of the CAS.

Roberta Archambault in the Hubert Foster Home

Ms Archambault and her older sister were placed in the foster home of Hannah and Boleslaw Hubert, located in Morrisburg, Ontario, on September 3, 1970. Roberta was five and her older sister Jennifer was eight years old. The Huberts had one young child and two adolescent children of their own living in the home. During the ten years that Ms Archambault lived in the Hubert home, a number of foster children were placed there, although none for as long as Roberta and her sister.

Ms Archambault alleged that she was verbally, physically, and sexually abused in the Hubert home. She knew something "had to be wrong" on the first day when, upon arrival at the home, she and her sister were taken upstairs to the bathroom and stripped down in front of a few members of the family, bathed, and washed with anti-lice soap. Ms Archambault testified that even at the age of five she thought it was degrading to have a bunch of adults watch her bathe.

Ms Archambault testified that the verbal abuse began after the first Christmas, when the Huberts began insulting her in Polish and German. Although she could not understand the languages, she came to understand later on that they were insulting her. Roberta was told that she was excess baggage and was there only because she and her sister were a package deal and they wanted a sibling close to their daughter's age to grow up with her. According to Ms Archambault, the physical abuse started the first summer they lived there, in 1971. She testified that she and her sister were not allowed to talk to each other, and, if they were caught talking, Roberta would get beaten and her sister would have to watch.

29. For purposes of clarity and consistency, I will refer to Roberta Judd Archambault as Roberta Archambault or Ms Archambault throughout this section.

Ms Archambault testified that she was physically abused by Mr. Hubert regularly and that Ms Hubert began to beat her when she was about eleven years old.

Ms Archambault also recalled being sexually abused by Mr. Hubert beginning when she was seven or eight years old. She testified that this recollection came to her recently:

I've had nightmares all my life and I haven't slept at night all my life until the early hours in the morning, and it was just recently, about two months ago, two and a half months ago, that I figured out what it was. It was like a mental block just undone.

She testified that the sexual abuse occurred in the summer when Mr. Hubert took her fishing and also in the garage during the winter. According to Ms Archambault, the abuse stopped shortly before she left the Hubert home. She testified that the only person who might have suspected she was being sexually abused was Ms Hubert: "For some reason she started hitting me in the stomach and telling me she made damn sure I never reproduced."

Ms Archambault testified that, when she was eleven years old, she tried to commit suicide by taking pills after Ms Hubert denied her the opportunity to spend the weekend with one of the Huberts' sons in Cornwall. Ms Archambault felt that Ms Hubert's son and his wife, whom she said were estranged from the Huberts, liked her and she thought they would "rescue" her. She testified that the Huberts and their son had a falling out over her treatment in the home. According to Ms Archambault, she was taken to the hospital and was there for two to three days. She said nobody asked her what caused her to pass out or if she had ingested any substances. However, she assumed the Huberts knew what happened because, when they returned from the hospital, there was a lock on the bathroom cupboard. Ms Archambault later learned that the Huberts said the episode was a result of a cheerleading accident.

Interaction With the CAS While in the Hubert Foster Home

Roberta Archambault had a number of CAS workers while at the Hubert foster home. She testified that, although a worker attended at the home from time to time and asked how she and her sister were treated, they could not say anything because the Huberts were in the next room and could hear everything that was said. She testified that she knew when the CAS worker was coming, because the Huberts would tell her to clean up and would put her in suitable clothes instead of the rags she usually wore. She recalled that the CAS worker never came unexpectedly.

Ms Archambault testified that she did not tell any CAS worker about the verbal or physical abuse by the Huberts until she was in high school. This will be discussed further below.

Bryan Keough was Roberta Archambault's CAS worker from July 1972 until she left the Hubert home in December 1980. He testified that, when he visited foster homes, he would meet with the foster parents or mother alone, followed by a meeting with the child alone and then a meeting with the parents and child together. The intent was to have the meetings with the child out of earshot from the foster parents. In my view, meetings with the child in the foster home are not effective, as the child cannot be certain he or she will not be overheard by the foster parents.

At the Inquiry, Ms Archambault recommended that every child in foster care should be questioned outside the home and should be told that they can say something if they are in danger and that they will then not be sent back to that situation. I agree. I recommend that the CAS require workers to conduct meetings with children in a location outside of the foster home, such as at school. Ms Archambault also noted that all visits by workers were scheduled, and she recommended that the CAS make unannounced visits. She testified that "[a]nybody can put on a show. You can clean up your house. You can clean up your children. You could tell them what they can and cannot say." Again, I agree. Ian MacLean, who was the director of Residential Services for a number of years, testified that steps are being taken by the CAS of SD&G to introduce unscheduled visits to begin in the fall 2009. He suggested that a recommendation be made to the Ministry of Children and Youth Services that Children's Aid Societies include in their service agreements with foster parents the requirement of unscheduled visits by workers to foster homes. I agree with this recommendation, and I support the initiative of the CAS of SD&G to introduce unscheduled visits prior to it becoming a Ministry requirement.

As required, Bryan Keough kept detailed recordings of Roberta's progress at the Hubert home. He agreed that from 1972 to 1973 there did not appear to be any concerns with her, but that by 1976 there had been a change and he had noted some concerns. For example, in an annual summary prepared in April 1976, Mr. Keough noted that Roberta had a "short attention span with possible problem areas as follows; lying, ... manipulative, and outright bullheaded at times." Mr. Keough testified that he was not aware of any suicide attempt by Ms Archambault. Although he had noted in the case file that she was admitted to hospital on October 6, 1976, he could not recall the incident or whether he had any concerns about it at the time.

In later entries, Mr. Keough noted possible sexual behaviour. In particular, he made the following comments:

She has a fair attention span with problem areas as follows: lying, stealing, possible sexual misbehaviour, manipulative, very selfish and self-centred at times.

She has severe anger outbursts, mood changes, manipulative, jealous, possessive, smokes heavily, but always has money and possibly promiscuous.

These recordings were made in 1980. The first comment was made in an annual summary that covered the period of time from October 1978 to October 1980, and the second comment is in a transfer summary recorded in November 1980. Roberta Archambault was then thirteen to fifteen years old. Mr. Keough testified that he could not recall what these comments referred to and that he likely made them based on information received from the Huberts. Mr. Keough did not think at the time that Ms Archambault's behavioural problems could be indicators of physical or sexual abuse. He thought she was just experiencing the trauma one would expect a child to experience when he or she is taken from the natural family and placed in a foster home.

In my view, observations of sexual misbehaviour or promiscuity with respect to a thirteen- to fifteen-year-old youth warrant at least some investigation, including speaking to the child in question. I also note that, at the time, Roberta Archambault had been in the care of CAS for ten years and had not recently been apprehended. I also expect that Mr. Keough, who had been her worker since 1972, would have developed a relationship with Ms Archambault and should have been able to observe a change in her character. Behaviour changes can be a product of growing up, and we cannot always assume there is something negative behind them. However, it is incumbent upon CAS workers to recognize the signs of possible abuse and to ask the appropriate questions to determine whether abuse is a factor. My recommendations above about meeting with foster children outside of the foster home and making unscheduled visits should help in this regard. Mr. Keough did not have a specific recollection of the events that would explain his comments. Perhaps case recordings should include more details of the supporting facts and observations when drawing inferences relating to sexual conduct.

Disclosure of Abuse to a CAS Worker

Roberta Archambault testified that, when she was in grade 10, she called Bryan Keough from school one day and that he came to speak with her at school. She said they met in Mr. Keough's car in the school parking lot once or twice a week for two or three months and she told him about the verbal and physical abuse by the Huberts and about her suicide attempt. Ms Archambault also said she told Bryan Keough that every Sunday while she was dusting the Huberts' bedroom, Mr. Hubert was in the room cleaning his shotgun and he would put the gun to her head and say he could shoot her and bury her in the backyard and nobody would look for her. According to Ms Archambault, Mr. Keough said he would look into it; she said that was his response to everything she told him. Ms Archambault recalled that Mr. Keough was constantly writing in his books and flipping pages during their meetings. She thought he was taking notes of what she said.

Ms Archambault testified that Mr. Keough told her he would get her out of the Hubert home; she could not understand why it was taking so long. She said that, after speaking with Mr. Keough the first time, she packed her bags and Ms Hubert had unpacked them.

Ms Archambault did not tell the CAS worker about the sexual abuse by Mr. Hubert. She testified she had "blocked that from myself."

Bryan Keough denied that Roberta Archambault told him about any abuse in the Hubert home or that he met with her at school two to three times a week for several months. He explained that the CAS would have received a call from the school because the school would have "frowned upon" a child being removed from the school for that amount of time. Mr. Keough did not recall Ms Archambault telling him that she had attempted to commit suicide or that Mr. Hubert had put a shotgun to her head; nor did he recall her showing him bruises or marks on her body. Mr. Keough testified that, had she told him she had been abused in the Hubert home, he would have put the information in his case recordings. There is no reference in the recordings prepared by Mr. Keough of Roberta Archambault advising him that she was physically abused by the Huberts. I have already recommended that case recordings should perhaps be more detailed. In light of the issues that arose here, recordings should also always note the location of the meeting or interview.

Removal of Ms Archambault From the Hubert Foster Home

According to the file recordings, in April 1980, the Huberts requested that Ms Archambault be removed from the home, but she requested that she not be moved immediately due to her school year and the Huberts agreed that such an interruption at that time could do her harm. According to the notes, Roberta was given several alternatives, including immediate removal if the situation in the home broke down or staying until the end of July if she behaved. Ms Archambault testified that Mr. Keough gave her the option to move immediately or stay until the end of the school year and that she told him she wanted to leave immediately. This is inconsistent with the case recordings, which indicate that, in August 1980, she requested that she be allowed to stay in the Hubert home.

In the fall of 1980, the situation in the Hubert home began to deteriorate again and Ms Archambault was removed from the home in December 1980.

Roberta Archambault Is Placed in the Lapensee Group Home

Roberta Archambault was transferred to the Lapensee group home in December 1980. She was fifteen years old. With the exception of a short period of time during which she tried living with her natural mother, Ms Archambault lived at the Lapensee home until the spring of 1983.

There were seven other foster children at the Lapensee home—five girls and two boys. The Lapensees also had two sons and three daughters of their own. When Ms Archambault first moved to the Lapensee home, they had a farmhouse where everybody lived. Shortly after, they purchased a residence in Martintown, which became the girls' group home. The boys stayed at the farmhouse. Mary Miller was the CAS worker responsible for the children in the Lapensee home. Ian MacLean was her supervisor.

There was a Placement Committee meeting on December 17, 1980, during which Roberta's file was reviewed. Present at the meeting were Ms Archambault's former worker Bryan Keough, Mary Miller, Ian MacLean, the Lapensees, and another CAS worker, Karen Clarke. Mr. MacLean testified that the references in the case file to sexual misbehaviour and possible promiscuity were discussed during the meeting. His role as supervisor was to ensure that the new worker took these issues into consideration and tried to deal with them. Mr. MacLean did not recall any discussion about obtaining a psychological assessment of Ms Archambault in light of some of the issues raised in the case notes. He testified that, in hindsight, it would have been prudent to arrange such an assessment.

The intention was that Roberta Archambault would be in the Lapensee home only temporarily and that she could then return to the Hubert family. However, within three months of her arrival she "adamantly refused" to return to the Hubert foster home. Mr. MacLean could not recall if Ms Miller explored with Ms Archambault why she was so adamant about not returning to the Hubert home.

Disclosure of Physical Abuse at the Huberts

Ms Archambault testified that she told the Lapensees about the physical abuse at the Hubert home, including the incident of Mr. Hubert holding a shotgun to her head and specific injuries she received to her hands and her nose. She testified that Mary Miller also knew about the shotgun incidents. There is no indication in the recording of either the Lapensees or Ms Miller being advised of these events. Mr. MacLean could not recall it being brought to his attention that Ms Archambault had disclosed physical abuse at the Hubert home to the Lapensees and Ms Miller.

Sexual Abuse by Brian Lapensee

After moving into the Lapensee group home, Ms Archambault was introduced to one of the Lapensees' sons, Brian. She thought he was around twenty-one years old. He lived at the Lapensee farmhouse, where Ms Archambault spent some of her weekends. She testified that, during her first weekend at the farmhouse, another foster girl told her that Brian Lapensee had been touching her inappropriately.

At one point, less than three months after she arrived at the house, Ms Archambault found herself the only female foster child left at the home over the weekends. She testified that the Lapensees started offering her a glass of wine and asking her to cook something:

And the thing was to cook something in the kitchen, you would have to leave the living room and he was always in the kitchen by the wood stove drinking, Brian Lapensee. It was basically a set-up. They never watched him. They knew what he was doing. They just turned a blind eye.

Roberta Archambault alleged that Brian Lapensee fondled her, and there was oral sex, and this took place when she was fifteen or sixteen years old. She said she never had sexual intercourse with him because she "didn't want to end up being one of the girls that got pregnant." She had heard about other girls who got pregnant and was told by one girl that she had been taken to Montreal for an abortion when she was fourteen years old.

According to Ms Archambault, she did not tell Brian Lapensee's parents because she had been told by one of the daughters that this was the last foster home for her, and she felt the mother, Alice Lapensee, would do anything to protect her son.

On August 31, 1982, Ms Archambault moved in with her natural mother in Crystal Beach, Ontario. She returned to the Lapensee home on December 2, 1982. Shortly before Roberta returned to the home, allegations of sexual abuse were made against Brian Lapensee by other girls in the home, and the CAS conducted an investigation.

CAS Investigation Into Allegations Against Brian Lapensee, November–December 1982

On November 30, 1982, Mary Miller reported to Ian MacLean that one of the female foster children in the Lapensee home had alleged that Brian Lapensee was sexually molesting her and other girls in the home. It was decided that the CAS would conduct a full investigation into the matter, and Mr. MacLean and Ms Miller interviewed all the girls in the home, Brian Lapensee, and Mr. and Ms Lapensee later that day. In addition to the original complainant, three other girls alleged that Brian Lapensee had sexually molested or made sexual advances towards them.

During their interview, the Lapensees advised the CAS workers that Brian Lapensee was not allowed in the group home and the girls were not allowed at the farmhouse. They admitted, however, that Brian and a male ward named Donald would drop by the group home occasionally to pick up their dinner but that the visit was brief and they were watched carefully. They also mentioned that Brian Lapensee had slept over at the home when the girls had been at the farmhouse on one occasion. Ian MacLean explained that there was approximately four to five kilometres between the group home and the farmhouse and that Brian Lapensee was living at the farmhouse.

Brian Lapensee denied having any physical or sexual contact with the girls and stated that he felt his previous involvement with a ward in his parents' home, which will be discussed below, allowed him to be set-up by the other girls even if he had not done anything. He advised that he was leaving that night to move to Toronto.

Following the investigation, Ian MacLean prepared a serious occurrence report. A serious occurrence report refers to a report of an incident that has to be reported to the Ministry. The use of the term is not dependent upon the seriousness of the situation. There is a long list of situations where a serious occurrence report is sent to the Ministry.

The report concluded as follows:

With all the similar reports given by at least four of the girls and with Brian's past history one has to conclude that many if not all and perhaps more of these incidents did occur. How much setting up was done by the girls (who all have promiscuous backgrounds) one will never know. However, Brian has to realize that this home is a home of safety of these girls and that he under no circumstance can be involved with them. I feel I made that very clear to him.

In my view, Mr. MacLean used some unfortunate language in this report, especially in light of the fact that Brian Lapensee was twenty-one years old and the girls, who were all in the care of the CAS, were fifteen years old. I find the reference to the girls' "promiscuous backgrounds" to be inappropriate and irrelevant to determining whether or not sexual abuse occurred in the home. Mr. MacLean acknowledged that, even if an individual is promiscuous, she can still be sexually assaulted and that promiscuity on the part of the girls would not excuse Brian Lapensee's behaviour. I also find disconcerting that Mr. MacLean concluded that Brian Lapensee could not "be involved" with the girls in the home. An allegation of a consensual sexual relationship between Brian Lapensee and a female ward would in itself have been inappropriate. However, the allegation reported was an unwanted and non-consensual sexual touching and harassment. Given that this report is submitted to the Ministry and would be provided to the legal authorities if the matter were further investigated and is kept in the foster parents' file, CAS workers should be forthright and explicit in describing the behaviour that is being investigated or questioned.

The conclusion also references "Brian's past history." The CAS was aware that there had been an issue of inappropriate sexual misconduct on the part of Brian Lapensee several years earlier, as a result of which a female ward became pregnant. Mr. MacLean testified that, at the time, Brian Lapensee was not constantly living in the home but moving in and out. Each time he moved back, Mr. MacLean would meet with him and his parents and "have a very frank discussion with him that he needed to be very careful of his actions." I think it is unfortunate that Mr. MacLean was not more specific with respect to the history being referred to—again for the sake of other individuals or institutions that may have read this report and made decisions on the basis of it.

I heard evidence at the Inquiry of an incident involving the Lapensees' other son, Larry. He had a sexual relationship with a ward in the home who became pregnant and was placed in a home for unwed mothers. Ian MacLean did not know about this until the Inquiry, as none of this information was in the Lapensee file. Mr. MacLean testified that, if he had had this information in 1977, when he began developing parent-model and specialized foster homes, he might not have considered the Lapensees as candidates to run a group home. He also agreed that, given that the event in 1979 was the second time a boy from the Lapensee family had impregnated a ward entrusted to the care of the Lapensees, the home should have been closed in 1979. This is a good example of the importance of accurate record keeping and information sharing. Had Mr. MacLean had this information, it may have led to the Lapensee home being closed earlier or perhaps not even opened.

The serious occurrence report recommended three actions to be taken:

1—That a letter of warning under Section 46(c) of the Child Welfare Act be sent to Brian Lapensee and recorded.

2—That the Ministry be notified.

3—That a letter be sent to Ed and Alice [Lapensee] containing a copy of Brian's letter and recommendations: 1) that Brian never be allowed on the Group Home premises; 2) that we be notified should he move back to our area; 3) that all incidents, alleged or otherwise affecting safety or well being of a child be reported to the CAS social worker immediately as outlined in our policy; 4) that staff on every shift report in the log.

The report recommendations were all followed. Notably, there was no recommendation to contact the police. Ian MacLean testified that the matter was reported to the executive director, Tom O'Brien, as was the practice at the time. Mr. O'Brien was provided with a copy of the serious occurrence report on December 1, 1982, the day after it was completed. According to Mr. MacLean, both Ms Miller and Mr. MacLean hoped that charges would be laid. Mr. MacLean thought charges would be laid.

"Standards and Guidelines: Child Abuse" (1981) was adopted to ensure adequate and uniform service and case management in cases of child abuse by Children's Aid Societies. It provides under "Receipt of Complaint" that the "[p]olice shall be informed of complaints received of alleged child abuse according to a predetermined plan that will have been worked out jointly by the police and local Children's Aid Society." Under "Police Involvement" it says that "[a] plan shall be developed jointly by the local Children's Aid Society and the police to ensure that there is a cooperative working agreement."

Mr. MacLean testified that he was not sure if he was aware of this document prior to his writing of the report in 1982. He testified that the child protection group should have been familiar with this document in February 1981. At the time, he was in foster care and special resources. He also testified that the guidelines applicable to child abuse investigations were not followed. He was unsure what the practice was but agreed that CAS wards should not have been dealt with under a different protocol than the provincial policies and guidelines in place at the time with respect to complaints of child sexual abuse allegations.

As I will discuss further below, in my opinion one of the recommendations coming out of the CAS investigation of Brian Lapensee should have been to notify the police. The allegations were sufficient to warrant a police investigation.

When Roberta Archambault returned to the Lapensee home on December 2, 1982, she was advised by Mary Miller of the allegations against Brian Lapensee and the subsequent investigation. According to the file recordings, this information upset Ms Archambault:

This upset Bertie considerably as she denied Brian had ever made any advances towards her and also because she had returned to the GH [group home] planning that she could eventually “graduate” to the Lapensee family home and from there find a sence [sic] of family belonging.

Roberta Archambault recalled Mary Miller asking her if Brian had touched her or made any sexual advances, and she denied that any such events had occurred. She understood that Ms Miller was asking her this question because another girl had reported that Brian Lapensee had touched her. She felt that she had “failed” this girl by not telling Ms Miller what had happened; she explained, “I didn’t want to live on the streets again.”

Tom O’Brien Reports to the Ministry and Meets With the Crown

On December 2, 1982, Mr. O’Brien wrote a letter to Robert Nadon, Ministry supervisor, enclosing a copy of the serious occurrence report. Mr. Nadon was advised that there was no further risk to children, as Brian Lapensee had left the area. Mr. O’Brien also stated that, although he did not expect any action on the part of the Crown attorney or the police, he had made an appointment to meet with the Crown attorney.

Mr. O’Brien sent another letter to Mr. Nadon, dated December 6, 1982, indicating that he and Ian MacLean had met with the Crown attorney. Mr. MacLean did not know why they had gone to the Crown rather than speaking with the police first; it was not his decision. He testified that the Crown did not suggest that it was inappropriate for them to come to him rather than the police and did not recommend that the police be contacted.

The Lapensees were provided with a copy of the serious occurrence report and the two letters to Mr. Nadon in addition to a letter from Tom O’Brien dated December 7, 1982. Mr. O’Brien advised them that the matter had been discussed with the Crown attorney, who had decided that no further legal action would be taken. The Crown attorney’s role in this will be further discussed in Chapter 11, dealing with the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

The Ministry supervisor, Robert Nadon, sent a letter to Tom O’Brien on or around December 14, 1982, indicating that he was satisfied that children in the Lapensee home were no longer at risk.

Home Not Closed, Charges Not Laid

This was not the first incident the CAS encountered at the Lapensee group home, yet the home was still not closed. Ian MacLean did not recall there being any discussion about closing the home. The fact that Brian Lapensee had moved away influenced Mr. MacLean's comfort level with respect to the home.

This group home already had two incidents in which the foster parents' sons had engaged in sexual activity with adolescent female wards. I accept that Mr. MacLean was not aware of the first incident involving Larry Lapensee. Mr. O'Brien also could not recall knowing of either incident in 1982. However, it is clear from Mr. MacLean's testimony and the serious occurrence report that the CAS was aware at the time of at least the incident in 1979 involving Brian Lapensee. In 1982, when allegations of sexual molestation were made against Brian Lapensee, an investigation led Mr. MacLean to conclude that these incidents and possibly more had occurred. Mr. MacLean testified that he was aware that what Brian Lapensee allegedly did to at least three girls in the home was possibly an offence under the Criminal Code. In my opinion, given these circumstances, the police should have been advised of the allegations and the home should have been closed. Even if charges were not warranted under the Criminal Code, the behaviour was such that this was not an acceptable home in which to place children and youth in the care of the CAS. The threshold for closing a home due to misconduct should be lower than the threshold for laying criminal charges. Any one of the incidents that occurred at the Lapensee home should have been grounds for considering closing it. More than one incident should have ensured its closure.

Mr. O'Brien, who was the executive director of the CAS at the time of these incidents, acknowledged that the information about Larry Lapensee would have been enough to close the home. He agreed that by 1982, given the earlier behaviour of the two sons, the home needed to be closed: "Knowing what I know now, I think we should have been much more thorough in our investigations and, if necessary, taken action to close the home."

Brian Lapensee Returns to the Lapensee Home

In December 1982, Brian Lapensee returned to the area and was again living in his parents' farmhouse. Tom O'Brien and Ian MacLean wrote Brian Lapensee a letter, dated December 20, 1982, in which they reminded him that he had agreed that he would leave his parents' home and have no further contact with the girls in the Martintown group home. He was advised that any further contact with any of the girls could result in serious consequences. A copy of this letter was provided to Mr. Nadon, Ed and Alice Lapensee, and Mary Miller. Mr. MacLean recalled that Brian Lapensee was in agreement and was willing to follow these conditions.

Given that it appeared that Brian Lapensee's departure from the area was a significant factor in the determination by the CAS that the wards in the home were no longer at risk, I am surprised that more aggressive action was not taken upon his return to the area to ensure that he would not pose a threat to the female wards in the group home.

Roberta Archambault Spends Christmas With the Lapensees

As the Christmas holidays approached, it was agreed that Roberta Archambault could spend two days and one night with the Lapensee family, including Brian Lapensee, over Christmas on the condition that the parents would provide constant supervision and ensure that their son was not alone with Roberta. According to the file recordings, "At that time, Bertie was unwanted by any of her family in this area and was very unhappy at having no one to spend Christmas with."

Correspondence was exchanged between Ed Lapensee and Tom O'Brien, confirming the conditions on which Roberta could join the family for Christmas Eve and Christmas Day. In particular, the Lapensees were to assume full responsibility for her during the time she was with the family in the farmhouse, and she could stay overnight in the farmhouse only when both parents were present.

As to why the CAS made the decision to allow a young female ward to spend Christmas in the Lapensee home, with Brian Lapensee present, only a few weeks after specifying that Brian Lapensee was to have no contact with female wards in the home, Mr. MacLean testified:

... We were faced with a young lady who is now 17 and-a-half, still a minor but 17 and-a-half years of age; she had been visiting her parents—her mother. That had broken down and that was quite disturbing to her.

At that point, she was in—no speaking terms, I believe, with her sister. She very desperately wanted to have family, again, as I've spoken before, and it was Christmas.

On the other side, I had Brian and I had the conditions that we had laid out, that I was fully aware of with the Ministry. And we made the decision, I was very much a part of that decision, to allow for the one night and two days. It was Christmas Eve and Christmas Day for her to spend, with the conditions.

Mr. MacLean was aware that allowing an arrangement to depart from the prohibitions and conditions that had been put into place three weeks prior was a major departure from the original prohibition. He did not believe that he notified that Ministry of this departure.

Roberta Archambault stayed with the Lapensees at Christmas, and there was no report of misconduct at the time.

The Easter Weekend Incident and Roberta Archambault's Second Suicide Attempt

In April 1983, Roberta Archambault attended a Lapensee family Easter dinner at a relative's house during which there was an incident that led Ms Archambault to accuse Brian Lapensee of making sexual advances towards her. This incident led to a heated family argument, and Ms Archambault spent the night with relatives of the Lapensee family. According to Ms Archambault, when she returned to the Lapensee home the following day, she was told by one of the Lapensees' daughters that she "had ruined it for everybody" and that now she "didn't have a home." Roberta Archambault testified that she "had nothing" and "had thrown it all away," so she bought some Anacin, took the pills, and went to bed "hoping not to wake up." The next morning, on April 5, 1983, she woke up not feeling very well but did not tell the Lapensees what she had done. At school, she called Mary Miller, who came to the school and took her to the hospital.

Ms Archambault testified that, on the way to the hospital, she told Ms Miller that the accusations made by the girls in 1982 against Brian Lapensee were true and that she had lied when asked about him because she "had always been able to handle Brian and his advances to her and she did not want to hurt Ed and Alice by telling them the truth." She desperately wanted to have them as a family.

According to Ms Archambault, she was told by Mary Miller that the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) would be investigating. She believed that Brian Lapensee was charged by the police, and she thought it was strange that she was not interviewed. As will be discussed below, the OPP were never contacted about this incident.

On April 7, 1983, Mary Miller and Ian MacLean interviewed Roberta Archambault at the hospital. She told them that she had stayed overnight at the Lapensee farmhouse on April 2, 1983. This was the first time the CAS was aware that Ms Archambault had stayed at the farmhouse that night. There had been no arrangement with the CAS for this overnight visit. Mr. MacLean testified that he would have expected there to have been a request and special circumstances set up, as the Lapensees were aware that Roberta was not to stay there and that Brian Lapensee was not to have contact with female wards.

Roberta Archambault told the CAS workers that, when she woke up the next morning, Brian Lapensee was in her bedroom and made a sexual advance towards her. She then described the family party, the confrontation that ensued, and her attempt to commit suicide.

Later that day, the Lapensees were interviewed and were told there were two options. One was to close the home and the second was to ask the Ministry to conduct a review of the home and for the Lapensees to follow the recommendations laid down. Following this interview, Mr. MacLean met with Tom O'Brien, Angelo Towndale, and other CAS officials. A unanimous decision was made to close the home, but that the Lapensees would be given the opportunity to resign. Mr. MacLean could not recall why this opportunity was given to the Lapensees.

As with the incident in late 1982, a serious occurrence report was prepared by Ian MacLean. His report recommended that: the report be filed with the Ministry; the police or Crown attorney be consulted on the recommendation of Mr. Robert Nadon; a deadline for closing the group home, allowing sixty days notice, be set by Mr. O'Brien, with Mr. Lapensee being asked for a letter of resignation; and, finally, the three girls then in the Lapensee home be referred to the Placement Committee.

Although the Lapensees were asked for a letter of resignation, the CAS was going to close the home regardless of whether such a letter was received, according to Ian MacLean. The recommendation to close the home was based on the fact that the Lapensees had broken the agreement with the CAS that Brian Lapensee was to have no contact with any girls in the group home and the girls were not to stay at the farmhouse. In addition, the CAS was "not prepared to expose [their] adolescent wards to further chances of sexual harassment from Brian."

As per the recommendations, the serious occurrence report, dated April 11, 1983, was forwarded to Mr. Nadon. With respect to notifying legal authorities, the recommendation was that either the Crown attorney or the police be consulted. In a letter to Executive Director Tom O'Brien, dated April 19, 1983, Mr. Nadon indicated that he understood Mr. O'Brien would be consulting with the Crown attorney. Mr. Nadon did not recommend reporting to the police. As with the previous incident, Mr. O'Brien again contacted the Crown rather than the police.

Tom O'Brien spoke with the Crown attorney, Alain Ain, on April 21, 1983. The following day, Mr. O'Brien sent Mr. Ain a letter, enclosing a copy of the serious occurrence report and providing the following opinion:

While it is your decision as to whether charges should be laid, I would like to take the liberty of giving you my opinion which is that there would not be a necessity to pursue charges. I'm basing my decision on three specific items—1) the nature of the sexual advance does not seem too serious; 2) since the advance in question was one more in a series of inappropriate advances we see it as the “straw that broke the camel’s back” and therefore decided to close this group home. The home is now closed, though because of a contract we must continue to pay until sometime in June; and 3) all girls have been removed from this group home and the licence for the operation of it has been revoked by us.

Mr. O’Brien advised Mr. Nadon in a letter dated April 23, 1983, that the Crown felt there was no point in pursuing charges against Brian Lapensee at that time.

Mr. O’Brien testified that he went to the highest source for direction, which was the Crown. He was comfortable basing his decision regarding the proper way of proceeding on the Crown’s opinion of the case, including the Crown’s opinion not to lay charges against Brian Lapensee.

In my opinion, the practice of Mr. O’Brien in going to the Crown for direction illustrates a misunderstanding of the roles of the police and the Crown. It is the police and not the Crown attorney who decide whether criminal charges will be laid. It is clear that Mr. O’Brien had no difficulty expressing his opinion to the Crown that he did not see a need for charges. Again, this is a matter for the police, not Mr. O’Brien or the Crown. Ian MacLean testified that, at the time, he did not understand the different roles of the Crown and the police. He thought going to the Crown was sufficient. Although he knew the police were responsible for laying charges, he believed that the Crown, upon looking at the evidence, would recommend that the police be contacted if there were sufficient grounds to lay a charge.

As I found with respect to the 1982 incident, the CAS should have contacted the police about the allegations of Ms Archambault in April 1983.

In addition to not contacting the police, the CAS also did not interview female wards who were placed in the home between 1977 and 1983 to find out if they had been sexually molested or suffered any sexual advances by Brian Lapensee. Given the number of incidents involving Brian Lapensee that had come to the attention of the CAS, this would have been a prudent thing to do. Mr. MacLean testified that this is something that would be done today.

According to Ms Archambault, she was not offered any counselling or help by the CAS. There is, however, in the file recordings a reference to an appointment with Dr. Forson on April 7, 1983, during which Ms Archambault was referred to Dr. Manigat for counselling. Whether or not Ms Archambault attended for counselling on that occasion, it is evident from her testimony at the hearings that she is still experiencing difficulties. She spoke of ongoing health problems that she attributes to her alleged abuse and a need for ongoing counselling.

The Lapensees Resign and the Group Home Is Closed

The resignation letter from Mr. Lapensee, dated April 11, 1983, stated:

We now find the heartache, pressure and emotional strain, too great for us to continue in the capacity of group home parents at this time.

...

As group home parents we feel that we have taken something away from our own children. It is time we devote [sic] more of ourselves to our own family.

Therefore, we must tender our resignations as group home parents, effective June 11, 1983.

There is nothing in this letter about the problems that occurred within the home or about the Lapensees being in breach of agreements with the CAS regarding their son. Mr. MacLean testified that the CAS did not expect the letter to go into any detail. He explained that he prepared a closing summary for the Lapensee foster home, which was to be part of the permanent file. This file would be shared with any other CAS jurisdiction that contacted the CAS of SD&G inquiring about the Lapensees if they were to move to another jurisdiction and decide to become foster or group home parents again. Mr. MacLean was very confident that Children's Aid Societies in other jurisdictions would be told the real reason behind the resignation.

The closing summary prepared by Mr. MacLean on January 7, 1985, stated in part:

Apart from the excellent care provided in this home, there has been one recurring negative theme throughout the six years I have worked in the home. Very early in our group home relationship I had our female wards complain that Brian Lapensee (youngest son of Ed and Alice) was attempting to have sexual play with them. At that point, Brian was about 16 years of age and given a firm warning. In the fall of 1979 Brian again came to our attention when he left the home with a 16 year old ward who became pregnant by him and moved with him to the West. On Brian's return to the home, he became involved in drugs and drinking and was again warned that should he have further involvement with our girls he may be charged and the home closed.

Two further serious occurrence reports have been received by this Agency—both involving Brian Lapensee and sexual advances to our female wards. As a result, I see no other possible alternative than to close the home so as to protect our wards from Brian.

... During these recent incidences Mrs. Lapensee tended to turn her anger back on our girls labelling them as being responsible for the initiation of the sexual activity and saying that Brian was “victimized.” Only in the last case did Ed truly begin to accept that Brian was the instigator, however, [he] was not prepared to take any significant action. At no time was Alice ever able to recognize Brian was a problem in the home. Very hesitantly she would support recommendations controlling Brian’s activity in the Group Home, but seldom consistently carried through.

This closing summary makes reference to an incident involving Brian Lapensee when he was sixteen years of age, prior to the 1979 incident. There was no note of this in the file until this closing summary. Ian MacLean did not believe that anything was recorded or the Ministry notified of that incident. Mr. MacLean just spoke to Brian Lapensee and his parents. He could not recall who the complainant was or anything else about the situation. There was similarly no reference in the file to the 1979 incident until the 1985 closing summary. There were in fact no recordings in the Lapensee file between 1973 and the closing summary in 1985. In my view, the record keeping with respect to the Lapensee group home was inexcusable. This failure is even more egregious given the numerous concerns that arose with respect to the Lapensees’ son. To maintain consistency and ensure that decisions are made with full knowledge and information, it is critical that foster and group home files be kept up-to-date and contain detailed descriptions of any incidents or concerns.

Staff of the Lapensee Group Home

The Lapensee family ran a group home for troubled teenagers for many years. The group home was staffed in part by some of the Lapensees’ children. Ian MacLean testified that the CAS would likely not have such an arrangement today because having family members directly under the responsibility of other family members can create awkward situations. I agree and would add that, unlike a foster home, which is modelled after a natural family, a group home is a somewhat different atmosphere, with many more children in the home and therefore the need for staff to assist in operating the home. It may be also be more difficult for a child to report difficulties to the foster parents, given the family dynamic.

Although I have acknowledged several times in this chapter that times have changed and many things are done differently today than they were twenty or thirty years ago, the Lapensee home, in my view, should have been closed down earlier than it was. The incident in 1979, in which Brian Lapensee impregnated a female ward, could have been sufficient grounds to close the home. At the very least, there should have been a discussion among CAS officials about the future of the home. According to Mr. MacLean, the issue of closing the home was not raised with his superiors in 1979. He explained that the CAS was in the process of replacing beds due to the closure of the Second Street group home, which may have been part of his focus at the time. He acknowledged that, in hindsight, he should have done things differently.

Although the decision not to close the home in 1979 might be understandable given the circumstances, the response of the CAS to the incidents in 1982 and 1983 involving Brian Lapensee was entirely inadequate. The police should have been contacted. The home should have been closed in 1982. When it was finally closed in 1983, the Lapensees should not have been allowed to resign. In any event, the closing summary should have been prepared immediately, especially given that the Lapensees were permitted to resign with no indication in their resignation letter as to the circumstances of the home's closure.

Mr. MacLean, who was a supervisor at the time of the incidents with the Lapensee home, agreed that in hindsight and with the knowledge he has today, the home should have been closed earlier. At the time, it was not something he considered.

At this point, I wish to say a few words about Ian MacLean. Although I have disagreed with some of the decisions he made in respect to the Lapensee group home, I find that he was an exceptionally dedicated and compassionate individual who genuinely had the best interests of the children in CAS care at heart. Unfortunately, often individuals like Mr. MacLean and others at the CAS are mentioned only when something goes wrong. And although it is important to hold people and institutions responsible for mistakes, it is equally important to recognize the good work and achievements accomplished by these individuals. Mr. MacLean has worked for over thirty years to ensure that children who have been abused and/or neglected have somewhere safe to live and grow. For that he should be commended.

I found Mr. MacLean to be a forthright and honest witness who readily admitted his errors and appeared to be genuinely interested in ensuring that all relevant information was put before the Inquiry for my consideration. I also found his recommendations insightful and helpful.

Roberta Archambault Is Placed in the deRonde Home

After her removal from the Lapensee group home, Roberta Archambault stayed briefly at the Lalonde home and then was sent to the deRonde home in St. Andrew's. She said that things were better there and they tried everything to make her a part of their family. She thought that, when she moved into the deRonde home, they knew what had happened to her, but she found out only later that they did not know anything about the physical and sexual abuse she had suffered. Ms Archambault believed that, if the foster parents had been told, they would have got her the help she needed.

Roberta Archambault left the deRonde home when she was nineteen. After graduating from high school, she had three months to find a place to live, and that ended the CAS's care of her. Ms Archambault's wardship ended in September 1984.

Roberta Archambault Attempts to Access Her CAS File

In or around 1992, Roberta Archambault asked the CAS if she could see her file from when she was a Crown ward because she thought it would contain some proof of what had happened to her. Because she had been a ward for close to fifteen years, she had expected her file to be thick but she received only four or five pages. When she asked where the rest of her file was, Ms Archambault was told that the CAS could give her only a summary of her file because of other parties named in her file. She was told that she could not even look at her whole file. In addition to being disappointed with the lack of information she received, Ms Archambault felt that the content of the file differed from her experience. In particular, with respect to her time at the Hubert home, she felt as though the file recordings were talking about somebody else.

In 1994, Roberta Archambault retained a lawyer to try to obtain access to her CAS records. Some correspondence was exchanged between her lawyer and the CAS of SD&G, but Ms Archambault still did not receive the entire contents of her file. She was provided with an additional three-page summary. After receiving this summary, Ms Archambault made an appointment to see CAS Executive Director Richard Abell. She testified that she asked him what happened to the information she disclosed to Bryan Keough about the Huberts. According to Ms Archambault, Mr. Abell called Mr. Keough, who said that he didn't write anything down because he thought she was a liar. Mr. Keough testified that he did not recall any such phone call with Mr. Abell.

Richard Abell recalled meeting with Ms Archambault in 1994 and that she had been seeking access to her file for several years. During a conversation on August 24, 1994, Mr. Abell told her that she would not be getting access to her file. He testified that this was the policy at the time.

As I will discuss in a later section, the inability of individuals who were in the care of CAS as children to obtain access to their files is troubling and, in my opinion, unacceptable.

Jeannette Antoine

Jeannette Antoine (née Lapointe) was born on September 24, 1960, the youngest of four girls. Ms Antoine³⁰ and her three older sisters were placed into the care of the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS of SD&G) at a very young age. She became a temporary ward on February 6, 1962, and a permanent ward in 1964. She lived in various foster homes and group homes and alleged she was a victim of both physical and sexual abuse while a ward of the CAS.

Jeannette Antoine and her sister Lorraine were the two youngest of the four sisters. They remained with their maternal grandmother until March 5, 1962, when they were placed in the St. John foster home for a period of two years. Jeannette's other two sisters were placed in care elsewhere and were eventually adopted.

In April 1964, Jeannette and Lorraine were moved to the Martin home in Cornwall. The St. Johns could no longer foster the children because of Ms St. John's health. The sisters remained at the Martin home until August 27, 1964, when they were both placed on probationary adoption, with Mr. and Ms Taillefer and their ten-year-old son. The foster mother had a difficult time adapting to life with the two girls. The adoption process was terminated, and they were removed from the home on October 27, 1964, and placed again in the St. Martin foster home. In early 1965, the foster mother reported that the two girls, who slept together, were frequently engaged in what appeared to be sex play. On July 1, 1965, Jeannette Antoine and her sister were removed from the Martin home and placed in the Lamarche home, where they gained security and their behaviour slowly improved. On July 12, 1966, Jeannette and Lorraine were once again placed on probationary adoption, with the Rowan family in Orillia. The adoptive placement was of short duration, and the two girls were returned to the care of the CAS of SD&G on September 15, 1966.

The Reynen Foster Home

Jeannette Antoine and her older sister Lorraine were placed in the Reynen foster home, located in Ingleside, on September 15, 1966, when Jeannette was five. The Reynens had a nine-year-old daughter, another foster child, and an adolescent son, aged eighteen, who was home for the weekend when Jeannette and

30. For purposes of clarity and consistency, I will refer to Jeannette Lapointe Antoine as Jeannette Antoine or Ms Antoine throughout this section. I will refer to her sister as Lorraine or Lorraine Lapointe.

Lorraine arrived at the home. There were other foster children placed in the home from time to time. Mavis Nixon was the children's childcare worker from October 1966 to January 6, 1967, when the children were transferred to the Anne Mitchell, their new worker.

Jeannette Antoine testified that the Reynens were from Holland and would occasionally return there for visits, during which time the girls would stay at either the Looyen or the Heemskerk foster homes. I have reviewed the foster file of Jeannette Antoine, which confirms that they were temporarily placed with the Looyens while the Reynens were away, but they were placed with the Heemskerks because they were being considered for adoption. Ms Antoine testified that they would also stay in one of these homes at times when Ms Reynen was admitted to the hospital. Ms Antoine testified that she lived in the Reynen foster home until she was fifteen years old, following which she lived in a number of group homes.

Jeannette Antoine alleged that she and her sister were both physically and sexually abused at the Reynen home. She testified that the physical abuse started within a month of their arrival and that the sexual abuse started approximately four months later. According to Jeannette Antoine, the foster mother physically abused the girls on many occasions. The abuse included pulling their hair, slapping them, punching them, and refusing to feed them. She claimed that the Reynens' daughter was also physically abusive. Ms Antoine recalled the Reynens' daughter kicking her sister in the mouth.

Ms Antoine also alleged that Mr. Reynen once took off his belt, chased her outside, and pushed her. She hit her head on a big rock and ended up with a concussion and stitches. Although she was taken to the hospital, Ms Antoine testified that she told people at the hospital that her sister had hurt her because she was worried that, if she told the truth, Mr. Reynen would do something else to her.

Jeannette Antoine testified that Mr. Reynen started sexually abusing her when she was about five or six years old. She said that she and her sister shared a bed in the basement and he would lie down between them and touch them. She testified that the abuse became more frequent and intrusive, and he eventually had sexual intercourse with them. According to Ms Antoine, initially she and her sister did not talk about the abuse, but when she was about twelve or thirteen years old she started to tell people, including school teachers and CAS workers.

Interaction With the CAS While in the Reynen Home

Ms Antoine testified that different CAS workers showed up at the home every two to three months. She recalled that the Reynens were always present, and the two sisters never had any time alone with CAS workers. She also believed that the visits were scheduled in advance, because when the CAS worker showed up there were dolls and jewellery in their room, which would be put away after the CAS worker left.

According to Jeannette Antoine, the CAS became involved when she was hospitalized after she hit her head on a rock. She testified that a worker named Mavis came to the house after she was released from hospital and advised that she had been trying to reach Ms Antoine but that the Reynens kept giving her excuses for why she could not come to the phone. Ms Antoine testified that she told this worker that she had received the injury to her head as a result of Mr. Reynen chasing her. She explained that she had a chance to speak freely to Mavis "for like 2 seconds" before the Reynens came into the room. Although she was able to convey her message, Ms Antoine testified that her worker did not believe her and asked Bill Reynen what had happened and that he told her that Lorraine had pushed Jeannette.

Ms Antoine also alleged that a teacher, Mr. Clancy, asked about a bruise on her sister, which is the bruise she received when the Reynens' daughter kicked her in the mouth. Ms Antoine testified that she and her sister told Mr. Clancy about some of the physical abuse one day. The CAS was contacted and Mavis came to the school. According to Ms Antoine, the sisters told the CAS worker only about the physical abuse, as they were too scared to talk about everything that was happening to them. She said the worker took them home and spoke to the Reynens, who explained that the Reynens' daughter kicking Lorraine had been an accident.

Jeannette Antoine testified that she told her worker Mavis "bits and pieces" about the abuse she suffered at the Reynen home. For example, if she had a bruise on her, she would tell Mavis exactly what happened. I have reviewed the file, which indicates that Mavis Nixon was their adoption worker at the time they were placed with the Heemskerks.

Bryan Keough became Jeannette Antoine's worker in 1972. She was approximately twelve years old and living at the Reynen foster home.

Ms Antoine testified that Bryan Keough was told about the physical and sexual abuse at the Reynen home. According to Ms Antoine, she was present when her sister told Mr. Keough that Bill Reynen was raping her and that she had to get out of the home. Bryan Keough denied that Lorraine ever told him she was being sexually abused at the Reynen home. He remained her worker until her wardship was terminated, and he testified that she never disclosed to him that she was sexually abused by Mr. Reynen. Although Mr. Keough did move Lorraine from the home, as will be discussed below, he testified that he had had no indication at the time that she was being sexually abused.

Jeannette Antoine testified that she told Bryan Keough about both the physical and the sexual abuse the day that her sister was removed from the home. According to Ms Antoine, Mr. Keough responded by calling her a liar and telling her that this was the best foster home the CAS had and she was lucky to be there. Ms Antoine testified that she asked many times to be moved to another home.

Ms Antoine Alleges Abuse at the Looyen and Heemskerk Homes

Jeannette Antoine recalled that she and her sister began going to the Looyen home within the first year that they were at the Reynen home. Ms Antoine testified that they were abused by Ms Looyen's father, who would put them on his lap and touch them. She recalled that the abuse did not begin immediately and might have started when she was seven or eight years old. According to Ms Antoine, there was also physical abuse at the Looyen home, and she recalled an incident where her sister was beaten because the foster mother thought she had ruined her flowers.

Ms Antoine testified that she and her sister were too scared to report the abuse in the Looyen home and did not believe anybody observed the abuse they suffered there. However, she alleged that she told a number of CAS workers about the abuse later. In particular, she said she told Mr. Keough when he picked them up at the house and took them back to the Reynens; that she told Françoise Lepage after she ran away from the Anson home; and that she told Angelo Towndale at the meeting in March 1976 regarding abuse at the Second Street group home. Mr. Keough denied receiving this disclosure from Ms Antoine. He believed that Ms Antoine was in the Looyen foster home prior to Mr. Keough joining the CAS.

The child care file indicates that Jeannette and her sister Lorraine were transferred to the Heemskerk home for adoption placement on March 22, 1968, but that they had stayed there a number of weekends prior to the transfer. The adoptive worker at that time was Mavis Nixon. The Heemskerks already had an adoptive son. On July 2, 1968, the Heemskerks announced that they could no longer keep Jeannette Antoine, as she had been engaging in sexual play with their son. The foster mother also revealed that Jeannette Antoine, who was not yet eight years old, enjoyed exposing herself to the teenage hired hand and had been observed stimulating the dog. She indicated at the time that she wanted Jeannette to be removed but that her sister could stay. On July 3, 1968, there was a case conference, which included the CAS executive director, Tom O'Brien, regarding Jeannette's behaviour. They discussed the possibility of separating Jeannette from her sister and agreed to do so if this would not traumatize Lorraine. According to the file recording, Mr. O'Brien also consulted Dr. Irwin, who was of the opinion that Ms Antoine's problem was not physiological but psychological. Arrangements were made for Ms Antoine to see Dr. Burns on July 15, 1968.

On July 11, 1968, the CAS worker was advised that the Heemskerks wanted both sisters removed. They indicated that Jeannette had been caught twice engaging in sexual play. The next day, on further examination of the file, Mavis Nixon also noted the previous incident of sexual play involving Jeannette and her sister, which I discussed earlier. Jeannette Antoine saw Dr. Burns on July 15, 1968. He was of the opinion that her behaviour was serious and that she could benefit from treatment. On July 16, 1968, both girls were moved back to the Reynen foster home. Ms Reynen was advised that Jeannette had been sexually acting out, and she indicated that her behaviour would be closely monitored. I note that Ms Reynen and Jeannette Antoine visited Dr. Burns in September and November 1968 and January 1969, but that the foster mother had not observed any further regressive behaviour. Ms Connelly was the case worker assigned to this case, until it was re-assigned to R. Martel in December 1969 and Ms Ward in May 1970. The file does not report any difficulties with the placement during that period of time. A number of workers were assigned to this file until Bryan Keough became the childcare worker in August 1972.

Jeannette Antoine testified that there was also a lot of physical abuse in the Heemskerk home, with the foster mother "smacking [them] around." According to Ms Antoine, she reported this abuse to Bryan Keough when he picked them up and brought them back to the Reynens'. There are no references in Ms Antoine's file of her disclosing physical or sexual abuse to Bryan Keough at that time. It is apparent from the file that Mr. Keough became the caseworker only in 1972, four years after the two sisters were returned to the Reynen Foster home by Mavis Nixon.

Ms Antoine initially testified that a ranch handyman who worked for the Looyens raped her sister and molested her; however, upon being shown a copy of handwritten notes she made indicating that this abuse happened at the Heemskerk home, she testified that she must have been confused and did not remember at which home this happened. I find that, at times, Jeannette Antoine may have been confused about the location, timing, and details of the events from her past. This is not surprising given the passage of time, the number of CAS workers assigned to her file, and the frequency with which she was transferred in and out of numerous foster homes, all at a very young age.

Although there are no references in the case file to Ms Antoine disclosing abuse to her CAS workers, the references to sexual behaviour in Ms Antoine's file should, in my opinion, have alerted the CAS to a potential problem. Although these entries are not conclusive of any mistreatment, they indicate behaviour that should cause concern when exhibited by such a young child. Although the CAS took steps to ascertain a medical or psychological reason for Ms Antoine's behaviour it should also have, in my opinion, investigated the foster homes where she resided to determine if circumstances in those homes were the root cause of her sexual behaviour.

Bryan Keough testified that when he became Jeannette Antoine's worker in 1972, he read her file but he could not recall making a note of these particular recordings regarding her sexual behaviour and nobody discussed this matter with him.

Jeannette Antoine Leaves the Reynen Home

Bryan Keough testified that there were some issues in the Reynen foster home. The foster mother suffered from depression, and in November 1972 she was hospitalized due to a nervous breakdown and was released one month later. On March 15, 1973, Bryan Keough met with Mr. Reynen, who requested that the children be taken out of his home at the end of the school year. In June 1973, Mr. Keough had a discussion with a social worker, Pierre Landry, about some of the problems the foster parents were having, including the foster mother suffering breakdowns. Despite these issues in the home, the children remained there. Mr. Keough testified that his reasoning at the time was that the children seemed to be doing relatively well and that the focus should be on helping Ms Reynen resolve her problems.

On July 19, 1973, Bryan Keough received a call from Mr. Reynen, who asked that Lorraine Lapointe be moved out of the home as soon as possible but said that they had not yet made up their minds about Jeannette. They subsequently decided that Jeannette could stay. Mr. Keough testified that he did not wonder why Mr. Reynen wanted Lorraine but not Jeannette out of the home, even though she was, according to Mr. Keough, a bit of a troublemaker in the home. It never occurred to Mr. Keough that something sexual had occurred between Mr. Reynen and Lorraine. Nor did it occur to him to ask Lorraine about whether something might have happened after Mr. Reynen requested that she be removed. In hindsight, he agreed it was strange that Mr. Reynen wanted Lorraine rather than Jeannette to be removed from the home.

On June 3, 1974, Mr. Keough met with his supervisor, Angelo Towndale, to discuss Jeannette Antoine's placement in the Reynen home. Mr. Keough testified that when the sisters were separated he thought Jeannette Antoine blamed him and working with her after this was very difficult. He suggested at this meeting that her file be transferred to a female worker, and it was subsequently transferred to Françoise Lepage. Ms Antoine remained in the Reynen foster home until April 1975, when Mr. Reynen requested that she be removed by the end of the month.

Jeannette Antoine's Experience in CAS Group Homes

After leaving the Reynen home, Ms Antoine was placed briefly in the Lisieux group home, following which she was placed in the Second Street group home. Ms Antoine's experiences at the Second Street group home are discussed in the next section. Jeannette Antoine's last placement with the CAS was in the Anson group home in Minden.

Although Ms Antoine claimed that Bryan Keough remained her worker, Mr. Keough testified that he was not her worker while she was at the Anson group home. Mr. Keough ceased being Ms Antoine's worker in 1974, when the file was transferred to Ms Lepage. In light of the events at Second Street group home and the allegations made by Ms Antoine against Mr. Keough, which I discuss in the next section, I do not believe that Mr. Keough was assigned as Ms Antoine's worker while she was in the Anson group home. The file indicates that Ms Lepage was her childcare worker until September 1997, when the file was transferred to Bill McNally.

While Jeannette Antoine was at the Anson group home, her sister Lorraine got married. Ms Antoine alleged that Bryan Keough drove her to the wedding and he put her in the trunk, only letting her out twice to go to the bathroom. Mr. Keough did not recall driving Ms Antoine to her sister's wedding and denied ever placing her in the trunk of his car. In a statement Ms Antoine gave to Constable Kevin Malloy of the Cornwall Police Service on January 21, 1990, she said that the "group home boss David" drove her to Cornwall to see her sister get married. Although Ms Antoine testified that this was a mistake and insisted that it was Bryan Keough that drove her, I am unable to conclude that Mr. Keough drove her to her sister's wedding or that he placed her in the trunk of his car.

Ms Antoine was discharged from the Anson group home on June 19, 1978, and her file was closed at her request, effective August 27, 1978.

A Difficult Childhood

Jeannette Antoine, unfortunately, had an awful experience as a young child in foster care. I do not disbelieve that she was physically and sexually abused while in foster care; however, I am unable to conclude with certainty by whom. I am also unable to determine with certainty who was made aware of the abuse she suffered, as there were no specific recordings in her file containing allegations of abuse. The lack of these entries does not mean that Ms Antoine did not in fact report abuse to her CAS workers. I have heard evidence from several witnesses, including from the CAS, that, in the past, children were not believed when they alleged abuse at the hands of an adult. In my opinion, all reported allegations of abuse should be recorded in a child's file regardless of whether they are believed or corroborated.

In this case, there were clear indications in the recordings that something was amiss, including observations about sexualized behaviour on the part of Ms Antoine when she was very young. In my opinion, signs of abuse were prevalent in this young girl's file, and they should have been properly investigated.

The Second Street Group Home

The Second Street group home was established by the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS of SD&G) in 1975. It was the Society's first attempt, explained Angelo Towndale, to provide alternative care for children with behavioural problems who did not function well in traditional foster homes. It was located in close proximity to the CAS office. The previous year, the CAS had established a group home on Lisieux Street in Cornwall for teenage girls who required minimal supervision.

When the Second Street home was opened in 1975, there were no CAS policies on physical discipline and no written documents stipulating that sexual overtures towards and relations with CAS wards were prohibited and grounds for dismissal. There was also no CAS training for the individuals who operated and worked at the group home. To exacerbate matters, the staff responsible for the children at the Second Street home were not adequately screened.

Rod Rabey, who worked in the Child Protection Department of the CAS of SD&G, was selected to operate the Second Street home when it first opened in 1975. Mr. Towndale was involved in the decision to select Mr. Rabey for the position. Mr. Tom O'Brien was the executive director at the time, but shortly after the group home opened he left the agency on sick leave.

Mr. Rabey operated the Second Street group home with his wife. Dave Devlin was a supervisor in the CAS Protection Department and was responsible for supervising the home. Children who lived in the home continued to have contact with CAS employees, as each child in the home was assigned a CAS worker. For example, Bryan Keough had been Jeannette Antoine's childcare worker since 1972, when she was about twelve years old. Ms Antoine moved into the Second Street home in April 1975. She referred to Mr. Rabey as "excellent," and she explained in her testimony that he "didn't want it as a group home. He wanted it as a setting for family, everybody pitched in to do everything."

The feedback on the group home was positive in its first months of operation, and Mr. Towndale did not recall hearing any complaints or concerns with respect to the treatment of children in the home in the fall of 1975.

Unfortunately, Mr. Rabey's time at the Second Street group home lasted only a few months. He died suddenly in December 1975, shortly before Christmas.

It was decided by the CAS that Derry Tenger, who worked in the Child Care Department, would fill Mr. Rabey's place and run the group home. It is of significance that CAS officials allowed Mr. Tenger to choose his staff for the group home without involvement in any of the interviews or the decisions regarding which individuals would be hired to care for the children at the home. As Mr. Towndale acknowledged, staff at the home were not screened by the CAS, the agency did not interview any of the candidates, and the CAS did not check references of the individuals selected to care for the children at the home. Hiring the staff was at the sole discretion of Mr. Tenger. In this respect, the CAS failed to properly screen the group home staff.

Mr. Tenger decided to ask Bryan Keough, a close personal friend, to assist him and asked the Children's Aid Society to designate Mr. Keough as the liaison officer between the group home and the agency. Although Mr. Keough continued to have a caseload at the CAS, he visited the group home and agreed to help Mr. Tenger "on a need basis." Mr. Keough testified that he had about two or three shifts in the group home, including an overnight shift. He routinely visited the group home, about twice or three times a week. Mr. Keough was under the supervision of Angelo Towndale at the CAS. Mr. Tenger also hired Mr. Keough's brother, Michael, as a staff member in the group home, as well as Mr. Tenger's daughter, Heather. He also hired Jerry MacGillis. To Mr. Towndale's knowledge, neither Mr. Tenger nor Mr. Keough had social work degrees or formal training. Mr. Towndale agreed that they had learned "on the job."

Bryan Keough's Knowledge of and Participation in Discipline in the Second Street Group Home

Bryan Keough did not discuss with the child residents their experiences in the home, despite his position as the liaison between the CAS and the Second Street home. He had interactions with the children when he visited the group home two or three times weekly, and on the shifts in which he was responsible for the care of the children. He did read the logs prepared by the staff at the group home. There was a requirement that all punishments administered be reflected in the log. In addition, a daily log was to be completed on each shift for every child.

Mr. Keough testified that he had witnessed corporal punishment as well as other forms of discipline of children at the group home. He himself had administered corporal punishment to a young boy at the Second Street home: he had strapped the child three or four times on his buttocks.

Mr. Keough witnessed various forms of discipline at the Second Street home. In the winter months, if the children misbehaved, they were forced to shovel snow from one pile to another, which Mr. Tenger referred to as “brainless activity.” Mr. Tenger also required the children to wash the floor tiles with a toothbrush. The children were expected to eat all the food on their plate at each meal; any food that remained on their dishes was reheated and served to them at the next meal.

Mr. Keough would occasionally have coffee with Derry Tenger. Mr. Keough considered Mr. Tenger a good friend. Mr. Tenger discussed with Mr. Keough the effectiveness of the discipline practised at the home. Bryan Keough testified that he “had no serious issues with what” Mr. Tenger was doing at the home. As a result, he never reported the corporal punishment or other forms of discipline to his superiors at the Children’s Aid Society.

Bryan Keough acknowledged that he was involved in conduct with C-75 that was “inappropriate” and an “error in judgment.” On February 28, 1976, on a Saturday afternoon, Bryan Keough received a call from the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) in Long Sault asking him to pick up a runaway teenage girl. Mr. Keough drove to the police station to retrieve C-75, a CAS ward with whom he had had no previous contact. Bryan Keough transported C-75 to a receiving home run by Ms Matte. He brought the girl to a bedroom and instructed her to take off all her clothing and put on a housecoat. Mr. Keough acknowledged that the fifteen-year-old girl was physically well-developed. She refused to remove her clothes, and a physical struggle ensued between her and Mr. Keough. Mr. Keough forcibly removed the girl’s pants, shirt, and bra. When asked why he forced her to strip, Mr. Keough explained that, without clothes or shoes, she could not run away in the winter, particularly if he tied her to the bed, which he proceeded to do. After he initially tied the girl’s hands and feet to the bed with nylon, she was able to extricate herself. A further struggle ensued, and he then successfully bound the girl tightly to the bed. Mr. Keough then left Ms Matte’s receiving home.

Mr. Keough testified that he soon realized that his actions were excessive and inappropriate—in his words, “totally stupid”—and that he had exercised bad judgment. He decided to contact his supervisor, Dave Devlin, that night to discuss the incident. Mr. Devlin immediately reprimanded Mr. Keough. Mr. Keough testified that this reprimand was “expected because after I left the home I realized just how big an error in judgment I had made ... [H]e needed to reprimand me because it was totally inappropriate.” Later that night, Mr. Keough picked up C-75 at Ms Matte’s receiving home and brought her to the Second Street home.

Bryan Keough saw one of the staff—he believes it was Jerry MacGillis—strap C-75 with a belt. The corporal punishment administered to this girl was sanctioned by Mr. Tenger: the director of the group home had ordered Mr. MacGillis to strap the teenager. Mr. Keough testified that, although he “believed in corporal punishment,” he had concerns about the physical punishment administered to C-75 for two reasons. First, the girl was strapped about four or five times for behaviour she had (allegedly) engaged in before she became a resident of the Second Street home. Mr. Keough had just brought C-75 to the group home as a “new placement,” and, in his view, “when you entered a foster home or a group home ... you always entered with a clean slate. No matter what had happened prior to that, you started from a clean slate.” The second reason Mr. Keough had concerns about the corporal punishment was that Mr. Tenger was visibly angry when the discipline was administered to the girl; Mr. Tenger’s voice was loud, his face was red, and he was very upset. Mr. Keough thought that it was not appropriate to corporally punish a child from a state of anger. Bryan Keough witnessed the strapping of C-75, saw the circumstances in which it was administered, and saw Derry Tenger’s rage. He considered this punishment inappropriate, yet he did not report it to his supervisor, Dave Devlin, or to other officials at the CAS.

Mr. Keough knew that teenage girls at the home had been forced to clean tiles with a toothbrush and, in the winter, move snow from one pile to another. He also knew that Mr. Tenger, an intimidating man, wore black clothing, as did his own brother, Michael Keough, a staff member at the group home.

The following week, Mr. Keough learned that, on the night he brought C-75 to the group home, the teenager had been forced to clean the house, wearing only a bra and underpants, in the presence of staff—clearly a degrading and humiliating experience for the fifteen-year-old. Mr. Keough claimed he was unaware that children in the home were compelled to take cold showers throughout that night.

It is clear that Bryan Keough was aware of discipline at the group home that constituted abuse. In my view, he should have reported this abusive behaviour to his superiors, and he failed to do so. Mr. Keough also used inappropriate methods of restraint and discipline on children, in particular C-75.

CAS Officials Aware of Problems at Second Street Group Home in Early 1976

It became apparent to Mr. Towndale, shortly after Mr. Rabey’s death, that there were problems at the Second Street group home. By February 1976, the acting director of the Children’s Aid Society was aware that the treatment of the children in the group home needed to be addressed.

When Tom O’Brien, the executive director of the CAS, went on sick leave in February 1976, the Board of Directors asked Angelo Towndale to fill his position until Mr. O’Brien returned. It was at a staff meeting in February, shortly after becoming acting executive director of the CAS, that Mr. Towndale learned there were concerns regarding the Second Street group home. Some Board members as well as the program supervisor of the Ministry of Community and Social Services, Steve Charko, attended this meeting. Mr. Towndale was told that Derry Tenger and other staff at the Second Street group home dressed in black. Dressing in dark attire was perceived as intimidating for the children at the home. Mr. Towndale then asked Mr. Devlin to check into things after the meeting. Mr. Devlin spoke with Mr. Tenger and reported back to Mr. Towndale that there was “questionable” discipline administered to the children by staff at the home. Mr. Towndale spoke with Mr. Tenger about the discipline issue. Mr. Tenger challenged him on his objection to corporal punishment, given that there were no policies at the CAS on this issue at the time.

Mr. Towndale and Mr. Keough both testified that they knew there were no standards or guidelines at the CAS regarding corporal punishment. They both indicated that different attitudes existed among CAS staff as to the appropriateness of corporal punishment and the extent of physical discipline that was acceptable for children under the care of the agency. When CAS social workers assessed foster homes, it was within the discretion of the individual social worker to determine whether the physical treatment of the children was excessive. In this regard, Mr. Keough noted that there were “different views ... from yes to no to in between. It was all over the scale. There was no policy, so it was all left to personal opinion, personal views.”

Mr. Towndale had concerns about the physical treatment of the children at the Second Street group home as well as other foster homes under the jurisdiction of the CAS of SD&G. Notwithstanding his concern, it does not appear that any action was taken other than the confrontation with Mr. Tenger. At the Board of Directors meeting on March 2, 1976, it was announced that, at the annual meeting scheduled later that month on March 24, 1976, a discussion on discipline with panel members and a moderator would take place. Mr. Towndale selected this topic for discussion because he thought his agency needed to address this issue, particularly because of concerns raised regarding corporal punishment at group homes and other foster homes.

On March 5, 1976, Mr. Towndale, Dave Devlin, and board member Canon Sidney Irwin met with staff from the Second Street home, including director Derry Tenger, Michael Keough, and Bryan Keough. The purpose of the meeting was to discuss the physical punishment administered to the children at the home.

Mr. Irwin, a member of the Board in 1976, was the Rector of Trinity Anglican Church in Cornwall. Derry Tenger had been the organist and choirmaster at Trinity Church.

At the meeting, Mr. Towndale and Mr. Devlin made it clear that they were opposed to physical punishment. Mr. Tenger told the CAS officials that physical punishment was an important part of his program at the group home and that he was reluctant to give it up. Mr. Tenger also stressed that no policy existed at the CAS on corporal punishment. Mr. Towndale responded that this type of discipline was not acceptable. Mr. Tenger disagreed. He was instructed to exercise caution in his administration of physical punishment to the children until such time as the CAS developed a policy on what constituted inappropriate physical discipline by staff.

Mr. Towndale, as acting executive director of the CAS, had a duty to ensure children under the care of the CAS were safe. His instruction to Mr. Tenger to exercise caution was clearly insufficient at that time; rather, he should have directed Mr. Tenger to completely refrain from using physical punishment. Furthermore, after this meeting, the CAS should have begun actively developing a policy regarding inappropriate physical discipline by staff.

Residents Run Away From the Second Street Home: Complaints by Children of Sexual Conduct and Excessive Physical Punishment

On Sunday, March 7, 1976, three female youths from the Second Street home ran away. When they were picked up by the police, the girls complained that they were strapped at the group home. The girls were also very worried they would receive further beatings as punishment for fleeing the home.

In fact, the following day, Derry Tenger and Michael Keough asked Angelo Towndale if they could strap the three girls as punishment for their behaviour. Mr. Towndale refused to grant permission, and he contacted the Chair of the Personnel Committee at the CAS, Ms Labekovski, and a meeting of the committee was arranged for the next day, March 9, 1976.

Mr. Towndale thought that he should speak to the children to gather information on their treatment at the group home. The acting executive director decided to hold interviews at the CAS offices and speak to each child individually. The girls were interviewed by Sister Theresa Quesnelle, who operated the group home for teenage girls in Cornwall, and Peggy Follon. Together with Mary Gratton, Mr. Towndale interviewed the boys who lived at the group home.

C-75 described the incidents that had occurred the evening she had been picked up by Bryan Keough at the OPP Long Sault Detachment and taken to Ms Matte's receiving home. She had been brought to a bedroom and ordered by Mr. Keough to strip off her clothes. When she refused, Mr. Keough, physically struggled with her and removed her pants, shirt, and bra. She was then given a housecoat. Mr. Keough then bound her hands and feet with nylon and locked the door. The girl said that she was bound for about six hours and that her hands became sore and swollen. When she was brought to the group home, she was strapped, forced to remove her clothes, and required to do housework throughout the night in her bra and underpants “in front of staff,” clearly a humiliating experience. The girl was also forced to take cold showers that night as a form of discipline. She was not permitted to attend school for the week. Sister Theresa Quesnelle and Ms Follon saw bruises on the girl’s buttocks. This was one week after she had received these beatings, yet the physical marks of these punishments on her body were clearly visible.

C-75 had a scheduled court appearance regarding her wardship soon thereafter. She said it was her intention to inform the judge of her experiences in the Second Street home and her treatment by staff and by Bryan Keough.

In these interviews, CAS officials also learned that, at the Second Street group home:

- children were forced to wash the floors with a toothbrush;
- children were required to get up at five o’clock in the morning and shovel a huge pile of snow from one side of the yard to another, for hours;
- children were forced to kneel for hours in a corner on a pile of beans, with arms above their heads—if they lowered their arms, they were strapped;
- a boy was strapped every night for a week because he had jumped on the bed and had been noisy at night;
- a boy said he was afraid to ask for glasses and needed clothing;
- the children were sometimes strapped in front of staff and other children at the home;
- one girl was strapped by the staff member she liked best, and Mr. Tenger had compelled the staff member to hit the girl with greater force.

Clearly, the information conveyed to the CAS officials by these wards raised serious questions about physical, sexual, and psychological abuse of children under the care of the Children’s Aid Society. Mr. Towndale considered this treatment of the children “demeaning, quite harsh, unacceptable” and “very inappropriate.”

These interviews with the children focused on physical discipline. The children were not asked questions during the CAS interviews about sexually inappropriate behaviour at the Second Street home; this issue was not probed. This was despite the fact that Mr. Towndale knew that female wards had had their clothes removed and that they had been required to do housework in their bra and underpants, and that Bryan Keough had taken off C-75’s clothes and bound her. Mr. Towndale agreed at the hearings that this conduct had a sexual dimension.

Mr. Towndale considered the treatment of C-75, a temporary ward with the CAS, appalling.

Mr. Towndale had serious concerns about Derry Tenger's treatment of the children at the Second Street group home, but he did not know how to deal with this objectionable and, in his view, egregious conduct. He testified that no CAS policies addressed this issue, and Mr. O'Brien was not available for advice. Mr. Towndale did not contact the Ministry of Community and Social Services for guidance or advice on how to handle the situation.

On March 9, 1976, the Personnel Committee of the Children's Aid Society met. Mr. Towndale, Mr. Devlin, Ms Gratton, and Sister Theresa Quesnelle were also present. A report of the children's interviews was presented to the committee. Mr. Towndale had previously arranged to have speakers at the meeting. John McKee, the director of Laurencrest youth facility, had been invited to address the meeting and present his views on corporal punishment. He made it clear that corporal punishment was never used at Laurencrest and, in his view, that such punishment had no value in terms of long-term behavioural change. He was a proponent of behavioural modification, which he stated had been very successful at Laurencrest. At the meeting, the Children's Aid Society lawyer addressed the legal ramifications of corporal punishment.

At that juncture, it was decided that Derry Tenger, Bryan Keough, and Michael Keough should join the meeting to discuss their views on physical punishment and other forms of discipline administered at the Second Street home. These men verified that the statements of the children were accurate. However, both the director and staff from the group home "felt that their actions were justified" and that "the behaviour of the children had greatly improved" as a result of the punishments administered to them. It was a "very emotional meeting," and a wide array of views on appropriate discipline of wards of the CAS were expressed. Bryan Keough described the meeting as "very heated."

A motion was passed at the CAS Personnel Committee meeting that staff at the Second Street group home refrain from strapping the children and that, if isolation of the child were considered necessary, it should not exceed twenty-four hours and that the child should be provided with a bed and bedclothes. The Personnel Committee considered the information from the Second Street home very significant and serious, thought that further investigation should be pursued, and agreed that CAS protocols should be developed.

The adoption of the motion was a step in the right direction but the CAS should have been more proactive, given the reaction of the director and staff of the Second Street home, who clearly did not agree with the views of the CAS Personnel Committee.

Five Children Run Away From the Second Street Home

On March 10, 1976, the day following the meeting of the CAS Personnel Committee, five children, one of whom was Jeannette Antoine, ran away from the Second Street home. Jeannette and another ward, Freddie, came to the CAS office and asked to speak to Sister Theresa and Ms Follon. Ms Antoine told Ms Follon and Ms Labekovski that she had been strapped twice in one day because she had lost her mittens. The CAS staff were also told that Freddie had been strapped for losing his place in his prayer book in church and for talking at night after lights went out. The children were afraid to return to the group home.

Ms Follon brought the children to her home for supper, and Jeannette and Freddie disclosed that the other children were hiding in a cottage in Summerstown. Dave Devlin transported the children to the Second Street home that evening. It is noteworthy that C-75, one of the residents of the home, was in court the same day the children ran away from the group home. The judge recommended that her wardship be terminated because of extreme disciplinary measures at the Second Street home.

By March 11, 1976, Mr. Towndale had decided that the situation at the group home had deteriorated to such an extent that he should remove Mr. Tenger immediately as director. Because there was no CAS policy on physical punishment and because Mr. Towndale did not feel he had the full support of the Board, he asked Mr. Tenger to return to his former position at the CAS and did not take any action to terminate his employment. Mr. Tenger made it clear that he had no intention of returning to his former position. Mr. Towndale gave him one week to think about the offer. Dick Mulligan, another CAS employee, replaced Mr. Tenger. The staff at the group home were upset and hostile about the removal of Mr. Tenger by the CAS. They also were required to leave the Second Street home for a one-week period.

Mr. Towndale claimed that he went to the Board to receive direction because he was concerned about lawsuits that could result from his decision to terminate the employment of CAS staff. He testified that "Children's Aid was under immense financial pressure at that time" and that the Ministry of Community and Social Services had a "very low profile" because, at that time, children had "no voice." Mr. Towndale explained that he went to the Board to get some "direction" about actions to take regarding the inappropriate treatment of children at the group home but did not receive definitive guidance:

So I went to the governing body and said there is a problem and what do we do? And people were all divided on that issue. So how do I go ahead an [sic] fire somebody and—on principle, maybe I should have done that at that time, but I didn't do it.

At the Personnel Committee meeting on March 17, 1976, it became clear that staff at the group home were still not receptive to other ways of disciplining the children. Moreover, Mr. Tenger had refused to attend this meeting. Staff at the home insisted that other methods were not effective:

They felt that other methods like removal of privileges or behaviour modification or grounding were too easy—"like patting a child on the head and saying naughty boy." They talked about discontinuing a hyperactive child's medication ...

The reason why Jerry was forced to strap [C-85] against his will, was because up until then [C-85] had an infatuation towards Jerry and the kids would respect Jerry's authority, because up until then, he had been ineffective in disciplining them and Mr. Tenger felt the kids would behave better for him if they knew he strapped too.

Members of the Personnel Committee decided that existing staff at the Second Street group home could not work with a new director who believed in behavioural modification and less negative, non-physical methods of disciplining the children. A written record of the meeting stated that staff "were not willing to learn new ways of discipline and voiced contempt for other more positive theories suggested to them. They showed a hostility and contempt for the Committee." The CAS committee decided that the current director and staff of the group home should submit their resignations to the Board immediately. Resignations were received in the next two days.

It is of significance that Bryan Keough was not asked to resign and was permitted to remain on staff at the CAS. Mr. Keough was under Mr. Towndale's supervision. Mr. Towndale considered Mr. Keough's behaviour appalling, yet no serious disciplinary measures were taken against this CAS staff worker. Mr. Towndale acknowledged at the hearings that, in hindsight, perhaps he should have terminated the employment of staff such as Bryan Keough for inappropriate treatment of children. At the hearings, Mr. Towndale stated that Mr. Keough was not fired because that was a decision of the Personnel Committee and the CAS Board was divided.

Bryan Keough testified that Mr. Towndale met with him shortly thereafter, to express his disappointment in Mr. Keough's behaviour and to inform him that a reprimand would be placed in his personnel file.

Mr. Towndale's decision to place a reprimand in Mr. Keough's file was insufficient in my view. The CAS had received information on Mr. Keough's handling of C-75 from Mr. Keough himself and from C-75. It is noteworthy that the handling of C-75 by the CAS was discussed before a judge, who decided to terminate her wardship. There was sufficient information available to Mr. Towndale to take action against Mr. Keough. He should have reported the matter to the police.

At the CAS Annual Meeting on March 24, 1976, speakers selected by Mr. Towndale made presentations on corporal punishment. Different views were elicited. Yet the CAS did not develop a policy on physical discipline of children at that time. Mr. Towndale was not successful in developing a protocol on unacceptable physical treatment of children under the care of the CAS.

When Mr. O'Brien returned to the CAS in April 1976 after his sick leave and resumed his position as executive director, he was briefed by Mr. Towndale regarding the treatment of children at the Second Street group home and the actions of Mr. Towndale, the Personnel Committee, and the Board of Directors. Mr. O'Brien took no steps to ensure that Bryan Keough was adequately disciplined for his inappropriate behaviour with the children at the group home. Nor did Mr. O'Brien ensure that the allegations made against the staff by the children at the home were investigated further or reported to the police. Nor did Mr. O'Brien, after learning about the treatment of the children, develop a policy on the procedures for current CAS wards who allege they were abused by an employee of the CAS. Nor did he develop a written policy on reporting such internal matters to the police. Mr. O'Brien stated that "I didn't at the time but if you asked me if I were there today would I do it, I'd say yes, I'd develop a policy."

Mr. O'Brien knew that Derry Tenger, Michael Keough, and others dressed in black. Although he considered it peculiar, he did not take any action to ensure that they dressed differently. The executive director did not invoke any measures to ensure that the children in the Second Street home did not feel intimidated by the dark clothing worn each day by the supervisor and staff at the group home operated by the CAS.

Ian MacLean Is Unsuccessful at Introducing Position Changes at the Group Home

Derry Tenger was replaced by Dick Mulligan, and new staff were hired for the Second Street home. Ian MacLean joined the CAS of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry in 1976. From June 1976 until February 1977, Mr. MacLean was the liaison between the agency and the Second Street home. When he assumed this position, he was told that staff at the home had been fired and that there had been excessive discipline of children at the CAS-operated group home. Mr. MacLean reported to Mr. Towndale and Mr. Devlin initially; after a month in his position as liaison, he reported solely to Mr. Devlin.

There were three male staff and six adolescent residents, mostly girls, when Mr. MacLean assumed the role as liaison of the group home. The three staff were John Primeau, Raymonde Houde, and Al Herrington. It quickly became apparent to Mr. MacLean that there were no policies in place or set routines at the Second Street home. Each day, the individual staff worker would decide what activities would take place at the home—for example, wake-up time, bedtime, and chores were left to the discretion of individual staff members.

It was Mr. MacLean's responsibility to develop a behavioural management program and a routine for the group home. He was also asked to develop a team approach for staff working with the children at the home. But it soon became evident to Mr. MacLean that it would be difficult to implement such programs, schedules, and team building at the home. Mr. MacLean did have meetings with staff, and he did develop protocols and programs. But he did not feel that he had the authority to require the staff at the home to adhere to his proposed schedules and to his suggestions regarding interactions with the children.

Mr. MacLean testified that it would have been beneficial if he had been fully apprised of the history of and treatment of the children at the Second Street group home when he became the liaison. He stated that he could have been more attentive to red flags regarding possible abuse—sexual or physical—of the children who resided in the home. He also stated that he would have had a better understanding of the children and would have ensured that the programming was tailored to their needs. He also claimed that, if he had had knowledge of the history of the treatment of the children, he would have taken appropriate actions to ensure that the current staff received adequate training regarding appropriate disciplinary measures. However, it is clear that Mr. MacLean did not take measures to obtain the particulars on the historical treatment of the children at the home before he became the liaison. He testified at the hearings that “there was no reason for me to do that and I was too busy, frankly.”

Mr. MacLean believed that it was important for female staff to be hired at the Second Street group home. As he said at the Inquiry, in assessing risk factors and considering “wise management” practices, Mr. MacLean thought female staff should be on duty, particularly in the evenings when the female wards were at the home. He spoke to Mr. O'Brien, Mr. Towndale, and Mr. Devlin about his concern and stressed that “we needed female staff in that home; that I felt very uncomfortable—that it was very unwise for them to have three male staff and the adolescent girls that were in that home.”

John Primeau was one of the staff at the home about whom Mr. MacLean had concerns. Mr. Primeau would routinely take female adolescents from the Second Street home on outings. Mr. MacLean made it clear to Mr. Primeau that he opposed this practice and considered it risky and dangerous. However,

Mr. Primeau did not adhere to Mr. MacLean's advice and continued to engage in this behaviour. Moreover, Mr. Primeau did not comply with the routine he had agreed to follow with Mr. MacLean regarding the activities and schedules for the children at the home. Mr. MacLean decided to raise Mr. Primeau's behaviour with his supervisor, Mr. Devlin, in July and August 1976. As Mr. MacLean said in his evidence, "The more I worked with John, the higher my anxiety level." John Primeau was always "distant" from Mr. MacLean; the CAS liaison "never felt" that Mr. Primeau "was a working member" or a "committed member to the team." In early September 1976, a female staff worker was hired for the Second Street home who, Mr. MacLean expected, would be the "eyes and ears" for him.

Despite Mr. MacLean's concerns about Mr. Primeau's refusal to follow the rules in the Second Street home and his continued excursions with female residents at the home, Mr. MacLean did not discuss with these adolescents what was going on during these outings. Nor did Mr. MacLean inform these teenagers of their rights in the event that anything untoward took place. This omission was despite the fact that he knew that children who have been abused often fail to disclose inappropriate behaviour for many reasons, including fear or guilt. In my view, Mr. MacLean failed to take appropriate action against John Primeau, a worker he knew to be acting contrary to the rules of the group home. He also should have taken some steps to satisfy himself that nothing inappropriate was happening between John Primeau and the adolescents in the home.

Had Mr. MacLean engaged the adolescents at the home in discussions, he would have likely learned about other questionable methods of discipline at the Second Street home, such as the improper use of restraints. He stated that he knew that restraints were being used on the children but was unaware of the particular techniques that were being practised. For example, one of the staff members, Raymonde Houde, told the Cornwall police in 1994 that a regular method of discipline was forcing the children to lie on their stomach with their hands behind their back while a worker sat on them. Mr. Houde stated that "[t]his method was shown to me by John Primeau and all the workers in the home used it." Despite the problems that had existed previously at the Second Street home when Mr. Tenger was the director, the CAS Board had not passed a written policy on discipline.

A former resident of the home alleged that a group home worker named "John" had fondled her and placed her under restraints. Mr. MacLean testified that he was unaware of sexual misconduct at the group home in 1976. As I discuss later in this chapter, allegations were subsequently made in 1994 by two former wards from the home that John Primeau engaged in sexual conduct with them. In an interview by a Cornwall Police Service Constable (Shawn White) in 1994, a girl alleged that Mr. Primeau sexually touched and sexually assaulted her.

In the early months of 1977, Mr. MacLean informed Mr. O'Brien that the operation of the group home was becoming too expensive for the CAS. In February 1977, the Board decided to close the Second Street home. Mr. MacLean understood that the reason for the closing was strictly financial and that it had nothing to do with any allegations of wrongdoing—physical or sexual—by staff to the children under the care of the CAS.

Jeannette Antoine Discloses to the CAS Abuse When She Was a Ward of the Agency

In 1989, Greg Bell and Suzie Robinson were assigned by the CAS to investigate allegations against Jeannette Antoine of physical abuse of her nine-year-old-child. It was during the course of this investigation that Ms Antoine disclosed to these CAS workers that she had been abused as a child when she was a ward of the Children's Aid Society.

One of the people Ms Antoine alleged had abused her was Bryan Keough, a colleague of Mr. Bell's. Over the course of a few meetings in 1989, Ms Antoine told Mr. Bell and Ms Robinson that she and other children had been abused by staff at the Second Street group home. She was particularly concerned that Bryan Keough remained in the employment of the CAS and continued to have contact with children. Mr. Bell joined the CAS of SD&G in 1982, several years after the Second Street home was closed by the CAS. Mr. Bell was disturbed to learn of the allegations of abuse at the group home. He contacted the Cornwall Community Police Service (CPS).

Mr. Bell reported Ms Antoine's allegations of historical abuse to Tom O'Brien, the executive director of the Children's Aid Society, and Bob Smith, a supervisor at the Society, on August 21, 1989. Mr. O'Brien instructed Mr. Bell and Ms Robinson to continue their investigation regarding Jeannette Antoine's child. In the meantime, the executive director reviewed the following documents: the statement signed by Ms Antoine, which provided details of her allegations of abuse when she was under the care of the CAS; Suzie Robinson's notes of her meetings with Ms Antoine; and minutes of the Personnel Committee meeting concerning the Second Street home, which had been placed in a confidential file.

On August 23, 1989, Mr. O'Brien instructed Mr. Bell and Ms Robinson not to concern themselves with Jeannette Antoine's allegations of historical abuse and told them he would contact her. That same day, he telephoned Ms Antoine and advised her that the CAS social workers to whom she had disclosed the allegations of historical abuse "would not be dealing with past issues since it was not part of their position," but that Mr. O'Brien was willing to meet with her. Ms Antoine told the CAS executive director that children at the group home had been subjected to harsh corporal punishment. She also stated that there had been sexual abuse but it was not clear to Mr. O'Brien whether Ms Antoine, or the other children at the home, had been subjected to the sexual conduct. Jeannette Antoine could not understand why the CAS had not terminated the employment of Bryan Keough for his inappropriate behaviour at the Second Street group home.

Mr. O'Brien decided to discuss these issues with Angelo Towndale upon his return from holiday, as Mr. Towndale had been involved in the group home in the spring of 1976, when Mr. O'Brien was on sick leave. A meeting attended by Mr. Towndale, Mr. O'Brien, and Bill Carriere was held on September 8, 1989, to discuss what actions the CAS should take regarding Ms Antoine's "accusations and concerns." It was agreed that the president of the Board of the CAS should be advised of the allegations and that a meeting should be arranged with the Cornwall police and the Crown to receive their input. It was also suggested that Mr. O'Brien contact other CAS executive directors, such as those in Ottawa and Renfrew, to obtain information on how these agencies handled allegations of abuse by staff employed by the agency. Mr. O'Brien did not know how to deal with such allegations against CAS staff. The matter was also discussed with Lenore Jones, the program supervisor in Ottawa at the Ministry of Community and Social Services, who believed that action should be taken regarding these historical allegations of abuse. Ms Jones also recommended that an outside body, not the CAS of SD&G, ought to deal with these allegations. The September 8, 1989, notes of Mr. O'Brien say:

This case has been discussed verbally with our programme supervisor, Lenore Jones, who encouraged action and suggested that the Agency itself might not be the best body to deal with the present situation as our action could be perceived as whitewashing the situation.

As Mr. Carriere stated, the purpose of the September 8, 1989, meeting was to brainstorm on how to handle the serious matter of allegations of abuse against CAS staff, which was "new territory" for the agency:

We hadn't, certainly in my experience at the Agency up to this point in time, ever had anything like this and I'd be fairly certain that's why there's the reference to checking with other Children's Aid Societies because it's just completely new territory for us.

There was no policy or protocol regarding the procedure to follow when allegations of abuse were made against staff or employees of the CAS.

Mr. Towndale continued to believe that the behaviour of staff at the Second Street home had been completely unacceptable. The physical punishments had been excessive and there had been a sexual dimension to the treatment of the girls in the home. Mr. O'Brien, he said, had been "fully informed" of this immediately upon his return to the agency after his sick leave in 1976.

On September 25, 1989, a meeting was held with Crown Attorney Don Johnson, Deputy Chief Joseph St. Denis of the Cornwall police, and Inspector Richard Trew. Strapping at the group home was discussed, and it was concluded that this did not constitute a violation of the Criminal Code. It was proposed that Mr. O'Brien send a registered letter to Jeannette Antoine attaching the CAS complaints procedure and inviting her to again meet with him. It was also suggested that, if Ms Antoine did not take any further action, there need be nothing further done.

A few days later, Mr. O'Brien met with Greg Bell, Suzie Robinson, Bill Carriere, and Angelo Towndale to review Ms Antoine's statement. In Mr. O'Brien's opinion, some of her allegations were true, others were exaggerated, and some lacked merit. Mr. Bell and Ms Robinson made it clear that it was Ms Antoine's desire that Bryan Keough's employment be terminated by the CAS. Questions were raised at the meeting regarding the "wisdom" of asking Ms Antoine to meet with Mr. O'Brien again, given that she considered the CAS executive director "as part of the system for which she really has little use."

On September 29, 1989, after again meeting with Mr. Towndale and Bill Carriere, Mr. O'Brien and his two senior officials decided the agency should "very quickly contact the police again," because information contained in Suzie Robinson's notes suggested that "inappropriate sexual behaviour" was engaged in by "staff when the group home was in operation." They decided that the police should be given copies of Jeannette Antoine's statement, Suzie Robinson's notes, as well as the minutes of the Personnel Committee meetings, once this was discussed with the president and vice-president of the CAS Board.

On October 2, 1989, Mr. O'Brien met with Deputy Chief St. Denis and Staff Sergeant Brendon Wells. The Deputy Chief was surprised that Mr. O'Brien was meeting with him again, given that Mr. O'Brien had recently met with the Cornwall police and the Crown to discuss the Antoine allegations of historical abuse. Mr. O'Brien explained that when he re-read Ms Robinson's notes on the allegations of sexual behaviour by staff, it "changed the situation" for him, and, as a result, Mr. O'Brien "felt" that he had "no option" but to contact the Cornwall police again. Mr. O'Brien also spoke to Crown Attorney Don Johnson to convey the information about the sexual misconduct alleged by Ms Antoine and offered to send the material to the Crown. Mr. Johnson replied that this was not necessary, as the police would notify him if they intended to pursue the matter.

There are no notes or records from Mr. O'Brien to confirm that he spoke to Bryan Keough in September 1989 to discuss these allegations of abuse. Mr. O'Brien testified that, despite receiving allegations against Mr. Keough that he sexually and physically abused children under the care of the CAS, he did not consider suspending his employment. Mr. O'Brien said, "I was unsure of what to do because I wasn't sure of the validity of some of the information." Yet Mr. Keough had admitted to inappropriate conduct with wards of the CAS as early as 1976.

Mr. O'Brien claimed that he was not concerned about the fact that Mr. Keough continued to supervise children under the care of the CAS. Yet Mr. O'Brien acknowledged that he did not agree with Bryan Keough's view of physical discipline and considered it excessive, rigid, and unduly harsh. At that time, Mr. Keough trained foster parents and supervised six specialized foster homes. Mr. O'Brien allowed Mr. Keough to continue supervising foster children and to provide advice and guidance to foster parents on such matters as physical discipline of children under their care. Mr. O'Brien testified that, although this did not concern him at the time, in hindsight, had he thought about the issues then, he "would have been much more cautious."

Mr. Keough remained a child protection worker at the CAS of SD&G and continued to have contact with foster children. Upon learning of Ms Antoine's allegations, Mr. O'Brien did not take any measures to suspend Mr. Keough or otherwise restrict his duties. Mr. O'Brien took the position that the Cornwall police were investigating the matter, and therefore it was not necessary for him to meet with Mr. Keough in 1989 to discuss the allegations or to impose any disciplinary measures on his staff member.

Mr. O'Brien acknowledged in his testimony that having an outside agency conduct an investigation of an employee at the CAS of SD&G would "probably be more objective."

Mr. O'Brien telephoned Staff Sergeant Wells at the Cornwall Police Service on October 23, 1989, to find out the status of the case. He was told that Staff Sergeant Wells had been away on holiday, and that the Antoine case had been turned over to Constable Kevin Malloy. The CAS executive director was told that when Constable Malloy reported to Staff Sergeant Wells on the Antoine matter, the CAS would then be advised.

Time passed. As is discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service, Mr. O'Brien again contacted the CPS in December 1989 to discuss the status of the Antoine investigation with Constable Malloy. The Constable reported that he had approached Jeannette Antoine regarding her desire to pursue the investigation, but that she had said she would think about it. He told Mr. O'Brien that he intended to "close" the case before Christmas but, in a subsequent conversation, Constable Malloy told Mr. O'Brien that the case would be closed in January 1990, as he did not have the time to do so in 1989.

Tom O'Brien inscribed the following in his notes of December 22, 1989: "If Det. Malloy does not contact me again prior to the middle of January, I will get in touch with Deputy Chief Joe St. Denis to learn of the current situation."

The delays and problems in the CPS investigation of the Antoine matter are discussed in detail in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service.

Bryan Keough's Application to Adopt a Child

Bryan Keough was not aware of the Antoine allegations of abuse until February 1990, when he applied to adopt a child who was under the care of the CAS. Mr. Keough had developed a relationship with this child.

On January 23, 1990, senior CAS officials met to discuss how the agency should handle Bryan Keough's application to be a foster parent with the intention of adopting the child. (At this time, Richard Abell had recently joined the agency and was clinical director.) Tom O'Brien, Richard Abell, and Ian MacLean thought that an outside agency should be responsible for the home study for Mr. Keough's application. These senior CAS officials had two concerns. First, if CAS staff from Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry conducted the home study, "would it not appear to indicate that we are quite prepared to seriously consider the Keoughs as foster parents with the further intention of adopting the child"? Second, the officials questioned whether a home study should even be undertaken at this time, as the outcome of the investigation by the Cornwall police was not yet known. It was uncertain whether the police and Crown would proceed with criminal charges as a result of the complaint by Jeannette Antoine. It was decided at this January CAS meeting that Mr. Keough would be advised by his supervisor, Ian MacLean, that an external agency would perform the home study for his adoption application.

Tom O'Brien contacted Constable Kevin Malloy to inform him that Mr. O'Brien would be disclosing to Bryan Keough the allegations made against him by Ms Antoine. Constable Malloy told the executive director that he intended to meet with the Crown to determine whether the criminal case should be pursued, as this still had not yet been determined.

In about the middle of February 1990, Mr. O'Brien raised with Mr. Keough the allegations of abuse that Ms Antoine had made in the past five or six months. The CAS executive director also discussed with Mr. Keough his application to become a foster parent. Upon learning of these allegations, Mr. Keough told Mr.

O'Brien that he no longer wished to proceed with the adoption. Mr. O'Brien did not discuss any possible disciplinary measures that might be imposed on Mr. Keough. Mr. Keough also advised Mr. O'Brien that he would be leaving the agency to attend theological college.

At no time did the CAS suspend the employment of Bryan Keough. In fact, it never conducted an investigation of Mr. Keough as a result of the allegations made by Ms Antoine. Even after speaking to Constable Malloy, Mr. O'Brien did not initiate a CAS investigation of the allegations. Mr. O'Brien acknowledged that, had the information regarding Mr. Keough arisen from another person in the Cornwall community, the agency would likely have conducted an investigation of the matter. The former CAS executive director acknowledged that, "in hindsight ... I'm not positive about some of the conclusions I reached in all instances."

Bryan Keough left the employ of the Children's Aid Society in June 1990 and moved to Regina to obtain a divinity degree. On January 17, 1990, Mr. Towndale signed a positive letter of reference for Mr. Keough's application to the Canadian Theological Seminary. As I discuss in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service, Mr. Keough was contacted in 1994 by the CPS regarding the Antoine allegations of abuse.

As Mr. O'Brien prepared to leave the CAS in May 1990, he drafted a memo to his successor, Richard Abell, regarding the "messy situation" involving the Antoine allegations. CAS officials still had not heard from the CPS or the Crown regarding the outcome of the criminal investigation and were not convinced they ever would. In a memo to Mr. Abell in May 1990, Mr. O'Brien wrote:

I did follow up several times verbally with Detective Malloy, but he had not on any occasion received a letter from the Crown Attorney and I am not sure that he ever will. I am not sure there is much point in your pursuing the matter with the Crown Attorney.

Mr. O'Brien further said in his memo to Mr. Abell:

As for notifying the Executive, I have not done that but I have discussed the matter verbally with the Board President, and you might wish to discuss it with him in your first meeting to determine how you would inform the Executive of the current status of this particular case.

As for Lenore Jones, I think you should advise her in writing that this case is no longer a contentious one with us, in that the police to whom the material had been given have made the decision not to proceed.

Richard Abell Succeeds Tom O'Brien As Executive Director of the Children's Aid Society

After Mr. O'Brien transferred the Antoine file to his successor, Mr. Abell, the new CAS executive director did not consider pursuing the Antoine matter further concerning the allegations of abuse against Bryan Keough. Mr. Abell testified that he did not consider an internal investigation of the allegations of abuse against his employee. At that time, he had no experience at the CAS with the suspension of an employee without pay while an investigation took place. Mr. Abell testified that this was "new ground" for him and that he was "feeling [his] way through it." Nor was there a suggestion from officials of the Ministry, to Mr. Abell's recollection, that an internal investigation of this issue ought to be conducted by the CAS.

Mr. Abell testified that the current practice of the CAS with respect to such issues has changed—the matter would be pursued by the agency, the individual in question might be removed from his or her duties, and another CAS agency or third party would be asked to conduct the investigation of the allegations against the CAS staff worker in question.

Jeannette Antoine Requests Disclosure of Her File and Renews Allegations of Abuse

On October 7, 1991, Greg Bell received a call from Jeannette Antoine requesting a copy of her file from the Children's Aid Society. Mr. Bell explained that Ms Antoine's file had been transferred to another CAS worker, Debbie Cleary. File disclosure was not an area in which Greg Bell generally had involvement at the CAS.

Mr. Bell discussed her request with his supervisor, Bill Carriere, as well as Mr. Towndale and supervisor Cam Copeland. Ms Antoine had said that she wanted to read her file for a number of reasons, which included finding out why she and her three sisters had been removed from the care of their parents.

Mr. Bell contacted Ms Antoine the following day and was informed that she was planning to initiate a lawsuit against the CAS. Mr. Bell suggested that she prepare a list of the information she was seeking, such as the dates of her placements and the various homes in which she resided as a ward of the Children's Aid Society.

The CAS executive director became involved. Mr. Abell decided to write to Susan Bihun, the Ministry of Community and Social Services program supervisor to whom he reported. Ms Bihun had succeeded Lenore Jones at the Ministry. Mr. Abell was concerned that the Antoine matter might result in publicity in the community, and he wanted to notify the Ottawa office of the Ministry that this might attract media attention.

In the October 15, 1991, letter to Ms Bihun, Mr. Abell discussed the history of the Second Street group home, beginning in March 1976. He discussed the reports of excessive corporal punishment, the highly questionable disciplinary practices, and the involvement of the CAS Board. Mr. Abell stated that the issue of the home had arisen again in 1989, when two CAS staff at his office were investigating allegations of abuse of Ms Antoine's child. He discussed in the letter to Ms Bihun Mr. O'Brien's interactions with the Cornwall police and the Crown.

Mr. Abell explained that Ms Antoine had contacted the CAS the previous week asking for information in her file, as she was contemplating a lawsuit against the agency for mistreatment when she was a child under its care. He told his supervisor that there was "evidence of improper behaviour management practices on the part of our agency staff" at the Second Street home. Mr. Abell indicated that he was planning to convene a case conference to review the matter.

Mr. Abell called Jeannette Antoine on October 15, 1991, and said he would like to discuss her allegations against the agency. According to Mr. Abell's notes of the telephone conversation, Ms Antoine replied, "I don't mind ... [I]t will all soon be public anyway." They arranged to meet a few days later.

Mr. Abell testified that he felt he had an obligation to speak to Ms Antoine directly; she was a former ward, she had made serious allegations against the CAS, he wanted to show her that someone was ready to listen, and he wanted to hear what she had to say and to give her a full hearing.

Mr. Abell called Constable Kevin Malloy. When they connected on October 16, 1991, Mr. Abell recounted that Ms Antoine had told Greg Bell that Constable Malloy had discouraged her from pursuing the matter when he had carriage of the file in October 1989.

Mr. Abell met with Jeannette Antoine on October 18, 1991. It was immediately apparent to Mr. Abell that her anger was directed at Bryan Keough for his treatment of her when she was a child under the care of the CAS. Ms Antoine was concerned that Mr. Keough continued to be a staff worker at the CAS, although he had in fact left the agency the previous year. Ms Antoine did not think that her allegations of abuse had been received with the seriousness they deserved from the agency. She was upset that no criminal charges had been laid by the police and she wanted an apology from the Children's Aid Society. Mr. Abell's notes of October 18, 1991, state:

... she wants Brian [sic] charged, and an apology from the Society for what was done to her. She has spoken to a lawyer about charges or a suit ... She mentioned having previously spoken to Kevin Malloy at the CPS, but was vague regarding a comment about the length of time since the events occurred [sic].

Mr. Abell did not know whether the CAS could provide Ms Antoine with the requested apology; it was “tricky ground,” particularly if a person is planning to sue the agency. There are “issues of liability and corporate risk” and the CAS had to “be cautious.”

Ms Antoine expressed concern to Mr. Abell that, if she pursued a legal claim against the CAS, the agency might take her children from her. He assured her that the CAS would not respond in this way. At the conclusion of the meeting, Mr. Abell invited Ms Antoine to contact him if she had any other concerns or wanted to discuss the matter further.

Mr. Abell gave further thought to Ms Antoine’s request for an apology and decided to seek advice. On October 29, 1991, he sent a letter to Ms Antoine in which he tried to express compassion and support and provide some recognition of the treatment she had sustained while under the care of the CAS. As he made clear in his testimony, this was not an apology. Mr. Abell wrote:

I have spent some time reading the record of your time in the care of this Society. It is evident that your very first months were bad for you and all of your family. As well, a number of social workers really did try hard to find you and Lorraine a permanent family for you to grow up in.

The discipline imposed on you and the other young people was harsh, and was definitely seen as such when it came to the attention of the Board of Directors ...

Mr. Abell further wrote that, if Ms Antoine wanted criminal charges laid against Bryan Keough, she should pursue this matter with the Cornwall police. By this time, Mr. Keough had left the province.

A few months later, in February 1992, Mr. Abell instructed one of the child protection staff, Carlene Cummings, to close the Antoine file. Mr. Abell made this decision because, at this time, there was no indication that the Cornwall police would pursue the matter further, nor had Ms Antoine initiated a civil lawsuit against the agency. In Mr. Abell’s opinion, there were no further steps the CAS ought to take regarding the allegations of Jeannette Antoine. However, Ms Antoine again contacted Mr. Abell about five months later. According to the notes of Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie, who conducted a review of the Antoine case for the Cornwall police, Ms Antoine spoke to Mr. Abell in July 1992 to complain about the inattention given to her case. Mr. Abell told Ms Antoine to contact the police. At the hearings, Mr. Abell could not recall this conversation with Ms Antoine.

Geraldine Fitzpatrick and Constable Sebalj Interview Jeannette Antoine: An Unauthorized CAS Investigation

It was in the late fall of 1993 that Geraldine Fitzpatrick, a CAS staff worker, arrived at the Cornwall police station to meet Constable Heidi Sebalj. As I discussed in the context of Project Blue and the David Silmser/Father Charles MacDonald investigation, when Ms Fitzpatrick arrived that day she noticed that Constable Sebalj was distraught. Constable Sebalj told Ms Fitzpatrick that her colleague at the CAS, Greg Bell, had come to the police station and had photographed her file of the Silmser investigation. Constable Sebalj told Ms Fitzpatrick that no criminal charges had been pursued against the priest, who had allegedly sexually abused a youth. The Constable explained that this was a result of the advice from the Crown and, as well, because the Diocese had offered the victim a financial settlement.

It was in the context of this discussion that Constable Sebalj asked Ms Fitzpatrick if she had information on the Second Street group home. Constable Sebalj asked Ms Fitzpatrick for her assistance in conducting an interview with a woman in a historical abuse case. This woman claimed she had been abused as a child when she was a ward of the CAS living at this group home. This woman was Jeannette Antoine.

The interview with Ms Antoine took place on November 12, 1993. Ms Fitzpatrick did not inform anyone at the CAS office that she was interviewing Ms Antoine with Constable Sebalj. Not only did Ms Fitzpatrick not advise her supervisor or other agency officials, she did not open a CAS file on the matter. Ms Fitzpatrick explained that the interview took place on a day that she had “booked ... off,” and that she was technically not on duty. Ms Fitzpatrick took the position that she was not at the Antoine interview in her official capacity as a child protection worker but rather to assist Constable Sebalj in her assessment of the validity of the allegations. The interview took place at 340 Pitt Street in the Youth Bureau at the Cornwall Police Service.

Ms Fitzpatrick asked Jeannette Antoine most of the questions during the interview. Ms Antoine stated that, when she was living at the Second Street group home as a child under the care of the CAS, she was physically and sexually abused. She told the CAS worker and CPS officer that she and other children at the home were hit and forced by male staff to strip down to their bra and underpants while they cleaned the home. She described Derry Tenger, who wore black clothing, as well as the room in which the children were beaten. Ms Antoine also made allegations against CAS child protection worker Bryan Keough. Ms Antoine stated that she believed that Mr. Keough had had sexual relations with her sister, impregnating her with a child whose name was also Brian.

Jeannette Antoine told Constable Sebalj and Ms Fitzpatrick that she and other children at the Second Street group home had run away because of their poor treatment. They had been picked up by the police and transported to the CAS office. At that time, the children described to the CAS the punishments they had sustained. Ms Antoine also said that she had been sexually assaulted while in foster care. Ms Antoine was able to identify by first name and surnames a number of children at the Second Street group home. She also identified Heather Tenger, Derry Tenger's daughter, as well as Ms Gratton and CAS worker Françoise Lepage. Ms Antoine alleged that she had recounted her experience at the Second Street group home to several CAS staff, including Greg Bell, Bill McNally, and Richard Abell. She stated that at the time the Second Street home existed in the 1970s, as well as in the late 1980s, the agency had been told of the abusive acts committed at the home on children who were under the care of the CAS. At the conclusion of the November 12, 1993, interview, Constable Sebalj informed Ms Antoine that she intended to pursue these discussions of allegations of abuse.

Ms Fitzpatrick testified that she was overwhelmed by the information conveyed by Jeannette Antoine against the CAS of SD&G. Very serious allegations had been made by this woman. She asked Constable Sebalj what she planned to do with this information. According to Ms Fitzpatrick, Constable Sebalj stated that she intended to take the audiotapes of the interview to a lawyer and that she would not disclose this information to her supervisor, Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet, as he was a member of the Board of the Children's Aid Society. In Constable Sebalj's opinion, this placed Staff Sergeant Brunet in a conflict of interest situation. This decision not to disclose the interview to the CPS or to her supervisor, Staff Sergeant Brunet, "stunned" Ms Fitzpatrick.

Constable Sebalj, according to Ms Fitzpatrick, said she would be in contact with her in two weeks time regarding the Antoine allegations. However, Constable Sebalj never contacted Ms Fitzpatrick respecting the Antoine matter.

It was Ms Fitzpatrick's evidence that Constable Sebalj had told her not to reveal the Antoine interview to her superiors at the CAS, as it would constitute an obstruction of the criminal investigation. Ms Fitzpatrick was distressed by the information that had been conveyed by Jeannette Antoine—namely, that people in positions of trust and power, and individuals entrusted by the CAS to care for children, may have abused children under their care. She was also very concerned that Ms Antoine had relayed the information about the Second Street home on two occasions to the CAS but that no action appeared to have been taken by the agency on this matter.

After returning to work at the CAS, Ms Fitzpatrick did not discuss with either her supervisor or her colleagues at the CAS the interview she had had with Jeannette Antoine. Nor, as I mentioned earlier, did she open a file or prepare notes regarding her interaction with the former ward of the CAS. Geraldine Fitzpatrick did not conduct further inquiries regarding the Second Street home, such as with respect to the individuals who had been identified by Ms Antoine as residents of the home.

After the Christmas holidays, Ms Fitzpatrick decided to disclose the contents of the November 1993 Antoine interview to some of her colleagues, including Carleen Cummings. She also said that she subsequently shared this information with Patricia Garrahan, who, according to Ms Fitzpatrick, was dating Charlie Greenwell, a news broadcaster at the local TV station.

Geraldine Fitzpatrick testified that she has not had any communication with Constable Heidi Sebalj since the November 1993 Antoine interview.

As mentioned, Geraldine Fitzpatrick chose not to disclose the interview that she had had with Jeannette Antoine to her supervisor or senior officials at the CAS. Richard Abell, executive director of the CAS, had no knowledge of the Fitzpatrick/Sebalj interview of Ms Antoine until about two years later, when, in August 1995, Geraldine Fitzpatrick disclosed the interview that had taken place at the Cornwall Police Service in November 1993 and the allegations that had been made by Jeannette Antoine. It was clearly inappropriate, Mr. Abell said, for Ms Fitzpatrick to have involved herself in that interview without authorization. I agree and am of the view that Ms Fitzpatrick should have advised her supervisors of this investigation.

Antoine Allegations Against CAS Publicized in the Media

Jeannette Antoine testified that, in early 1994, she was approached by reporter Charlie Greenwell, who was interested in obtaining information on her care as a child when she was a ward of the Children's Aid Society. Although Ms Antoine signed a consent form allowing Mr. Greenwell to access her CAS file, he was apparently unsuccessful in retrieving this information from the agency. Nevertheless, Mr. Greenwell interviewed Ms Antoine, and a story was broadcast on television regarding her treatment as a child under the care of the CAS at the Second Street group home. The report was televised on CJOH, a local stations.

The media stories on Jeannette Antoine occurred immediately after media publicity in the media about David Silmser's allegations of sexual abuse. The stories in January 1994 on television and in print were of concern to the executive director of the Children's Aid Society of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry. Allegations of institutional cover-up, which included the Children's Aid Society, were reported in the media.

On January 12, 1994, Mr. Abell received a letter from Deputy Chief St. Denis confirming that the Cornwall police would be examining its investigation of the Antoine allegations of abuse and that CAS staff would likely be interviewed. By January 1994, Mr. Abell knew that Constable Shawn White had been assigned to the Antoine investigation and that Staff Sergeant Derochie would be reviewing the earlier police investigation that had begun in 1989.

The following day, Richard Abell issued a press release, which essentially stated that the CAS had taken action with respect to the Antoine allegations.

On January 14, 1994, an article entitled "Police review abuse claim at former CAS group home" was published in the Cornwall Standard-Freeholder. Mr. Abell was quoted in the article as stating that the CAS had acted very quickly and decisively. He said that the incident was never reported to the police. Mr. Abell agreed in his evidence that, regardless of whether a legal requirement existed in the 1970s to report such cases to the police, it would have been appropriate for the CAS to have notified the local police of the allegations of abuse made by the children in the Second Street group home.

Staff Sergeant Derochie informed Mr. Abell a few days later (on January 19, 1994) that the CPS had had discussions with Jeannette Antoine, who wanted criminal action taken against CAS staff for acts of physical and sexual abuse. The Staff Sergeant, who was re-investigating the 1989 Antoine complaint to the CPS, asked Mr. Abell for information in the Antoine file as well as for the names of members of the police force who were on the CAS Board of Directors at that time. After consulting with CAS legal counsel, Mr. Abell told Staff Sergeant Derochie that he could view the CAS file and also could remove any CAS material if a warrant were obtained. He also told the Staff Sergeant that there was no record of any CPS officer on the CAS Board in 1975 to 1976, but that Constable Kevin Malloy was a member of the Board from March 1990 until April 1992. In other words, when Constable Malloy was involved in the investigation of the Antoine complaint, he was a member of the CAS Board of Directors. Staff Sergeant Derochie informed Mr. Abell later in January 1994 that Suzanne Lapointe, one of Ms Antoine's sisters, alleged that she had been physically and sexually abused while in the care of a foster family.

The 1994 police investigation by Constable Shawn White of the Antoine allegations, as well as Staff Sergeant Derochie's review of the manner in which the CPS conducted itself in the earlier investigation, are discussed in detail in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service.

In November 1994, the CAS was informed of the outcome of Constable White's investigation. Acting Chief Carl Johnston and Inspector Richard Trew met with Mr. Abell and Mr. Towndale at the CAS office on November 3, 1994. Constable White had concluded that there was insufficient evidence to support criminal charges with regard to the Second Street home or the foster homes. It was made clear to Mr. Abell that although a number of other children had allegedly been abused, there had been no follow-up by the police.

Mr. Abell was “struck” that former wards of the CAS, not solely Jeannette Antoine, had alleged abuse and that the allegations involved not only physical abuse but also sexual abuse. Mr. Abell did not ask the police for the names of the former wards. Nor did Mr. Abell follow up with Suzanne Lapointe regarding her allegations of abuse in a foster home.

Mr. Abell acknowledged that, in retrospect, he should have asked the CPS for further details and should have pursued allegations of abuse, which were extensive. He agreed that he should have been more proactive and that this was a failing on his part. These former wards were now struggling as adults and needed support. Mr. Abell also testified that, had he had this information earlier, he would have had a different perspective and been more sympathetic to Jeannette Antoine. He also testified that she was part of a larger set of circumstances that had called for much more interest and activity on his part than he had given it at the time.

Mr. Abell sent a memo to CAS staff alerting them to a civil lawsuit by Ms Antoine and informing them that the Cornwall police would not be laying criminal charges. He also wrote a press release on November 4, 1994, to the effect that the CPS had decided, after a lengthy and exhaustive criminal investigation, not to lay charges. Neither in the memo to his staff nor in the press release did Mr. Abell indicate that a number of former wards had alleged that they, too, had been abused while in the care of the CAS.

Response to Reported Allegations at the Second Street Group Home

Although it was operational for only two years, the Second Street group home was an extremely negative experience for many of its residents. It was also, as I have noted throughout this section, the focus of a far from ideal institutional response to allegations of abuse, both sexual and physical, allegedly perpetrated by its own employees. As noted by Jeannette Antoine in her testimony, things at the home may have been completely different but for the sudden death of its initial director, Rod Rabey, during its first year in operation. It was during the first three months after his death, when Derry Tenger was the home’s director, that the vast majority of the abuse and other improper conduct occurred.

Although I am critical of some of the decisions made by Angelo Towndale during his handling of the allegations made by residents in the Second Street group home, I acknowledge that he was the acting director while Mr. O’Brien was away. When this situation arose, Mr. Towndale acted reasonably quickly, an investigation was conducted, and in the end many of the staff involved were dismissed. I was impressed with Mr. Towndale’s candour and his obvious compassion for children. He readily admitted errors he had made and expressed regret for some of his decisions. I found him to be an honest and credible witness.

Although the response of the CAS of SD&G to the allegations of abuse at the Second Street group home was not ideal, the CAS managers and employees involved were, for the most part, caring, dedicated professionals who were, unfortunately, ill-equipped to deal with the challenges they faced in the mid-1970s, when various incidents of abuse and alleged abuse occurred.

Earl Landry Jr.

In the late 1990s, Earl Landry Jr., the son of the former chief of the Cornwall Community Police Service (CPS), was convicted of various sexual offences involving children and youth. The Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS of SD&G) became involved with Mr. Landry Jr. in the 1990s, both in an investigative capacity and with reference to the placement of a CAS ward, in his home. Prior to this time, the CAS of SD&G was made aware of allegations of abuse against Earl Landry Jr. in 1985.

Earl Landry Jr. Is Named As an Alleged Perpetrator

In 1985, the CAS of SD&G conducted a joint investigation with the Cornwall Police Service into allegations of sexual abuse made by C-51 against Gary Seguin, who was inviting children into his home and employing them to assemble curtain rods. Mr. Seguin was ultimately charged and prosecuted. CAS worker Jean Dupuy was assigned to investigate the allegations on behalf of the CAS. Bill Carriere was his supervisor.

C-51 also made an allegation of abuse against Earl Landry Jr., who, at the time, was employed by the City of Cornwall Parks and Recreation Department as the caretaker at King George Park in Cornwall. According to police notes, on July 8, 1985, Sergeant Ron Lefebvre of the Cornwall Police Service met with Jean Dupuy and Bill Carriere to discuss the investigation into Earl Landry Jr. and Gary Seguin. (The CPS investigations of Earl Landry Jr. are discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service.) Although I did not have the benefit of seeing any notes taken by the CAS workers during this meeting, notes made by Jean Dupuy on July 9, 1985, indicate that he was advised by Sergeant Lefebvre that C-51 alleged that he had been sexually assaulted by "an Earl Landry care taker of King George Park."

CAS Receives a Letter From Dr. Park Containing Clear Allegations Against Earl Landry Jr.

In or around mid-September, Mr. Dupuy received a letter from Dr. Malcolm Park, Chairman of the Child Protection team at the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario, in Ottawa. The letter stated that C-51 and his brother alleged that they had been sexually molested by Gary Seguin and Earl Landry Jr. Bill Carriere explained that the medical staff at the Cornwall hospital knew that the CAS was working with C-51 and that there was a file on the family. The letter contained unequivocal and specific details of the allegations against Mr. Landry Jr. In fact, Mr. Carriere described it as “one of the stronger letters” he had seen in his career.

Although he could not recall if Mr. Dupuy had showed him this letter, Mr. Carriere testified it would have been his normal practice to do so and thought it was likely that Mr. Dupuy had brought it to his attention. According to Mr. Carriere, Mr. Dupuy also should have brought it to the attention of the police. Mr. Carriere did not know whether the police were informed of this letter, but he testified that he “would be surprised” if Mr. Dupuy did not bring this matter to their attention.

Jean Dupuy provided a statement to Sergeant Brian Snyder on December 19, 2000, regarding the letter from Dr. Park and the allegations of sexual abuse by Earl Landry Jr. contained therein. Mr. Dupuy was not able to provide an explanation as to why the information was not investigated or whether it was passed on to the Cornwall police. He stated that the normal procedure would be to share all relevant information with the police but, without his case notes, it was not possible to determine if this had occurred.

In my opinion, the information contained in this letter should have been turned over to the police, whether or not the CAS conducted its own investigation.

The CAS Does Not Investigate; Earl Landry Jr. Not a “Caregiver”

The CAS of SD&G did not conduct an investigation into Earl Landry Jr. because he was not considered a “caregiver” and therefore fell outside the CAS mandate. Mr. Carriere acknowledged that this position was taken despite the fact that Mr. Landry Jr. worked at a park used by children on a regular basis. He explained that, in 1985, there was a more rigid approach to deciding which cases the CAS would pursue. The standards and guidelines in existence at the time related more to abuse within the family. According to Mr. Carriere, he broke new ground when he became a supervisor by expanding that definition to include situations beyond the family. His feeling was that, in 1985, a park caretaker did not fit within that definition. It would be included today.

Although the abuse allegedly committed by Mr. Seguin was also outside the family, Mr. Carriere explained that because Mr. Seguin invited children into his home, employed them, and was responsible for them, the CAS investigated him. According to Mr. Carriere, it was not the expectation of the CAS of SD&G that a caretaker in a park was responsible for children. He acknowledged that, in order to determine if Earl Landry Jr. was a caregiver, one would have to know what interaction he had with the children. Based on the information in Dr. Park’s report, he was taking boys into the clubhouse, where he sexually assaulted them. According to Mr. Carriere, this was no different from a stranger taking a child into a car and molesting him or her.

Bill Carriere agreed that the CAS needs to have a certain amount of information before it can determine if a situation falls within its mandate. He was shown the statement of C-53, a victim who as an adult came forward with allegations against Earl Landry Jr. It was taken by Cornwall Police Constable Brian Snyder on June 10, 1997. In this statement, C-53 indicated that he knew Earl Landry Jr. from the park and that Mr. Landry Jr. would take kids for rides in his car and buy them popsicles. C-53 described being invited to swim at Earl Landry Jr.'s house and feeling awkward when Mr. Landry Jr. changed in front of him. He went on to describe an incident of abuse that occurred in 1983 or 1984. Mr. Carriere admitted that, if the CAS had had this information in 1985, it would have responded differently. He agreed that, if in 1985 the CAS had sought out more information, it may have discovered that Earl Landry Jr. fit within the definition of caregiver in the same way Gary Seguin did.

Bill Carriere testified that, given Mr. Landry Jr.'s position as a caretaker in a park, there would be many questions asked today that were not asked in 1985.

No Reference to Earl Landry Jr. in CAS Case Notes

Not only did the CAS not investigate Earl Landry Jr., but Jean Dupuy's case notes with respect to C-51 do not make reference to the allegation against him. Bill Carriere testified that there should have been a reference to Earl Landry Jr. in the file. Even if the CAS did not consider him as being in a caregiver role, and therefore not within its mandate, there should have been some discussion within the agency about the allegations. Mr. Carriere acknowledged that the records should have had more detail. He signed off on the closing of the file on C-51 in 1986 but testified that he probably was not conscious of Mr. Landry Jr. When he saw the recording, he was not aware of its deficiencies. In addition, he explained that, at the time, he would often only see sections of the file and not the entire file at once, whereas today everything is electronic so the entire file can be viewed at once.

The Campbell Case

The CAS of SD&G became aware of allegations of sexual abuse against Earl Landry Jr. but did not investigate because he was not considered a caregiver and therefore was outside the CAS mandate. This is in stark contrast to how the CAS handled the case of Bernie Campbell, who was a volunteer coach for various sport teams for the Parks and Recreation Department. Mr. Carriere and Mr.

Dupuy were both involved in the Campbell case. Upon being notified of potential abuse, Mr. Dupuy notified the police within a day. He attended the next day with the alleged child victims and they gave the police statements. Mr. Campbell was charged, and the CAS made a decision to contact the department manager who supervised him, which was done within days. In this case, the CAS reacted very quickly. Mr. Campbell was charged and convicted in March 1986. Although Earl Landry Jr. was only a caretaker, as opposed to a coach, he had equal access to and opportunity to approach the children attending the same recreation facilities.

An Unfortunate Failure to Investigate

There are two issues with respect to the handling of the Earl Landry Jr. case by the CAS of SD&G. The first is the decision not to investigate, and the second is the adequacy of information sharing and record keeping. With respect to the first issue, I appreciate that the definition of caregiver was less expansive in 1985 than it is today. However, in my opinion the facts warranted at least some investigation on the part of the CAS to allow them to make an informed determination about whether or not Earl Landry Jr. was a caregiver. The issue of who is a caregiver remains unclear. For example, a caretaker of a park that children frequent year round, similar to a caretaker in a school, is more likely to be considered a caregiver than a caretaker in a factory or workplace where children seldom visit. Mr. Carriere testified that, when looking at the definition of “caregiver,” perhaps we need to consider whether there are certain locations in which any adult present would be considered a caregiver regardless of their relationship with the children—for example, an electrician doing work in a park. It is clear that the concept of caregiver, which is currently defined in the eligibility spectrum, needs to be more clearly defined. There should also be consistency in the language used in the eligibility spectrum and the Child and Family Services Act, the latter of which uses the term “in charge of a child” rather than “caregiver.” The current definition of caregiver and my recommendations for clarification will be discussed further in the conclusion to this chapter.

The second issue in this case is insufficient record keeping and the lack of information sharing. I have already commented that the letter from Dr. Park, or at least some of the information in the letter, should have been shared with the police. Given the lack of remaining records from both the CAS and CPS, it is not possible for me to conclude if it was. It is also my view that the fact that C-51 and his brother made allegations against Earl Landry Jr. should have been recorded in the family file. As Mr. Carriere acknowledged, because Earl Landry Jr.’s name was not included in the recording, even if the CAS of SD&G had an internal register or tracking system, his name would not be on it and so would not have been available to workers who might become involved with him at a later time.

Earl Landry Jr. did, in fact, come to the attention of the CAS again, in 1993, for two reasons. He and his wife applied to become foster parents to C-54, and an anonymous complaint of sexual abuse against a young person by Mr. Landry Jr. was reported by the alleged victim's psychologist. It is unfortunate that a more complete investigation was not conducted into Earl Landry Jr. in 1985. A more complete CAS and/or joint CAS/CPS investigation may have prevented the victimization of the children Mr. Landry Jr. abused after 1985.

1993: Earl Landry Jr. Becomes a Foster Parent

In May 1993, Earl Landry Jr. and his wife, Lucie Landry, applied to the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS of SD&G) to be approved as a provisional foster home for C-54. Being a provisional foster home means that the applicant is interested in taking only a particular child and not other foster children. Due to the inadequacies of record keeping and coordination related to previous reports regarding Earl Landry Jr., discussed in this chapter and Chapter 6, on the Cornwall Community Police Service (CPS), the records at the CAS of SD&G did not disclose past allegations that could have disqualified the Landrys as foster parents.

When the application was made in respect to C-54, he had already been in contact with the CAS. In 1991, he had come to the attention of the CAS of SD&G as a victim of sexual abuse by a male relative and had participated in a family sexual abuse treatment program. However, Bill Carriere, who was at that time a supervisor in the Protection Department, indicated that the CAS did not know that C-54 had been abused by Earl Landry Jr. at the time of the foster home application. This was discovered only much later. At the time of the foster home application, C-54 was sixteen years of age and living in a group home.

References must be provided by individuals applying to be foster parents. In this case, a reference was given by Earl Landry Sr., the father of Earl Landry Jr., who identified himself as the retired chief of police in Cornwall. The father's reference letter stated that his son had coached high school sports. Although he knew of the 1985 allegations made against his son, the father provided a reference without caveat. This is further discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service. Ian MacLean, who was the director of Residential Services at the CAS of SD&G for seven years prior to his retirement, indicated that references supplied by family members are still accepted by the CAS.

On September 13, 1993, the CAS received a call from Cornwall psychologist Dr. Wayne Nadler, who indicated that one of his counselling clients had disclosed sexual abuse perpetrated by Earl Landry Jr. when his client was a child. This patient did not want to pursue the matter with the CAS or police.

On September 20, 1993, the CAS sent a letter approving the Landry home as a provisional foster home for C-54. Executive director Richard Abell also sent a letter to the Landry family. He testified that, if he had known of the call received from Dr. Nadler, he would not have approved the placement.

Follow-up Regarding the Report by Dr. Nadler

On September 14, 1993, Bill Carriere and his staff met to discuss a plan of action with respect to the report of abuse from Dr. Nadler. Mr. Carriere testified that the application by the Landrys to become provisional foster parents was not brought to his attention at that time. However, his colleague Françoise Lepage had become aware that Earl Landry Jr. was noted in a foster home application at the CAS, and she appeared to be looking into whether the alleged perpetrator in the doctor's report and the foster home applicant were the same person. On October 4, 1993, Dr. Nadler provided additional identifying information: the alleged perpetrator of abuse was the son of the former chief of police. CAS staff responsible for C-54 and the provisional foster home were given a copy of Dr. Nadler's report, and more information was requested from him. At this point, there was still no connection made by CAS staff between the 1993 report and the previous allegations that had surfaced in 1985. It is clear, however, that the information relayed by Dr. Nadler identified Earl Landry Jr., who had recently become a foster father, as an alleged child abuser.

In discussing the situation, the CAS staff assessed the risk to C-54 as low, despite his previous history of abuse by an unidentified male family member. As well, his age appeared to be a factor, in that he could not be compelled to leave his place of residence after he was sixteen. Pina DeBellis was assigned to investigate the sexual abuse allegation reported by Dr. Nadler.

Joint Investigation With CPS Does Not Proceed

Ms DeBellis contacted Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet on October 22, 1993. He was the CAS liaison at the Cornwall Police. Staff Sergeant Brunet did some research and indicated that there was no criminal record for Earl Landry Jr. but there was a reported incident of sexual assault in 1985. Several days later, Ms DeBellis spoke to Sergeant Ron Lefebvre, who provided her some details regarding this earlier allegation. Sergeant Lefebvre told her there had been identification problems and that they had not proceeded with charges at that time. The Cornwall Police Service investigation into Earl Landry Jr. in 1985 is discussed in detail in Chapter 6; it was an inadequate investigation almost from its inception.

The CAS investigated the 1993 allegation against Earl Landry Jr. on its own, because the police would not proceed without knowing the identity of Dr. Nadler's client.

In the course of her investigation, Ms DeBellis spoke to C-51, a person identified to her by Sergeant Lefebvre as one of the individuals who had made an allegation in 1985. Although C-51 could not give the name of his abuser, he was able to give significant identifying information about the individual who sexually assaulted him when he was nine or ten, including the fact that the abuser was still working as a city employee.

On October 27, 1993, Ms DeBellis met with C-54 and Lucie Landry and told them that the agency had received a report from an individual who alleged having been abused by Earl Landry Jr. They were advised that the complaint was being investigated and that the CAS believed the allegations were serious and credible. They were not given any information about the complaints from 1985.

Mr. Landry Jr.'s Employer Is Not Contacted

Earl Landry Jr. was working at a local arena, where he could have contact with children, and thus a decision was made at an October 29, 1993, meeting to contact the head of the Parks and Recreation Department of the City of Cornwall. Decisions to contact employers were always made on a case-by-case basis and were subject to senior level authority at the CAS. An attempt was made to contact the head of the Parks and Recreation department, at Earl Landry Jr.'s place of employment, but he had left for the day. The employer was otherwise never contacted or informed in this case. In another case, involving complaints against an individual named Bernie Campbell, who was a volunteer coach, the CAS did disclose the allegations to the Parks and Recreation Department, which led to other victims being identified. In testimony before me, Bill Carriere agreed that the same approach should have been followed in the case of Earl Landry Jr., and his employer should have been informed.

Continued Attempts to Identify the Name of the Alleged Abuser

In November 1993, Ms DeBellis continued to work with C-51 in the hopes that he would provide the CAS the name of his alleged abuser. Bill Carriere testified that, for some reason, the CAS "became fixated" on the name. He said that, at the time, it was thought that finding the name of the alleged abuser was the appropriate thing to do. The CAS continued to assess the risk associated with Earl Landry Jr. as low.

In November 1993, consideration was given to removing C-54 from the Landry home. Earl Landry Jr. had moved out for a period but Ms Landry was having difficulty caring for the Landry's young son, who was in a full-body cast, and needed her husband to help her. In addition, C-54 indicated that he wanted to stay in the home, and he denied any abuse by Earl Landry Jr. While the CAS had concerns, it did not intervene to remove C-54, and Earl Landry Jr. returned to the family home.

In a meeting held on December 21, 1993, the CAS concluded that there was sufficient information to infer that Earl Landry Jr. had probably molested C-51 and Dr. Nadler's client. This position was confirmed at a January 11, 1994, meeting. However, the CAS did not inform Earl Landry Jr.'s employer or contact the police, nor did it take steps to record his name in the Child Abuse Register. In addition, although CAS staff told C-54 that they preferred he move out from the Landry home, they took no further steps, as C-54 was sixteen and did not want to move. The Landry family was told on January 20, 1994, that the status of their home as a provisional foster home was terminated. This angered the family and had financial consequences for them, as foster parents are paid.

Another Allegation Is Made Against Earl Landry Jr. in 1995

In December 1995, CAS of SD&G worker Carole Leblanc received an allegation by C-52 that he had been abused by Earl Landry Jr. at King George Park when C-52 was twelve to sixteen years of age. Ms Leblanc indicated that she was not aware of the 1993 or 1985 allegations about Earl Landry Jr. She provided the information she had collected to the Cornwall Police Service. Ms Leblanc had no further contact with the police until February 1997, when Sergeant Brian Snyder of the CPS contacted her to prepare a will-state statement.

At a May 1996 risk management meeting, the issue of informing the Parks and Recreation Department about Earl Landry Jr. surfaced once again. A decision was made that the CAS was on "shaky ground" with respect to informing the employer, notwithstanding the third allegation and the fact that a determination had been made that Earl Landry Jr. had likely abused C-51 and another individual. In April 1997, the issue of informing the employer remained under consideration but again no action was taken. By this time, CAS worker Carole Leblanc had been asked by the CPS to prepare a will-state in respect to the complaint of C-52, which would suggest a serious investigation was proceeding.

Executive director Richard Abell indicated in a forthright way that, in failing to inform Earl Landry Jr.'s employer that he posed a risk to children, the CAS "dropped the ball." I agree that, on this issue, the CAS failed to take appropriate action. There was sufficient information to warrant informing the employer, who could then have taken its own steps and actions. A useful analogy is what occurs in the school system. If an allegation of abuse is made against a teacher, the teacher is removed from teaching duties while the complaint is reviewed. When an employer is informed of the allegation, it can take steps such as assigning the individual to duties that do not involve children or suspending the employee with pay while the situation is investigated. Informing an employer about allegations of abuse against an employee is a serious matter, and there should be a credible allegation before proceeding. In this case, there was ample information to indicate that there was a risk to be managed.

I accept the testimony of Richard Abell and Bill Carriere that they were not influenced by the fact that the individual they were investigating was the son of the former chief of police. However, I am troubled by the reality that there was so much concern about the sensitivity of reporting to an employer and insufficient sensitivity to the risk to children represented by a man who had ongoing access to children in his workplace.

C-54 Discloses Abuse by Earl Landry Jr.

Throughout the CAS investigation in 1993, C-54 denied being abused by Earl Landry Jr. However, in August 1997, he disclosed to the CPS that Earl Landry Jr. had abused him. The CAS of SD&G was made aware of this disclosure on August 5, 1997. Earl Landry Jr. later admitted that he had abused the boy when C-54 was a preteen and also when he was residing with the Landrys as a foster child. Earl Landry Jr. was charged by the CPS in 1997 and in August 1999 pleaded guilty to charges relating to five complainants, including C-54. He was sentenced to five years imprisonment.

Once Earl Landry Jr. was charged, Greg Bell, a worker with the CAS of SD&G, was asked to assess any possible risk associated with the Landry's own three children. By this time, the Landry family had moved to the Ottawa area, and so Mr. Bell was assisting the Ottawa CAS. Greg Bell testified that he did not see information about a prior complaint regarding Earl Landry Jr. in the files of the CAS of SD&G.

Poor Cross-Referencing and Record Keeping Create Unacceptable Risk

The issue of poor or non-existent cross-referencing in CAS files is a consistent theme in the Landry case. The foster home staff approved placements at the same time when a credible report of abuse had been made. In addition, there appeared to be poor record keeping with respect to the 1985 and 1993 complaints. Executive director Richard Abell indicated in his testimony that, in general, CAS record keeping was good and that this case was a "blip." I am not so sure. It seems that, even when the CAS had the opportunity to correct its records in 1995, this was not done. In 1997, CAS worker Greg Bell could not find documentation of complaints made about Earl Landry Jr. prior to the charges related to C-54. I believe that a review of the records-management system of the CAS is necessary to ensure that the system is sound and that indeed the pervasive record-keeping problems in this case were only anomalies.

The fact that records were incomplete is not a trivial matter. It led to the approval of an inappropriate foster home placement and delays in reporting to the employer of the potential risk associated with an employee with access to children. While I do not attribute the inadequacies of the Landry investigation at the CPS to the CAS, if the CAS had had better records, it might have been of greater assistance to the CPS or have been in a position to put pressure on the Cornwall police during its very slow investigation.

Project Blue

The genesis of Project Blue emanated from a discussion in late September 1993 between Richard Abell, executive director of the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS of SD&G), and Constable Perry Dunlop in the parking lot at Quinn's Inn in St. Andrew's.

On September 25, 1993, Perry Dunlop, who was a musician as well as a Constable with the Cornwall Community Police Service (CPS) was scheduled to perform at the pub at Quinn's Inn. Richard Abell and his wife were good friends of the Dunlop family and went to see Constable Dunlop perform that evening. As Constable Dunlop was unloading his equipment in the parking lot, he decided to approach Richard Abell and share some information with him that was a source of anxiety.

Constable Dunlop told Mr. Abell that he had overheard a conversation between some officers at the police station in which Father Charles MacDonald was mentioned. Constable Dunlop spoke to the officer involved in the investigation of the sexual assault allegations involving Father MacDonald and obtained a copy of the victim's statement. Perry had looked for the file on this matter, but had not been successful: "Nothing [was] put on internal record system, computers."

Perry Dunlop was very upset that a police investigation involving sexual abuse of a young person by a priest was not being pursued by the CPS. The Constable thought that the investigation had not been properly handled. He was worried that children in the community continued to be at risk of abuse. He considered himself under a statutory duty to report this information to the Children's Aid Society. Constable Dunlop told Richard Abell that he had a copy of the victim's statement. Mr. Abell testified that he thought that Constable Dunlop had disclosed the name of the priest that evening, identifying Father Charles MacDonald, an active priest in St. Andrew's Parish, as the alleged perpetrator. This parish was in fact across the street from Quinn's Inn, where the Abells and Dunlops were having this discussion. Perry and Helen Dunlop had been married by Father MacDonald, and the priest had baptized their children. As Mr. Abell commented in his evidence, Constable Dunlop knew the priest very well: "[T]his was very close to home for Perry, extremely close to home, and he was rocked by it."

The following day, Helen and Perry Dunlop came to the Abell home to further discuss their concerns about the CPS investigation. It was on that day, September 26, 1993, that Perry Dunlop showed Richard Abell the statement of David Silmsen concerning his allegations of sexual assault. In this statement, Mr. Silmsen made allegations of sexual abuse against not only Father Charles MacDonald but also Ken Seguin, a probation officer in Cornwall. Mr. Abell understood that these were allegations of historical abuse. Constable Dunlop told the CAS executive director that, although some of his fellow officers supported his view and agreed that the investigation should be pursued, he felt he was "stuck" in terms of persuading his police force to pursue the criminal allegations against the priest. Inscribed in Richard Abell's notes is the comment, "[A] couple of sergeants ... are with him on this but otherwise he is stuck." Mr. Abell assured Constable Dunlop that he would pursue the matter within his own organization. Mr. Abell did not take the victim's statement from Perry Dunlop at the time but he read it and found it to be very credible. Inscribed in his notes were the comments "very credible—looks to be consistent with SVA (statement validity analysis) criteria" and "I tell Perry I'm duty bound to act on the information."

Constable Dunlop told Mr. Abell that he wished to discuss the case further with officers in his force with the objective of convincing them to pursue the Father MacDonald matter. In particular, he wanted to speak with Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet, who, he explained, was the head of the Criminal Investigation Branch (CIB) and Constable Heidi Sebalj's supervisor. Constable Sebalj was the CPS officer who investigated the allegations made by David Silmsen. If he was not successful, Constable Dunlop planned to give a copy of the victim's statement to Mr. Abell. Richard Abell had a clear recollection of this discussion with Constable Dunlop on the afternoon of September 26, 1993, at the Abell home:

... I recall this clearly from that meeting, he was very aware of the situation he was putting himself in with his own force in coming to me, talking to me the way he had and being prepared to give me the statement. He knew that there were going to be consequences to that. He wanted to make one more effort, as he saw it, to try to move things ahead within his own organization.

After a few days, Richard Abell decided to contact Constable Dunlop to find out the outcome of his discussions with Staff Sergeant Brunet and members of his force. Mr. Abell called the Dunlop home on September 29, 1993, and spoke with Helen, who was upset. Richard Abell decided to go to the Dunlop home.

Helen Dunlop related to the CAS executive director that her husband's discussions with Staff Sergeant Brunet had not gone well. Constable Dunlop had been advised to end his involvement in the Father MacDonald matter and was cautioned that he could be charged under the Police Services Act. Constable Dunlop, she said, had also spoken to the Crown prosecutor, Murray MacDonald. Ms Dunlop told the CAS executive director that she herself had contacted David Silmsers and had tried to arrange to meet with him. Mr. Silmsers subsequently told officers at the CPS about this contact. Mr. Abell was surprised that Ms Dunlop had involved herself in this matter by contacting an alleged victim of sexual abuse.

Perry Dunlop called Mr. Abell that evening and reiterated the information conveyed by his wife. The CPS Constable made it clear that he had not been successful in persuading his force to pursue the criminal investigation involving the priest. Mr. Abell picked up the victim's statement at the Dunlop home the following morning and assured the CPS Constable that he would discuss the matter with senior staff at the CAS and decide whether the CAS would proceed with an investigation. Constable Dunlop told Mr Abell that he had very limited support at the CPS and that there could be charges under the Police Services Act as a result of his actions. Both Perry Dunlop and Richard Abell believed that Constable Dunlop was under a statutory duty under the Child and Family Services Act to report these allegations of child abuse. Constable Dunlop knew that by giving Mr. Silmsers's statement to Richard Abell, he was placing himself in even greater professional jeopardy. As Mr. Abell said in his evidence, "it was clear that the risk to him had gone up" but "he [Constable Dunlop] was absolutely determined to follow through" with it.

In Mr. Abell's view, the circumstances presented in the Silmsers case, past abuse by a priest who continued to be active in the church and the community, required a report to the Children's Aid Society by officers at the Cornwall Police Service. The CAS executive director believed that the failure of the investigating police officer and his superior to report the matter to the CAS was attributable to the lack of clarity surrounding cases of historical abuse. Mr. Abell, in fact, acknowledged in his testimony that the "lack of clarity may well have extended to our own organization."

I agree with Mr. Abell and I am of the view that the statutory duty in section 72 of the Child and Family Services Act should be amended. It should clarify that there is an obligation to report cases of historical child abuse in circumstances in which the alleged perpetrator continues to be a risk to children.

When the Silmser allegations were brought to his attention, Mr. Abell raised with Chief Claude Shaver that the development of a protocol was necessary in order to clarify the reporting obligations and to delineate the procedures for historical cases of child abuse. Mr. Abell agreed that it would be beneficial to generate a formal document to ensure that all police officers were cognizant of the statutory duties and the procedures to be followed for cases of historical child abuse. I note that the 2001 Eastern Zone Child Protection Protocol provides that, when there is an allegation of sexual abuse and where the accused is in charge of a child or is in a position of trust, there should be reciprocal reporting and joint investigations involving the CAS and the police. There is also a list of factors to be considered to determine if the CAS should be involved despite the fact that the accused is not in charge of a child or in a position of trust. In my view, the definition of sexual abuse should be broadened so it is clear that it also includes instances involving historical sexual abuse. The protocol should also be reviewed and updated. Furthermore, it is unclear to me whether there is a mechanism in place to ensure that everyone from the different signatory institutions is familiar with the applicability and operation of the protocol.

Mr. Abell gave a copy of David Silmser's statement to CAS senior managers Bill Carriere, Angelo Towndale, and in-house legal counsel at the CAS, Elizabeth MacLennan. Mr. Towndale confirmed that, when he read the Silmser statement, his immediate reaction was that the Children's Aid Society should investigate the allegations. The primary reason for this conclusion was that other children were possibly at risk of abuse by the priest.

Prior to meeting with the senior managers, Richard Abell called his sister, Susan Abell, who had been the executive director of two Children's Aid Societies. She had been the executive director of the Children's Aid Society in Kingston at the time of the St. George allegations, a church-related multi-victim situation that had some parallels to the matter confronting Mr. Abell in the Cornwall area. Susan Abell had experience with the media and information disseminated to the public, and Mr. Abell sought to draw upon her knowledge.

Mr. Abell met with his senior managers on September 30, 1993. Richard Abell, Mr. Carriere, Mr. Towndale, and Ms MacLennan all agreed that the statement was "highly" credible, that "very likely ... there was other abuse of Silmser not mentioned in the statement, likely other victims," and that there was a "good possibility of present abuse of children by Charlie MacDonald." Inscribed in Mr. Abell's notes of the September 30, 1993, meeting was the comment "Strong consensus we have duty to open investigation based on concern for present abuse of children." This consensus resulted in the CAS Project Blue.

During this meeting, Mr. Abell and his senior managers discussed how to proceed with Project Blue. They discussed the composition of the team, which would consist of highly qualified CAS staff, female and male. The executive director also decided that he would first approach Chief Shaver of the Cornwall Police Service as a professional courtesy. The chief of the CPS would be asked if the force wished to re-open the criminal investigation, and, if so, whether the police force was interested in conducting a joint investigation with the CAS. If not, the CAS would proceed with its own investigation of the allegations against the priest. Mr. Abell also intended to contact the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) in Long Sault, as this was the area of the parish in which Father Charles MacDonald was then assigned. Mr. Abell also planned to notify the Ministry of Community and Social Services because of the potential for this investigation to become high profile and because of the allegations against Ken Seguin.

The CAS Meets With the Chief of Police

As discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service, Richard Abell met with Chief Shaver on October 1, 1993. The executive director of the CAS testified that he had initiated the meeting, which was held in the CAS office. Mr. Abell asked Angelo Towndale to attend the meeting with the police chief. Mr. Towndale, a Roman Catholic, was active in the local Catholic Diocese and was also a member of the Cornwall Police Services Board.

It was at this meeting with the CAS that Chief Shaver learned that Constable Perry Dunlop had given Mr. Silmsner's statement to the Children's Aid Society. Chief Shaver was visibly angry that the CPS Constable had done this. According to Mr. Abell's notes of the meeting, Chief Shaver said that he had "a big issue to deal with re Perry Dunlop going outside channels."

At the meeting, Mr. Abell reviewed the reporting section of the Child and Family Services Act with the police chief and told him there was a statutory duty to report this alleged abuse to the Children's Aid Society. The executive director of the CAS also told Chief Shaver that the victim's statement was "highly" credible, and that Mr. Abell intended to proceed with the investigation.

Chief Shaver told Mr. Abell that he was "upset" when he learned about the financial settlement of the Diocese with David Silmsner and that he would have wanted the criminal investigation of the priest to have proceeded. The police chief explained that he had conferred with the Crown, who had indicated that, if the complaint were withdrawn, there was no basis to proceed. The chief admitted that his police force had "screwed up big time," that the investigation had not been done, and that it had been placed on the "back burner." Mr. Abell considered these comments "striking" at the time and had a clear recollection of this acknowledgment by the police chief. Chief Shaver acknowledged that the investigating officer, Heidi Sebalj, was inexperienced and that Staff Sergeant Brunet had not supervised her adequately. This criticism of the police officers also surprised Mr. Abell. As the executive director of the CAS said in his evidence, “[Y]ou’ve got to be candid with professional colleagues, but to take criticisms of your own people outside your shop is, I guess—in my view, senior people don’t typically do that.”

This meeting is also discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service, where I note that Chief Shaver did not agree with all of Mr. Abell’s recollections of the meeting. Where there are differences, I prefer the evidence of Mr. Abell, whose evidence was forthright and consistent with his thorough, legible, contemporaneous notes.

Mr. Abell confirmed that the CAS would be proceeding with an investigation and that he planned to assign two of his “top” staff to investigate these allegations of abuse. Chief Shaver questioned the authority of the CAS to investigate on the basis of “out of channel” information, namely the Silmsers statement provided by Constable Dunlop. Mr. Abell replied that there was authority under the statute to proceed with the investigation.

Chief Shaver indicated that David Silmsers was a man of questionable character and motive. Mr. Abell pointed out that, if Mr. Silmsers had difficulties in his adult years, this was consistent with the profile of a victim of abuse. The police chief voiced further criticism by adding that four people had been contacted—three denied anything had occurred, and one person refused to talk. A $25,000 payment had been made to Mr. Silmsers from the Bishop’s office, and, in the chief’s view, his police force had been “used” by David Silmsers to obtain this payment.

Mr. Abell reiterated that the CAS had the authority on the basis of current risk to children to pursue the matter, as the David Silmsers’s statement alleged that two individuals in positions of authority and control had abused children.

Chief Shaver asked for some time to review the police file on the Silmsers complaint, which was being assembled, and to confer with Sean Adams, Mr. Silmsers’s lawyer. Mr. Abell agreed to a delay of one week and told the police chief that, after that time, the CAS would proceed with its own investigation.

Mr. Abell met Chief Shaver again one week later with Angelo Towndale. This time, Staff Sergeant Brunet accompanied Chief Shaver to the meeting with the CAS. As I discuss in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the CPS, at this meeting Claude Shaver reported on the visit he had with the Pope’s representative in Ottawa on October 7, 1993, and a subsequent meeting with Bishop Eugène LaRocque.

Chief Shaver reported that the Bishop intended to move Father MacDonald out of the parish and send him for an assessment at a facility in Barrie, Ontario.

The police chief told Mr. Abell that the Bishop had related to him that Father MacDonald had paid $10,000 of his own money, the Bishop had paid $10,000 on behalf of the Diocese, and “someone else put in $10,000 or $12,000” for the financial settlement with Mr. Silmsner. In other words, the payment to David Silmsner was from three sources: Father MacDonald, the Diocese, and a third unnamed party. Although Mr. Abell knew that David Silmsner had made allegations of abuse against Ken Seguin, he could not recall whether he asked Chief Shaver for the identity of the unnamed third party at the October 8, 1993, meeting. The Bishop told the police chief that he opposed the payment to Mr. Silmsner but relented because of the advice received by lawyers Jacques Leduc and Malcolm MacDonald.

Chief Shaver told Mr. Abell that “police hands were still tied with respect to [Father] MacDonald” in that Mr. Silmsner had withdrawn the complaint. The chief stated that the CPS was waiting for a response from Sean Adams, Mr. Silmsner’s lawyer, regarding his client’s refusal to proceed.

Mr. Abell told the police chief that the CAS intended to meet with the Bishop. There was agreement that current altar boys at St. Andrew’s Parish needed to be contacted. Mr. Abell discussed with Chief Shaver the need to develop a joint CAS–police–Church protocol to deal with allegations of sexual abuse by clergy. At that time, there was only a CAS–police protocol. Mr. Abell testified that the Diocese had done its own investigation in late 1992 and early 1993, but it had not shared information with or reported the allegations of abuse to the CAS.

Mr. Abell asked what the CPS was doing with regard to Ken Seguin. Chief Shaver replied that he was waiting to hear from the Crown prosecutor. Staff Sergeant Brunet undertook to keep Mr. Abell informed of the outcome of this discussion.

The CAS Meets With Bishop LaRocque

The CAS met with Bishop LaRocque on October 12, 1993. Mr. Carriere and Mr. Towndale accompanied Mr. Abell to the meeting. At this point, Richard Abell had decided that Mr. Carriere would be responsible for the investigation by the CAS. Although the Bishop did not take any notes of that meeting, Mr. Abell took detailed contemporaneous notes.

Mr. Abell started the meeting with a discussion of the role of the CAS and explained that the agency was concerned with current and recent abuse of children. He told the Bishop that the agency was investigating allegations of abuse by Father Charles MacDonald. Recorded in Mr. Abell’s notes of the meeting was that the Bishop was “taken aback” that the CAS would investigate this matter. Bishop LaRocque said he wished to “monitor” the investigation. Mr. Abell made it clear that the CAS intended to conduct a full investigation without any monitoring by the Church. The Bishop expressed concern for the publicity as well as the reputation of Father MacDonald. He said that Cornwall was a small community and that once the altar boys and their families were interviewed, the priest would be considered an "accused" person. Mr. Abell's response was that the best way to deal with the accusations was to conduct an open and thorough investigation to learn the facts.

The Bishop told the CAS officials that Father MacDonald was at the South-down facility in Barrie. Mr. Abell indicated that he wanted Father MacDonald out of the parish to enable the CAS to freely conduct its investigation. Mr. Abell testified that the primary reason to ensure that the priest was not in the parish was the concern about the safety of children. The Bishop was "very reluctant" to comply with this request, according to the notes of the meeting. They engaged in a "lively exchange" and finally agreed that Father MacDonald would stay away from the parish for a two-week period. The CAS officials knew this was not sufficient time to enable it to complete its investigation. As Mr. Abell said in his evidence:

It wasn't going to be enough; we certainly knew that. I mean, he held his ground on this for a while. We really had to bat this one around for a while. He really wanted to bring Father MacDonald back relatively quickly. And, again, it had to do with the rumour mill getting started and, you know, the public image of him as an accused. So that was his position.

In the mind of the CAS officials, two weeks was merely a "start point." The Bishop mentioned that David Silmsner had contacted a cleric in Ottawa who handled abuse allegations for that Diocese. The Church official had sent a letter to Bishop LaRocque, which the CAS officials asked to read. Although the Bishop allowed Mr. Abell and his senior managers to review the correspondence, he refused to give the CAS a copy of the document on the grounds that it was "confidential." The letter was from Monsignor Peter Schonenbach and was dated December 11, 1992. Mr. Abell noted that the Church official from Ottawa had ended his correspondence with his assessment that David Silmsner was credible.

Bishop LaRocque told the CAS officials that he had been opposed to paying off David Silmsner but had been persuaded to do so by the Diocese lawyer, Jacques Leduc, and Father Charles MacDonald's lawyer, Malcolm MacDonald. This was despite the fact that the Bishop said he had recently attended meetings at the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops and had been advised not to enter a settlement with the alleged victim. Mr. Abell knew Mr. Leduc, as he had previously acted as legal counsel for the CAS on a few matters. Mr. Abell's notes indicate that the Bishop referred to the payment to Mr. Silmsen as a “nuisance settlement.” Bishop LaRocque made negative comments about Mr. Silmsen’s character and commented that he had been “in and out of jail.”

The Bishop told the CAS that Father MacDonald had strongly denied the Mr. Silmsen’s allegations of sexual abuse. Bishop LaRocque stated that Father MacDonald had admitted that he was homosexual and that he had engaged in sexual relations in the past. However, he claimed that his partners had all been teens and adults and that they had sometimes initiated the encounters. Mr. Abell found these comments “pretty striking.” The CAS officials immediately responded with “a very clear message” to the Bishop that a priest was in a position of trust and authority. Mr. Abell said the following in his evidence:

... I’m struck with the notation there “We jumped on it.” I mean, we did, and not [in] an impolite way but—not in an impolite way but we wanted him to know that if we were being presented a rationale that, “I only did it with teens,” [it] wasn’t going to—wasn’t, frankly, going to wash with us. I mean, that’s why we had a—we gave him a very clear message about people in roles of trust and responsibility and that we were going to proceed.

... [I]t frankly smacked of a rationale and it’s a rationale that we’ve heard in our business all too often, you know, including [regarding] small children—you know, they enticed me and she cuddled up to me, and you know, we’ve—it’s not at all uncommon to hear victimizers victimize those children in that way.

So just because of our professional orientation and background it’s just something we couldn’t let go, and we didn’t. That’s where the conversation went.

Bishop LaRocque said Father MacDonald had not engaged in sexual relations while he was teaching, nor for the past four years. This was when that the CAS executive director learned that Charles MacDonald had formerly been a teacher.

The CAS officials discussed with the Bishop the need for a protocol with the Church. Bishop LaRocque was receptive and agreed that the police and the CAS should work on developing a protocol for allegations of abuse.

Mr. Abell told the Bishop that Bill Carriere would be responsible for the CAS investigation of David Silmsen’s allegations. The Bishop said Monsignor Donald McDougald would handle the Father MacDonald case for the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. The Bishop agreed to provide names of altar boys to the

CAS. A discussion ensued about whether contact should be made with former altar boys or those in other parishes where Father MacDonald had worked. The CAS agreed to begin its investigation with the current altar boys. Mr. Abell asked the Bishop to give Jacques Leduc permission to speak freely and openly to the CAS about the Silmser case. He also mentioned that the CAS would contact the OPP and advised the Bishop that keeping the priest away from the parish for merely two weeks may not be a sufficient period of time for the CAS to complete its investigation. According to Mr. Abell's notes of the October 12, 1993, meeting, when the meeting came to an end, the "Bishop looked worried." As Mr. Abell said in his evidence, the Bishop said:

... he had a mess on his hands. I mean, he did have a mess on his hands
... [H]e was also open with us that he had a role in creating it in terms of the decision-making he made.

Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie came to the CAS to meet with Mr. Abell on October 14, 1993. As discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service, Staff Sergeant Derochie explained to Mr. Abell that the CPS was investigating Constable Dunlop, who could be subjected to charges under the Police Services Act for providing the Silmser statement to the CAS. Mr. Abell immediately disclosed that he was friends with Perry and Helen Dunlop. In this meeting, Staff Sergeant Derochie was critical of the CPS investigation of the Silmser complaint and stated that, in his opinion, it had been poorly handled by the CPS.

Staff Sergeant Derochie said that, if the CPS had "made mistakes," it "should do damage control—get busy and do a proper investigation." He also mentioned that the Crown lawyer had a conflict of interest. The police officer encouraged the CAS to examine the allegations of abuse made against Mr. Ken Seguin and added that there had been "stories" about this probation officer for some time.

Staff Sergeant Derochie said that he would be recommending that no charges be laid against Perry Dunlop and commented that an "officer's highest duty is to the safety of the community."

The Initiation of Project Blue: October 14, 1993

On October 14, 1993, Project Blue was initiated by the Children's Aid Society. Project Blue was named after the Blue Jay baseball team, which was playing in the World Series at that time. The primary purpose of the project was to determine whether Father Charles MacDonald posed a present risk of abuse to children in the Cornwall area. According to the provincial guidelines, "the society will initiate a further investigation only if there is an allegation or evidence that a child under the age of sixteen may be at risk.” Mr. Abell testified that although, based on Mr. Silmsen’s statement, the CAS had concern and suspicions that altar servers were at risk, there was no “specificity” regarding a particular child. Bill Carriere was assigned the responsibility for the investigation. Greg Bell was the lead investigator, assisted by Pina DeBellis. CAS lawyer Elizabeth MacLennan was also part of the Project Blue team. Beginning on October 14, 1993, Mr. Bell worked full-time on the Project Blue investigation for ten weeks, after which time he returned to his caseload. Team meetings were held each week, chaired by Mr. Abell, who was also the principal note-taker.

Mr. Carriere discussed with Mr. Bell the components of the CAS investigation. It involved making contact with several institutions, including the OPP, to advise the police force of the Project Blue investigation of Father Charles MacDonald. The CAS also wanted the Cornwall Police Service to provide the agency with all pertinent information on Father MacDonald, probation officer Ken Seguin, and David Silmsen and other possible victims. The agency also planned to ask the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall for information on Father MacDonald’s contact and relationship with Mr. Silmsen and any other potential victims. In addition, the CAS intended to contact the Ottawa Diocese and to speak to Monsignor Schonenbach.

Other components of the Project Blue investigation included interviews with David Silmsen and other possible victims of abuse who were identified. The CAS also had plans to interview the alleged perpetrator, Father MacDonald, and possibly Mr. Seguin.

On October 14, 1993, Mr. Abell briefed Lenore Jones, program supervisor at the Ministry of Community and Social Services. She agreed to find out whether probation and parole officer Ken Seguin was in the Ministry. At that time, probation officers for young offenders were in the Ministry of Community and Social Services and not the Ministry of Correctional Services. If Mr. Seguin were with Correctional Services, this meant that he was dealing with clients who were sixteen and seventeen years old. However, if he were with Community and Social Services, he would be coming into contact with children under the age of sixteen.

Mr. Abell subsequently learned that Mr. Seguin was not in fact with the Ministry of Community and Social Services. Mr. Abell denied at the hearings that he had told Staff Sergeant Derochie that the CAS was not investigating Mr. Seguin because the probation officer was not employed by his Ministry. I accept the explanation of Mr. Abell that he was trying to determine which ministry Ken Seguin worked for in order to determine the age of his clients. However, in my opinion more should have been done to determine whether Mr. Seguin was in contact with young persons, regardless of which Ministry he worked in.

On October 14, 1993, Monsignor McDougald brought to the CAS office the names of current altar boys at St. Andrew's Church. He gave these names to Mr. Towndale.

In mid-October 1993, Mr. Carriere and Mr. Bell met with Detective Constable Ron Wilson of the Ontario Provincial Police, Long Sault Detachment. The OPP officer stated that his force would not be conducting an investigation without a willing named complainant. Detective Constable Wilson agreed to conduct a Canadian Police Information Centre (CPIC) check on Father Charles MacDonald and to consult with members of his force to determine what assistance, if any, the OPP could provide to the CAS. Detective Constable Wilson, after reading David Silmser's statement, expressed concern about the credibility of this alleged victim. Mr. Carriere pointed out to the OPP officer the areas of credibility in Mr. Silmser's statement regarding the allegations of abuse against Father Charles MacDonald.

CAS Receives a Call From Jacques Leduc

Jacques Leduc, who represented the Diocese in the financial settlement with David Silmser, contacted Richard Abell on October 15, 1993. The lawyer asked Mr. Abell if Father Charles MacDonald had made an admission with respect to the allegations of abuse. Mr. Abell replied that he had learned from a meeting with Bishop LaRocque that the priest had admitted that he was gay and had engaged in sexual relations with adults and adolescents, but not for the past four years. The priest, according to Bishop LaRocque, had denied that he participated in sexual acts when he was a teacher. Mr. Abell's notes of the October 15 call with Mr. Leduc state: "I say 'yes' to being homosexual—relations with adolescents, adults. Not as a teacher, not the last 4 years. (This from the bishop)."

Mr. Leduc told Mr. Abell that "priestly confidences" could not be "betrayed." It appeared that Mr. Leduc was extending the confessor–penitent privilege to priestly confidences. It is curious that Mr. Leduc offered this opinion to Mr. Abell. I comment in Chapter 8, on the institutional response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, that the penitent–confessor privilege is not recognized in this province.

Mr. Bell and Mr. Leduc also spoke on October 15, 1993. Mr. Leduc made it clear to Mr. Bell, and later to CAS legal counsel Elizabeth MacLennan, that he intended to fully cooperate with the CAS investigation. Inscribed in Ms MacLennan's notes is the comment that "[h]e wanted to know if CAS was on a witch hunt or was there something to it. I said we felt there is definitely something to the allegation." Mr. Leduc also told Mr. Bell a few days later that he would try to encourage David Silmser to talk to the CAS.

Mr. Leduc met with Mr. Carriere, Mr. Bell, and Ms MacLennan on October 22, 1993. He gave the CAS the letter from Monsignor Schonenbach as well as other pertinent documents. Mr. Leduc indicated that Father MacDonald was receiving treatment at a facility for stress. He confirmed that the Diocese had not had contact with the Cornwall Police Service regarding the Silmsers' allegations of abuse.

At the second team meeting held by Mr. Abell, on October 29, 1993, the CAS executive director learned that the Bishop had made a commitment through his lawyer, Jacques Leduc, to give the CAS the necessary time to investigate the allegations. Mr. Abell, as I mentioned, was initially told that the CAS had only two weeks. He was now informed that Father MacDonald was not returning to his parish.

Mr. Bell stated that he was trying to arrange an interview with David Silmsers but that Mr. Silmsers was reluctant to speak with the CAS for fear of losing his settlement money. Discussions were taking place with the Diocese to ensure that Mr. Silmsers would not risk forfeiting the settlement money if he discussed the allegations of abuse with the CAS.

The CAS Meets With the Cornwall Police Service

On October 21, 1993, Mr. Carriere and Mr. Bell met with CPS Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet and Constable Heidi Sebalj. The CAS officials were told that the Cornwall Police Service had not investigated the allegations made against Ken Seguin. Mr. Carriere and Mr. Bell were also permitted to examine the statements of some alleged victims of Father MacDonald, but the identity of these individuals were not disclosed to them by the police. As a result, the CAS could not contact them.

Three statements in particular concerned Mr. Carriere. The first involved an individual who had known Father MacDonald, Mr. Carriere believed, from St. Columban's Parish. The priest had offered to drive the then eighteen-year-old home one evening, and he alleged that Father MacDonald had put his hand on his groin and asked him if it felt comfortable. The youth responded, "No," at which time the priest removed his hand. There was no further contact with the alleged victim. The second incident involved the sexual molestation of a youth who had had an overnight stay with Father MacDonald. The third statement that was of concern to Mr. Carriere stated that Father MacDonald showed pornographic magazines to two boys who were eleven or twelve years old. The individuals said that the priest kept the magazines under his bed. This raised two questions for Mr. Carriere:

... One is what they would be doing in Father Charlie's bedroom and why would Father Charlie be showing them pornographic magazines? And if they weren't in Father Charlie's bedroom how would they know that these magazines were kept under the bed? I mean, either they saw them there or they were told that they were kept under the bed, and one almost seems as bad as the other.

On November 4, 1993, Richard Abell had a second meeting with Staff Sergeant Derochie. The CPS officer told Mr. Abell that not only was he reviewing whether Constable Dunlop's disclosure of the Silmsers statement warranted charges under the Police Services Act, he was also conducting a review of the CPS investigation of the allegations of abuse by David Silmsers. Staff Sergeant Derochie asked the CAS executive director whether he had become aware of any problems in the earlier police investigation.

Mr. Abell would have wanted the CPS to have alerted the CAS to the Silmsers allegations when the police were investigating the matter. He told Staff Sergeant Derochie that the CAS and CPS needed to discuss the duty to report generally, and the obligation to report historical child abuse in particular. In Mr. Abell's view, it was essential that the two institutions have a common understanding of this issue.

The CAS Meets With David Silmsers

Mr. Carriere believed that the initial approach of the CAS towards David Silmsers required careful thought. In his view, it was important to convey the following to Mr. Silmsers:

1. that his allegations had credibility;
2. that he was playing an important role in helping to protect other children;
3. that there were also other possible victims; and
4. that both Ken Seguin and Father MacDonald were of concern to the CAS.

Mr. Carriere explained in his evidence that "we were coming out of an era where children weren't necessarily believed" and that "it was important to say that in the absence of any other information we should at least accept that what they may be telling has credibility."

Greg Bell called David Silmsers on October 28, 1993. Mr. Silmsers was surprised by the CAS contact and was concerned that the agency knew about his abuse.

Mr. Silmsner wanted to know who had disclosed the abuse to the CAS, but Mr. Bell replied that he could not reveal the identity of that person. Mr. Silmsner told Mr. Bell that he was prevented from discussing the abuse with the CAS because of the financial settlement that he had entered into with the Diocese. Mr. Bell told Mr. Silmsner that, pursuant to the Child and Family Services Act, the CAS had the right to pursue these allegations of abuse.

The following day, a team meeting was held, which was attended by Mr. Abell, Mr. Carriere, Mr. Bell, Ms DeBellis, and Ms MacLennan. It was agreed that Jacques Leduc, the lawyer representing the Diocese, should be asked for a copy of the financial settlement between the Church and Mr. Silmsner, as well as the reports from the Southdown facility on Father Charles MacDonald. Unlike the CPS, the CAS immediately found it prudent to attempt to obtain the settlement documents.

Mr. Leduc made it clear in a telephone call with the CAS on October 29, 1993, that the settlement agreement between the Diocese and David Silmsner was confidential and that it would not be provided to the agency. Malcolm MacDonald, Father MacDonald's lawyer, subsequently provided this information to the CAS.

David Silmsner was interviewed by the CAS on November 2, 1993. Mr. Bell and Ms DeBellis were present at the interview, which was audiotaped. The purpose of the meeting was to obtain information from Mr. Silmsner regarding his allegations of abuse and to ascertain the identity of other possible victims.

David Silmsner described the abuse he was subjected to by Father Charles MacDonald and Ken Seguin. David Silmsner told the CAS officials that he was about thirteen or fourteen years old when he was sexually abused by Mr. Seguin. He said that he was sexually abused in Mr. Seguin's home. As Mr. Carriere stated in his testimony, Mr. Seguin, a parole and probation officer, was clearly a person in a position of authority within the meaning of the Child and Family Services Act.

To the surprise of CAS officials, Mr. Silmsner also alleged in the November 2, 1993, interview that he had been sexually abused by a school teacher, Marcel Lalonde. This was the first time the CAS heard that Mr. Lalonde was an alleged perpetrator of child sexual abuse. To Mr. Carriere's knowledge, the Cornwall police had not informed the CAS of Constable Malloy's 1989 investigation of Marcel Lalonde for sexual abuse. However, it is important to note that the CAS also did not share with the CPS the information it learned on November 2 about Mr. Silmsner's allegation of abuse against Mr. Lalonde. Mr. Carriere agreed that, in retrospect, that would have been a "good idea": "We didn't think of that at the time but I think you know a closer liaison between two agencies and sharing information, I think it's a good idea." Nor did the CAS contact the School Board or Bishop Macdonell School, the school at which Marcel Lalonde was then teaching.

Mr. Bell testified that his interview with David Silmsner was consistent with his experience of other disclosures of historical child sexual abuse by adults: "there was a tenor sort of of anguish.” It was evident that coming to the CAS office and speaking with CAS workers about his abuse as a child was a “struggle” for Mr. Silmsen, who had difficulty describing the full details of the sexual abuse to which he was allegedly subjected: “they were painful recollections.” Mr. Silmsen was clearly agitated with regard to the Diocese. He was also agitated with regard to the Cornwall police, as he stated that he had been waiting for nine months for the police force to take action on his complaints of sexual abuse.

At the November 4, 1993, CAS team meeting, Greg Bell and Pina DeBellis briefed the group on the Silmsen interview. Inscribed in Mr. Abell’s notes is that David Silmsen “presented credibly.” It is of significance that, in his notes, there is no mention that Mr. Silmsen alleged that school teacher Marcel Lalonde had also abused him.

Mr. Abell was not aware that the Cornwall police had received complaints of child sexual abuse by alleged perpetrator Marcel Lalonde in 1988. The CAS executive director testified that, had the CPS informed him of these complaints, it may have influenced his decision to investigate the Lalonde matter further or notify the school or School Board when Greg Bell eventually informed him of this allegation on December 17, 1993.

David Silmsen alleged in the November 1993 interview with Greg Bell and Ms DeBellis that Marcel Lalonde had sexually abused him. Mr. Silmsen stated that Mr. Lalonde had taught grade 8 students at Bishop Macdonell School and that he believed that Mr. Lalonde was still teaching. The CAS knew that Marcel Lalonde, as a schoolteacher, would be in contact with many children. Yet, the CAS made a decision not to take any action to confirm this information, alert the educational institution, initiate an investigation, or contact the School Board. In my opinion, the CAS should have notified the School Board that an allegation of historical sexual abuse had been made against Marcel Lalonde. Today, this situation would require that the School Board be notified pursuant to the 2001 Eastern Zone Child Protection Protocol.

Mr. Bell testified that the November 2, 1993, interview was the only in-person interview of David Silmsen. Mr. Bell spoke to Mr. Silmsen on November 4 and November 9, 1993, hoping that he would meet again with the CAS to provide further details of the alleged abuse by Ken Seguin and Marcel Lalonde. An interview was set up for November 16, 1993, but Mr. Silmsen did not appear. Mr. Bell contacted him by telephone and stressed that, by speaking with the CAS, Mr. Silmsen would be helping protect other children at risk of abuse.

Late in November 1993, Ken Seguin committed suicide. At that time, the CAS had not yet initiated its investigation of Mr. Seguin. After Mr. Seguin’s death, David Silmsen would not discuss with Mr. Bell the details of the alleged acts of abuse to which he had been subjected in his youth. Mr. Silmsen told the CAS worker, “I don’t want another death on my conscience.” Mr. Bell testified that he thought that Mr. Seguin’s death likely had an impact on Mr. Silmsner’s unwillingness to disclose the details of the alleged abuse by Marcel Lalonde.

CAS officials such as Bill Carriere claimed that, before his suicide, the CAS had had insufficient information on the alleged abuse by Mr. Seguin and therefore had not wanted to launch an investigation and expose the agency to civil liability or possibly destroy Mr. Seguin’s career. Mr. Carriere stated that, had the CAS possessed additional information, it would have contacted Mr. Seguin’s employer at the Cornwall Probation Office and/or the Ministry of Correctional Services to notify them that Mr. Seguin might be a risk to young probationers. But this was all in hindsight. The CAS never investigated Mr. Seguin and did not notify the Ministry of Correctional Services.

Interviews of Altar Servers

After receiving from the Diocese the names of altar servers currently at St. Andrew’s Parish, Mr. Bell began to contact the boys’ families in mid-November 1993 to ask permission to interview the children. Mr. Bell simply told the parents that the CAS was conducting an investigation, and did not disclose that it concerned allegations of abuse by Father Charles MacDonald. The majority of parents permitted the CAS to interview their children. Mr. Bell and Ms DeBellis interviewed the children alone, without the presence of their parents. They used the Stepwise procedure and statement validity analysis to assess the veracity of statements made by the children in the interviews. None of the current altar servers interviewed from St. Andrew’s Parish disclosed that they had been abused by Father Charles MacDonald.

Contact With Helen and Perry Dunlop

Helen Dunlop came to the CAS office on November 16, 1993, to give Mr. Bell information on Father MacDonald and St. Andrew’s Parish. Constable Dunlop met with Mr. Bell that afternoon. The CPS constable offered to give Mr. Bell leads of people who should be interviewed in the CAS investigation. They agreed to arrange a further meeting at which Constable Dunlop would bring his notes. At the CAS team meeting the following day, it was decided that, if Constable Dunlop was providing the CAS with official information in his capacity as a police officer, the CPS should be notified. When contacted about this issue by Mr. Bell, Constable Dunlop immediately agreed and suggested that the CAS contact Staff Sergeant Derochie. The Staff Sergeant had no problems with Constable Dunlop engaging in such discussions with the Children’s Aid Society.

At the November 29, 1993, meeting with Mr. Bell and Ms DeBellis, Perry Dunlop informed the CAS that Detective Constables Randy Millar and Chris McDonell of the OPP Lancaster Detachment were investigating Ken Seguin's suicide and possibly the issue of extortion. Constable Dunlop told Mr. Bell that there was a pedophile ring. Inscribed in Mr. Bell's notes is the following statement: "[T]here are other perpetrators involved in a ring and we will be hearing about them and this includes Malcolm MacDonald."

On November 30, 1993, Mr. Bell received documents from Malcolm MacDonald, which included some of the documents involved in the financial settlement between the Diocese and David Silmser. They included a copy of the release and undertaking not to disclose, the settlement document, the certificate of independent legal advice, as well as a report from Southdown on Father MacDonald. Malcolm MacDonald asked the CAS for an undertaking that the material provided would remain confidential and be returned to him once the agency no longer required the documents.

Mr. Bell made contact with the OPP and spoke to Officer Ron Wilson on December 14, 1993. The OPP officer related that he had spoken the previous week to David Silmser, who had made it clear that he did not want to have anything to do with the police—either the OPP or the Cornwall Police Service. Mr. Silmser told Officer Wilson that Father MacDonald and Ken Seguin had abused him, but did not mention his former teacher, Marcel Lalonde.

The CAS made a number of attempts in December 1993 and January 1994 to follow up with Constable Dunlop. A number of messages were left, but there was no response. Mr. Carriere instructed Mr. Bell to stress to Constable Dunlop his statutory reporting obligation under the Child and Family Services Act. Mr. Bell made contact with the Constable on January 13, 1994, and communicated the officer's statutory obligations, but Constable Dunlop neither conveyed further information nor had further discussions with the CAS about the allegations of abuse against Father Charles MacDonald. At a team meeting on January 31, 1994, the CAS officials involved in Project Blue decided not to pursue Constable Dunlop any further.

Failed Attempt to Interview Father MacDonald

As part of the CAS investigation, Mr. Bell attempted to meet with the alleged perpetrator, Father Charles MacDonald. On January 25, 1994, the CAS sent a letter asking the priest if he would like to meet with the CAS to provide his account of events pertaining to the allegations of child sexual abuse. In this correspondence to Father MacDonald, it was made clear that a decision would be made by the CAS, pursuant to section 75(3) of the Child and Family Services Act, whether the “allegations are verified and thus reportable to the Child Abuse Register.” The CAS asked Father MacDonald to:

... respond to the following questions as truthfully, accurately and in as much detail as possible:

- 1) Have you every [sic] sexually abused a child or children under the age of sixteen years?
- 2) If the answer to #1 is yes, please provide full details of this event.

On January 31, 1994, the CAS received a handwritten note from Father MacDonald, which had been inscribed on the CAS letter. It said:

Jan. 31/94

My answer to the above question (#1) is an emphatic No!

David Silmser's Allegations of Abuse Are Broadcast on Television: Distrust of Institutions Deepens

In late December 1993, Charlie Greenwell, a television reporter from CJOH, a local television station, tried to contact the executive director of the CAS of SD&G to discuss allegations of abuse by both David Silmser and Jeannette Antoine. Mr. Greenwell told Mr. Abell in a call on December 29, 1993, that there had been a $35,000 payoff in the settlement of David Silmser. He also discussed Ken Seguin's death, the fact that the police had not pursued the investigation of the allegations of abuse against Mr. Seguin, and that other boys may have been involved. Mr. Greenwell wanted to know the position of the CAS with regard to allegations by adults that they had been abused as children—in other words, the position of the agency with respect to historical child abuse. Inscribed in Mr. Abell's notes of the call with Mr. Greenwell was the comment “Allegations of coverup for long time in the community.”

About a week after this call, on January 6, 1994, a broadcast of Mr. Greenwell's report on the Silmser allegations appeared on television on CJOH. Portions of the handwritten statement that David Silmser had given to the police in February 1993 were broadcast on television.

On January 6, 1994, after the broadcast, Mr. Abell received a call from his predecessor, Tom O'Brien, as well as from former police chief Shaver and Staff Sergeant Wells.

Tom O'Brien, who rarely called Mr. Abell, was upset. He told Mr. Abell that he was contacting him “as a Catholic” community member and relayed that he knew another alleged victim. It was not clear to Mr. Abell whether Father MacDonald was the alleged perpetrator of abuse against this victim, but the executive director of the CAS did not ask Mr. O'Brien for further details.

Staff Sergeant Brendon Wells, professional standards officer at the Cornwall police, also contacted Mr. Abell. Mr. Greenwell had called the CPS officer asking him if new victims of Father MacDonald had come forward. Mr. Abell told Staff Sergeant Wells that the CAS had not received any calls that day from other alleged victims of the priest. Retired police chief Shaver also spoke to Mr. Abell on January 6, 1994. He was concerned that the quotes and facts in the media were inaccurate.

The following day, David Silmsers, distressed by the reports in the media, telephoned Mr. Abell. He did not know who had released his statement to the media—the CAS, the CPS, or another institution, or a person. It was very evident that David Silmsers had lost trust in the Children's Aid Society and in institutions in general. As Mr. Abell said at the hearings, "he was very upset, very angry and I think he didn't know where to turn or who to trust." This is consistent with the testimony I heard from David Silmsers. Mr. Bell commented that, "[i]n an ongoing sense, his trust in institutions, which was fragile I think to start with, was injured by that experience."

Charlie Greenwell contacted Mr. Abell on January 7, 1994. The CAS executive director told the reporter that he had been misquoted by taking general information elicited from Mr. Abell and applying it to the particulars of the Silmsers case. Mr. Abell "felt he had crossed the line."

In his testimony, Mr. Abell agreed that the media stories in 1994 about David Silmsers and the allegations of cover-up by several institutions in Cornwall had an impact on David Silmsers's relationship with the Children's Aid Society. As Mr. Abell said, Mr. Silmsers "was devastated by the release of that statement."

As I discussed in Chapter 8, on the institutional response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, there was a press release on the case from the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall at that time, and several articles in the Cornwall Standard-Freeholder.

Mr. Abell released a media statement on January 10, 1994. He described the mandate of the CAS with regard to children under the age of sixteen and made it clear that the agency was interested in historical allegations of child abuse by adults, as children in the community could be at risk of abuse by the alleged perpetrator. The media statement read in part:

The mandate of the Children's Aid Society of S.D. & G. is to respond to information that children (i.e., individuals who have not yet reached their sixteenth birthday) have, or may have, been abused. However, the Society has a strong interest in the community's response to allegations by adults that they were abused as children, as those allegations may pertain to the present or future abuse of children. The Society is also interested in providing support and direction to adult victims of abuse when feasible.

Child abuse victims of any age deserve a full opportunity to make their experience known, and to have appropriate action taken on their behalf. Without such an opportunity there is little likelihood that victims will be able to overcome the profound personal effects of their abuse experience.

The community as a whole has a right to expect that all available public resources are being brought to bear on any instances of child abuse which come to light.

Alleged perpetrators deserve the chance to have an objective and competent enquiry into the accusations made against them. As with victims, there will be little likelihood of abusers receiving professional assistance to face and overcome their abusive behaviours without a full airing of the circumstances.

Lastly, it is a well established fact that child abuse which is left unaddressed creates an environment in which all too often other children are destined to suffer the same destructive experience, and thus sow the seeds for still more abuse of future generations.

Mr. Abell testified that, in his view, the CAS should be notified of allegations of historical child abuse by a member of the clergy if the alleged perpetrator continued to have contact with children. This, he said, was consistent with his approach in Project Blue.

“Verification” of Abuse by Father MacDonald

It was at the February 17, 1994, meeting that the CAS officials involved in the Project Blue investigation verified the sexual abuse of David Silmser by Father Charles MacDonald.

As explained by Mr. Bell, some of the factors that led the CAS to verify the abuse by Father MacDonald were:

- a) written police statement—sufficiently credible not to be dismissed
- b) interview w/ D. Silmsner
- c) Msgr. S. in correspondence dated [December 11, 1992] states “D.S. appears to be a credible person”
- d) Silmsner personal statement is consistent with the written statement provided substantially earlier (10 month gap)[.] Silmsner’s personal presentation to agency staff was highly consistent [with] our experience of disclosure behaviours of other verified victims of sexual abuse.
- e) A considerable financial settlement was made to the alleged victim, a sizeable portion of which was contributed by the accused.
- f) The diocese has stated it made the financial settlement to meet the treatment needs of the alleged victim suggesting that they recognized the validity of his claim and their liability for same.
- g) There are other statements relating sexual assaults of young men by Father Charles MacDonald.
- h) Father Charles MacDonald has admitted to having sexual relations with young males.
- i) We have been informed by Msgr. McDougal [sic] that the diocese received an anon. allegation against Fth. MacDonald of an alleged sexual impropriety, which was denied by Fth. Charles.

At the February 17, 1994 CAS meeting, potential risk factors were also listed:

- there is child/victim of Fth. Charlie
- there are other young (adolescent) victims of Fth. Charlie
- Fth. Charlie therefore represents a potential risk to children/male adolescents
- the church should consider carefully the potential risks to children/male adolescents posed by Fth. Charlie.

Thus, the CAS and Project Blue concluded that there was truth to the allegation of child sexual abuse by Father Charles MacDonald of David Silmsner.

After the verification decision was made, the CAS sent letters to the Cornwall Police Service and the Ontario Provincial Police informing them about the outcome of its decision.

The CAS wanted to send a letter to Father Charles MacDonald’s “employer,” Bishop LaRocque, to ensure that he understood the potential risk this priest posed to children. The Bishop was responsible for assigning members of the clergy to various duties, and the CAS wanted to ensure that he took the necessary measures to protect children. The CAS therefore sought the consent of Father MacDonald to send this information to the Bishop. Greg Bell explained that the same situation applied to teachers alleged to have abused their students. In circumstances in which the CAS verified the abuse, the agency would seek the permission of the teacher to notify his or her school or School Board of the verification decision. Greg Bell stated that when the teacher, clergyman, or other person under CAS investigation did not give their consent to the CAS to notify their respective employer, the agency was placed in a very difficult and awkward position. Mr. Bell explained that, if the CAS notified the employer in the absence of consent, the agency would be violating the individual's right of privacy. But if the CAS failed to advise the employer that it verified abuse of a child, the perpetrator could abuse another young person. He stated that the agency has "agonized" over such issues and that these decisions were complicated from a legal perspective.

In fact, there was a substantial delay in obtaining the consent of Father Charles MacDonald to allow the CAS to notify the Bishop of its verification decision. It was not until the end of November 1994 that the CAS received the consent of Father MacDonald through his lawyer, Malcolm MacDonald, to advise Bishop LaRocque of the conclusion of the Project Blue investigation. The letter to the Diocese, which was sent in January 1995, stated in part:

Based on our investigation of the allegations, we have reached the position that there are reasonable and probable grounds to believe that the abuse of a child did occur. Our view is supported by the result of our inquiries into this specific allegation, as well as statements of other individuals who claim victimization by Father MacDonald.

Given this position, and in the absence of a full sexual behaviours assessment of Father MacDonald, it is our view that he may present a risk to children and young adults under his care and control. We are therefore concerned that any further assignment of Father MacDonald in the Diocese be done with this information in mind.

Although the Bishop was fully aware of the allegations against Father MacDonald, the CAS still felt it was necessary to obtain the consent of Father MacDonald in order to tell the Bishop that it had verified the abuse. I fail to understand why the CAS felt it was necessary to obtain Father MacDonald's consent. Mr. Abell testified that he is not aware of any guideline standards or legislation that requires the CAS to notify an employer once an allegation of abuse has been verified by the CAS. Mr. Bell also stated that he is not aware of any standards that guide the CAS as to the circumstances in which an employer should be notified. I will discuss the issue of notification of employers in the conclusion to this chapter.

It is important to note that the CAS did not contact the registrar of the Sexual Abuse Register after the CAS verification decision, namely that Father Charles MacDonald sexually abused David Silmser. There is a mandatory obligation that, if the abuse is verified, the CAS file this information in a report with the registrar. In my opinion, the CAS should have registered Father MacDonald's name on the Child Abuse Register.

As I discuss in the following chapters, the OPP issued a press release in December 1994 that criminal charges against the Cornwall priest would not be pursued.

The final CAS team meeting on Project Blue was on March 27, 1995.

Another Alleged Victim of Father MacDonald: John MacDonald

In August 1995, Father Kevin Maloney, a priest in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, advised Richard Abell that he had received a letter from John MacDonald, who alleged that he also was a victim of abuse by Father Charles MacDonald.

On August 21, 1995, Mr. Abell received a call from David Silmser. He said that another former altar boy, John MacDonald, had also been a victim of abuse by Father MacDonald. Mr. Silmser expressed relief that another victim of abuse had come forward because he "thought he was the only one." Mr. Silmser also said that there was yet another victim, but that he did not want to come forward.

Mr. Abell met with John MacDonald on September 25, 1995.

Mr. Abell contacted Inspector Tim Smith to relay that John MacDonald would willingly discuss his allegations with the Ontario Provincial Police. Mr. Abell also spoke to Bishop LaRocque about providing counselling for John MacDonald. Mr. Abell testified that he was "pleasantly surprised" that the Bishop was very forthcoming in quickly agreeing to fund counselling for John MacDonald.

Ottawa Police Service Investigates

During the course of the Project Blue investigation, Staff Sergeant Blake of the Ottawa Police Service met with Richard Abell on January 18, 1994. As I mentioned in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service, the Ottawa police, an external police force, was reviewing the investigation by the CPS of the Silmser complaint. Staff Sergeant Blake asked Mr. Abell whether, in his view, there was a cover-up of the Silmser allegations of abuse. Mr. Abell replied that, although this possibility had crossed his mind, he had not seen any evidence to substantiate a cover-up.

Reflections on Project Blue

The decision by Richard Abell and his senior managers to commence the Project Blue investigation in October 1993 was a good one. He and his peers were concerned that there may be other children at risk of abuse by Father Charles MacDonald, who was in active ministry at the time. The team he assembled was clearly qualified to do the work assigned and, with few exceptions, did this work in a thorough and efficient manner.

Early on in this investigation, the CAS attempted to get the CPS to re-open its investigation and, when that failed, tried the same with the OPP. The CAS then carried out its child protection investigation without a concurrent police investigation. The CAS investigators asked for the settlement release and other documentation shortly after commencing Project Blue. They also interviewed as many current altar servers as were willing to meet with them.

They verified, in accordance with their mandate, the allegation of child sexual abuse of David Silmsr by Father Charles MacDonald. None of the current altar servers they interviewed reported abuse allegations. In their verification letter to the priest's employer, they outlined that the priest "may present a risk to children and young adults under his care and control" and thus expressed concern about any further assignment of him to priestly duties.

As I have noted, there were some aspects of this institutional response that could have been approached differently. When the Project Blue investigators first heard from David Silmsr about his allegations against teacher Marcel Lalonde, they should have contacted the CPS. Mr. Carriere acknowledged this. In hindsight, I am of the view that the CAS should have contacted his Mr. Lalonde's employer, as he was a teacher employed in a position of trust with constant access to children. Unfortunately, even when the CPS became aware of Mr. Silmsr's allegations against Marcel Lalonde, its officers did not recall prior allegations against him from the late 1980s. In addition, when Detective Inspector Tim Smith interviewed David Silmsr in February 1994 and gleaned further information about Mr. Silmsr's allegations against Marcel Lalonde, he did not share this information with the CAS. These problems are discussed in Chapter 6, on the CPS, and Chapter 7, on the OPP, respectively. I have no doubt that if this information had been shared with the CAS, its investigators would have notified the School Board and investigated Marcel Lalonde in 1994.

During the Project Blue investigation, Constable Dunlop advised Mr. Bell that there was a pedophile ring operating in the Cornwall area. A number of attempts were made to obtain further information from Constable Dunlop, including notifying him of his statutory obligations. His non-reporting is curious to say the least, given his initial report. Although CAS officials did try repeatedly to have Constable Dunlop comply with his statutory responsibilities, in hindsight they should have continued their efforts beyond January 31, 1994.

Mr. Abell testified about his discussion with Mr. O'Brien and his information about a further victim. Whether this was a further alleged victim of Father MacDonald or simply related to that case, I agree with Mr. Abell's acknowledgment that he should have explored this issue further with Mr. O'Brien.

After the CAS "verified" Mr. Silmsen's allegations of abuse, it did not contact the registrar of the Child Abuse Register. While the value of the registry has been questioned, and I discuss this in the introductory sections of this chapter, the practice back in 1994 was that, if abuse was verified, the verified abuser's name would be given to the Register. This process was not followed with regard to Father MacDonald and it should have been.

Some might argue that Project Blue should have questioned former altar boys in addition to current ones. While this may have turned up other allegations and led to the provision of counselling and other support to more alleged victims, I do not fault the CAS for restricting its investigation. Its mandate is to determine if children are currently at risk. The interviewing of former altar boys was for the police to do in their investigation of the criminal complaints.

In closing, the decision by Constable Dunlop to report the historical sexual abuse allegations and the decision of the CAS to act upon them and conduct a full investigation were, in my view, correct. Historical allegations, like current ones, should be covered by the duty to report provisions in all circumstances in which the alleged perpetrator continues to be a potential risk to children.

Relationship Between CAS and Project Truth Investigators

The relationship and interactions between the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS of SD&G) and the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) are described in Chapter 7 in the section dealing with the initial plan for Project Truth. I have heard the evidence of both Richard Abell and Detective Inspector Tim Smith about their initial meeting and the ongoing interactions between them and their agencies during the Project Truth investigation. Both Detective Inspector Smith and Mr. Abell had positive things to say about each other and also about the nature of their ongoing working relationship.

Within days of completing their investigative plan for Project Truth, Detective Inspector Smith, together with Detective Constables Steve Seguin and Don Genier, had an initial meeting on May 21, 1997, with Mr. Abell and his colleague Bill Carriere. From all accounts, the first meeting was a good exchange of ideas and information. The CAS officials were apprised of the OPP's plan for its investigation and, in keeping with this, a copy of the Fantino Brief was left with CAS officials for their review. Both Mr. Abell and Detective Inspector Smith took notes of the meeting. Mr. Abell's notes set out most of the decisions made by the parties, and these are set out in detail in the OPP chapter, as mentioned above.

I noted the acknowledgment by both Detective Inspector Smith and Mr. Abell in their testimony that the informal protocol they entered into that day should have been put in writing and formalized. Several of the ongoing tasks agreed to, in particular commitments by the OPP, were not carried through. Having a formal protocol or letter of understanding would, in my view, have made full compliance with these tasks more likely.

Although information was shared by Project Truth officers with CAS officials at or around the time of some arrests, more information should have been shared with the CAS, and information that was shared could have been shared in a more timely fashion. If the OPP had systematically informed the CAS of all Project Truth suspects, the CAS could have better assessed whether there were children at risk. In addition, fully informing the CAS would have allowed the agency to assist victims and alleged victims and keep children out of harm's way.

Developing and instituting a more formal protocol was the responsibility of both institutions. In the case of the Project Truth investigation, I am of the view that the CAS should have instituted more formal protocols and procedures to assure more effective cooperation and communication during the course of the Project Truth investigation. As I note in Chapter 6, some of the allegations against Jean Luc Leblanc and Jacques Leduc were current. Although some information was shared, more could have been done, and joint investigations might have resulted.

As I indicated in the development of protocols section, in the past, the CAS of SD&G had access to excellent joint police-CAS training offered by the Institute for the Prevention of Child Abuse and by the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies. This valuable training ceased to be available in 1995. In my view, it is imperative that joint training between social workers and police officers be re-instituted in Ontario. The training should incorporate training on reports of historical sexual abuse.

C-14 was born July 20, 1962. His father suffered from poor health and his mother was unable to care for her four children. The children were therefore brought into the care of the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS of SD&G) in 1972. C-14 became a permanent Crown ward in 1974. Prior to coming into the care of the CAS of SD&G, C-14 was in the care of the Ottawa CAS. Between 1972 and 1980, C-14 was placed in ten different foster or group homes. None of C-14's siblings were placed in the same homes as he was. C-14 had various CAS workers who were responsible for his file while he was in the agency's care. Angelo Towndale, who became a supervisor in 1969, remained the supervisor responsible for C-14's file throughout his wardship.

C-14 alleged that he was physically and sexually abused multiple times as a child while in the care of the CAS. He reported these allegations to the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) in Morrisburg and later to Project Truth. This section will consider the institutional response of the CAS of SD&G to the reported allegations of abuse made by C-14 and his request for access to his file.

The Barber Foster Home

C-14 was initially placed in a foster home run by Ken and Muriel Barber in June 1972. He was almost ten years old. The Barbers had no children of their own but they had a number of foster children. Arthur Sypes, a twenty-three-year-old mentally challenged man, was also living at the Barbers. He had been released from a long-term-care facility in Smiths Falls into the Barbers' care and was living with them full-time and doing work on their farm.

Ms Barber had been previously married, with the surname Lewis. She and her first husband had been foster parents, but the home was closed shortly after Mr. Lewis suddenly died. Ms Lewis remarried and became Ms Barber.

C-14 Alleges Physical Abuse by the Barbers

When he came to the Barber home, C-14 was "very frightened" of the foster father because he had a "very terse attitude." Initially things were fine. C-14 testified that approximately one month after he came to the home, another foster child, "Ronny," was beaten by Mr. Barber on the bed with a thrasher belt. C-14 was nearby at the time, and he said Mr. Barber hit him (C-14) across the legs with the belt. There were other occasions when C-14 witnessed Mr. Barber beat this other boy, and he also recalled that this boy made many attempts to run away.

According to C-14, his physical abuse by Mr. and Ms Barber started after he had been at the home for approximately one month. Some of his allegations of abuse include:

- being kicked in the testicles with steel-toed work boots;
- being beaten on the head with a hardwood brush handle until on the verge of nausea;
- being chased around with horsewhips and sometimes cornered;
- being whipped on the face, arms, and testicles with what resembled a razor strap or part of a thrasher belt;
- Mrs. Barber backing him into the corner, stepping on his feet, and punching him in the face or raking his face with her rings.

C-14 also alleged that on one occasion when he was doing chores, Mr. Barber flew into a rage and chased him out the back of the barn near the manure pile, where C-14 fell in a pool of cow urine and inhaled it into his lungs. C-14 believed he contracted pneumonia as a result. He spent approximately two weeks in the Winchester Memorial Hospital but was unable to explain to anybody what was happening at the foster home. According to C-14, Ms Barber told him that he should not say anything that might embarrass her publicly.

C-14 testified that there were many times when there were marks on his body from the abuse, and that these marks would have been observed by other children in the home. C-14 believed that he went to see a doctor who saw the markings, but that Ms Barber was extremely domineering and was always in the room with him during medical appointments. When the doctor tried to raise the issue of the marks, she explained them by saying he was clumsy.

C-14 Alleges Sexual Abuse by Arthur Sypes

In addition to the physical abuse by the Barbers, C-14 alleged he was sexually abused by Arthur Sypes while in the Barber home. C-14 testified that the sexual abuse began shortly after he came into the home. He explained that he was often left in the care of Mr. Sypes when the foster parents went to social functions. According to C-14, Mr. Sypes would chase him around the house, pin him to the ground, and fondle his genitals. C-14 testified that the abuse occurred until he was approximately fourteen years old, at which point he had grown much bigger and could defend himself. One time when Mr. Sypes tried to chase him, C-14 turned and chased him until Mr. Sypes barricaded himself in the bathroom. There were no further attempts at abuse by Mr. Sypes after this incident, although C-14 still had to sleep in the same room as him. He testified that the sleeping arrangements were “very nerve-wracking.”

C-14 testified that he tried to run away from the home many times. Although he was not picked up, he had to return, as he had overheard a conversation between his first CAS worker and the foster parents that he would not get another placement but would only be brought back to the Barbers’ again.

Interactions With the CAS While at the Barber Foster Home

Jim Wylie was C-14's first social worker after he had been placed in the Barber home. C-14 testified that, when he was taken into the Barber home, Mr. Wylie made it clear that he was to be treated with a "heavy hand"; the family was told not to spare the rod. C-14 said he overheard Mr. Wylie talking to Ms Barber, and she was told that even if C-14 asked for another placement he wouldn't be given one. In his case notes, Mr. Wylie noted that C-14 was manipulative and would request a move during difficult situations. According to the notes, Mr. Wylie advised C-14 that it would not be possible to be moved to another placement, and that he would not be returning home for some time. In my view, telling a child that he would not be moved regardless of the circumstances of the request could discourage children from reporting abuse, as they might believe that they would be returned to the home regardless. Although I appreciate that children may request a new placement for reasons other than abuse, and that such requests cannot for many reasons be accommodated, the possibility of removal from a foster home should never be explicitly precluded.

Mr. Wylie was C-14's worker for just over one month. Rod Rabey was C-14's second worker. According to C-14, their relationship was initially very good, and, in fact, Mr. Rabey had referred to him as the "icing on the cake," meaning that C-14 was helpful and a model child. C-14 recalled that Mr. Rabey came to the house from time to time, but he was more focused on speaking with the foster mother than speaking with him. According to C-14, Mr. Rabey would see him when he came to the house but not without the foster mother being present.

C-14 testified that he never spoke to Mr. Rabey about the sexual abuse at the Barber home but did tell him that he was strapped. According to C-14, Mr. Rabey met with him at school and asked him whether Mr. Barber struck him with a strap, and C-14 told him about the abuse with the strap. C-14 did not tell him anything else about what happened to him in the Barber home. Nothing else was asked, and C-14 did not volunteer further information. He testified that he felt good that he had finally told somebody about the abuse. He believed, however, that nothing was done about it. C-14 said that when he arrived home that day, Mr. Rabey was in the living room talking with Ms Barber. Mr. Rabey gave him a lecture about how he should not exaggerate and said that C-14 was doing these things to receive attention.

Case notes recorded by Mr. Rabey indicate that visits with C-14 were monthly and were conducted both at home and at school. According to C-14, however, Mr. Rabey saw him only once at the school. He contended that this was the only time Mr. Rabey saw him without his foster mother present. C-14 acknowledged that he had the opportunity to see Mr. Rabey in private at a summer camp run by the CAS. He explained that there had been an incident that discouraged him from talking to Mr. Rabey. In consoling a boy who had been slapped by other kids, C-14 told him he had been beaten by his foster father. A counsellor brought this to the attention of Mr. Rabey, who dismissed it and told the counsellor that C-14 tended to exaggerate things. Following this, C-14 would not confide in Mr. Rabey.

In September 1974, Bryan Keough became C-14's worker. According to C-14, he visited the home from time to time but never saw C-14 without the foster mother present. C-14 described these meetings as follows:

By then, I had been severely abused and I was a very impulsive child. I was acting out because of the abuse, the sexual abuse, the physical abuse.

The meetings were more like tribunals. Both Mrs. Barber and Mr. Keough would sit at opposing ends of the kitchen table. I would sit in the middle. I would be chided over my poor behaviour and I would be blamed for everything.

... If I tried to respond to anything, Mrs. Barber would put words in my mouth. She would finish my sentences.

C-14 recalled that he would get into screaming matches with Ms Barber, and she would call Mr. Keough, who told C-14 that he would be eighteen soon and should not rock the boat. He was told that when he was on his own he could do whatever he pleased, but for the time being he was just to bear it. C-14 was around fourteen years old at the time. C-14 also testified that Mr. Keough told Ms Barber to give him a good slap on the face and that, on another occasion, Mr. Keough told the foster mother, "knock his f'ing teeth down his throat until he learns to shut his mouth." When Mr. Keough testified, he denied that he had said either of these things.

Although Mr. Keough recalled many emotional discussions at the kitchen table in the Barber home, during which they would discuss C-14's behaviour and Ms Barber would often interrupt C-14 while he was speaking, he denied that he never saw C-14 alone. Mr. Keough's case notes indicate: "The foster parents and young lad have been visited approximately every month during the above period. On a number of these occasion [sic] I saw both the foster mother and [C-14] together and then separately." In a previous section of this chapter, I comment on the importance on the CAS workers conducting visits outside of the foster homes.

The following comment was made in Mr. Keough's case notes:

Mr. and Mrs. Barber are very fair, loving, firm foster parents. This is not always to [C-14's] advantage, at least immediate advantage, especially when he gets a good slap, however it is geared to his positive progress. They need Agency support and backing and have a low breaking point ...

Mr. Keough further noted that at times the punishment was too harsh for the wrongdoing committed.

C-14 testified that it would have been helpful when he was a child in the care of the Barbers to have someone independent of the Barbers and the CAS whom he could speak to and inform about what was happening to him. For example, if there had been an ombudsman or a group separate from the CAS that was looking after his interests, C-14 would have contacted them.

Effects of the Abuse at the Barbers

C-14 testified that, while at the Barbers, he "gave up on school" and stopped studying. Although he felt the teachers knew something was wrong, he acknowledged that he did not discuss the problems he was having at the Barbers with any of his teachers. As a result of being hit on the head a number of times, C-14 testified that he started suffering from chronic migraine headaches and still suffers from them today.

C-14 was removed from the Barber home on August 29, 1977, at both his and the foster parents' request. According to the case notes, there was an unannounced visit by C-14's mother and one his brothers following which "all hell broke loose," and both C-14 and the foster parents requested that he be moved.

The Hubert Foster Home

C-14 was placed in a foster home run by Mr. and Ms Hubert from late August 1977 to March 1978. Bryan Keough remained his worker. There was no physical or sexual abuse at this home. However, while at the Huberts he disclosed the physical abuse he alleges that he suffered at the Barbers'.

C-14 Discloses Abuse by the Barbers to the Huberts

C-14 testified that, shortly after arriving at the Hubert home, he told Ms Hubert about some of the incidents of abuse at the Barber foster home. He thought that, initially, Ms Hubert believed his stories were incredible, but she questioned him regularly and remarked that his stories never seemed to change. According to

C-14, at one point, he showed her bruises he had on his back from a beating he had received before leaving the Barber home.

C-14 did not tell Ms Hubert about the sexual abuse. He said that this was because when he had tried to talk about the physical abuse with his previous worker, Rod Rabey, nothing had been done and he was ridiculed for the allegations. In addition, C-14 felt a lot of anxiety, guilt, and shame with respect to the sexual abuse. He testified that the attitude prevailing at the time—that children were not to be believed—made it difficult to disclose the sexual abuse: “If someone would have listened to what I was saying about the physical abuse, it was only a matter of time before the sexual abuse would have been disclosed.”

The CAS Is Advised of Abuse

Shortly after C-14's disclosure to Ms Hubert, there was a meeting between C-14, Ms Hubert, and Mr. Keough to discuss the allegations of physical abuse at the Barbers'. C-14 reported the details of the physical abuse to Mr. Keough, including that he had been kicked with steel-toed boots, horsewhipped, robbed of his clothing money, and not taken care of when ill.

Bryan Keough recalled that C-14 was extremely aggressive towards him. C-14 alleged he had been the victim of systematic abuse in the Barber home for years, and he was very upset that Mr. Keough had not picked up on it. He requested a new social worker. Mr. Keough testified that this was the first time that he had been made aware of the alleged abuse. Although he had had concerns, which were noted in the file, that some of the Barbers' discipline was too harsh, he testified that C-14 never spoke to him about the things he spoke about during the meeting on November 22, 1977.

According to Mr. Keough, he told C-14 that, if what he alleged were true, then he was justified in requesting an investigation and a new social worker because Mr. Keough had failed him. During this meeting, C-14 advised Mr. Keough that his supervisors were already aware of the allegations. Mr. Keough was surprised by this. At the time, Mr. Keough's superior was Angelo Towndale.

In September or October 1977, Mr. Towndale had arranged to have a questionnaire sent to all teenagers in care regarding how they were being treated in foster care. One of the reasons for the questionnaire was what had been happening in the Second Street group home. Mr. Towndale wanted to find out if this type of physical punishment was occurring in other places.

C-14 filled out the questionnaire. Mr. Towndale testified that he was upset when he read the report. He recalled speaking to the foster mother, Ms Hubert, and then to C-14. According to Mr. Towndale, he told C-14 that he believed him, that the treatment he received was not justified, and that the Barber foster home would no longer be used. Mr. Towndale said he encouraged C-14 to speak to Mr. Keough about his allegations. There were no allegations of sexual abuse in the questionnaire completed by C-14.

Mr. Keough was upset that Mr. Towndale had not advised him of the allegations. He felt that, if he had known, he would have been better prepared for the meeting with C-14 in November 1977. Mr. Towndale testified that he did not speak to Mr. Keough himself because he received the information the day before he was leaving on holidays, but that he had directed Mary Gratton to inform Mr. Keough and the executive director, Tom O'Brien.

Although I applaud Mr. Towndale's initiative in sending this type of questionnaire to children in care following the allegations of abuse coming out of the Second Street group home, it is important that the frontline workers, who work directly with the children, be advised of such initiatives and any outcomes.

In addition to Ms Hubert and Bryan Keough, C-14 also spoke to Ms Gratton, who was a foster home finder, and Mr. Towndale about his experiences at the Barber home. According to C-14, he told Mr. Towndale or Ms Gratton about the comments he alleged Mr. Keough made to Ms Barber about knocking his teeth down his throat. Mr. Towndale did not recall being told this by C-14.

After disclosing these allegations of physical abuse to a number of CAS officials, C-14 testified that he was not offered any help or counselling by the CAS. Both Mr. Towndale and Mr. Keough acknowledged that they did not arrange any counselling for C-14 or arrange for him to be seen by a medical doctor. In addition, the police were not notified about C-14's allegations.

Bryan Keough Conducts an Investigation

Bryan Keough conducted an investigation into C-14's allegations of abuse. The investigation took approximately one week, during which time Mr. Keough reviewed the recordings of previous CAS workers and interviewed a number of people including other child protection workers and other children who had been placed in the Barber home while C-14 was there. One child who Mr. Keough interviewed stated that the expectations in the home were high and that the foster parents took good physical care of the children. However, she also noted that C-14 was often punished too severely for his wrongdoings and was beaten by Ms Barber, who would lose control and hit him with everything she could get her hands on, often leaving bruises. The child protection workers Mr. Keough interviewed all believed the Barber home was an excellent foster home.

Mr. Keough did not prepare a report but he recorded the following conclusions in the case recordings:

There is a lot that one must give and take from [C-14's] accusations, however I conclude that [C-14] did at times receive treatment that was far too harsh and could be labeled a beating. I further believe that at such times [C-14] had driven the foster parents to a point where they lost control, and later would regret their actions ...

As the foster parents did not to the day of [C-14's] departure from the home come to grips with this problem, I would recommend that we place no more children in their home. This would be quite simple as the Barbers requested from me, once [C-14] left, that their home be closed.

The Barber home was closed and a closing summary prepared on January 25, 1978. C-14 recalled that Mr. Towndale called him after the investigation was completed and told him that the Barber home was "blacklisted."

Despite the fact that C-14 alleged that Mr. Keough was incompetent for failing to pick up on the abuse while he was at the Barber home, Mr. Keough did not think it was improper for him to do the investigation himself. His supervisor, Angelo Towndale, however, did think it was unusual that Mr. Keough was investigating this matter. According to Mr. Towndale, Mr. Keough should have had the Protection Department or another CAS department to do the investigation. In addition, he should have reported to his supervisor about the matter and the action he intended to take. Mr. Towndale testified that, because he was on holidays at the time, Mr. Keough should have reported to Tom O'Brien or Dave Devlin. Ian MacLean testified that, today, when a complaint is launched against a social worker, a different social worker would conduct the investigation.

Like many of the CAS cases examined during the Inquiry, this occurred several decades ago. The policies, systems, and procedures in place today are quite different, and it is likely that if the same situation arose today it would be handled differently. This said, I am of the view that Mr. Keough should have requested that another social worker conduct the investigation into C-14's allegations. C-14 was clearly accusing Mr. Keough of failing to notice the abuse, in addition to alleging that Mr. Keough had always sided with the foster parents. In light of what was being alleged, these accusations against Mr. Keough alone put him in a conflict situation such that he should not have conducted the interviews. Aside from specific accusations by C-14 against Mr. Keough, if the abuse alleged by C-14 did occur, it would presumably raise questions about Mr. Keough's observations and interactions with C-14 and how he could have failed to notice the abuse and its effect on him.

I am also concerned that the police were not contacted. Although corporal punishment of children was an accepted practice in the 1970s, Mr. Keough acknowledged in his case recordings that the punishment of C-14 had been too harsh and that he had received "beatings." The treatment was deemed severe enough for Mr. Keough to recommend closing the home. The Barbers' actions may have amounted to assault, and the police should have been contacted to conduct their own investigation. In addition, counselling should have been offered to C-14. Regardless of whether the actions of the Barbers were criminal, the boy was clearly affected by the experience, and he should have been offered counselling or other support. Removing him from the foster home was not a sufficient response to his needs.

Transfer From the Hubert Foster Home to the Lapensee Group Home

C-14 was removed from the Hubert foster home in early March 1978 at the request of the foster parents. He was transferred to the Lapensee group home in Martintown, where he stayed for approximately three and a half months. During this time, Ian MacLean was his worker. Mr. MacLean testified that he had reviewed C-14's file and was aware that C-14 had made allegations of mistreatment at the Barber foster home.

C-14 testified that, while at the Lapensee group home, he was physically assaulted by one of the Lapensees' children. He did not report the incident, as he thought nobody would listen. According to C-14, he had a lot of problems while in this home. He was distraught over the incident with the Lapensees' son, he was having problems in school, and had started sleep walking.

C-14 ran away with another boy from the home, following which he was placed temporarily in the Cieslewicz receiving home.

The MacIntosh Foster Home

C-14 was placed in the MacIntosh foster home in Apple Hill on July 6, 1978, just before his sixteenth birthday. Ian MacLean remained C-14's worker. There was no physical abuse alleged at this home, but C-14 alleged that, while at the home, he was sexually abused by a man named Frank Rolland.

Mr. Rolland was approximately sixty years old. He lived in Montreal but had made arrangements with Stewart MacIntosh to keep honeybees on his property. C-14 testified that Mr. Rolland learned from other children in the home that C-14 wanted to buy a motorcycle and said that if C-14 worked for him for the summer, he would help him buy a dirt bike at the end of the season. Ian MacLean recalled that, during his first visit with Ms MacIntosh and C-14, it was mentioned that C-14 had met Mr. Rolland. Mr. MacLean saw this as a potential "big brother" relationship.

Alleged Sexual Abuse by Frank Rolland

During the summer of 1978, Mr. Rolland approached the CAS for permission to bring C-14 to his home in Montreal and to show him around the city. Mr. MacLean asked that Mr. Rolland attend the CAS office in Cornwall for an interview so Mr. MacLean could find out more about him. Prior to this meeting, Mr. MacLean had never met Mr. Rolland and had never witnessed C-14 and Mr. Rolland together. C-14 recalled that he accompanied Mr. Rolland to the CAS office but remained in the car. He testified that Mr. Rolland received a letter from the CAS that allowed him to take C-14 to Montreal. Ian MacLean explained that the executive director of the CAS at the time, Tom O'Brien, had to sign a form to give Mr. Rolland permission to take C-14 out of the province. The practice was that the worker would meet with the adult seeking permission to take the ward out of the home. The worker would then go to Mr. O'Brien and have him sign the form. The worker had to satisfy the executive director that he or she did not feel there was any risk to the child and that it would be beneficial for the child to go on the outing.

Ian MacLean relied on conversations he had with the MacIntoshes and on his personal interview in assessing Frank Rolland. He did not ask for any other references. He did not search local CAS files or contact the CAS in Montreal to see if his name came up. He did not contact the local police or the police in Quebec to find out whether Mr. Rolland had a police record. According to Mr. MacLean, that was not the practice at the time. As discussed in the introduction to this chapter, the policies and procedures of the CAS have evolved considerably since the late 1970s, when C-14 was in the care of the CAS. Today, there would be far more rigorous screening of anyone who would take a child out of a foster home or group home.

C-14 testified that, on the second evening in Montreal, Mr. Rolland gave him coffee that made him feel dizzy and strange. Mr. Rolland told him there was Valium in the coffee. According to C-14, he passed out, and when he awoke the next day the bedding was dishevelled. C-14 did not know what happened until much later. In the early 1990s, he was admitted to hospital for difficulties sleeping and, after being administered a powerful sedative and falling asleep, C-14 had a flashback of Mr. Rolland sexually abusing him. C-14 testified that there was more sexual abuse on the trip but most of what happened occurred when he was in a drug-induced haze. He also alleged that he was sexually abused by Mr. Rolland in the car a mile down the road from the MacIntosh's home, upon returning from Montreal.

C-14 did not tell anybody that summer about what Frank Rolland did to him. He thought nobody would believe him. Ian MacLean did not recall if he spoke with C-14 after the trip to Montreal. He did, however, speak with Mr. Rolland, who told him that C-14 was exposing himself and masturbating in the sight of Mr. Rolland and that he often struck Mr. Rolland when disagreements occurred. Mr. MacLean testified that this was the first incident of alleged sexual misbehaviour on C-14's part, and he did not feel it was necessary to do anything except record it and be aware of it. He acknowledged that the best practice would have been to speak to C-14 and possibly the foster parents to find out what was going on. Mr. MacLean could not recall whether he spoke to C-14 about this report from Mr. Rolland.

C-14 testified that, when he reviewed his file in 1995, this was the first time he saw this recording, and he was "incensed." The fact that this behaviour might be indicative of sexual abuse did not enter Ian MacLean's mind. He testified that it did not occur to him that Mr. Rolland might have had something to do with this alleged behaviour by C-14. Mr. MacLean thought that Mr. Rolland was "a very mild-mannered man" and that abuse was not in his character.

Although he could not remember if he did or not, Mr. MacLean acknowledged that he should have brought Mr. Rolland's complaint to C-14's attention. I agree. In my opinion, Mr. MacLean should have immediately spoken with C-14 about these allegations by Mr. Rolland. In addition, I am of the view that, regardless of Mr. Rolland's statements about C-14, Mr. MacLean should have met with C-14 after the trip to Montreal to ensure that the trip went well and that C-14 did not have any concerns or problems. I would expect that, today, significantly more detail would be recorded about any trips taken by children under CAS care than was recorded in the case of C-14.

C-14 did not have any further contact with Frank Rolland after the trip to Montreal. Mr. Rolland died in autumn of 1978. C-14 left the MacIntosh home on November 30, 1978, at the request of the foster parents.

Counselling

In the early summer of 1978, prior to C-14 moving to the MacIntosh home, Ian MacLean arranged for C-14 to see a psychometrist, Diane Latreille, at the Cornwall General Hospital. Mr. MacLean made the appointment after C-14 started to exhibit certain behaviours, such as wandering around at night, in the Lapensee Home. Based on these behaviours and what Mr. MacLean had read about C-14's previous behaviour and allegations at the other foster home, he felt it was wise to get a psychological assessment done.

C-14's first meeting with Ms Latreille was on or around July 13, 1978. She reported that initially C-14 "presented as a suspicious, closed, 15-year old who did not volunteer any information about himself," but that he gradually relaxed and was able to laugh and converse freely by the end of the first session. C-14 did not disclose being sexually abused by Arthur Sypes during this meeting. The report indicated that C-14 was told to contact Ms Latreille at any time if he wanted to discuss anything. C-14 never contacted her.

C-14's second visit with Ms Latreille was in November 1978. Ian MacLean did not recall taking any steps to advise her about the behaviour Mr. Rolland had reported to him during the summer.

C-14 testified that, because Ms Latreille was a referral from the CAS, he was "very guarded" with her throughout both visits. Although Mr. MacLean did the right thing in arranging for C-14 to see a counsellor, it should be ensured, given that some children who have been abused while in CAS care may not trust the agency, that the individual the child sees is truly independent of the CAS and that the child is aware of that.

Termination of C-14's Wardship

After leaving the MacIntosh foster home, C-14 spent approximately eight to nine months at the Chrétien boarding home. Things did not work out in this home, and he was moved to St. Lawrence College residence, where he stayed for one month.

In late August 1979, C-14 was moved to the Barlow foster home in Long Sault. According to C-14, he was physically assaulted in that home by the foster mother's boyfriend. However, he did not tell the CAS about this because "I was called a liar all the time." Instead, C-14 decided to "get even" and stole approximately $20 in change from a piggybank. According to C-14, when the foster mother found out about it, she kicked him out of the house, following which C-14 lived in his car.

According to the case recordings, C-14 contacted his CAS worker, Bill McNally, on November 26, 1979, and informed him that he was quitting school and no longer wanted CAS assistance. During his testimony, C-14 disagreed with this recording and maintained that his worker had told him that the CAS was cutting ties with him because he was no longer in school.

According to the CAS case recordings, a few months later, in February 1990, C-14 was re-admitted to CAS care at his request. He was placed in the group home of Mr. and Ms Champagne. He remained there only a couple of weeks. C-14 spent the last few months of his wardship at the King George Hotel. On June 18, 1980, C-14's Crown wardship was terminated.

C-14 Discloses Sexual Abuse Allegations to Bryan Keough

C-14 testified that in or around 1981-1982, he called Bryan Keough. He testified:

I was very upset with the way that things were going. I had difficulty holding a job. I was anxious all the time. I was depressed. I didn't really know what was wrong with me. I had been blamed so much for what had happened to me. I just assumed something was wrong with me.

According to C-14, during the conversation he reiterated the physical abuse he had been through and blamed Mr. Keough for a lot of things that were going on in his life. C-14 said that he also told Mr. Keough about the sexual abuse by Arthur Sypes and Frank Rolland. C-14 testified that Mr. Keough was unresponsive during this call and that he did not suggest that C-14 contact the police nor did he give him any advice about how to proceed. According to C-14, neither Mr. Keough nor anyone else at the CAS followed up with him after that call.

Bryan Keough testified that he did not recall receiving this phone call and he was not aware of C-14's allegations of sexual abuse.

C-14 Attempts to Get Information About His File From the CAS

C-14 testified that, in 1991, he went to the Ottawa CAS looking for answers. He wanted to know what had happened regarding the abuse in the Barber foster home. C-14 received a document from the CAS of SD&G, entitled "Background Social History," prepared by Lise Stanley and dated May 30, 1991. C-14 was not satisfied with this document, and in fact he was upset by it. With respect to his allegations of physical abuse by the Barbers, the report stated "It was further believed that at such times, [C-14] had driven the foster parents to a point where they lost control and later would regret their actions." C-14 took exception to the fact that the CAS appeared to blame him for what had happened.

C-14 had a conversation with CAS worker Lorenzo Murphy on or about July 23, 1991. Prior to this call, Mr. Murphy had spoken to a supervisor at the Ottawa CAS who had spoken with C-14. According to Mr. Murphy's notes of the call, this supervisor had recommended two different psychiatrists to C-14. C-14 testified that he had never been recommended a psychiatrist by the CAS and that, at this point, he had been diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder and was already seeing someone.

Mr. Murphy's notes of the call with C-14 also indicate that C-14 had never reported the sexual abuse by Mr. Sypes and was only now beginning to talk about it. C-14 disagreed with this note, stating that he had told Mr. Keough about the sexual abuse in 1981 or 1982. Although Mr. Murphy's notes say he "feels charges can't be laid as Arthur is developmentally handicapped," C-14 maintained that he was adamant that the CAS investigate his allegations thoroughly.

Mr. Murphy noted that C-14 "feels that Bryan Keough knew some of what was going on" and that Mr. Keough once saw him when he had blood running from his mouth from a beating. Mr. Keough did not recall any such incident. According to Mr. Murphy's notes of the call, C-14 wanted to review his file and talk about the abuse he had suffered, but that he wanted to be connected with a counsellor before probing things further. Mr. Murphy's case notes state that he agreed to meet further with C-14 and explore counselling options. C-14 testified that there was no agreement to speak further and no follow-up from Mr. Murphy.

C-14 Discloses Abuse to the OPP; No Charges Are Laid

In July 1991, C-14 contacted the OPP in Morrisburg because he wanted answers and did not think he was getting anywhere with the CAS. There were no charges laid as a result of this contact. Unfortunately, other than a few excerpts from the notes of the investigating officer, Constable Huffey, there was no evidence put before me explaining why Constable Huffey concluded that charges should not be laid.

The CAS Terminates C-14's File

A termination report, dated May 15, 1992, noted that C-14's allegations had been discussed with the police and that no charges had been laid; that C-14 had been invited to meet with Lorenzo Murphy and didn't; and that he had not come in to review his file. The report further stated that C-14 felt he needed more counselling before he could pursue allegations further or attend a meeting and review his file. According to the report, the file was terminated because there were no present protection concerns, as the alleged victim was an adult and the foster home had been closed fifteen years earlier.

C-14 Attempts to Obtain His CAS File

In or around July 1993, C-14 had a conversation with the executive director of the CAS, Richard Abell, about accessing his file. Mr. Abell recalled that C-14 had two concerns. First, in his view the summaries prepared of his file were only negative and, second, things were taking too long and he was not getting sufficient disclosure.

In 1994, C-14 retained a lawyer to assist him in getting access to his CAS files. Between May 1994 and March 1995, there was correspondence between his lawyer and Mr. Abell about C-14's request to review his file. At the outset, the CAS took the position that, although C-14 was entitled to information concerning him, the CAS could not disclose information about others that might be in his service file and, as a result, the CAS had to limit the information disclosed to him. An offer was extended to arrange a meeting during which the CAS would provide C-14 as complete a disclosure of his file as it could. Mr. Abell testified that it was a long-standing practice at the CAS to release only file summaries. When C-14's lawyer requested a meeting to review C-14's file, he was advised that CAS policy was not to make files directly available to clients. Mr. Abell could not recall why he rescinded the earlier offer to allow C-14 access to his file. He explained that this access was a new practice and, although the agency eventually honoured the initial commitment to let C-14 see as much of his file as possible, the CAS was having second thoughts at this time.

In October 1994, C-14 and his lawyer visited the CAS office expecting to review the file. Mr. Abell told them it was not available. He offered to have the file reviewed by another worker and a summary prepared, but that was not acceptable to C-14 and his lawyer. In late 1994 or early 1995, the CAS changed its position and advised that it would allow C-14 to review his file, with information the CAS could not disclose redacted. A meeting took place on April 5, 1995. C-14 testified that he was not given access to his file and saw only a summarized version of it.

C-14 retained new counsel and attempted again in 1996 to obtain access to his file. Mr. Abell testified that he indicated to C-14's counsel that the CAS has already provided C-14 with an opportunity to review the file. On November 22, 1996, C-14 was provided with a photocopy of his client file, with information redacted as required.

I discuss the issue of file disclosure in further detail in another section of this chapter. In this case, it took nearly one year before C-14 was allowed to review a redacted version of his file. It took a further year or so before he was provided with a photocopy of his redacted file. This was after numerous letters written on his behalf by counsel. It is unlikely that an unrepresented individual would have been as successful. As I say in a previous section, the position of the CAS on file disclosure was not appropriate, and I reiterate the comments I made in the section regarding Cathy Sutherland's attempts to access her file.

C-14 Discloses Abuse to Project Truth

In the fall of 2000, C-14 again disclosed his abuse allegations to the OPP, this time to Project Truth. Detective Constable Ralko of the Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry OPP Detachment was assigned to investigate the allegations because the matter fell outside the mandate of Project Truth. During his investigation, Detective Constable Ralko interviewed Ken Barber and Arthur Sypes and several other potential witnesses, including other foster children of the Barbers. On May 30, 2001, Detective Constable Ralko informed C-14 that, because of a lack of corroborating evidence, he did not have reasonable and probable grounds to lay any charges.

Conclusion

C-14 made a few recommendations when he testified. He suggested that social workers should never be allowed to investigate abuse claims if they have a personal involvement in the claim nor should they be allowed to write the definitive report on them. C-14 suggested that a social worker not affiliated with the agency should be appointed to conduct an impartial assessment of allegations of abuse by foster parents and/or CAS workers. I agree with his recommendation. At the time, the CAS of SD&G had an informal practice in place to refer internal allegations to neighbouring CAS offices. It is unclear when this practice was implemented. I understand that, today, the process has been formalized and a new policy was adopted in 2001. I recommend that the policy be reviewed to ensure that the mechanics of the referral are clear and the definition of a conflict leading to a referral is well defined.

C-14 also testified about the ongoing effects of the alleged abuse. This testimony is set out in greater detail in Chapter 3, on the impact of child abuse.

Catherine Sutherland

Catherine (Cathy) Sutherland (née Donnelly) was born on June 28, 1955. She was one of five children born to Joan Donnelly.³¹ As a child, Ms Sutherland suffered extreme physical abuse by her mother, and she also alleged that she suffered sexual abuse both by her mother and by a foster father.

Growing up, Ms Sutherland spent some time at home with her mother and siblings; at other times she lived in various foster homes. The Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS of SD&G) first became involved with Ms Sutherland in 1957, although she was not apprehended at the time. She was brought into CAS care on April 14, 1958, and placed in a foster home. Ms Sutherland remained in CAS care until May 1960, when she was discharged from foster care and returned to her family. She was readmitted into CAS care on June 29, 1968, and remained a ward until her eighteenth birthday, on June 28, 1973.

I will comment on three issues that arose in respect to the Children's Aid Society's care of Ms Sutherland and subsequent interactions with her as an adult. The first is Ms Sutherland's allegations that the CAS failed to adequately protect her from her mother's abuse. The second issue is Ms Sutherland's allegations that she was sexually abused in a CAS foster home and that she told her worker about the abuse. The final issue involves the attempt by Ms Sutherland to obtain access to her CAS file.

31. For purposes of clarity and consistency, I will refer to Catherine Donnelly Sutherland as Catherine or Cathy Sutherland or Ms Sutherland throughout this section.

Catherine Sutherland Alleges the CAS Failed to Protect Her From Her Mother's Abuse

Catherine Sutherland felt that the CAS failed to protect her when she was a child. With respect to the physical abuse, she noted that the agency simply “monitored” the situation despite increasing evidence of neglect and abuse. When Ms Sutherland was apprehended by the CAS of SD&G in March 1958, she had suffered extensive burns to her feet caused by scalding bath water. According to the recordings of the CAS worker, a relative who was concerned that the girl's mother had burned her on purpose had contacted the agency. Upon a visit to the home, the worker was “amazed” that Ms Donnelly had not called a doctor. According to Ms Sutherland, when the doctor finally saw her, she was immediately hospitalized, and the doctors were furious about the lack of intervention. These events occurred over fifty years ago. I was able to review the file recordings but did not have the benefit of the testimony of the CAS workers involved at the time. As a result, I am unable to make a finding about Ms Sutherland's allegation that the CAS of SD&G failed to adequately protect her from her mother's abuse.

In addition to the physical abuse, Ms Sutherland alleges that she was sexually abused by her mother and that her mother would sell her to men who sexually abused her. However, it does not appear that Ms Sutherland disclosed any of this abuse to the CAS of SD&G while she was in its care.

Although Ms Sutherland may not have disclosed allegations of sexual abuse by her mother or other men, there were references in her file to sexual behaviour that perhaps should have alerted someone that there was a problem. In June 18, 1959, Ms Sutherland was living in a foster home run by Mr. and Ms Wood, and the CAS had arranged for her to have visits home with her natural family. A recording following one of those visits stated:

We learned today upon visiting Cathy and Mrs. Wood, that Cathy's last visit to her mother's home had been somewhat short of successful. She said that the child came back to her a little stranger. She elaborated on this by saying that Cathy did not act or behave normally, was not interested in her toys, and even lost her sense of balance. Cathy did not seem to hear them when they would speak to her unless they did so sharply. She would walk around the room bumping into the furniture and seemed to be in a daze. This strange behaviour lasted about three days. Previous to this visit, Cathy had been fully toilet trained, but after the visit she began to soil her clothing both during the day and at night. She even began to masturbate. (Emphasis added)

At the time of this recording, Cathy Sutherland was not yet four years old.

Another recording in Ms Sutherland's file in November 1967 stated that she "masturbates excessively." At the time, Ms Sutherland would have been twelve years old. Around June 1968, when Ms Sutherland was readmitted into CAS care, she was seen by a psychiatrist, who noted that she was prone to sexually acting out.

Although they could be indicators of other problems as well, these excerpts could at least suggest, in my view, that Cathy Sutherland had been sexually abused as a child and would perhaps have warranted further investigation.

Allegations of Sexual Abuse at Foster Home

In July 1968, shortly after Ms Sutherland's thirteenth birthday, she was placed in a foster home in Bainsville operated by Mr. and Ms Virgin. She alleged that she was sexually abused by the foster father, Carl Virgin, for approximately one year. Ms Sutherland testified that she told her doctor and her CAS worker, Blaine Grundy, about the abuse but that they did nothing and she remained in the home. She recalled telling her worker about the abuse while sitting in his car in the driveway of the Virgin home. According to Ms Sutherland, when she disclosed the abuse to Mr. Grundy, "he just kind of ignored" it and kept on talking. She had the impression that he did not believe her. Ms Sutherland testified that, although she cannot remember exactly what she told Blaine Grundy, she told him enough for him to know that she was being sexually abused.

Ms Sutherland explained that she told her CAS worker about the abuse because she wanted to be removed from the home. However, she was not removed until Ms Sutherland told a girl at school. She testified that she came home from school one day and the Virgins were sitting around the table. Ms Virgin was crying and the couple was furious.

Cathy Sutherland testified that she also disclosed the sexual abuse to Derry Tenger, who was her worker after Blaine Grundy and until she left CAS care, and he did not do anything either. She also said that she told the foster mother at one of the homes she subsequently resided in.

With respect to Ms Sutherland's allegation that she advised a CAS of SD&G worker of her abuse by Carl Virgin and he did not take any action, there is no recording in the file of the worker being advised of sexual abuse and, unfortunately, I do not have the benefit of the testimony of either Blaine Grundy or Derry Tenger, the two CAS workers whom Ms Sutherland alleged she told of the abuse. The absence of a notation in the file is not conclusive evidence that Ms Sutherland did not tell a CAS worker about the abuse. As I have noted elsewhere in this chapter, there was a tendency in the past to disbelieve allegations made by children. As such, her allegation may not have been recorded because she was not believed.

Catherine Sutherland Attempts to Obtain Her CAS File

Beginning in 1987, Ms Sutherland attempted to obtain information from her CAS file. It was not until the Inquiry that she was provided with unrestricted access to information about her care by the CAS. In the remainder of this section, I examine Ms Sutherland's attempts to obtain information from her CAS file and I comment on the response of the CAS of SD&G to these requests. Many former CAS wards who testified at the Inquiry spoke about difficulties in obtaining access to their files. I will make some recommendations on how this process can be improved.

Ms Sutherland's Psychologist Requests Information, 1987

On March 26, 1987, Dr. Vincent Murphy, a psychologist at the Etobicoke Centre for Children and Families, wrote the CAS of SD&G and requested a summary of its contact with Ms Sutherland's family and a copy of any medical, psychological, or psychiatric reports the CAS had completed about the family. Dr. Murphy was attempting to complete a family assessment for Ms Sutherland and her son. He enclosed a consent form signed by Ms Sutherland authorizing the release of these records. Bill Carriere, who worked for the CAS for approximately thirty-three years and held the position of director of Client Services and Protection Services prior to his retirement, testified that the agency tried to give priority to these kinds of requests.

The CAS worker assigned to deal with this request recorded that she did a thorough search of the files and concluded that the agency had never been involved with the family and therefore could not assist Dr. Murphy. Her supervisor, Mr. Carriere, testified that they had been unable to find the file. He acknowledged that this was "a complete error."

Ms Sutherland Attempts to Obtain Her File, April 1995

Ms Sutherland's first personal attempt to obtain her file was on April 8, 1995. She wanted her file for medical reasons:

... It was the first time in my life that I had actually lived alone and I was being flooded by nightmares and flashbacks. My life was just totally falling apart and I needed the file for my own medical reasons to be able to try and reconstruct my life.

She sent a letter to the CAS, providing the name of her mother, her date of birth, and the name of her last worker, Derry Tenger. She wrote, "I'm aware of the complexity of this request if nothing more than for the logistics of having the file temporarily relocated to a [sic] this area for my perusal.” Ms Sutherland testified that she realized the CAS would not just give her the file, and she thought that, if they sent it to the local CAS office, she could read it there.

Shortly after sending this letter, Ms Sutherland spoke with CAS case worker Lise Stanley, following which she sent Ms Stanley a letter, dated April 21, 1995, providing some identification the agency had requested. The letter also indicated that Ms Stanley had requested that Ms Sutherland highlight the information she was looking for. Ms Sutherland responded:

As I pointed out in our conversation, I have had a great deal of difficulty remembering certain aspects of my childhood and it is therefore difficult to pinpoint specific times and episodes. In essence, that is why I am trying to obtain the file.

In my opinion, this exchange highlights the difficulty faced by those seeking access to information about their childhood. The CAS of SD&G requested that Ms Sutherland specify the information she was seeking from her file, but, without access to her file, Ms Sutherland could not know what information she was seeking. CAS staff who are responsible for responding to requests for information must be cognizant of the fact that individuals seeking the information may not know exactly what they are looking for or what they expect to receive.

Another letter from Ms Sutherland to Lise Stanley, dated June 28, 1995, referred to a further conversation between the two women on June 20, 1995, during which Ms Stanley advised Ms Sutherland that she should indicate in writing that she was seeking all available medical information that was contained in her files.

Ms Sutherland testified that this was “ludicrous.” She had already provided identification and, when she asked for medical information, the CAS requested that she write a letter specifically asking for medical information. Ms Sutherland testified that she complied and made a written request for her medical records and was then told that the CAS could not release them because they were third-party records.

Cathy Sutherland was learning that she was not going to get her file, but she felt that the CAS could have provided her with more information to help fill in the gaps in her memory.

Ms Sutherland did request some specific information in addition to requesting disclosure of her entire file. Mark Boisvenue, a CAS investigator, noted that, during a telephone call with Ms Sutherland on August 16, 1995, she requested information regarding why she was returned to her family, given the abusive situation, and she wanted to know if there was any information related to sexual abuse by her foster parent, Carl Virgin. Ms Sutherland testified that she wanted to know why nobody did anything and why she was left in the foster home after disclosing the abuse to her worker.

Several days after this telephone call, Ms Sutherland received a letter from Mark Boisvenue and Bill Carriere, dated August 22, 1995, which enclosed a summary of her involvement with the CAS. This was the first disclosure that Ms Sutherland received from the agency. Bill Carriere explained that Mark Boisvenue was an investigator and he was tasked with trying to get information to Ms Sutherland quicker than if it was left with someone in the intake department. Mr. Carriere was Mr. Boisvenue's supervisor. Although Mr. Carriere's name is on the letter, it appears that Mr. Abell signed the letter for him, and Mr. Carriere did not know whether he saw what was provided to Ms Sutherland.

The cover letter advised that "due to confidentiality," the CAS could not provide any specific details involving individuals other than Ms Sutherland. Bill Carriere testified that this reference to confidentiality was not a reference to a specific policy, as there was no such policy in place. Rather, Mr. Boisvenue was referring to a practice of the CAS of not disclosing information about other individuals.

The letter also stated that the agency was unable to find any information within her files indicating sexual abuse, and it encouraged Ms Sutherland to file a complaint with the police if she believed an offence had been committed.

The summary enclosed with the letter consisted of a chronology of Ms Sutherland's wardship and her placement history, a brief overview of her medical history, and a social history. The summary was four pages long. The CAS of SD&G had been involved with Ms Sutherland and her family for a period of sixteen years.

Mr. Carriere testified that Mr. Boisvenue could view any materials relating to Ms Sutherland to which the agency had access, including her family file, her child file, and her birth parents' file. He also had access to the file on the Virgin foster home. However, it was not expected that he would have accessed all of these files when writing the summary. Mr. Carriere thought that, in most cases, when a ward asks for background information, the majority of the information would come from the child file. He agreed, however, that, if Mr. Boisvenue did look at the family file in preparing the summary, any relevant information he saw in that file that could be provided to Ms Sutherland should have been included in the summary.

As noted above, Mr. Boisvenue wrote to Ms Sutherland that he had been unable to find any information in her files that would indicate that she had been sexually abused. There was no reference to the entries referring to Ms Sutherland beginning to masturbate shortly before her fourth birthday and subsequent entries about excessive masturbation. Mr. Carriere disagreed with the suggestion that, in 1995, a social worker reading these entries would have been alerted to the possibility of sexual abuse. While these observations are clearly not proof of any abuse, they indicated, in my opinion, the existence of some issues, particularly the entry pertaining to masturbation as a young child. Not only should this have been explored by the CAS at the time, but Mr. Boisvenue should have provided Ms Sutherland with this information.

Regarding the incident in which Ms Sutherland's feet were badly burned when she was two years old, the summary prepared by Mr. Boisvenue stated that a family member indicated that the burns were the result of being exposed to scalding water in a bathtub. An entry in Ms Sutherland's child file stated:

It was later learned that the burns were caused by hot water in the tub, but it was not clearly established whether the child turned on the tap herself or whether the mother may have caused it deliberately.

The family file, which Mr. Boisvenue also had access to, included the following entry:

She had also suffered third-degree burns from negligence on her mother's part, and there was evidence from her mother's relatives and her local family doctor to substantiate the fact that these accidents were not really accidents.

Ms Sutherland was not advised that the CAS knew that there was the possibility that the burns were inflicted deliberately by her mother. In my opinion, this information should have been provided. It is clearly a part of Ms Sutherland's history and in fact is related to her specific request for information about why she was returned to her mother's home despite the abuse.

Bill Carriere testified that he did not know why the summary failed to provide details contained in the file that might have answered some questions for Ms Sutherland. He acknowledged that the summary was very different from what was contained in the file. Mr. Carriere disagreed that the agency was being paternalistic and trying to protect Ms Sutherland from negative information. Rather, he thought Mr. Boisvenue did not have a lot of time to complete the summary and therefore was not able to give proper attention to the file review and the preparation of the summary.

I will provide further comments on and recommendations to improve client access to files for former wards. I note that the practice of providing summaries of a file is time consuming and not very effective. To provide an accurate summary, the CAS worker must review the entire file, which in some cases can be very lengthy. It is inevitable that information will be missed or, more importantly, the interpretation of the recordings may be inaccurate if the information is taken out of its original context. I appreciate that the CAS is concerned about the privacy interests of other individuals mentioned in the file, such as other former wards. In my opinion, providing a copy of the file with confidential information pertaining to other people redacted is a more efficient way of providing the information requested, if the redactions are not excessive.

Ms Sutherland Responds to the CAS, March 1996

On March 28, 1996, Ms Sutherland wrote a lengthy letter to Mark Boisvenue in response to the letter and summary she received from him the previous August. In this letter, she questioned the CAS's action—or, more accurately, inaction—with respect to her treatment by her mother, and she described a number of alleged acts of abuse.

At the conclusion of the letter, Mr. Sutherland wrote:

When I look back at my childhood, it is nothing more than a series of disjointed snapshots and I have no access to pictures, report cards, babybooks, toys or anything else that would enhance such a connection. I have no idea what I looked like before I was 14 and short of the various statements in your letter, I have little idea of the kind of child I was. But, one of the greatest difficulties I have had, has been trying to find a way to convey the importance of retrieving those lost memories. For many people, actively searching out what trauma has suppressed just does not appear reasonable but they are the same ones who visit their relatives and surround themselves with vintage artifacts from their past. Good, bad or indifferent I need the facts if I'm to ever really know who I am and it is with that starving need for knowledge that I beg your continued support and assistance.

She also requested contact information for a foster family with whom she had been placed in Mountain. She felt strongly that they had “provided the birthplace for the positive facets of my personality.” She expressed a desire to write to them.

The comments by Ms Sutherland in this letter illustrate that the issue for former CAS wards is not simply a desire to see their file but a desire to understand who they were as children and to have some memories of their childhood. Many of us would have difficulty remembering much about our childhood if it were not for photographs, mementos, and stories from our parents and relatives. Children like Ms Sutherland were denied those linkages, and their CAS file is often the only source of information about their past. I understand from the evidence of Mr. MacLean that foster parents are now required to keep life books, which the child can keep. Although this does not address the file disclosure issue per se, I think it is an excellent initiative.

This letter by Ms Sutherland also raises the issue of the disclosure of the names of foster parents. It appears that the practice of the CAS of SD&G at the time was to not provide former wards with the names of foster parents with whom they had been placed. Although Bill Carriere could not point to any written policy or law prohibiting the CAS from telling a former ward the name of her foster parents or the names of workers in receiving homes, he testified that it was an understanding between the agency and foster parents that their names would not be shared as part of records disclosure unless the foster parents agreed.

For some children, foster parents play a crucial role in their growth and development. In my view, to deny them access to even the names of these individuals is not acceptable. Mr. Carriere alluded to the potential problems that could be caused for foster parents who had a difficult relationship with a child in their care if the child, now an adult, is given their identifying information.

Ian MacLean recommended that the Ministry of Community and Social Services require Children's Aid Societies to release to all Crown wards leaving their care the following information: a record of their updated social history; their full medical history; the contact information for mental health professionals who have done tests and produced reports for them along with information on how to obtain those reports and test results; a full list of schools attended, with the names of teachers, the grades completed, and copies of report cards; a list of the foster homes where they lived, including the dates and placements and the names of the foster family members living with them in the home; and a list of churches, clubs, and so on, attended and any certificates received from these organizations. A sign-off by a parent or guardian or the youth him- or herself would be required prior to authorizing the release of the information. A full copy of the material, including the sign-off, would be kept by the CAS at the front of the child's file and would be immediately available to the individual if requested in later years. I agree with and support this recommendation.

Having received no response to her March letter, Ms Sutherland wrote to Mr. Boisvenue against on June 10, 1996. She received a letter dated October 1, 1996, advising her that her file would be reviewed by a second social worker and that the CAS required time to go through that process.

The Ministry of Community and Social Services Becomes Involved

In late December 1996 or early January 1997, Ms Sutherland spoke to Wenda Hodsdon, the program supervisor for the Ministry of Community and Social Services. She asked Ms Hodsdon for assistance in retrieving her CAS files.

Following this call, Ms Hodsdon contacted Bill Carriere, on January 2, 1997. At the time, he was either the clinical director or the director of Client Services. She asked him if the CAS had a specific policy about the time frame for responding to requests for information. He responded that there was no such policy. Mr. Carriere testified that he was concerned about having sufficient staff to deal with protection matters, let alone information disclosure. He agreed, however, that Ms Sutherland was not being dealt with in a timely fashion and that it was understandable that she contacted the Ministry.

As a result of this call from the Ministry, Mr. Carriere contacted the supervisor of the workers on the file to determine what was happening with Ms Sutherland's request.

Ms Sutherland Contacts the CAS Executive Director

On January 13, 1997, Ms Sutherland wrote a letter to the CAS executive director, Richard Abell, outlining the chronology of her attempts to obtain her file. She asked to be provided access to her file within two weeks. Mr. Abell responded in a letter dated February 11, 1997. He advised her that arrangements were being made to give her access to her file through the Hamilton CAS. According to Ms Sutherland, this was the first time there was any discussion about giving her access to her file.

In this letter, Mr. Abell also responded to some of the questions Ms Sutherland raised in her March 1996 letter to Mark Boisvenue.

Ms Sutherland Attends at Hamilton CAS to Review Her File, March 1997

Ms Sutherland received another letter from Mr. Abell, dated February 25, 1997, outlining the arrangement for her to view her file at the Hamilton CAS office. She was advised that Patricia Garrahan would have three to four hours to spend with Ms Sutherland to review her file. She was told that the CAS was obligated to black out identifying information such as names of foster families, society workers, and other professionals mentioned in the file. In addition, the CAS could not disclose any documents it did not author, such as medical reports. Ms Sutherland was advised to contact her family physician, who could arrange to obtain her medical records from the Cornwall General Hospital. Mr. Abell explained that the CAS was not permitted to release medical reports but was required to inform people if they had such a report and tell them where it originated from.

Finally, Ms Sutherland was told that information that might be upsetting to her would also be blacked out, but that Ms Garrahan would provide the information if requested. Ms Sutherland felt that it was her history and it was not up to the CAS to decide what she could or could not see.

The meeting at the Hamilton CAS took place on or around March 10, 1997. Ms Sutherland was given a redacted file to review, which was missing the first seven pages. According to Ms Sutherland, she was given a limited time to read the information. She was not allowed to photocopy it, but she read it into a dictaphone. She felt rushed: "I mean, it was the best I had up to that point, but it certainly wasn't complete and it certainly didn't answer all the questions."

Ms Sutherland said there was no explanation given for why the seven pages were missing and she did not have time to ask Ms Garrahan where they were. According to Ms Sutherland, she was not able to ask Ms Garrahan any questions during this meeting; it took the whole time just to dictate the file, as it was not very legible. It was difficult to decipher the bad photocopies. Notes prepared by Ms Garrahan of her meeting with Ms Sutherland indicate that Ms Sutherland was advised that four of the missing pages contained identifying information and that the remaining pages were either lost or not photocopied. I have viewed Ms Sutherland's child file. The first seven pages include a lot of information about the situation in her home leading up to her apprehension by the CAS. They contain no more or less identifying information than the remainder of the file. I am of the view that they should have been provided to Ms Sutherland to review.

Richard Abell testified that the arrangements to have Ms Sutherland review her file with Patricia Garrahan went beyond the normal CAS practice. Although an improvement over the file summary prepared nearly two years earlier, this was clearly not a satisfactory method of providing Ms Sutherland access to her file. She was given an incomplete, difficult to read copy of her file and a limited amount of time to review it. It is obvious that the agency at this point was trying to figure out a way to provide Ms Sutherland with the information in her file without actually giving her the file. The CAS of SD&G may have been trying to improve the process, but, in my opinion, it still did not get it right.

Later that year, Ms Sutherland sent a letter, dated November 7, 1997, to Richard Abell, asking about a hospital record, which was part of the agency's files. She wrote that someone from the hospital had contacted the CAS and given it permission for the record to be disclosed to Ms Sutherland. According to Ms Sutherland, she never received a response to this letter.

Ms Sutherland's Psychiatrist Requests File Disclosure

In the fall of 1998, Ms Sutherland was seeing a psychiatrist, Dr. Cornfield. He thought it would be beneficial if he obtained a copy of her CAS file. Ms Sutherland signed a consent form pursuant to the Mental Health Act,³² which was provided to the CAS of SD&G on or about September 8, 1998. According to Ms Sutherland, the agency would not give him the file and told him to read the copy that Ms Sutherland had dictated and typed herself.

Internal CAS documents show that intake worker Carole Leblanc received the request for record disclosure from Dr. Cornfield on behalf of Catherine Sutherland. According to Ms Leblanc, Dr. Cornfield did not identify what details he wanted. He just said he was looking for information from her file as a child. Ms Leblanc spoke to Dr. Cornfield on October 6, 1998, in an attempt to get more information about his request. Ms Leblanc testified that the file was extensive and she wanted to narrow down the request. She said Dr. Cornfield was not able to provide any further detail and she had no further contact with him after this telephone call. It appears that on November 23, 1998, the matter was being transferred to the Family Services Department. Ms Leblanc testified that records disclosure was a large undertaking and there was a backlog at the time. There were only three intake workers, who were not able to complete all of the records disclosure requests. She was not able to attend to this file at the time. Ms Leblanc had no further involvement with the file after it was transferred.

On or about November 27, 1998, Bill Carriere wrote a letter to Dr. Cornfield, advising him that Ms Sutherland had been permitted to review and dictate portions of her file on March 10, 1997, and directing him to obtain a copy of the summary Ms Sutherland had dictated.

In my opinion, this was an inappropriate way to deal with a request from a medical professional. Underlying this approach is an assumption that Ms Sutherland had maintained a copy of what she had dictated and that she had dictated the entire unredacted portion of the file. The CAS could be assured of neither of these things. If a doctor requests a file for the purpose of treating a patient, the CAS should provide a copy of the file, with personal information about third parties redacted if that is deemed necessary.

Ms Sutherland Writes to Politicians for Assistance

On December 10, 1998, Cathy Sutherland wrote the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Anne McLellan, requesting her assistance. Ms McLellan responded, saying she was not at liberty to give members of the public legal advice. She suggested, however, that Ms Sutherland contact the Minister of Community and Social Services, which she did by way of a letter dated April 8, 1999. In this letter to the Honourable Janet Ecker, Ms Sutherland provided a summary of her involvement with the CAS and requested her assistance in obtaining her file from the CAS. Ms Ecker responded in a letter dated May 4, 1999. She provided Ms Sutherland with a pamphlet outlining the complaint procedure for the CAS of SD&G and encouraged her to contact area manager Pierre Lalonde if she had any difficulty.

Ms Sutherland Takes Her Concerns up the CAS Chain

Ms Sutherland took the advice she received from Minister Ecker and wrote a letter, dated May 17, 1999, to Pierre Lalonde. Among other things, she alluded to sexual abuse by her mother and wrote about the sexual abuse she alleged had occurred at the Virgin foster home. In June 1999, Ms Sutherland was advised by Mr. Lalonde that the next step in the process was to request a meeting with the Board of Directors.

Ms Sutherland made such a request in a letter dated June 8, 1999, addressed to Jeanette Scrimshaw, the president of the CAS Board of Directors. Ms Sutherland hoped that this meeting would lead to her being granted access to her file. She received a response from Ms Scrimshaw a couple of weeks later advising her that the matter would be referred to Mr. Carriere and that the complaint sub-committee of the Board would be available to her if she wished.

Ms Sutherland Is Provided With a Redacted Copy of Her File

On July 13, 1999, Ms Sutherland's file was copied and third-party names, addresses, and information about third parties were blacked out. Bill Carriere testified that a decision must have been made to provide as much information to Ms Sutherland as possible without needing to ask her for any further details.

Ms Sutherland was provided with the redacted copy of her file in August 1999. The cover letter, dated August 12, 1999, stated that the information contained within was everything the CAS thought she was entitled to view. The letter provided a coding system for the redactions, with certain numbers indicating the reason for certain information being redacted.

Ms Sutherland testified that most of the file was blacked out and it did not look much different from the one she had been permitted to view in Hamilton. She was still not satisfied and thought she was entitled to see everything in her file. There were also no medical reports in her file despite the fact that, according to Ms Sutherland, the hospital had given the CAS permission to release the medical reports to her. The only medical information Ms Sutherland received was the summary prepared by Mr. Boisvenue in August 1995.

Another Request by Dr. Cornfield, 2006

Richard Abell received a letter dated January 27, 2006, from Dr. Cornfield, who advised him that Ms Sutherland would be appearing before the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board soon and that he was seeking records to assist in this application. Having received no response, Dr. Cornfield wrote a follow-up letter dated March 16, 2006. In June 2006, Dr. Cornfield received a copy of the family file with all information pertaining to individuals other than Cathy Sutherland blacked out.

Conclusions About File Access

I have two concerns regarding Ms Sutherland's journey to obtain her CAS file: first, the extent of the access she was granted and, second, the delays. With respect to the first issue, I previously commented that summaries were both an inefficient and ineffective way to provide a former ward with information from his or her file. It appears, at least in some of the cases looked at during the Inquiry, that the CAS has moved away from this practice of providing only summaries and will provide a former ward a copy of the file with certain information blacked out. The question then becomes whether it is necessary or appropriate for the CAS to black out any information or whether the former ward should simply be given his or her entire file. Bill Carriere testified that the CAS cannot release the entire file because often there is information in it concerning other people that the person requesting the file is not entitled to. He explained that CAS files typically have a lot of information that would be considered highly personal. People reveal information that they would not want disclosed.

I appreciate this concern and accept that, if the entire file is to be released to a former ward, certain information may have to be redacted. I do not agree with the redaction of the names of foster parents, CAS workers, or even other wards who resided in a particular foster home. These are all individuals who, to varying degrees, played a significant role in a foster child's life and that child has the right to know the identity of these individuals. Although I think the names of other wards who, for example, resided in a particular foster home should be shared, I agree that personal information about those children and their particular circumstances should be redacted to protect their privacy interests.

I reiterate that I agree with the recommendation of Ian MacLean, discussed earlier, that the CAS be required to compile particular information about children in CAS care, including information about placements, schools attended, and teachers, to provide to those individuals in the future. If an individual still requests access to his or her file, it should be provided, subject to the redactions discussed above.

Once a determination is made on what material can be disclosed, the next issue is how quickly can or should this be done. In Ms Sutherland's case, it took twelve years. Both Bill Carriere and Richard Abell agreed that this was too long. Mr. Abell testified that, in the case of Ms Sutherland, the CAS of SD&G was "breaking new ground" with respect to disclosure. The CAS was going further than it ever had in terms of records disclosure; however, Mr. Abell acknowledged that, from Ms Sutherland's perspective, it was like "pulling teeth." It is clear that the CAS must do better than it did with Ms Sutherland. I appreciate that resources are an issue and understand that this issue is now being addressed. Previously, file disclosure requests were handled by the intake department, in addition to its many other tasks. Mr. Carriere commented that he did not have enough staff to deal with child protection issues, let alone disclosure requests. It is apparent that the same resources being used for child protection and child placement issues cannot also be used for records disclosure requests because inevitably the latter will be a second priority. Mr. MacLean testified that the CAS of SD&G recently hired a full-time worker to deal with record disclosure requests. He explained that currently the agency receives twenty to thirty requests per month and there are fifty-five outstanding requests. A second worker has been hired for a six-month period to handle the backlog of requests.

Although I found that the CAS was too slow in responding to Ms Sutherland and often did not provide her with information to which I think she was entitled, correspondence sent to Ms Sutherland was, for the most part, courteous, and my impression from the CAS witnesses who testified at the Inquiry is that there was a genuine concern to assist her. I am hopeful that the changes testified about by Mr. MacLean coupled with the implementation of a clear direction about the type of information that should be disclosed will ensure that, in the future, former wards of the CAS will receive adequate disclosure in a timely fashion.

Involvement With Police Forces

Beginning in the mid-1990s, Ms Sutherland had interactions with several police forces regarding her allegations of physical and sexual abuse. I do not intend to explore these in depth but will refer to them as they are part of Ms Sutherland's history.

Hamilton-Wentworth Police

In November 1996, Ms Sutherland called the Hamilton-Wentworth police to report historical child sexual abuse and provided a written statement. The police asked for more details about the sexual abuse by Carl Virgin, which she provided. However, when they asked for more specifics, Ms Sutherland testified that she “couldn’t handle it” and she asked them to put the investigation on hold.

The Ontario Provincial Police

In August 1997, the Hamilton-Wentworth police sent a letter to the Morrisburg OPP advising them that, in November 1996, Ms Sutherland had contacted them to report child abuse at the hands of her mother and sexual abuse by Carl Virgin in a foster home. The OPP was further advised that, in January 1997, Ms Sutherland asked for the investigation to put on hold but that she had recently advised that, although she did not want to deal with the sexual abuse allegations, she wanted to continue with the child abuse investigation.

An investigation was conducted by Detective Constable John Ralko of the Stormont, Dundas, and Glengarry OPP and Constable Shawn White of the Cornwall Police Service into the death of Ms Sutherland’s infant brother, the burning of her feet when she was two years old, and the mistreatment by her mother. In a letter dated March 26, 1997, Detective Constable Ralko summarized his investigation and advised Ms Sutherland that no charges would be laid, as the officer had been unable to locate any witnesses or documentary evidence to corroborate her allegations.

I have provided my findings and recommendations regarding file disclosure. I have not touched upon the matter of counselling in this section. It is covered in other sections of this chapter. Ms Sutherland recommended that wards of the CAS should be offered counselling and that the offer should remain open even if it is initially turned down. She testified that she was never offered counselling while in care. This is an issue that has arisen with many of the witnesses at the Inquiry who were former wards of the CAS.

Allegations Against Jean Luc Leblanc

In 1986, Jean Luc Leblanc was convicted of gross indecency relating to the sexual abuse of young boys. The Cornwall Police Service (CPS) and the Children’s Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS of SD&G) had been engaged in a joint investigation of the allegations giving rise to the charges against Mr. Leblanc. In 1994, 1995, 1998, and 1999, further information came to the attention of the CAS of SD&G regarding Mr. Leblanc.

The Children's Aid Society Is Notified of Allegations, 1986

In early January 1986, Jason Tyo decided to tell someone that Jean Luc Leblanc was sexually abusing him. He testified that he called the after-hours emergency number for the Children's Aid Society. He spoke to a woman and told her that he was tired of being physically abused at his home and sexually abused outside of his home. The call lasted less than five minutes. He could not remember if, during the call, he revealed who was sexually abusing him. In his view, the woman he spoke to was not sympathetic. At the time, because he had called the number of the CAS on York Street in Cornwall, he assumed he had been speaking to someone at that office. He acknowledged, however, that he may have been speaking to someone on the telephone answering service, and not with a worker from the CAS. Mr. Tyo testified that he had no recollection of the CAS calling him back the night of this call, but he thought someone from the agency called back a couple of weeks later. When someone from the CAS did call Mr. Tyo back, he said that he had already told his teacher and that the allegation was being dealt with. Mr. Tyo testified that he had not been happy with the response he had received from the CAS to his original call, and that he had cried out for help and received no response. He lost all hope with respect to the CAS. Instead, he went to see a former teacher, Dawn Raymond, about Mr. Leblanc. Mr. Tyo's disclosure of abuse to his teacher is also discussed in Chapter 10, on the institutional response of school boards.

On January 24, 1986, Lorne Lawson, the superintendent of the County Board of Education, a predecessor of the Upper Canada District School Board, contacted the CAS of SD&G and requested that a worker come to his office to discuss a sexual abuse case. Bruce Duncan was the intake worker at the CAS when the call was received. Mr. Lawson would not supply any names during the call. He told Mr. Duncan that he was confident that the CAS was not involved with the family.

Bill Carriere was Mr. Duncan's supervisor. Mr. Carriere testified that, in instances where sexual abuse was alleged, especially against people in positions of trust, his workers would come to him almost immediately, and there would be frequent communications. Mr. Duncan discussed the January 24, 1986, intake with him.

Shortly after receiving the call, Mr. Duncan met with Mr. Lawson and Dawn Raymond, a teacher, at the School Board offices. He was informed that Jason Tyo, a former student of Ms Raymond's, had disclosed to her that Jean Luc Leblanc was sexually abusing Scott Burgess, who was also a former student of Ms Raymond's. Jason Tyo did not disclose to Ms Raymond that he was also being abused by Mr. Leblanc. After teaching Scott Burgess and Jason Tyo at Gladstone Public School, Ms Raymond had become "more of a friend" to them:

they visited her home, and she was someone in whom they would confide. After Mr. Tyo's disclosure, Ms Raymond had met with Scott Burgess, who confirmed that he was being abused by Mr. Leblanc. Mr. Burgess did not want his mother to know about the alleged abuse because he was afraid of her.

After meeting with Mr. Lawson and Ms Raymond, Mr. Duncan called Angelo Towndale, director of services at the CAS of SD&G, and the Cornwall Police Service. When speaking to the CPS, he was advised that Constable Brian Payment would attend at the school. As I discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service, Constable Payment was told that the school would not allow him to speak to Scott Burgess without the consent of his parents. Mr. Duncan recorded in his notes that the school said they could not allow the police in without a warrant. The school did, however, permit Mr. Duncan to meet with Mr. Burgess.

I note that the Child Protection Protocol of 2001 addresses comprehensively the issue of the location of the interview of a child reporting abuse to someone in a school setting. It also addresses the issue of when to provide notice to the parents and when to proceed with an interview without the parents' consent. Ultimately it is always a question of judgment, and I agree with the protocol that the "best interest" of the child is paramount. In this situation, however, not permitting Constable Payment to speak to Scott Burgess had the practical effect of increasing the number of times that the young person was interviewed. The 2001 protocol provides that, if a principal is denying access to the child, the police/CAS team should follow the chain of command and may communicate with the area superintendent.

The First CAS Interview of Scott Burgess

Later in the afternoon on January 24, Mr. Duncan interviewed Scott Burgess at Central Public School about the allegations against Mr. Leblanc. Ms Raymond was present for the interview. She testified that Mr. Duncan made her ask the questions because Scott would relate better to her. She also testified that Mr. Duncan sat behind her taking notes and that he would slip her questions he wanted her to ask.

During the interview with Mr. Duncan, Scott Burgess described allegations of abuse against Mr. Leblanc. He also described alleged abuse by Mr. Leblanc against his brother, Jody Burgess, and Jason Tyo. He also provided the names of a few other young people.

After the interview, Mr. Duncan called Angelo Towndale. Mr. Duncan recorded in his notes that he would take Scott Burgess home and talk to his parents. Shortly thereafter, he spoke to Constable Brian Payment. He recorded in his notes "go to parents and see if Scott will talk" to the CPS.

The Burgess Home Visit

At 5:00 p.m., Mr. Duncan arrived at the Burgess home. There were seven children in the Burgess family, three of whom had left home by this time. Mr. and Ms Burgess were informed of what their son, Scott, had disclosed about Mr. Leblanc. They were shocked and reported that one of their older sons had been molested and that one of their daughters had been sexually assaulted. Mr. Duncan's notes of that visit appear to indicate that he interviewed Jody Burgess, who said that Mr. Leblanc was his "friend." He did not disclose that Mr. Leblanc had sexually abused him. Jody Burgess also reported allegations that Bill McKinnon had sexually abused Jason Tyo and others and that Mr. McKinnon had pictures of "many little kids."

Mr. Duncan interviewed Scott Burgess a second time while at his home. During this interview, Scott Burgess further discussed allegations of abuse against Mr. Leblanc. He agreed to be interviewed by the CPS.

CAS Fails to Interview Any Other Burgess Children

None of the other Burgess children were interviewed by Bruce Duncan during this home visit or at any time later. As is discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service, the CPS also failed to interview any of the other Burgess children. While Scott and Jody Burgess had identified other young people and children as being alleged victims, they had not identified their siblings. Years later, as a result of the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) investigation of Jean Luc Leblanc in 1999, it was determined that Cindy Burgess, the sister of Scott and Jody, had also been sexually abused by Mr. Leblanc. Had she been interviewed in 1986, this could have been determined. Scott Burgess testified that he knew in 1986 that his sister was being abused by Mr. Leblanc. Had someone asked him in 1986, "Has your sister, Cindy, ever been abused?," he would have told them.

In his testimony, Mr. Carriere acknowledged that, knowing what he knows now, it would have been a good idea to interview the other siblings. In particular, he expressed regret that Cindy Burgess was not interviewed. Mr. Carriere noted that the current standard requires all children in the family to be interviewed. If a family member is not being interviewed, an explanation must be included in the file. I agree with Mr. Carriere that all of the Burgess children should have been interviewed. Information received from such interviews, particularly of Cindy Burgess, would have furthered the criminal investigation and prosecution and, importantly, would have furthered the ultimate purpose of the CAS, the protection of children.

Further Interviews

Constable Payment interviewed Scott Burgess at the CAS offices on the evening of January 24, 1986. Mr. Duncan was present, as was Ms Raymond. Statements were taken from both Scott Burgess and Ms Raymond.

By this point, Scott Burgess had been interviewed three times that day. Mr. Carriere testified that he did not believe that there was a policy in place regarding how many interviews were appropriate for a child victim of sexual abuse. In his view, it is best to try to do as few interviews as possible because of the possibility of re-victimization. I agree with Mr. Carriere and acknowledge that victims often disclose the circumstances of abuse in incremental disclosure. This may necessitate a number of interviews. It is therefore all the more important to limit the number of interviews that are within your control. As I indicate in Chapter 6, the CAS and the CPS ought to have conducted joint interviews with all child victims to minimize the number of interviews and the trauma to the children.

On January 25, 1986, Constable Payment interviewed Jody Burgess and Jason Tyo. Mr. Duncan was not present at these interviews. On January 27, 1986, charges of gross indecency were laid against Mr. Leblanc with respect to the sexual abuse of Scott and Jody Burgess and Jason Tyo. Mr. Leblanc pleaded guilty to two out of the three charges. The arrest and prosecution of Mr. Leblanc is discussed in Chapter 6 and in Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

The CAS took appropriate steps to report Mr. Leblanc to the Child Abuse Register.

Ongoing CAS Involvement With the Burgess and Tyo Families Related to Allegations Against Mr. Leblanc

It was not until January 31, 1986, that Mr. Duncan contacted Jason Tyo's family and set up an appointment for a home visit, which was held on February 3, 1986. Mr. Carriere testified that he did not know why there was this delay.

Although Mr. Carriere testified that he did not remember this meeting, the case notes indicate that, on February 4, 1986, Mr. Duncan and Mr. Carriere met to discuss the file. Based upon comments Jason Tyo had made to Mr. Duncan and Constable Payment, there was some concern that Mr. Tyo might become a potential abuser in the future. When asked about this at the Inquiry, Jason Tyo said that this was something that should have been acted upon. Mr. Carriere testified that a plan was developed to try to get Jason Tyo to accept counselling. The case notes include references to counselling for Mr. Tyo and a referral to a sexual abuse treatment group. The notes also indicate that he never attended any counselling sessions. CAS documents indicate that Jason Tyo, at the age of fifteen, said he did not need counselling. He and his parents also felt it was not necessary that they be involved in the Family Action Program. Jason Tyo testified that he did not recall any discussions about counselling with the CAS or his mother.

On April 2, 1986, Jason Tyo's file was transferred to another CAS worker, Pina DeBellis. After this point, Mr. Carriere was no longer responsible for supervising this file. The file was closed on June 8, 1987.

Jason Tyo testified that, as a result of the abuse he suffered, he went on to abuse other people, has been in trouble with the law, has used drugs and alcohol, and has experienced depression and anxiety. He testified that he was disappointed with the CAS response to his situation. He noted that the decision to go to counselling is an adult decision that is difficult to make as a young person. In his view, people did not do enough to push him toward counselling and, if the CAS had encouraged him to go to counselling, he would not have abused. He acknowledged that he does not remember much of the contacts with the CAS but said there should have been stronger intervention. Mr. Carriere testified about his concerns regarding "forcing" someone into counselling and stated that the only way to "force" Jason Tyo into counselling would have been to obtain a court order that he was a child in need of protection. He didn't know if this would have been successful.

Both Scott and Jody Burgess testified that they did not remember any offers of counselling from the CAS in 1986. However, the CAS notes outline attempts to arrange counselling for them.

It is not surprising that Scott and Jody Burgess and Jason Tyo do not remember discussions about counselling options presented by the CAS or other institutions. The events that placed them in contact with the agency occurred some time ago, when they were young people going through what would undoubtedly have been a difficult time. While I agree with Mr. Carriere that forcing someone to attend counselling may be ineffective, or even counterproductive, I believe every effort should be made to encourage child victims of sexual abuse to attend counselling.

Bill McKinnon

When interviewed by Mr. Duncan on January 24, 1986, Jody Burgess alleged that Bill McKinnon had sexually abused Jason Tyo and others, and that Mr. McKinnon had pictures of young children. Scott Burgess testified at the Inquiry that he had also been abused by "Billy." He testified that no one had ever asked him if he had been abused by "Billy."

Mr. Duncan's notes include a reference to a discussion between Mr. Duncan and Constable Payment about "Billie." Specifically, the notes say: "Billie is so senile we may not get anywhere with him—he was very scared and was told they would watch his house." Constable Payment testified that, when this matter was discussed with Crown Attorney Don Johnson, Mr. Johnson raised a concern about Mr. McKinnon's competency to stand trial. Mr. McKinnon was seventy-one years old. The CPS did not investigate this matter further, and no charges were laid against Mr. McKinnon.

Mr. Carriere testified that he did not believe that Mr. McKinnon was investigated at all and agreed that this matter should have been followed up. He also noted: "I think if [someone is] senile and abusing, the likelihood of them stopping is not very great."

I am of the view that further steps should have been taken by the CAS of SD&G and particularly Mr. Duncan to investigate the allegations made by Jody Burgess about Bill McKinnon. While the CPS may make its own decisions about whether or not to investigate and lay charges, the CAS need not rely on that assessment to determine whether it should conduct its own investigation directed towards the protection of children. A thorough investigation should have been conducted to determine whether allegations against Bill McKinnon were within the mandate of the CAS of SD&G.

The CAS Gets Information About "Jean Luc" From a School Principal

On October 21, 1994, CAS worker Françoise Lepage received a call from Tannis Girard, a principal at St. Mary's School. Ms Girard was concerned about a student in grade 4 who was spending a lot of time with a fifty-four-year-old man by the name of "Jean Luc" who was buying him gifts, such as a dirt bike, gloves, and a helmet, and paying him money for carrying empty beer bottles. Ms Girard had addressed the issue with the student's mother, who noted that her son had spent the weekend at Jean Luc's cabin. The student had reported that another man and his daughter were there when he stayed the night. Ms Girard reported that the student's mother did not seem concerned.

The initial risk assessment by the worker was rated as low or nil. The decision under the preliminary inquiry was that there were no grounds to pursue further, and the complaint was not accepted for service. Mr. Carriere testified that he did not know what, if any, attempts were made to find out Jean Luc's last name. Jean Luc Leblanc would have been known to the agency as a convicted sex offender. Mr. Carriere further testified that there was a policy at this time that required the CAS to check the Child Abuse Register or see if there was a prior history when allegations of abuse were made.

The notes of Françoise Lepage indicate that, on October 24, 1994, she discussed the matter with Mr. Carriere because her own supervisor was absent. According to Ms Lepage's notes, she then decided she could wait to discuss the matter with her own supervisor. Mr. Carriere testified that he did not remember the discussion but noted that he was involved in the Jean Luc Leblanc matter in 1986.

After meeting with her supervisor, Ms Lepage met with the student's mother and stepfather. The home was impoverished and in desperate financial straits. The mother said that they were very vigilant with regard to the relationship between her son and "Jean Luc," and noted that her son had never disclosed any inappropriate behaviour on Jean Luc's part. The mother refused to provide Jean Luc's last name because "he was not accused." She also said that Jean Luc had lots of money and gave gifts to lots of children. When asked about this, Mr. Carriere testified that this could raise a red flag. Looking at the matter in hindsight, Mr. Carriere stated the following:

Sometimes we're faced in Child Welfare with situations that I would describe as being worrisome but you don't necessarily have the ground to have a protection application unless you can actually offer something that's concrete.

If the family says, "Thank you for your concern but I don't want you to come back to my home," you have the choice of closing the file or going to court and you have to look at, well, what evidence would I have?

And sometimes I know that our Agency has been in situations where we go to court—and this doesn't happen often—but we go almost expecting to lose but at least we're going to make an effort. This might have been one of those situations.

Mr. Carriere also acknowledged that perhaps if Ms Lepage had interviewed or visited Ms Girard, she may have been able to identify who Jean Luc was. On November 3, 1994, however, the matter was signed off.

Mr. Carriere testified that Ms Lepage was a very conscientious and responsible person. He indicated that, had the CAS had the full name of the man, it would have been a very different circumstance. There was insufficient information to open a file with only a first name, and Ms Lepage would have had a difficult time searching CAS records, such as the list of people put on the Child Abuse Register and the logbooks for suspected and verified abusers, with only a first name.

Further concerns regarding neglect were raised by Ms Girard in 1995 regarding this family, but the topic of “Jean Luc” did not resurface. As will be discussed later, this student, identified as C-82 for the purpose of the Inquiry hearings, was considered in 1999 by the OPP to be a potential victim of Mr. Leblanc, and, in 2001, Mr. Leblanc was charged in relation to sexual offences against him and others.

The CAS Gets More Information About Mr. Leblanc

On January 6, 1995, Françoise Lepage received a call from Valerie Nadon. According to Ms Lepage's notes, Ms Nadon told her that she saw a convicted sex offender, whom she referred to as Jean Luc, on January 6 or 7, 1995, with an eight-year-old boy outside her store. Ms Nadon indicated that her brothers had been sexually abused by this man when they were about the same age as this boy. Ms Lepage asked for Jean Luc's surname. On January 10, 1995, Ms Nadon called back and provided Ms Lepage with the surname “Leblanc.” According to her notes, on that same day, Ms Lepage did a records search confirming that Jean Luc Leblanc was on the Child Abuse Register.

On January 19, 1995, Ms Lepage contacted Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet of the CPS and requested a record search on Jean Luc Leblanc. He informed her that Mr. Leblanc had received a suspended sentence in 1986 and three years probation for gross indecency. Ms Lepage also made a number of calls to the court, the probation office, and to Staff Sergeant Brunet to attempt to determine any conditions on Mr. Leblanc's release, as well as his whereabouts. Ms Lepage noted that on January 25, 1995, she met with Mr. Carriere and it was decided that the CAS could not pursue the matter because it did not have Mr. Leblanc's whereabouts or any identifying information regarding the child who had been seen with him. Further, there were no allegations of harm to the child he had been seen with. Mr. Carriere testified that he did not know if he was involved in the case at this stage. The file was closed because they did not think that they could find Mr. Leblanc. It is of note that, in this instance, the file was opened under the name “Leblanc,” as the CAS did not have the names of any children involved.

With respect to the difficulty in locating Mr. Leblanc, Mr. Carriere testified that they could have asked the police to consider doing a driver's licence check for Mr. Leblanc. He specifically noted that, as a result of this case, he has “recommended to the Society that they arrange to meet with police departments to look at different ways in which they can find people that otherwise can't be found” and that “the Society ... develop a list of measures that could be taken to find people.” I agree with Mr. Carriere that this would be a good step to take.

Mr. Carriere testified that, at the time, he was not linking the concerns about “Jean Luc” that were expressed to the CAS of SD&G in the fall of 1994 by Ms Girard and those about Mr. Leblanc expressed by Ms Nadon. He testified that he was certain there was no discussion about the connection between the two reports. As a phone intake worker, Ms Lepage would have many cases referred to her and, in this instance, did not connect the dots. He suspected that, if Ms Nadon's sighting of Jean Luc Leblanc had been in the city, this fact might have contributed to the failure to connect to the earlier case, which had taken place in a county location.

A Report to CAS That C-81 Was Living in a Tent in Mr. Leblanc's Backyard

On September 3, 1998, it came to the attention of the CAS of SD&G that a young boy, C-81, had been living in a tent in a backyard in Newington. The boy had no money or clothes and was asking for food. The worker assigned to the file was Brian MacIntosh. Bill Carriere, as coordinator of services, was the supervisor who handled only the intake referral. Bernie Lamarche was the supervisor.

Case notes indicate that Mr. MacIntosh spoke to C-81 on September 3, 1998, at Mr. Leblanc's home, in whose yard C-81 had been living. C-81 indicated that he had been staying with a friend, Jean Luc Leblanc, and that his parents knew he was there. Mr. MacIntosh left his card for Mr. Leblanc and left a note at C-81's home. Mr. Carriere testified that he did not recall speaking to Mr. MacIntosh after this visit or having any knowledge that the visit was to Mr. Leblanc's home. Mr. Carriere acknowledged, however, that Mr. Leblanc was known to the CAS at this time.

On that same day, Mr. Leblanc called the CAS of SD&G and spoke to worker Gordon Lanctôt, who was the duty worker in emergency services that day. Mr. Lanctôt recorded that Mr. Leblanc told him that C-81, who was thirteen years old, and another boy, C-82, who was fourteen, had permission to camp in his yard. Mr. Lanctôt recorded that he stated to Mr. Leblanc that he was not aware of the case and suggested that Mr. Leblanc call Mr. MacIntosh. He also noted that he would inform Mr. MacIntosh of the call. Mr. Carriere testified that Mr. Lanctôt did not check Mr. Leblanc's name or the name of the boys. Mr. Carriere would not have expected the after-hour worker to do so.

On September 8, 1998, Mr. MacIntosh called Mr. Leblanc. According to Mr. MacIntosh's notes, Mr. Leblanc said that C-81 was there because he liked to hang around with another boy in the community, C-82. He said C-81 was not abandoned and that his mother had picked him up the previous night. At this point, Mr. MacIntosh had neither spoken to the mother nor realized that Mr. Leblanc was a convicted sex offender who was known to the agency.

That same day, Mr. MacIntosh did try to contact C-81's mother, but spoke only to her boyfriend. On September 11, 1998, he spoke to C-81's mother, who was upset that her son had told people in Newington that he had been left. C-81's mother said he was not abandoned. As will be discussed below, it is of note that, on this very day, another worker at the CAS also received information from the CPS that Mr. Leblanc had been seen in the company of young boys.

CAS documents dated September 14, 1998, indicate that C-81 was living with a family friend, Jean Luc Leblanc, and that his mother had given him permission to be there. The family was in temporary accommodations because they had bought a farm and would be moving mid-September. C-81 had returned home on September 8, 1998. The plan was to close the file. Mr. Carriere testified that there was no information available to Mr. MacIntosh to suggest that Mr. Leblanc had harmed this child or was going to harm the child. The child was not reporting that he had been harmed, and the mother subsequently didn't suggest that she was upset about anything. That said, he wished that they had "connected the dots." Mr. Carriere testified that, had Mr. MacIntosh known who Mr. Leblanc was, he would have expected a different course of action.

According to Mr. Carriere, in a perfect world, one would want to check every name, but so many names go by a CAS worker in the course of a day that a considerable amount of time could be spent checking them. The actual process of doing it is quite simple but, like most tasks, it stretches out. He did not know what could have been done differently, short of checking every name. He noted that there are certain situations in which names should be checked and that guidelines as to when those names ought to be checked would be helpful. He provided, by way of example, that an automatic check could be done when a child is staying with a substitute caregiver. I agree with Mr. Carriere.

It was only on January 7, 1999, that the CAS realized that C-81 had been staying in the backyard of convicted sex offender Jean Luc Leblanc. Mr. MacIntosh had read a newspaper article that explained that Mr. Leblanc of Newington had been charged with sexual assault as a result of the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) Project Truth investigation. Mr. MacIntosh contacted Detective Constable Steve Seguin of the OPP and informed him of the agency's involvement with C-81 in 1998. Mr. MacIntosh was advised that C-81 had already been interviewed and, during this interview, had not disclosed sexual abuse. Mr. Leblanc was eventually charged with four counts of sexual offences involving C-81. The investigation, arrest, and prosecution of Jean Luc Leblanc is discussed in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the OPP, and Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

This incident prompted a risk management conference to determine if the CAS of SD&G needed to take any further steps. The minutes of the meeting indicate that a decision was made to contact the police and ask if the agency could communicate with C-81's parents in order to receive their assurances that there would be no further contact between Mr. Leblanc and C-81. Mr. Carriere testified that, depending upon the response of the parents when spoken to, there may have been some follow-up with the child.

Report to CAS That Mr. Leblanc Was Seen With Young Boys

Around the same time that Mr. MacIntosh was made aware that C-81 was sleeping in a tent in the backyard of Jean Luc Leblanc's home in Newington, on September 11, 1998, CAS worker Lise Stanley, received a call from Constable George Tyo of the CPS. Constable Tyo was calling to pass on information the police had received from Vivian Burgess, the mother of Scott and Jody Burgess, who had both been sexually abused by Mr. Leblanc in 1986. Ms Burgess contacted the police because her daughters saw Mr. Leblanc in the company of two young boys at the shopping centre and the motor speedway in Cornwall.

The family was quite concerned that the children might be at risk from this individual, as they appeared to be around the same age as the Burgess boys when they were sexually abused by Mr. Leblanc. Constable Tyo indicated that Mr. Leblanc lived in the Newington area and that this information had been passed on to the Long Sault OPP.

Ms Stanley consulted with Mr. Carriere later that day. She reported that a decision had been made to contact Mr. Leblanc and invite him to come into the agency to discuss concerns that it had regarding him associating with young people. She also reported that she planned to contact the main source of the referral and the OPP to obtain further information, if any, on Jean Luc Leblanc.

Mr. Carriere testified that the CAS of SD&G was aware that one of the conditions of Mr. Leblanc's sentence was to get counselling. The agency had not received any reports that Mr. Leblanc had harmed anyone and when the CAS followed up with various professionals, they knew nothing of him. In having Mr. Leblanc come in, the goal was to determine whether he had received any treatment and to plan accordingly.

Mr. Carriere testified that Mr. Leblanc was never brought in and that he did not think that Ms Stanley had spoken to the OPP. He explained that the failure to bring in Mr. Leblanc was the result of a "workload issue" with Ms Stanley. She was a phone intake worker and was too busy to do these tasks. Mr. Carriere acknowledged that he should have assigned this case to an investigator and told them to meet with Mr. Leblanc promptly. He also acknowledged that the OPP should have been contacted at an early stage to find out what, if anything, they were going to do.

Mr. Carriere acknowledged that this case did not receive much priority. This was despite the CAS's knowledge that Mr. Leblanc was a convicted sex offender.

CAS–OPP Project Truth Contact Regarding Jean Luc Leblanc

On January 14, 1999, CAS worker Pina DeBellis was contacted by Constable Joe Dupuis, an OPP Project Truth officer investigating allegations against Mr. Leblanc. He was looking for the contact information for the principal from St. Mary's School who had referred the matter regarding C-82 to the CAS in 1994. The OPP was considering C-82 as a new alleged victim of Mr. Leblanc.

Mr. Carriere indicated that the OPP were concerned with boys going to Mr. Leblanc's residence after running away from a foster home. C-82 was one of these boys. As is discussed in Chapter 7, on the OPP, Mr. Leblanc had been charged in January 1999, and one of the conditions of his release was that he not be in contact with children under sixteen unless supervised. Mr. Carriere testified that he had a telephone conversation with a police officer from the OPP and helped the officer get in touch with C-82.

The file notes suggest that the CAS communicated to Constable Dupuis that the CAS file system was not set up by alleged offender but by victim. Presumably, this may create some challenges in gathering information if only the alleged offender is identified in a complaint. Mr. Carriere testified that, in 1999, the CAS would have had information about Mr. Leblanc in the files of the 1986 victims known to the agency. Also, as noted above, in 1995 a file was opened in Leblanc's name, as the CAS did not have the names of the victims. It would have also have had a binder of suspected or verified offenders and could have checked the Child Abuse Register. If the police had provided a list of children, it could have also checked to see if the agency had files on those children.

The CAS did not conduct an administrative review in the Leblanc matter to determine what went wrong and to try to make changes to its internal system.

Cross-Referencing of Files and Information

The CAS of SD&G was actively involved in the 1986 investigation that resulted in Jean Luc Leblanc's conviction for sexual offences involving children. In the 1990s, on several different occasions, the CAS of SD&G was made aware of incidents of children being in the company of a man named "Jean Luc" and, at times, even had his full name. However, it was not until the publication of Mr. Leblanc's arrest by Project Truth officers in 1999 that the CAS of SD&G realized who Jean Luc Leblanc was. The institutional response of the CAS, its managers, and employees was deficient on each of these occasions.

In my opinion, it is imperative that an agency that deals with a matter as vital and sensitive as the protection of children have an adequate system for cross-referencing and searching names of alleged or convicted child abusers.

Conclusion

In examining the institutional response of the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS of SD&G), I had the opportunity to review a great deal of documentary evidence and to hear testimony from a number of CAS managers, supervisors, and case workers and former wards of the CAS of SD&G. Throughout this chapter, I have made some conclusions and recommendations about specific issues, and I will not repeat them here. I would instead like to comment on some of the general themes that have become apparent as a result of my examination of the agency's institutional response.

In this chapter, I examined incidents of abuse at several foster homes and group homes operated by the CAS of SD&G and the response of the agency to these allegations. I also looked at the role of the CAS of SD&G in investigations of allegations of abuse of children not in the agency's care, such as its involvement in the investigation of Father Charles MacDonald in 1993–1994, Jean Luc Leblanc in 1986, and Earl Landry Jr. in 1985 and 1993. I also examined the interactions that the CAS of SD&G had with public institutions, such as police services, school boards, the Crown attorney's office, the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, and other public and community agencies and organizations. I have made recommendations that I believe may enhance those relations in an effort to improve the response to allegations of abuse in this community and others.

Today, child protection is a highly regulated and document-intensive area. I began this chapter with an examination of the evolution of legislation and the policies, protocols, and procedures of the CAS of SD&G in dealing with issues such as the duty to report, the operation of foster homes, the investigation of child abuse allegations, and reporting to the Child Abuse Register.

Over the past thirty years, there has been a vast improvement in the formalization of procedures and policies regarding how the CAS of SD&G operates. Of particular importance has been the development of policies pertaining to the screening and training of staff, intake and investigation procedures, and foster homes. Although training of staff has been much more extensive and formalized than it was previously, I was disappointed to hear of the suspension of the investigative training provided by the Institute for the Prevention of Child Abuse and then the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies, at times in partnership with the Ontario Police College. This training was provided to CAS and police jointly. I heard testimony from many witnesses about how valuable this training was. I recommend that a similar type of joint training be reinstituted, to be offered to both social workers and police officers.

I heard evidence that the Child Abuse Register (CAR) and the Child Protection Fast Track Information System are not available to Children's Aid Societies in Ontario for the purpose of screening potential employees or foster parents. I recommended that a review of the purpose and usefulness of the CAR be undertaken and consideration be given to whether it still serves a useful purpose in its present form. If the decision is made to keep the CAR, I echo the recommendations made by several witnesses that the names of victims be excluded from the register and that it be used as a screening tool for potential employees and foster parents.

In terms of intake procedures, the introduction of the Ontario Risk Assessment Model (ORAM) in 1998 provided clearer guidance to workers about which referrals require further involvement of the agency and also gave greater prominence to cases of historical sexual abuse than did past guidelines and procedures.

Although I am pleased to see the extensive number of policies and protocols that have been put into place by the CAS of SD&G, I note that the agency has not established a schedule for reviewing and updating of applicable protocols and policies. As a result, it appears that some time has passed without update. For example, the multi-agency protocol "Child Protection Protocol: A Coordinated Response in Eastern Ontario" was adopted in 2001. It is my view that a schedule for review and appropriate updates of protocols and policies should be developed, ideally with every protocol and policy being reviewed every three years, and more frequently if there is relevant legislative change.

Although internal policies and protocols within the CAS of SD&G have clarified the agency's involvement in cases of historical sexual abuse, the legislative duty to report cases of historical sexual abuse remains unclear. Witnesses from other institutions testified that the duty to report in historical cases was not clear. The most prominent example of this is in the case of David Silmsen's allegations against Father MacDonald. Because the CAS's mandate does not extend to adults, and Mr. Silmsen was an adult making an allegation of historical sexual assault, there was some confusion about whether this allegation should be reported to the CAS. Richard Abell testified that he felt it was clear that this allegation should be reported because Father MacDonald was an active priest and therefore still could pose a risk to children. Currently, the legislation provides for a duty to report in a number of circumstances, including when "there is a risk that the child is likely to be sexually molested or sexually exploited..." This can be interpreted as requiring someone to report an allegation of historical sexual abuse where there is a suspicion that the alleged abuser could be currently abusing children. However, the use of the phrase "the child" may be interpreted as requiring suspicion that a particular child may be at risk of abuse. I recommend that the legislation be amended to clarify that the duty to report provisions apply to cases of historical abuse where there is a risk that the alleged abuser has current access to children.

There is also a lack of clarity about which cases the CAS will become involved in. The CAS does not investigate all cases of harm to children but rather investigates only those cases in which harm is caused by a “caregiver” or a person “in charge of the child.” The 1985 allegations against Earl Landry Jr., for example, were not investigated by the CAS of SD&G because the agency did not consider Mr. Landry Jr., a caretaker at a park, to be a “caregiver.” Therefore, he did not fit within the mandate of the agency. The definition of “caregiver” is found in the eligibility spectrum, which is one component of ORAM. That document provides for three types of caregivers. A primary caregiver is a child’s parent, a caregiver exercising access contact, and an adult with a custody and control order for the child in question. An assigned caregiver includes a daycare worker, babysitter, a family member providing substitute care, and a partner of the caregiver. An assumed caregiver includes individuals such as teachers, school bus drivers, and recreational group leaders. I heard from CAS witnesses that, although this definition has expanded over time to include more categories of individuals, it is still not clear in certain circumstances.

Part of the difficulty arises from the fact that the current Child and Family Services Act uses the term “having charge of the child” rather than “caregiver.” The phrase “having charge of a child” is not defined in the Act. It is explained for CAS workers in the Ministry’s Standards and Guidelines (1992) as referring to a parent, a person exercising parental rights, or anyone having responsibility for caring for a child. The guidelines provide that the determination of whether or not someone is in charge of a child will depend on the facts of each case.

I recommend that steps be taken to ensure that the language used in the legislation and in CAS policy documents is consistent. The definition of caregiver in the eligibility spectrum should be consistent with the definition of a person having charge of a child found in the Child and Family Services Act, and in the Revised Standards and Guidelines (1992). The definitions should be clarified and extended to ensure that the CAS is involved in reported allegations of historical abuse when there is a child currently at risk.

This is an area where joint training could help ensure that all institutions that frequently come into contact with children are aware of, and have the same understanding about, their obligations to report to the CAS and about the mandate of the CAS.

I also considered in this chapter the investigation by the CAS of SD&G of allegations of sexual and physical abuse made by children in the care of the agency against foster parents and CAS case workers. The CAS takes children out of situations of abuse or neglect and places them in what are supposed to be safe environments. Unfortunately, some of these placements were not safe, and these children and youth continued to be victimized. The tendency in the past to not believe children, especially “troubled” or “bad” children, meant that these allegations were often dismissed as lies and exaggerations. The reaction of the agency to allegations made by girls living in the Cieslewicz home is an example of this issue. The allegations by several girls in that home were dismissed because the girls were thought to have a tendency to lie. Promiscuity was also often noted as a reason not to investigate the allegations or as a factor mitigating the seriousness of the allegations. I am hopeful that we have emerged from the time when such attitudes were prevalent and acceptable. All allegations of abuse made by children must be treated as serious, regardless of the child’s background or behaviour.

In a number of cases I looked at, allegations made by children in the care of the CAS were not reported to the police. This occurred with respect to allegations made against members of the foster families in both the Cieslewicz and Lapensee homes. The practice of the CAS of SD&G was to discuss these matters with the Crown attorney and not refer them to the police unless specifically told to do so. Because it is the police, and not the Crown attorney, who investigate and decide whether charges are warranted, all allegations of abuse should be reported to the police. I am satisfied that this issue is now addressed by CAS policy.

A number of the cases I looked at involved allegations against staff of the CAS of SD&G. In particular, C-14 alleged that his worker, Bryan Keough, was aware of the abuse he suffered at the Barber foster home. Jeannette Antoine also disclosed allegations of abuse by Bryan Keough to the CAS of SD&G in 1989. In neither case did the agency retain an outside Children’s Aid Society to investigate the matter, and, in the case of C-14, Mr. Keough himself conducted the investigation. I understand that the practice today is that an outside agency is brought in to investigate when allegations are made against an employee of the CAS of SD&G. This practice was formalized in the 2001 “Child Protection Protocol: Coordinated Response in Eastern Ontario.” Although I am pleased that there has been some formalization of this practice, this is a joint protocol with a number of other agencies. I recommend that the CAS of SD&G have an internal, and more detailed, policy about how to handle these conflicts of interest.

Several individuals testified that they disclosed abuse to a CAS worker but there was no follow-up. Such allegations were made by C-14, Jeannette Antoine, Catherine Sutherland, and Roberta Archambault. In all of these cases, there was no recording of this disclosure in the child’s file. As I commented throughout this chapter, I am not prepared to conclude that the absence of such a recording means the disclosure never occurred. I also discussed the fact that, in many of these cases, there were entries in the file about sexual misbehaviour that, given the age of the children, should have alerted the CAS to potential issues and warranted some investigation.

Another problem faced by many of the former wards who testified before me was gaining access to their file after they had left the care of the CAS of SD&G. These individuals had to contend with excessive delays and insufficient disclosure and often had to retain counsel to assist them in dealing with the agency on this issue. In the case of Catherine Sutherland, it took twelve years, and numerous letters to CAS staff, board members, and a politicians before she received a heavily redacted copy of her file. I have commented on a recommendation made by Ian MacLean that certain information about a child's life while in the care of the CAS be compiled and disclosed to the individual if requested in later years. Steps should be taken to make the compilation and disclosure, if requested, of this information mandatory for all Children's Aid Societies in Ontario.

In several cases I looked at, an issue arose about whether the CAS should notify the employer of an individual accused of sexual abuse, and, if so, when that notification should take place. It appears that, currently, there is no legislative or policy guidance on this point, and the CAS of SD&G considers this issue on a case-by-case basis. I found the practice of the agency to be inconsistent on this issue. When a decision was made to initiate the Project Blue investigation into Father MacDonald, officials from the CAS of SD&G met with Bishop Eugène LaRocque and advised him of the impending investigation. In this case, the Bishop was already aware of the allegations against the priest, which may have made this a different situation from one in which the employer has no advance knowledge of the allegations. However, despite this knowledge, the CAS of SD&G still felt it was necessary to obtain Father MacDonald's consent before informing the Bishop of the results of the investigation. In the case of Bernie Campbell, a volunteer coach, the Cornwall Parks and Recreation Department was contacted immediately, but in the cases of Earl Landry Jr. and David Silmsers' allegations against Marcel Lalonde, the employers were not contacted. Given this inconsistency, I am of the view that there needs to be some direction about when an employer should be notified.

It is my view that the CAS of SD&G should formally develop a policy regarding disclosure of allegations of abuse to employers. There is a provision in the 2001 protocol about notifying an employer in cases of individuals employed in a school or childcare setting. However, this provision is not broad enough, and the Ministry of Community and Social Services should develop a standard to assist Children's Aid Societies across Ontario in determining which institutions they should be informing and in what circumstances. This policy should require disclosure to employers when an employee has allegedly sexually abused a child and the employee, as part of his or her work, has regular contact with children. This policy should also address at what point disclosure will be made. For example, disclosure could be made upon receipt of a credible allegation or upon verification of abuse following a CAS investigation.

There should be designated individuals who review disclosure to employers to ensure consistency, and, in addition to file-specific documentation, there should be central files maintained on all disclosures.

There has been extensive development of policies and procedures within the CAS of SD&G and a tremendous shift in the attitudes and practices of those responsible for protecting children in need. I have made comments in this chapter about a couple of individuals from the CAS of SD&G involved in some of the cases I reviewed. I wish to make a few comments here about a number of other people. I found Richard Abell to be a candid and humble witness. His extensive and legible contemporaneous notes of events, in particular those relating to Project Blue, were of great assistance to me and other witnesses in trying to determine what happened a number of years ago. I am extremely grateful to Bill Carriere for his forthright evidence and insightful recommendations and for his effort in working with the CAS of SD&G in preparing for this Inquiry. I found that both Mr. Carriere and Mr. Abell readily admitted past errors. These men dedicated their careers to assisting children in need. Regardless of any errors they may have made in the past, I believe they were committed and compassionate about their work and no doubt improved the lives of many children in Ontario. Finally, I want to commend Tom O'Brien for having the tenacity and strength to testify at the Inquiry despite medical issues that made his attendance difficult for him.

I hope that this chapter has provided some guidance to the CAS and other institutions, and some answers to former wards of the agency and to the public. I hope and expect that the CAS of SD&G will use my findings and recommendations to continue to improve the vital service it provides to children and families in Ontario.

Recommendations

Policies, Procedures, and Protocols

1. Steps should be taken to ensure that the language used in the Child and Family Services Act and in Children's Aid Society (CAS) policy documents is consistent. The definition of caregiver in the eligibility spectrum should be consistent with the definition of a person having charge of a child found in the Child and Family Services Act, and in the Revised Standards and Guidelines (1992). The definitions in CAS policy documents should be clarified in order to provide more certainty as to when the agency does or does not get involved in an allegation of abuse, particularly in extra-familial situations.
2. The CAS of SD&G should develop a schedule to review and update policies and protocols triennially, and more frequently if there is a relevant legislative change.

Records

3. The CAS of Stormont, Dundas, & Glengarry (SD&G) should review its records-management system to ensure that the information it obtains can be easily cross-referenced throughout its activities, whether it receives child-protection information, foster-parent applications, or other information.
4. The CAS of SD&G should develop or augment guidelines to indicate when the names of individuals should be checked to see if they appear in any CAS records or databases. An automatic check should be performed whenever a child is staying with a substitute caregiver.
5. Case recordings made by CAS of SD&G workers should be more detailed. They should include the location of any meeting or interview with a child in care and should include more details of the supporting facts and observations when inferences related to sexual conduct are being drawn.

Foster-Home Files to Be Updated Regularly

6. The CAS of SD&G should ensure that foster-home files are updated regularly, particularly in cases where various workers are involved with children in the home.

Foster Children to Be Questioned Outside the Home

7. The CAS of SD&G should require workers to conduct meetings with children without the presence of foster parents, preferably in a location outside the foster home.

Unscheduled Visits to Foster Homes

8. The government of Ontario, and in particular the Ministry of Children and Youth Services or the Ministry of Community and Social Services, should make it mandatory that the CAS include in service agreements with foster parents unscheduled worker visits to foster homes.

Prevention of Conflicts of Interest in CAS Investigations

9. The CAS of SD&G should develop a detailed internal policy about how to handle situations where there is a conflict of interest, such as when allegations of sexual assault/abuse³³ are made by a ward against an agency employee or when an employee applies to be a foster parent or adopt a child. The policy should include a clear definition of a conflict of interest and require that an outside agency be asked to investigate in all cases where there is such a conflict.

Sexual Abuse Allegations to Be Communicated to the Police

10. The CAS of SD&G should amend its foster-care policy to provide that all serious occurrences involving allegations of sexual assault/abuse should be reported to the police for further investigation.

Disclosure to Employers

11. The government of Ontario, and in particular the Ministry of Community and Social Services or the Ministry of Children and Youth Services should develop a protocol to assist Children's Aid Societies across Ontario in determining when an employer should be advised of sexual assault/abuse allegations against one of its employees. This policy should require disclosure to employers

33. The reference to sexual assault/abuse refers to the sexual abuse of children and young people, whether current or historical, unless defined otherwise.

when an employee has allegedly sexually abused a child and the employee, as part of his or her work, has regular contact with children. Notification should take place only after a preliminary analysis. If there is a subsequent verification of the sexual abuse, given that the societal interest in the protection of children outweighs individual privacy interests, the CAS need not seek the employee's consent before its disclosure to the employer.

Duty to Report

12. The government of Ontario should amend the Child and Family Services Act to clarify that the duty-to-report provisions apply to cases of historical abuse where there is a risk that the alleged abuser has current access to children.

File Disclosure

13. The government of Ontario, and in particular, the Ministry of Community and Social Services or the Ministry of Children and Youth Services, should develop standards and provide guidance to all CAS on disclosure of records and the type of records individuals formerly in the care of a CAS should receive. This should include a review of the provisions of Part VIII of the Child and Family Services Act, which deals with confidentiality and access to records.
14. The government of Ontario and, in particular, the Ministry of Community and Social Services or the Ministry of Children and Youth Services, should require Children's Aid Societies to compile the following information with respect to all wards in their care:
 - a record of their updated social history;
 - their full medical history;
 - the contact information for mental health professionals who have done tests and produced reports for them, along with information on how to obtain those reports and test results;
 - a full list of schools attended, with the names of teachers, the grades completed, and copies of report cards;
 - a list of the foster homes where they lived, including the dates and placements and the names of the foster family members living with them in the home; and

- a list of churches, clubs, and so on, attended and any certificates received from these organizations.

A sign-off by a parent or guardian or the youth him- or herself would be required prior to authorizing the release of the information. A full copy of the material, including the sign-off, would be kept by the CAS at the front of the child's file and, except in exceptional circumstances, would be immediately available to the individual if requested in later years.

15. If requested, the CAS of SD&G should provide former wards or those subject to protection orders with timely access to a copy of their file with confidential information pertaining to other people redacted. Except in exceptional circumstances, information such as the following should not be redacted:
 - a. the names of foster parents
 - b. the names of CAS worker(s); and
 - c. the names of other wards residing in a particular foster home. (Personal information about the children and their particular circumstances should be redacted to protect their privacy interests.)

Counselling

16. The CAS of SD&G should ensure that every effort is made to encourage and support wards who have been sexually assaulted/abused to attend counselling.

Reassessment of the Child Abuse Register

17. The government of Ontario and, in particular, the Ministry of Community and Social Services or the Ministry of Children and Youth Services, should undertake a review of the Child Abuse Register and determine whether it still serves a useful purpose in its present form. If the decision is made to keep the Child Abuse Register, it should be revised to exclude the names of victims and the CAS should be allowed to use it as a screening tool for potential employees and foster parents.
18. The government of Ontario should permit the CAS to use the Child Abuse Register and the Child Protection Fast Track Information System to screen its prospective employees and foster parents.

Recommendations for the Children's Aid Society of Stormont, Dundas, & Glengarry and Other Public Institutions

Joint Training

19. The government of Ontario and the responsible ministries should reinstitute joint training for CAS and police officers as soon as practicable. This joint training should include specific training on responding to historical allegations of abuse. For some aspects of training, consideration should be given to including other Justice partners, such as Crown counsel or those working in hospitals, in specialized assault units. Joint training might also support more standardization or the development of “best practices” protocols between police and Children's Aid Societies.

Child Protection Protocol, 2001

20. The CAS of SD&G is a partner in the “Child Protection Protocol: A Coordinated Response in Eastern Ontario” (July 2001). Since this protocol has not been updated, the CAS of SD&G should meet as soon as practicable with other partners to review and update the protocol. For those partners actively involved in the investigation and prosecution of sexual assault/abuse cases, consistent roles for the participants should be set out as well as guidance on the sharing of information between investigating bodies. The process of reviewing and updating the protocol should continue triennially.

Institutional Response of School Boards

The Upper Canada District School Board (UCDSB) and the Catholic District School Board of Eastern Ontario (CDSBEO) are both parties to this Inquiry. This chapter sets out the institutional response of the two boards and of predecessor boards with respect to allegations of sexual abuse of children and young people. For both boards, information on the characteristics of the boards and relevant policy change over time is discussed. As context, information is provided on the special features of a Catholic education within a publicly funded school system and how changes to how Catholic education is funded have affected organizational change at both school boards.

The sections on the UCDSB address issues related to three men employed by predecessor school boards: Robert Sabourin, Gilles Deslauriers, and Nelson Barque. Also examined are the circumstances that led to the hiring of Jean Luc Leblanc, an individual convicted of sexual offences against children, as a school bus driver for the UCDSB, and the actions taken by employees of that Board in response to the arrest of Mr. Leblanc in January 1998 for additional sexual offences.

The sections on the CDSBEO address issues related to teachers Marcel Lalonde and Gilf Greggain and to Principal Lucien Labelle.

Where relevant to the subject matter discussed, I make recommendations for future change.

Upper Canada District School Board

Introduction

The Upper Canada District School Board (UCDSB) is a publicly funded English-language board serving students in the County of Lanark, the United Counties of Leeds & Grenville, the United Counties of Prescott and Russell, and the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry. Its head office is in Brockville and there are four satellite offices, one of which is in Cornwall.

The Board has 21,000 students in 79 elementary schools and 13,000 secondary students in 24 secondary schools. Approximately 2,500 students attend alternative and continuing education programs at 30 sites across the Board. There are 5,500 staff, including teachers, administrative, professional, and custodial staff.

Reorganizations Affecting the School Board Over Time

Before 1990, the public school boards in the Cornwall area provided services to elementary and secondary English and French students and Catholic secondary students. Catholic secondary school students moved to Catholic boards in a gradual process between 1984 and 1990, as the government of Ontario provided full funding. In 1997 and 1998, French-language elementary and secondary schools and students moved to French-language school boards. When secondary-level Catholic French schools, such as La Citadelle, were transferred to a new board, all facilities and staff went with the transferred school. La Citadelle was transferred to a Catholic school board in 1989, and subsequently to a French-language Catholic school board.

School board reorganization has occurred several times in the past. For example, there was a 1969 amalgamation that created the Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (SD&G) County Board of Education. In the 1970s and 1980s, this Board had approximately 54 schools, 12,000–14,000 students, 800 teachers, and 400 staff. Students and staff reduced over time, due to declining enrolment and movement of Catholic secondary students to schools in Catholic boards. In 1997, there was a major restructuring of several area school boards pursuant to the Fewer School Boards Act, 1997.¹ Four area public school boards, including the SD&G County Board of Education, were merged to create the current Upper Canada District School Board. There are still outstanding issues from this challenging amalgamation and restructuring. The current Director of Education, David Thomas, testified that some protocols still need to be brought “up to speed.”

School Management Structure

Principals manage elementary and secondary schools; for some larger schools, they are assisted by vice-principals. Principals are responsible for the administration of educational programs, supervision of teaching and administrative staff, discipline of students, and management of school facilities. Before the 1990s, principals were part of collective bargaining units for teachers.

1. S.O. 1997, c. 3.

Principals report to superintendents, who usually have responsibility for groups or “families” of schools and sometimes have additional program responsibilities on behalf of the Board, such as responsibility for special education. In more recent times, responding to the Robins Report² and to Ministry of Education initiatives on safe school environments, there has been a Safe Schools Superintendent. Superintendents report to the Director of Education, who reports to the Board and is also the Secretary of the Board of Trustees.

Duty to Report Abuse

The 1965 *Child Welfare Act*³ provided that “every person” must report a child in need of protection to the Children’s Aid Society (CAS). The Act did not specifically mention teachers, principals, or other professionals. The law relieved those reporting from the obligation to treat information as subject to legal restrictions, so teachers and staff could obtain and transmit confidential information in making reports to Children’s Aid Societies. Changes to the Child Welfare Act occurred in 1978.⁴ Specific references to reporting “abuse” were added to the requirement to report a child in need of protection, and specific responsibilities were introduced for professionals, such as teachers, to report. Penalties for failure to report were also set out.

Mr. T. Rosaire Leger, who was the Director of Education for the SD&G County Board of Education from 1973 to 1988, indicated that these changes were communicated through regular staff meetings with principals during the 1970s and 1980s. Special education teachers were also informed.

Further amendments to the Child and Family Services Act, the successor to the Child Welfare Act, occurred in 1984 regarding the duty to report.⁵ Mr. Leger testified that this information was communicated at general meetings, through principals’ meetings, and through the established special education network. Mr. James Dilamarter succeeded Mr. Leger as the Director of Education for the SD&G County Board of Education. He held this position until 1997, following which he was the Interim Director of the UCDSB for three months in late 1997 and early 1998. He testified that during his tenure as Director of Education, this communication approach continued but there was also the introduction of a written policy manual, which will be discussed later in this section.

5. Child and Family Services Act, 1984, S.O. 1984, c. 55, consolidated in 1990 as the Child and Family Services Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.11.

Mr. Leger testified that allegations made against someone not employed by the School Board would usually be reported to a superintendent but not necessarily to the Board since they did not relate to a staff member.

Hiring and Termination of Teachers

Hiring of teachers has always been done at the School Board level. Mr. Leger testified that during his tenure in the 1970s and 1980s, he advocated direct reference checks by telephone rather than relying on written references. Teachers were also required to have teaching certificates and certain other qualifications related to education. Today, the Board does criminal record checks on all employees.

Before 1988, there was no written policy governing what to do if there was a report of abuse by a teacher or other school employee. The practice was to remove the accused person from his or her duties, report to the CAS, and send the person home with pay. The individual would be suspended with pay until criminal charges were resolved and/or the CAS investigation completed. Mr. Leger testified that any report of abuse against a teacher had to be reported to the Director of Education and the School Board.

In April 1989, the Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry County Child Abuse Protocol came into effect. It was a written consolidation of the procedures in effect before the protocol was implemented. James Dilamarter testified that as the new Director of Education, he thought the procedures should be in written form. This protocol was in effect until 1998.

The current policy continues to be that an employee who is accused of abuse is suspended with pay and removed from the school setting by the Human Resources Department. Amendments to the *Education Act*⁶ in 2002⁷ provide that if teachers are charged with sexual offences regarding minors or other offences that place students at risk, they must be removed from classroom duties. The current Director of Education, David Thomas, indicated that this statutory obligation was already “long-standing” UCDSB policy.

From 1993 until direct reporting to the Ontario College of Teachers was instituted, school boards were required to report to the Ministry of Education convictions of teachers for any offences involving sexual conduct and minors or any other offences that could place pupils at risk. School boards must now report teachers who are charged or convicted directly to the Ontario College of Teachers. The College also has an obligation to inform school boards of any outcome of its licensing or disciplinary processes.

6. R.S.O. 1990, c. E.2.

7. Student Protection Act, 2002, S.O. 2002, c. 7.

If the CAS or police declines to investigate or there is no conviction, the UCDSB may still perform a further investigation and terminate an employee. UCDSB policy following conviction requires termination but if the individual is acquitted, the UCDSB conducts a comprehensive review and has discussions with the College of Teachers. Even on acquittal, the UCDSB may terminate a teacher.

The 2002 Ontario College of Teachers Professional Advisory provides that in the case of misconduct that is not of a criminal nature, school board staff or a third party may conduct an investigation. For example, a teacher's inviting students to his or her home to swim in the pool may not be criminal but is inappropriate. In addition, the Ontario College of Teachers Act, 1996 contains a definition of sexual abuse, and any of the acts included in the definition would be considered professional misconduct. The UCDSB has no specific policy on steps or procedures for sexual misconduct that is not criminal or reportable. In such cases, it exercises individual discretion and confers with counsel.

The current policy of the UCDSB is to provide a "full reference or no reference" for departing teachers. This follows the Ontario College of Teachers reporting procedures. In addition, personnel files reflect the reasons for any resignations related to allegations of sexual misconduct.

Transportation Contractors

Private providers deliver school bus services under contract with the UCDSB. This was also the case with the Board's predecessors. Although there was an expectation that transportation service providers would screen their own drivers, prior to 1999 there were no formal, documented requirements. Criminal record checks are done by the Ministry of Transportation as part of the application for a "B" class licence, which is required to operate a school bus. Since 1994, the Ministry cannot license drivers as school bus drivers if they have a conviction involving abuse of a minor within the last five years. An older record can be reviewed, and there is discretion for the Ministry of Transportation to refuse a licence even for a very old conviction.

UCDSB officials indicated in correspondence in 1999 that it was expected that if a driver was a risk to pupils (for example, charged with a sexual offence), the operator would remove the driver from a school route. Mr. Leger testified that he was not aware of any incidents during his tenure in the 1970s and 1980s. Current Director of Education David Thomas confirmed that this expectation for school bus operators continues to apply at the UCDSB.

In early 1999, formal standards of performance were developed by the UCDSB and incorporated into contracts with school bus operator contractors. Subsequently, a new draft transportation contract was circulated that included a provision requiring bus operators to obtain police criminal record checks for all new drivers prior to employment.

Relevant Protocols and Policies

Before 1989, many of the administrative processes and practices developed to respond to allegations of abuse were unwritten. In 1989, these were codified in the policy manual of the Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry County Board of Education. The policy manual included a child abuse protocol. While the protocol is dated 1989, Director of Education James Dilamarter indicated that most policies were already in place as practices, at least in the 1984–1989 period. The 1989 written protocol provided that teachers with “well-founded” suspicions of abuse or neglect of students were to report to principals, who would gather “information and insight” to decide if there were reasonable grounds to report to the CAS. If a principal did not report and a teacher still had suspicions, he or she was required to report directly to the CAS. The protocol indicated that if an allegation was made regarding a staff member, the Superintendent or Director of Education would be responsible for assessment and reporting. The policy also provided that pupils should not be interviewed at school in an investigation of extra-familial abuse without parental consent.

In 1992, a multi-party protocol was created that included school boards and other agencies. Developed largely by the Children’s Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry, it clarified processes and procedures of the 1989 protocol but dealt mainly with how the CAS and applicable police forces would handle a situation of abuse.

A revised protocol was signed in 2001 between the UCDSB, the CAS for the United Counties, and relevant police services and other organizations and is still in effect. It outlines responsibilities for reporting abuse and procedures and assistance. In this protocol, all investigation is clearly left to the CAS or police services.

This protocol also makes it clear that teachers must report to the CAS, not to their principals. This policy change was effective in 2001. The 2001 protocol has not been updated as of January 28, 2009.

The 2003 Ontario Eastern Region Police and School Board Protocol ensures that multiple interviews are avoided and addresses investigations in schools and police access to school information. This protocol is currently in place and is based on a provincial model for local police–school board protocols. It provides more detail on policies and practices related to the interrogation of pupils by police.

The *Safe Schools Act, 2000*⁸ deals with the conduct of students, not teachers or other adults, and provides the authority to address inappropriate behaviour, including sexual misconduct, by students at schools. However, the Ontario Schools Code of Conduct, which applies to all schools, sets out behaviour standards for all individuals in schools, not just students. The Code includes requirements to comply with all laws, engage in respectful conduct, and take measures to help those in need.

Current Director of Education David Thomas testified that counselling is provided to students, family members, and victims of historical abuse at the UCDSB, pursuant to Board policy.

Robins Report

From the late 1970s to the early 1990s, Mr. Kenneth DeLuca, a teacher of the former Sault Ste. Marie Roman Catholic Separate School Board, sexually abused a number of female students. Allegations led to charges and convictions. The Honourable Sydney L. Robins, a former judge of the Court of Appeal of Ontario, was mandated to look into these events and “make recommendations regarding protocols, policies and procedures to effectively identify and prevent sexual assault, harassment or violence.”

Protecting Our Students was an important report by Justice Sydney Robins, released in 2000. The Robins Report provided information on the extent of sexual abuse of students by teachers, including grooming practices, and the serious impact of such abuse. The Report indicated that 70 percent of children do not report such abuse. The Report had a significant influence on school boards as it made many recommendations for change, for example, that teacher and staff references should be checked and criminal record checks done. The Upper Canada District School Board does criminal background checks for volunteers and employees every two and a half years.

The Robins Report also recommended periodic review of policies and procedures on sexual misconduct by the Ministry of Education in cooperation with Ontario school boards. Director David Thomas, in reviewing the UCDSB’s progress with respect to the Robins Report, did not know if these policies and procedures had been specifically reviewed as recommended. Because of the importance and relevance of the Robins Report, Mr. Thomas assisted this Inquiry by going through key recommendations of the Robins Report and indicating the UCDSB's status with respect to many recommendations.

He acknowledged that more work needs to be done with respect to training teachers and staff at all levels. Mr. Thomas testified that the Board does not have funds to prevent misconduct before it occurs or ascertain whether a child may have been abused before any report, i.e., to train teachers to see the warning signs that could lead to early identification and response to abuse. The Robins Report recommended extensive training and funding of training in the area of child abuse, including prevention-oriented training and early intervention training, but the Upper Canada District School Board received no specific funds from the Ministry of Education for this.

The UCDSB has only recently started the volunteer training recommended by the Robins Report. David Thomas testified that the UCDSB needs more discretion for use of funding for such training to recognize and respond to abuse, not necessarily more money.

In compliance with the Robins Report, the UCDSB's current protocols identify even "second-hand" information or "in-confidence" information as reportable.

The *Teaching Profession Act*⁹ was clarified in September 2002¹⁰ to provide that a teacher reporting suspected abuse by another teacher did not need to inform that teacher of the report. Before this, belief that this notice was required led to reluctance among teachers to report. This issue was raised in the Robins Report as a possible impediment. The UCDSB has implemented this approach.

However, there are still areas of uncertainty in policies and protocols at the UCDSB. For example, it is not clear what should be reported to the CAS if a student is sixteen or older. As well, existing protocols do not appear to clearly identify how to deal with volunteers or others associated with the school if sexual misconduct occurs when the student is over sixteen. It is important to develop such policies because information about abuse of an older student may ultimately reveal abuse of younger students; in addition, students over sixteen may be under the power of an authority figure and criminal acts may have been committed. Students may also need and deserve counselling.

The UCDSB has no policies or protocols for communication plans after disclosure of alleged sexual misconduct, as recommended by the Robins Report. This means that possible unknown victims or family members are not aware of the potential for assistance. As well, it means that the public may be hearing only rumours, rather than having direct information from a responsible public institution.

9. R.S.O. 1990, c. T.2.

10. Student Protection Act, S.O. 2002, c. 7, s. 7.

While the UCDSB has made considerable progress in responding to the Robins Report, it needs to complete a review and updating of all its protocols and then to adhere to a regular process of review and updating. Some protocols have not been revised since 2001. In particular, in my view the UCDSB should have policies in place for sexual abuse related to students sixteen and older and for communication plans when the UCDSB is affected by disclosure, charges, or convictions of abuse. Therefore, I recommend that such policies be put into place.

In terms of training costs, given the size of school board budgets, it seems likely that the issue is one of providing more flexibility to school boards and not necessarily more funds for this type of training. However, I note that if my recommendations in Phase 2 of this Report are accepted, some money will be available for cross-institutional training in Cornwall and in the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry, through what I have referred to as the Reconciliation Trust. In addition, as part of the forward-looking recommendations in my Phase 2 Report for education across Ontario, I make specific recommendations for enhanced professional training, as well as funding for that training. If these recommendations are adopted, there could be the supports available to the UCDSB that it has indicated it needs to prevent and respond to the sexual abuse of children and young people attending schools in the Board.

Robert Sabourin

Sabourin Hired in 1967

Robert Sabourin was hired in 1967 as a French, theatre arts, and photography teacher by a predecessor board to the Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry County Board of Education. Robert Sabourin taught at La Citadelle High School in Cornwall. Jeannine Séguin was the principal from 1973 to 1981 for La Citadelle and for St. Lawrence High School, when the two schools operated in the same building. The Superintendent responsible for La Citadelle was Jean-Paul Scott.

High School Student C-112 Makes a Complaint

C-112 was a student at La Citadelle High School from grade 10 to grade 13, from 1973 onward. In 1972, he had attended the St. Lawrence High School, in the same building as La Citadelle. The schools operated in shifts in the building until the St. Lawrence High School moved out in the mid-1970s.

C-112 was active in school extracurricular activities, including student radio and local access cable television. He was also an active student photographer. Student photographs could be developed in a school darkroom. The teacher responsible for the darkroom was Robert Sabourin. The room was kept locked and

Robert Sabourin had a key, as did others on staff. C-112 used the room during lunch hours but not after school, as he lived outside Cornwall and had to take a bus home. Usually, he asked Mr. Sabourin to open the room or to give him the key. In 1974–1975, when he was in grade 11, C-112 took a cinematography course from Mr. Sabourin.

C-112 alleged that the first sexual incident with Mr. Sabourin happened when he was taken to Ottawa at age fourteen or fifteen to attend a meeting of the Association canadienne-française de l'Ontario. C-112 was a student representative and Robert Sabourin a teacher representative. C-112 reported that during the drive, under the guise of helping him learn to drive, Robert Sabourin rubbed his thigh. Although C-112 believed that Robert Sabourin was coming on to him, he did not tell anyone about what happened.

Early in the school year 1974–1975, Robert Sabourin is alleged to have sexually assaulted C-112. While they were locked in the darkroom at school, the teacher spoke to C-112 about pictures C-112 had taken but thrown out before developing. These were pictures of him naked. Because there was a picture of C-112's mother in the roll of frames, Robert Sabourin even suggested that she might be accused of taking pictures of her naked son. Robert Sabourin then sexually abused him. While the two were in the room, another teacher tried to open the door but it was locked and she left.

C-112 testified that he was ashamed and scared and did not return to classes but went home. He did not tell his mother what had happened, only that he did not want to return to Robert Sabourin's cinematography class. C-112's mother was upset and called the school. The school sent Father Gary Ostler to speak to C-112 several days later. Father Ostler was not on the staff of La Citadelle, but the priest was often involved in school activities.

C-112 and Father Ostler went for a drive to talk after school and C-112 explained what had happened and why he did not want to return to Robert Sabourin's class. C-112 indicated that Father Ostler told him it did not seem that Robert Sabourin had hurt him and that if C-112 complained, he would ruin the teacher's reputation over "some silliness." On his return to C-112's home, Father Ostler told the student's mother that C-112 was sick, which she did not believe. C-112 remembered that this incident distressed him.

C-112 returned to school but not to Robert Sabourin's class. A few days after Father Ostler's visit, C-112 was called into the office of Principal Jeannine Séguin. C-112 recalled that Vice-Principal Jules Renaud also attended. Principal Séguin asked C-112 to confirm that he had complained about an incident involving Mr. Sabourin and that this was the reason he was refusing to attend Mr. Sabourin's class. C-112 agreed that this was the case, saying Robert Sabourin was a "pervert." Jeannine Séguin asked him if he was prepared to testify in court and C-112 said he was not ready for the matter to be public and did not want his friends to find out. C-112 did not have his mother or another adult with him during this interview. Principal Séguin said that C-112 could continue his class in the library instead of with Robert Sabourin. He continued as yearbook photographer but the films were developed elsewhere. C-112 testified that he was satisfied with this response and it gave him some closure.

Principal Séguin was interviewed in March 1998 with respect to a civil proceeding of one of the complainants of Robert Sabourin. In her statement, she denied that C-112 had disclosed a complaint about Robert Sabourin to her. Constable Heidi Sebalj also interviewed Principal Séguin in October 1997 for the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) investigation of allegations against Robert Sabourin. Ms Séguin indicated in her interview that after the resignation of Mr. Sabourin, she had asked her vice-principal if he was aware of complainants. He told her that he had heard of him. I believe he was referring here to Mr. Sabourin.

Mr. Jean-Paul Scott, the Superintendent of Education at the time, testified that Albert Morin, a Board member, had told him of the allegations of C-112 in 1976 or 1977. He had provided that information as well to Constable Sebalj in his statement of October 16, 1997. I am of the view that either the principal or the vice-principal or both were aware of the allegations reported by C-112 and that certainly Mr. Scott was aware of the allegations before the CPS investigation.

C-112 sometimes saw Robert Sabourin in the halls at school over the next year. C-112 thought Mr. Sabourin knew of his disclosure because the teacher would make a motion as if, in C-112's words, "he was going to slit my throat." C-112 would tell other students not to go into the darkroom alone with Robert Sabourin.

I have heard no evidence that anyone from the School Board contacted the police or the CAS, although C-112 was only fourteen or fifteen at the time of his reported abuse. At the time, the School Board took no job-related action with Robert Sabourin. Mr. T. Rosaire Leger, Director of Education of the SD&G County Board of Education from 1973 to 1988, testified that on receiving a report of abuse, the Board's practice was to remove any person involved from his or her duties, report to the CAS, and send the person home with pay. He explained that information on the duty to report child abuse was communicated to principals. He also indicated that if complaints involved staff members, the Director of Education and the Board of Trustees were to be informed.

There was a failure to follow Board policy with respect to Robert Sabourin. Jean-Paul Scott testified that he did not report to the CAS or the police, and presumably did not report to the Director of Education or Board of Trustees regarding C-112's complaint because of a "lack of evidence." He also did not make any notation in Robert Sabourin's personnel file. In this, Mr. Scott failed to take appropriate action in response to an allegation of sexual abuse by teacher Robert Sabourin.

Superintendent Scott also testified that he did not recall any of his teachers receiving training at that time with respect to the handling of allegations of sexual abuse.

Locked Door Discussion

Superintendent Jean-Paul Scott recalled visiting La Citadelle High School on many occasions during the period 1974–1976. He recalled seeing several rooms used by Robert Sabourin and that these rooms had locks on the doors. Mr. Scott said that Mr. Sabourin told him this was necessary to protect developing film. He also recalled that he asked Principal Séguin about the locks and she told him that it was not necessary to have locks on the doors. No steps were taken to remove the locks even though Principal Séguin thought them unnecessary. Superintendent Scott was sufficiently concerned to make inquiries.

Ms Sabourin Visits Principal Séguin

The wife of Robert Sabourin came to visit Principal Séguin in the spring of 1976 and asked that the meeting be kept in confidence. She told the principal that “for the good of the students,” she should not keep Robert Sabourin teaching in her high school. Ms Sabourin told Principal Séguin that she had been told by her son “what was going on” in his father’s classes. In an interview with Constable Sebalj in 1997, Principal Séguin indicated that this was the first time she was aware of any issues with Robert Sabourin.

Ms Sabourin said she had seen pictures of a sexual nature and that her son had told her that her husband was going into the darkroom at school and having sexual relations with students. Ms Sabourin indicated that her husband had confessed to this but then destroyed the pictures.

Jeannine Séguin told Ms Sabourin that as principal she could take no action without proof and that the union (the teachers’ federation) would be an impediment if she had no “written report against him.” Since she had no pictures and Ms Sabourin would not testify, Principal Séguin decided that her only option was for Robert Sabourin to go on sick leave or voluntarily resign.

Principal Jeannine Séguin Negotiates the Resignation of Robert Sabourin

Several days later, Principal Séguin met with Robert Sabourin and discussed his leaving voluntarily. Robert Sabourin submitted his resignation at the end of May 1976. While Principal Séguin indicated in her statement to Constable Sebalj that the teacher had made no admissions to her, one of the reasons she gave to convince Robert Sabourin to resign was that he would do a service for the students. She also urged him to get medical help, telling him that he was sick.

In 1997, Constable Sebalj of the CPS was investigating allegations made by André Lavoie against Robert Sabourin. In addition to interviewing Principal Séguin, she interviewed Gerald Labreque, head of the French Department at La Citadelle. Mr. Labreque recalled Robert Sabourin telling him that he was taking a sabbatical year because of depression. Mr. Labreque discussed this departure with Principal Séguin, who told him that Robert Sabourin was sick, that he had been caught in a sexual abuse case, that there were incriminating photos, and that this had happened before.

Principal Séguin Meets With Superintendent Jean-Paul Scott

The Superintendent to whom Principal Séguin reported was Jean-Paul Scott. Principal Séguin told Superintendent Scott that Robert Sabourin had resigned. She explained the circumstances of Ms Sabourin's visit, her perspective on the issue of proof, and her negotiation of resignation with Robert Sabourin. Mr. Scott did not report the circumstances of this departure to his Director of Education, Mr. Leger, or to the Board of Trustees for the School Board. The resignation was documented and reported to the Board of Trustees as being by "mutual consent." During the discussion with Mr. Scott, the possible impediment to dismissal represented by union (teachers' federation) intervention was discussed and appeared to be a significant factor in how the departure was handled.

Neither Superintendent Scott nor Principal Séguin contacted the CAS or the police. It was possible that there may have been victims of Mr. Sabourin who were under sixteen. In addition, he was a teacher and therefore an authority figure. Mr. Lavoie, who testified about his experience of abuse, indicated that he thought there could have been thirty to forty victims of Robert Sabourin. In my view, the CAS or the police should have been contacted and the Board and Superintendent Scott failed to take appropriate action by failing to do so.

After Mr. Sabourin left his employment at La Citadelle, Principal Séguin gave him a reference as a good worker and a good teacher. Mr. Sabourin was hoping to work for a community centre in order to develop and run a cinematography centre. This would have potentially given Robert Sabourin access to some of the same type of facilities that he used at La Citadelle to attract and abuse teenagers. The failure to properly manage Mr. Sabourin's departure, by permitting him to resign rather than documenting his behaviour, led to the giving of an inappropriate reference that had the potential to put other organizations and young people at risk.

André Lavoie Reports Allegations of Sexual Abuse by Robert Sabourin

In March 1996, André Lavoie gave a statement to Constable Heidi Sebalj of the CPS, alleging historical abuse by teacher Robert Sabourin.

André Lavoie had attended St. Lawrence High School, in the building that also housed the French-language school La Citadelle. In 1967, when André Lavoie was fourteen and in grade 9, Mr. Sabourin was his French teacher. Mr. Sabourin expressed a personal interest in André Lavoie, encouraging his interests in literature, film, and music. This was attractive to the young student because he had not received such encouragement and interest from his own family. Within a short time, Robert Sabourin began sexually abusing him, and this continued for the five years Mr. Lavoie was in high school. The abuse occurred initially at Robert Sabourin's apartment and then at the school, notably in the locked darkroom or the teacher's locked office. Mr. Lavoie recalled Robert Sabourin saying that the rooms needed locks to protect developing film. Robert Sabourin also abused the young student at the Sabourin home, at the Lavoie home, and in his car.

Mr. Sabourin cautioned the student to say nothing about the sexual abuse because "terrible things would happen to himself and myself." He mentioned that his previous school in Montreal had asked him to leave, citing "sexual innuendoes." Robert Sabourin expressed concern that his activities in Cornwall could "get back to Montreal." An Ontario Municipal and Provincial Police Automation Cooperative (OMPPAC) search by Constable Sebalj located a record showing that Robert Sabourin had been before the courts in Quebec in 1969 in regard to sexual improprieties.

While in school, Mr. Lavoie did not disclose his abuse. However, he wondered why teachers did not challenge the locked doors or ask why a teacher was so frequently in the company of young boys, often alone or at out-of-town meetings or excursions. Other students inquired about Mr. Sabourin's relationship with their fellow student, but Mr. Lavoie turned the questions aside. He testified that he saw other boys coming out of the same room in which Robert Sabourin victimized him. He was convinced that they were also victims of sexual abuse but was paralyzed with fear and shame and could not talk to them.

When André Lavoie was in grade 11 he left school for three months. Although a guidance counsellor called during his absence and spoke to him on his return, no one asked him why he had been so unhappy at school that he had left. If anyone had asked or the school had indicated that they were looking into Robert Sabourin's activities, André Lavoie was convinced he would have disclosed his abuse and got help sooner.

When André Lavoie came forward to the CPS in 1996 and provided evidence of Robert Sabourin's abuse, he had reason to be concerned that his abuser could be in a position where he had access to young boys. A neighbour told him that Mr. Sabourin was involved in activities at Église St. Felix-de-Valois and wanted to be responsible for training altar boys. Mr. Lavoie had warned Curé Desrosiers about the risk and he had responded, “We’ve always kept an eye on him.”

Robert Sabourin was charged with abusing André Lavoie and others and pleaded guilty, receiving a sentence of two years less a day. The trial of Robert Sabourin is discussed in Chapter 11, on the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

As a student, Mr. Lavoie recalled having respect for and liking Principal Séguin. He found it hard to understand why she did not ask questions when she saw him so frequently in the company of Robert Sabourin. Indeed, he would look her in the eye and silently beg her, “Please do something.” He thought if the principal had asked about sexual impropriety with Robert Sabourin, he probably would have opened up. The fact that opportunities to intervene were missed by school authorities is understandably an added source of pain.

Mr. Lavoie pointed out that victims of sexual abuse are often perceived as irritants. I agree that this is unfortunately true and needs to change. Mr. Lavoie’s articulate and moving account of the lifelong impact of abuse for him underlines the serious consequences of sexual abuse of young people.

Primary School Student Alain Seguin’s abuse by Robert Sabourin

Alain Seguin was a grade 7 student at École Jean XXIII in Cornwall. The thirteen-to fourteen-year-old had friends at nearby La Citadelle. These friends introduced him to photography teacher Robert Sabourin in 1973 or 1974.

Robert Sabourin befriended the boy, encouraging his interest in photography and becoming friendly with the Seguin family. Robert Sabourin would meet Alain Seguin during lunch time in his locked office and darkroom, where he would sexually abuse him. Students, teachers, and janitors would see him coming in and out but did not challenge the presence of a younger boy at the school. Robert Sabourin also abused him in his car and took Alain Seguin to Ottawa as a “helper” when Mr. Sabourin took pictures of the inauguration of Archbishop Proulx. The boy was also sexually abused during this trip. Robert Sabourin used his Church connections to deceive Mr. Seguin’s parents as to the legitimacy of his intentions. The abuse continued for about two years, including a period after the complaint of C-112.

Mr. Seguin indicated that he had first disclosed his abuse in 1987, to an officer in the CPS. Approximately one month later, he disclosed at the Royal Ottawa Hospital in conjunction with an assessment and treatment, specifically mentioning Robert Sabourin, a teacher. There was no follow-up to this disclosure. He testified that Staff Sergeant Robert Trottier of the CPS had facilitated this assessment.

Mr. Seguin testified that he had told the officer that a teacher in high school had abused him, but the Cornwall police did not respond to this or institute an investigation. In cross-examination, Mr. Seguin was less clear about his disclosure to Staff Sergeant Trottier. Alain Seguin referred to failures to respond to his disclosures as missed opportunities. I agree with Mr. Seguin.

In 1997, Mr. Seguin called the OPP Project Truth hotline, intending to report his abuse by Robert Sabourin. He was referred to the Cornwall Police Service. He gave a statement on January 26, 1998.

Robert Sabourin was convicted and sentenced to two years less a day plus probation. Mr. Seguin thought the sentence was insufficient because there were several victims. Mr. Seguin noted that no one from the School Board approached him or offered counselling or other services. In this respect the UCDSB failed to provide adequate support services to a victim of abuse.

Adequacy of Response

The response to the complaints of C-112 was inadequate. Principal Séguin and Superintendent Scott should have reported to the CAS and the police. It is the responsibility of the CAS and the police to investigate. Principal Séguin and Superintendent Scott had enough information to make a report and let the appropriate authorities take over. If Robert Sabourin had been removed from his position at the time of C-112's complaint, the abuse of Alain Seguin might have been limited and other victims might have been spared.

When Ms Sabourin came forward, Principal Séguin and Superintendent Scott should have reported to the CAS and police but failed to do so. The school officials had information of serious wrongdoing. They did not have to conduct an investigation; other authorities could have done so. While Ms Sabourin's request for confidentiality was understandable, confidentiality should not be preserved in the face of a risk to students. I note that the current protocol of the UCDSB specifically provides that "in-confidence" and "second-hand" information is reportable. I agree with this policy.

Because the reasons for Robert Sabourin's departure were not properly documented, he left with his teaching qualifications intact, able to relocate and abuse elsewhere. The risk of being challenged by the union (teachers' federation) was given greater importance than it should have received. Dismissals are often grieved, but this does not absolve institutions from following the law or Board practices and policies in place to protect students. The Board's employees failed in fulfilling their managerial duties by not sufficiently disciplining Robert Sabourin and allowing him to resign, and for not advising the Board of the reasons for his resignation.

The response to allegations against Robert Sabourin reinforces the importance of up-to-date written policies and protocols and regular training. Training should include tips to identify inappropriate behaviour by authority figures, such as having a locked office or obscuring the window on an office door, being alone regularly with students, having “favourites,” and giving or receiving special favours. Teachers should also be taught to recognize signs of abuse such as sudden changes in physical appearance, inexplicable anger, or crying. This is the type of preventative training referred to in the Robins Report.

In addition, the USCDB should conduct physical audits and make appropriate changes, such as removing unnecessary locks or putting glass in the doors of offices where teachers may meet with students. Opportunity for observation reduces opportunity for sexual abuse.

Father Gilles Deslauriers

Chaplain at La Citadelle

Roman Catholic priest Father Gilles Deslauriers was the full-time chaplain at La Citadelle High School from 1977 until early 1986. The SD&G County Board of Education paid his salary. It had been the idea of Jeannine Séguin to bring a priest to the school, and she arranged to pay for Father Deslauriers' salary. Principal Séguin expressed confidence in Father Deslauriers and reported that the teachers admired him. Ms Séguin worked for the SD&G County Board of Education from 1970 to 1981 and became a principal in 1973.

Although La Citadelle was a public school, it had a significant Catholic population. At the time of Father Gilles Deslauriers' appointment as chaplain, Bishop Eugène LaRocque of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall wrote a letter noting that more than one hundred French Catholic students attended. Father Deslauriers was encouraged by his Bishop to ensure a Catholic presence at the school and to evangelize future leaders of the country and Church.

Father Deslauriers Leaves the Diocese and La Citadelle

Benoit Brisson and his parents reported allegations of sexual abuse against Father Deslauriers in 1986. These allegations and what happened following the reports of abuse were discussed in Chapter 8, on the institutional response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

After the report of the allegations, Father Deslauriers met with Bishop LaRocque and it was agreed that he would leave the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall to attend a thirty-day spiritual retreat. Following this meeting, Father Deslauriers went to visit Jeannine Séguin.

After being approached for help, Ms Séguin assisted Father Deslauriers in a number of practical and appropriate ways:

- permitting Father Deslauriers to stay briefly with her and Bishop Proulx's sister, with whom she was living at the time;
- calling Dr. Corbeil to come and speak to Father Deslauriers as she was concerned for his mental health;
- calling Bishop Proulx and arranging for Father Deslauriers to stay "at the cottage";
- taking Father Deslauriers to Montreal for a driver's licence because he had only an Ontario licence;
- asking a lawyer to act for Father Deslauriers; and
- taking Father Deslauriers to a treatment centre in Montreal.

It appears that Father Gilles Deslauriers first told Jeannine Séguin that he had been asked to leave because he had caused a separation between two people. This was probably a reference to Benoit Brisson and his wife, Denyse Deslauriers, as Mr. Brisson's crisis over his recollection of abuse by Father Deslauriers led to the breakdown of his marriage. Later, Father Deslauriers told her that he did not do the things he was accused of by the Bishop. I have heard no evidence that would allow me to determine if Father Deslauriers had formally resigned from his position as chaplain or was on some kind of official leave.

Constable Herb Lefebvre and Sergeant Ron Lefebvre of the Cornwall Police Service interviewed Principal Séguin as part of their investigation into the allegations against Father Deslauriers. She indicated that she had not received any complaints about Father Deslauriers from school students.

Use of Position at La Citadelle

The investigation revealed that Father Deslauriers used his position at La Citadelle to meet students and involve them in activities outside school, leading to the abuse of some students. The activities were generally a combination of youth group and spiritual activities sponsored by the Catholic Church and often involved many students.

While grooming did occur at school, the acts of sexual abuse did not occur on school premises but at the St. John Bosco Rectory, where Father Gilles Deslauriers was a priest in residence.

When knowledge of the sexual abuse emerged in early 1986, following Benoit Brisson's disclosure to his wife and parents, his mother, Lise Brisson, made considerable efforts to contact responsible Church officials in order both to address past abuse and to avoid future abuse. In March 1986 correspondence to senior officials of the Roman Catholic Church in Canada, she noted that Gilles Deslauriers was the chaplain at La Citadelle and had access to young people, who were vulnerable because of his charismatic personality and the degree of trust reposed in him. It does not appear that the Diocese provided this correspondence to the School Board. Lise Brisson did not contact La Citadelle directly, hoping that the Diocese would deal with Gilles Deslauriers' lack of suitability for the priesthood.

The allegations of sexual abuse by Father Gilles Deslauriers became public in May 1986. I have neither reviewed nor heard evidence that the principal of La Citadelle or the School Board took any action. Before the May 1986 disclosures, it did not appear that the senior management of the School Board had knowledge of or could reasonably have obtained knowledge of the abuse that involved Father Deslauriers. The Diocese had not disclosed the abuse to the School Board or the Children's Aid Society, and the police investigation did not start until late May 1986. By that time, Father Gilles Deslauriers had left La Citadelle.

Failure to Conduct Internal Investigation

Although Ms Seguin was aware in early 1986 that Father Deslauriers had been asked to leave the Diocese for a period of time, it is unclear exactly what information she had at the time and what, if any, information was shared with School Board officials by either the Diocese or Ms Seguin, who had retired from the Board by this time. It seems likely, however, that Board personnel would have known about subsequent media reports stemming from a May 1986 television interview conducted between Lise Brisson and Charlie Greenwell. Ms Brisson testified that she had gone to the media because she was concerned that the Diocese and the Church officials she had contacted were not taking action with respect to Gilles Deslauriers and there had been no response to her correspondence.

In addition, by June 1996, the Cornwall Police Service had made contact with the principal of La Citadelle concerning its investigation into Father Deslauriers. I did not hear any evidence that the principal or the School Board took any action on learning of the police investigation into Father Deslauriers, such as attempting to contact students, helping to find other potential victims, or offering any assistance with counselling.

It is unfortunate that no assistance appears to have been extended to affected students and their families or efforts made to find other students who may have been victims of Father Gilles Deslauriers' actions. In this respect, the pattern of response was similar to that in the Robert Sabourin case in the failure to adequately address the need for services for victims.

Lessons for the Future

The Father Deslauriers case demonstrates the need to develop communication policies and practices to ensure appropriate follow-up after allegations are reported.

Father Gilles Deslauriers was incardinated in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall and was an employee of the SD&G County Board of Education. Although today it may be more relevant for Catholic school boards, I recommend that if a school board permits access to its students by a priest, member of a religious order, or minister or provides a school office, it must be satisfied as to the individual's suitability. It must be clear that if a complaint of sexual abuse is received, the same policies will apply as are in place for teachers, other employees, volunteers, and school bus drivers in terms of any internal investigation or follow-up with alleged complainants.

Nelson Barque

Barque Works Briefly As a Teacher

As discussed in Chapter 5, on the institutional response of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services, Nelson Barque was a probation and parole officer in Cornwall from 1974 to 1982. He was the probation officer for several young men who reported allegations of sexual abuse.

Some of these victims who reported allegations of abuse against Mr. Barque were of school age. For example, Albert Roy was sixteen, and Robert Sheets indicated that he was eighteen. Before working as a probation officer, Nelson Barque had been a substitute teacher at La Citadelle High School in the SD&G County Board of Education for a month and a half in 1971. He was then a case worker for unemployed individuals at the City of Cornwall, assisting, among others, students from four high schools. Principal Jeannine Séguin was listed as a reference with respect to his 1971 teaching experience. No complaints regarding Nelson Barque have been identified from 1971 or prior.

Incident With Benoit Brisson Reported to Gilles Deslauriers

Benoit Brisson knew Nelson Barque through activities related to the Christ-Roi Parish. Mr. Barque was a communion minister, assisting in the distribution of communion and helping with mass. He was also a family friend.

Mr. Brisson indicated that in 1979 Nelson Barque had shown him heterosexual pornographic movies in his locked office and provided him with alcohol. Benoit Brisson was eighteen at the time and attending high school. Mr. Brisson testified that Nelson Barque was an acquaintance of Father Gilles Deslauriers, who was the chaplain at La Citadelle at that time. Benoit Brisson spoke to Father Deslauriers about the incident but did not report it to others.

Mr. Barque resigned from his employment at the Ministry of Correctional Services in May 1982 following an internal investigation of allegations of his sexual misconduct. He was then employed as a social worker for Équipe Psycho-sociale from 1982 to 1986, interacting with children at two Cornwall area primary schools. He then obtained a one-year supply teaching contract with the Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry County Roman Catholic Separate School Board in 1992. He was subsequently charged and convicted in relation to the sexual abuse of Albert Roy in 1995.

Mr. Barque's history at Équipe Psycho-sociale is described in Chapter 5, on the institutional response of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services. I noted that Équipe Psycho-sociale should have been informed of the circumstances surrounding his departure from the Ministry. This lack of follow-up also allowed Mr. Barque to obtain employment with a school board.

Jean Luc Leblanc

Disclosure of Abuse Made to Teacher

In January 1986, Jason Tyo and Scott Burgess were students at Central Public School, an English-language public school in Cornwall that was part of the SD&G County Board of Education. At the time, Jason Tyo was thirteen and Scott Burgess was fourteen years old.

They both reported allegations of sexual abuse over several years by Jean Luc Leblanc, a neighbour who worked as a training instructor at Transport Canada. On January 7, 1986, Jason Tyo spoke to his former teacher, Dawn Raymond, about being abused by Jean Luc Leblanc and witnessing the sexual abuse of Scott Burgess. He came to his former teacher because he trusted her and thought she would take action. Ms Raymond had taught both boys in grades 5 and 6 at Gladstone Public School. Jason Tyo testified that a few days earlier, he had called the Children's Aid Society after-hours emergency line regarding his sexual abuse by Jean Luc Leblanc and physical abuse at home, in hopes of stopping the abuse. This call and the response received were discussed in Chapter 9, dealing with the institutional response of the Children's Aid Society.

Dawn Raymond believed Jason Tyo and interviewed Scott Burgess a few days later. Ms Raymond already had some concerns about Jean Luc Leblanc, whom she had met for the first time in late December 1985. On meeting Jean Luc Leblanc, she and her husband wondered why an older man would spend so much time with a young boy like Scott Burgess. They also worried when they realized that he was paying for expensive items such as Scott Burgess' calls to her in Mexico when she was on vacation.

Teacher Dawn Raymond Follows Up

Ms Raymond spoke to Scott Burgess on January 10 and 11, 1986, following Jason Tyo's disclosure. Scott Burgess initially denied the abuse but then opened up and told her what had been happening. He also disclosed that Jean Luc Leblanc was abusing others, including Jason Tyo.

Ms Raymond subsequently told her principal of the information obtained from her discussion with the two students. The principal, Ivan St. John, originally suggested she speak to Dave Hill, a special education consultant. Mr. St. John then contacted the Superintendent responsible for the school, Lorne Lawson. Ms Raymond and Mr. St. John met with Mr. Lawson at the Board's Cornwall office on Second Street. Superintendent Lawson called the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry during that meeting on January 24, 1986, and Bruce Duncan of the CAS came to the Board's office that very afternoon.

Bruce Duncan and Dawn Raymond went directly to Central Public School, where Scott Burgess attended, and withdrew him from class. They asked questions regarding his sexual abuse, including details of specific sexual acts. Mr. Duncan thought Ms Raymond had a good rapport with Scott Burgess so he got her to ask questions, prompting her while sitting behind her and taking notes. Ms Raymond describes this questioning as a painful and difficult experience for the young student.

The CAS also contacted the CPS that same day and the case was assigned to Constable Brian Payment on January 24, 1986. The school had permitted Mr. Duncan of the CAS to interview Scott Burgess on school property but did not permit Constable Payment, indicating that he could not speak to the student without the consent of his parents. Scott Burgess had initially indicated that he did not want his parents to know of the abuse. He was embarrassed and afraid his mother would be angry.

Constable Payment ultimately interviewed Scott Burgess and his brother, Jody, at their home and then took Scott Burgess to the CAS office for another interview. This meant that Scott had to repeat his difficult and painful story on at least three separate occasions.

Constable Payment's investigation revealed that Jean Luc Leblanc had sexually abused Jason Tyo, Jody Burgess, and Scott Burgess. In fact, sister Cindy Burgess was also a victim of Jean Luc Leblanc, although that information did not come out until a later investigation and prosecution. At the end of the day on January 24, 1986, Scott Burgess went home with Dawn Raymond, with the consent of Mr. and Ms Burgess. The police investigation is further discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service.

Dawn Raymond Feels Ill Equipped to Respond

Dawn Raymond had worked as a teacher in the Cornwall area since 1960. She taught at Gladstone Public School from 1966 to 1988. From 1983 to 1985, she taught a special education class of ten to eleven students; the small class size allowed her to get to know the students well, including Scott Burgess and Jason Tyo.

Teacher Dawn Raymond testified that it was difficult to detect sexual, as opposed to physical, abuse of children as there were no visible marks. She also indicated that she had no training in this area, was not aware of any written policy, and had no prior experience with sexual abuse. Notwithstanding, she acted with concern for the young students. At that time, Board practice was that matters of this nature were to be reported to the school principal. Ms Raymond was evidently aware of this practice and acted on it, although there was some delay before she reported the matter. Principal St. John consulted Superintendent Lawson, who acted appropriately by immediately contacting the CAS.

Despite Board practice, the legal duty to report abuse was a duty to report to the CAS, not to any intermediary. The delay of approximately two weeks in reporting was of concern to the investigator, Constable Payment. He also indicated that he understood the hesitancy of victims to discuss their abuse. It is always desirable to interview individuals as soon as possible.

Relief and Disappointment on Conviction

Ms Raymond, like Scott and Jody Burgess and Jason Tyo, was relieved that Jean Luc Leblanc was convicted. However, she and the boys were all disappointed with the sentence of three years probation. She thought that “[Leblanc] got a slap on the wrist and Scott, Jason and I got a slap in the face.” She felt they had to go through agony for little result. The investigation of Jean Luc Leblanc is discussed more extensively in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service.

Outcome of the Lack of Clear Policies and Training

I have concluded from my review of evidence that in the case of Jean Luc Leblanc, there was a delay in reporting to the CAS, which could have affected information obtained in the investigation or how the investigation was conducted. It is clear that training regarding duty to report sex abuse was not reaching teachers and principals, such as well-intentioned individuals like Ms Raymond. Both Ms Raymond and Principal St. John first reported to a superior rather than reporting to the CAS directly. This contributed to a delay, although minor.

There was inconsistency regarding the interviewing of students on school premises, as Mr. Duncan from the CAS was permitted to interview at the school but Constable Payment from the CPS was not. As well, Ms Raymond participated in investigative interviews with Mr. Duncan, asking Scott Burgess questions about the nature of sexual acts committed on him, prompted by Mr. Duncan. This created the risk that Ms Raymond, who was not a trained investigator, would ask questions that could compromise future prosecutions or that Mr. Duncan would prompt her to ask such questions.

At the time, Ms Raymond was not aware of any policies governing interviews and school involvement. Although they may have been informally in place, they were not put in writing until 1989.

Mr. Leger and Mr. Dilamarter, Directors of Education during the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s, testified that obligations regarding the duty to report and the practices of the Board were communicated orally to staff during the 1970s and 1980s. This was often done through briefings with principals, who were to inform their school staff.

However, it does not appear that in the Jean Luc Leblanc case all of the information reached teachers, or even principals. It may be desirable for the UCDSB to circulate periodic questionnaires or conduct audits to determine the extent to which information is reaching staff and the areas in which they need extra training or information.

Leblanc Hired As a School Bus Driver on a UCDSB Route

Private contractors provided school bus services to the UCDSB and its predecessors. The contractors hired and employed drivers. Before 1999, there were no written policies or standards at the UCDSB or its predecessor boards governing school bus operators, although school bus operators were provided with guidelines. A comprehensive written policy, entitled “Standards of Performance for School Bus Operators,” was approved on or about January 11, 1999.

Evans Bus Lines hired Jean Luc Leblanc as a school bus driver around October 1998. Mr. Leblanc told Rory Evans, the owner, that he had been convicted of sexual assault but had received counselling and had been “cured.” Mr. Evans said he was satisfied with the explanation and hired Jean Luc Leblanc.

On January 5, 1999, Jean Luc Leblanc was arrested by the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) as part of the Project Truth investigation. Mr. Evans contacted the School Board that day and Board officials met with Detective Constable Don Genier of the OPP.

On January 15, 1999, Mr. Marc Shaefer, Director of Human Resources for the UCDSB, wrote to Mr. Evans. He indicated that there was an expectation that criminal record checks would be completed and that a record of conviction would be a “deciding factor” in hiring drivers and should be discussed with the UCDSB’s transportation officer. Mr. Evans was warned that his transportation contract with the UCDSB could be cancelled if there was a recurrence of the failure to follow Board policy or practices.

In 2001, Jean Luc Leblanc pleaded guilty to offences against several victims over many years, including Cindy Burgess-Lebrun. The offences included acts committed after his 1986 conviction with respect to Jason Tyo. Jean Luc Leblanc was designated a long-term offender and sentenced to a ten-year custodial term. This related investigation and conviction is discussed in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police.

The fact that Jean Luc Leblanc was hired as a school bus driver horrified his victims and teacher Dawn Raymond. It could be expected to exacerbate victims’ feelings of distrust in public institutions and seemed to minimize the terrible suffering they experienced.

Policies Not in Place

The UCDSB did not have appropriate policies and practices in place for school bus driver screening at the time of the hiring of Jean Luc Leblanc in 1998. Although the transportation contractor, Mr. Evans, made the hiring decision and the UCDSB was not aware of it, there did not appear to be a system in place to ensure that school bus operators complied with hiring requirements stipulated by the Board. Because contractors are providing a service for which the UCDSB is responsible, the Board must ensure that they adhere to the standards established by the Board.

After the Standards of Performance for School Bus Operators document was adopted, a new draft Transportation Contract, dated April 8, 1999, was circulated. It included a provision requiring that bus operators obtain police criminal record checks of all new drivers prior to employment. A copy of the check must be provided to the Transportation Department. It is hoped that a clearer written policy with explicit requirements regarding criminal records checks will enhance the level of screening being conducted by bus operators and avoid this type of situation occurring in the future.

Mr. David Thomas, Director of Education for the UCDSB, testified that the Board does not have communication policies with respect to providing the public or the community with information after incidents such as the arrest of Jean Luc Leblanc. While no incidents involving students on buses were reported, the lack of a comprehensive policy may mean that potential victims, or those who could have helped such victims, simply never heard about what happened.

The UCDSB should develop policies and procedures for communication to enhance the possibility that students who have been harmed in any way feel comfortable coming forward to obtain help. Openness also sends a positive message to UCDSB staff, students, parents, and the public at large that the welfare of students is of paramount importance.

As was explained by a number of the context experts, sexual abuse is generally underreported. As a result, there may still be victims of abuse by Board employees who have not yet come forward. This is a further reason for the UCDSB to adopt an approach of openness in its communications.

Given that there have been a number of confirmed cases of sexual abuse of young people by employees of the UCDSB, that there have been additional allegations of sexual abuse reported against the Board's employees, as well as the possibility that there are further victims, the Board should make a public appeal and consider making an apology. As a part of its appeal, I recommend that the UCDSB offer counselling and support to any alleged victims of abuse by Board employees who come forward.

Catholic District School Board of Eastern Ontario

Introduction

The Catholic District School Board of Eastern Ontario (CDSBEO) is an English-language separate school board under the Education Act.¹¹ It was created in 1998, through the amalgamation of three other school boards.

The newly created school board became responsible for schools in the County of Lanark, the United Counties of Leeds & Grenville, the United Counties of Prescott and Russell, and the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry. These counties include the following municipalities: Cornwall, Brockville, Gananoque, Prescott, and Smiths Falls. The CDSBEO currently operates forty elementary and ten secondary schools for approximately 15,000 students, and employs 850 teachers and 450 support staff.

The predecessor board in the Cornwall area was the English section of the former Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (SD&G) County Roman Catholic Separate School Board.

Catholic separate schools have been publicly funded since the mid-1980s. Before that they were not fully funded at the secondary level. School boards in the Cornwall area each included a French and an English section until 1997.

Prior to the establishment of the CDSBEO, the French sections of three Roman Catholic boards were amalgamated in 1997 to form the Conseil de District des

11. R.S.O. 1990, c. E.2.

Écoles Catholiques de Langue Française de l'Est Ontarien (C.S.D. 65). That board assumed responsibility for corporate records from the former SD&G County Roman Catholic Separate School Board.

Denominational Rights and Relationship With Diocese and Archdiocese

One of the roles of a Catholic school is to educate students in the faith in partnership with home and parish. As a result, the CDSBEO works with any local diocese or archdiocese of the Catholic Church.

Each of the schools of the CDSBEO is assigned a liaison priest, who works in cooperation with the school chaplain to provide spiritual leadership in schools. Some schools may not have a chaplain. The bishop or archbishop approves any individual appointed as a chaplain or liaison priest.

A diocese or archdiocese provides screening and criminal record checks for priests assigned to schools. The CDSBEO does not receive the “particulars” of the screening or checks but “assurances” by the diocese that appropriate screening has occurred. If a priest is a regular presence in a school and has a role of authority in relation to children or youth, the CDSBEO is responsible for the children and young people and should satisfy itself about the rigour of screening and existence of criminal record checks for priests or members of religious orders active in their schools.

Copies of the criminal record check and any screening information should be provided to the CDSBEO by the responsible diocese or archdiocese or religious order, or the CDSBEO should undertake the task itself. I think such a system is preferable and less intrusive to performing an audit of diocesan records, which is the approach I suggest to school boards for oversight of school bus drivers to ensure that providers of transportation follow school board policies.

I also made a recommendation to the UCDSB that if a minister, priest, or member of a religious order is an employee of a school board, the same reporting and sanctions that apply to other employees, such as school bus drivers and teachers, should apply to these employees. I suggest the same to the CDSBEO.

Section 53 of the Education Act provides that a member of the Roman Catholic clergy may visit a Roman Catholic school in the area in which the member has pastoral charge. However, Regulation 474/00 of the Education Act also allows a principal to exclude persons from a school if their presence is detrimental to the safety or well-being of a person on the premises.

With respect to Catholic education, the Code of Canon Law applies.¹² The Code speaks generally of expectations for teachers and curriculum. Dr. Donaleen Hawes, Superintendent of Special Education for the CDSBEO, explained that in practice, the Canon applies only to the approval of religious education programs, family life education programs, and pastoral care programs. The wording of the Code suggests that authorities in a diocese can appoint or remove a teacher of religion. Dr. Hawes clarified that the local bishop does not appoint or approve teachers of religion; this is done by the CDSBEO. If a teacher were removed under the Canon, it would not be from employment but from the teaching of religion.

12. Code of Canon Law, Book III, Title III, Catholic Education, Cann. 793–806.

At a day-to-day level, the involvement of priests and other religious personnel in schools may extend to liturgical celebrations, preparation for confirmation or First Eucharist, pastoral care in difficult situations or crisis, and evangelization. It can include arrangements for confession in the Advent or Lenten seasons. Priests, deacons, lay pastoral assistants, and others may function as role models for students, demonstrating conduct and attitudes consistent with the values of the Roman Catholic faith.

Section 93(3) of the Constitution Act provides for certain protections of denominational rights in relation to the provincial authority to act in the area of provincial jurisdiction such as education. In making recommendations to the CDSBEO, I have considered these protections.

Teachers Charged or Convicted of Sexual Offences Related to Minors

The duties of the CDSBEO under the *Education Act*¹³ include the following: “[U]pon becoming aware that a teacher is charged with or convicted of an offence related to sexual conduct and minors” or of any other offence that indicates “pupils may be at risk,” to ensure that the teacher performs no classroom duties and has no contact with pupils, pending the withdrawal of any charges, discharge, stay, or acquittal.

The Ontario College of Teachers Act, 1996,¹⁴ stipulates that an employer must provide a written report to the College of Teachers if:

1. an employer terminates a teacher or imposes restrictions on duties for reasons of professional misconduct;
2. an employer intended to take action related to professional misconduct but the employee resigned before action was taken; or
3. an investigation into misconduct is ongoing and the teacher resigns before completion of the investigation.

This report by an employer must be filed with the Registrar of the College within thirty days of the termination, restriction, or resignation, stating the nature of the circumstances. In particular, the statutory provisions for reporting to the College say that there should be a “prompt” report if there is a charge or conviction involving sexual misconduct and minors or some other offence that could expose students to harm or injury.¹⁵

13. R.S.O. 1990, c. E.2, s. 170(1)(12.1).

14. S.O. 1996, c. 12, s. 43.2.

If the Ontario College of Teachers takes disciplinary action against a teacher, it must inform the employer.¹⁶ The College has a process to investigate and hear a matter and to impose discipline, including revoking a certificate. Teachers who do not have a certificate or letter of permission cannot work as teachers. A school board is not a party to these proceedings. In my view, the existence of an investigative process at the College of Teachers does not absolve school boards from conducting their own internal investigation to determine whether an individual should remain in a teaching capacity following allegations of misconduct.

Before the creation of the College, the Ontario Teachers’ Federation administered professional discipline.

Criminal Record Background Checks

Pursuant to Regulation 521/01 under the Education Act, which became effective January 1, 2002, a “personal criminal history” is collected by the CDSBEO for each employee and service provider. School boards were given until July 2003 to complete this work, and an annual offence declaration from CDSBEO employees regarding criminal history has been required since 2004. The CDSBEO indicates that directly or indirectly, it now checks all teachers, staff, volunteers, chaplains, priests, and bus drivers. Before 2001, it did not have a policy to collect a record of offences. I have already discussed the issue of reliance on checks done for priests or members of religious orders earlier in this chapter.

Relevant Policies or Protocols

Child abuse protocols were in place between 1986 and 2002 in the boards that ultimately amalgamated to form the current CDSBEO. They were revised in 1993 following 1988 changes to the Criminal Code and the development of revised standards for investigation and management in 1992.

The 1986 and 1988 protocols in place in the SD&G County Roman Catholic Separate School Board were substantially similar to the 1989 protocol for the public board. The Catholic board also had a policy in place during the 1980s and 1990s that an employee with “well founded suspicions” should report to his or her principal or designate, not directly to the Children’s Aid Society (CAS).

15. Ontario College of Teachers Act, 1996, S.O. 1996, s. 43.3.

Under this policy, the principal was then to “gather information and insight” and report if there were reasonable grounds for suspicion. The policy provided that only if the principal did not act and the employee still had suspicions of abuse did the employee report directly to the CAS. The policy also stated that any suspicion regarding teachers or staff members must be put in the hands of a Superintendent and Director to ensure impartiality, i.e., the follow-up to any report would not be conducted by the principal. This rule was confirmed and clarified in 1988. The original wording said that the protocol was “to be put in the hands of the Superintendent/Director,” and the 1988 version specified that “the Superintendent or Director will conduct the necessary investigation in lieu of the principal.”

This policy remained in place until 2002, when the CDSBEO approved the Child Protection School Handbook currently in use. That handbook clearly indicates that professionals must immediately report to the CAS and, for those sixteen and over, to the police. The professional making the report must also inform his or her principal or designate of this report.

Like those of the UCDSB, the policies in place at the CDSBEO for reporting abuse of students aged sixteen and older are neither as detailed nor as complete as for those under sixteen and do not deal with reporting to the CAS. I recommend that the CDSBEO review policies for reporting abuse or suspicions of abuse for older students. There is always the possibility that if there is sexual abuse of students over sixteen, there could have been abuse of younger students, which must be considered. There is also the possibility that a student was abused by a person in a position of authority, which might involve criminal charges even for older students.

Relevant Training

The CDSBEO summarized available training in respect to the duty to report abuse and to comply with protocols:

- Principals should review CAS protocols with staff early in each school year.
- Crisis and student support workers receive specialized training and in turn train administrative staff.
- There is a yearly presentation to school bus drivers.
- If there is legislative change, special training is provided for all staff.

The CDSBEO recommends that more adequate funding for training be provided by the Ministry of Education and would like to have a consistent training panel (e.g., police, CAS, CDSBEO crisis workers, etc.) and to be able to train everyone at the CDSBEO annually. Care for Kids and RespectedED are programs currently offered to students in the CDSBEO. Care for Kids is aimed at younger children (i.e., preschool, junior and senior kindergarten, and slightly older children).

In terms of training costs and provision of funds for that purpose, the same issue was raised by the Upper Canada District School Board. Given the size of the school budgets, it seems likely that at least part of the issue is one of providing more flexibility to school boards and not necessarily more funds for this type of training. However, I note that if my recommendations in Phase 2 of this Report are accepted, some money will be available for cross-institutional training in Cornwall and in the counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry, through what I have referred to as the Reconciliation Trust.

In addition, as part of the forward-looking recommendations for education across Ontario in my Phase 2 Report, I make specific recommendations for enhanced professional training, as well as funding for that training across Ontario. If these recommendations are adopted, the supports the CDSBEO has indicated that it needs to prevent and respond to the sexual abuse of children and young people attending its schools will be available.

Marcel Lalonde

History As a Teacher

The SD&G County Roman Catholic Separate School Board hired Marcel Lalonde as an elementary school teacher in 1969. He first taught grades 7 and 8 at Bishop Macdonell School in Cornwall. Starting in the 1987–1988 school year, Mr. Lalonde was placed at Sacred Heart School in Cornwall, where he taught until the end of 1997.

In January 1997, Marcel Lalonde was charged with the July 1973 indecent assault of C-68. He was removed from his teaching duties that same month and, pursuant to established Board policy and practice, continued to receive full pay, pending the progress of charges in the courts or review by the School Board. In the spring of 1997, the Board was informed that Marcel Lalonde had been charged with additional offences. His resignation, given on October 27, 2000, but effective September 30, 2001, was accepted by the CDSBEO on November 21, 2000.

Marcel Lalonde was convicted of sexual offences in regard to four individuals on November 17, 2000. Some of these convictions related to former students of Mr. Lalonde. On May 3, 2001, Marcel Lalonde was sentenced to a term of incarceration of two years less a day.

Complaints First Made in 1989

In January 1989, Constable Kevin Malloy of the Youth Bureau of the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) commenced an investigation into several allegations of sexual abuse by former students regarding Marcel Lalonde. Following his investigation, Constable Malloy did not lay any charges against Mr. Lalonde but instead placed the file in abeyance. He did not contact the CAS or the school board where Marcel Lalonde was employed as a teacher. This investigation is discussed in detail in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall police.

Allegations by David Silmsner Against Marcel Lalonde

In November 1993, David Silmsner disclosed to CAS staff members Greg Bell and Pina DeBellis that he had been sexually abused by Marcel Lalonde, a teacher at Bishop Macdonell School, when he was thirteen and fourteen years old (1971 or 1972) and in grade 8. He provided further details of this allegation to the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) in February 1994. The OPP advised the CPS of David Silmsner's allegations but did not provide any detail. These facts are more fully described in the CAS and OPP chapters.

Neither the CAS nor the two police services provided any information to authorities at Bishop Macdonell School or Sacred Heart School or to the SD&G County Roman Catholic Separate School Board.

Further Allegations Against Marcel Lalonde

In October 1996, probation officer Sue Lariviere reported to the CPS that C-68, who was in custody at the Cornwall jail, had told her that Marcel Lalonde had sexually abused him. C-68 told Ms Lariviere that he had been repeatedly sexually abused while a twelve-year-old student in grade 7 at Bishop Macdonell School. The alleged abuse occurred during summer camping trips in the summer of 1973.

This investigation was ultimately placed in the hands of the OPP because the location of the camping trips placed the case within their jurisdiction. However, Constable René Desrosiers of the Cornwall Police Service also contacted Mr. Lynden of the SD&G County Roman Catholic Separate School Board on October 30, 1996, and told him the OPP would be investigating the matter. Constable Desrosiers testified that Ms Lariviere had also contacted Mr. Lynden.

In January 1997, Constable Desrosiers received disclosure from C-45 that Marcel Lalonde had sexually assaulted him and his brother. The brother indicated that Marcel Lalonde had given him alcohol and abused him when he was about sixteen or seventeen, and again about one year later. The brother indicated to Constable Desrosiers that he had been a student in Marcel Lalonde's grade 8 class at Bishop Macdonell School in 1970. He reported that Mr. Lalonde was also a deacon at St. Columban's Church, attended by the family. When interviewed by the OPP, Marcel Lalonde acknowledged he was involved with the parish, but not as a deacon. One of the brother's motivations for reporting was concern for a young cousin who was in Marcel Lalonde's class.

C-45 said he had also been a student of Marcel Lalonde. He also related that Marcel Lalonde had invited him to his home, given him alcohol, and when he passed out, sexually assaulted him. This occurred repeatedly. As well, C-45 reported that Mr. Lalonde had nude pictures of him.

In February 1997, Sergeant Brian Snyder of the CPS took a videotaped statement from C-8 regarding abuse by Marcel Lalonde. He also contacted C-66, who said that Marcel Lalonde had sexually assaulted him. Sergeant Snyder also spoke to C-58 regarding Mr. Lalonde.

On April 29, 1997, Constable Desrosiers arrested Marcel Lalonde and searched his residence. On April 2, 1998, he received confirmation from the CDSBEO regarding the attendance of some of the complainants at Bishop Macdonell School while Marcel Lalonde had been a teacher. The list included C-68.

At roughly the same time as the Cornwall Police Service was investigating Marcel Lalonde for incidents in Cornwall, he was being investigated by the OPP in regard to the alleged sexual abuse of the former student, C-68, who had initially disclosed to Ms Lariviere. The OPP charged Marcel Lalonde with indecent assault with respect to this individual on January 7, 1997. They had informed Ms Bunny Warner, Superintendent of Education at the SD&G County Roman Catholic Separate School Board, of the pending charges the previous day.

The original trial date for Mr. Lalonde was October 1999 but it was postponed to September 2000. Marcel Lalonde was convicted on November 17, 2000, in regard to four complainants: C-45, C-8, C-66, and one other individual.

Response by School Authorities

Although investigations of teacher Marcel Lalonde had occurred in the 1989–1994 period, the first notice that the SD&G County Roman Catholic Separate School Board received regarding the case was in October 1996, with the communication from probation officer Sue Lariviere and Constable Desrosiers.

This was followed shortly by communication on January 6, 1997, from the OPP regarding a pending charge against Marcel Lalonde. Mr. Lalonde did not attend school on January 7, 1997. He was told not to report for work until further notice. On January 8, 1997, Carolina Willsher, Manager of Human Resources for the SD&G County Roman Catholic Separate School Board, contacted Marcel Lalonde to advise him of a meeting the next day at the Board office. He was informed that he would receive a letter relieving him of his teaching duties. He was told that he could bring a representative of his certified bargaining agent, the Ontario English Catholic Teachers Association, and he did so. At the meeting, he was given a letter that relieved him of his teaching duties but continued his pay. He was told that he would be advised of any additional steps the Board might take after further review.

The Board received a faxed copy of the charges from Detective Constable Don Genier of the OPP. Those charges related to an incident involving C-68 and Marcel Lalonde at a Charlottenburgh campsite in July 1973. The name of C-68 was disclosed on the face of the charge. Marcel Lalonde denied these allegations and asked for reassignment within the Board. This was not granted.

On April 1, 1997, Carolina Willsher spoke to Detective Constable Genier of the OPP and he told her there was a possibility of further charges being pursued by the Cornwall Police Service. Ms Willsher subsequently contacted Sergeant Snyder, who said he would keep her informed. Shortly thereafter, the CPS Sergeant contacted Carolina Willsher and told her that Marcel Lalonde had been arrested and charged with sixteen counts of sexual assault. A Board employee obtained copies of these additional charges from the courthouse, but the names of those victims were blacked out.

On May 16, 1997, Ms Willsher met with Marcel Lalonde and his bargaining agent, but the union representative indicated that Mr. Lalonde, on the advice of his lawyer, would not answer some of the Board's questions.

On October 27, 2000, Marcel Lalonde submitted his resignation, effective September 30, 2001. I assume that this would entitle him to benefits until the effective date. It was accepted by the CDSBEO on November 21, 2000.

Marcel Lalonde was convicted of sexual offences in regard to four complainants on November 17, 2000. The CDSBEO notified the Ontario College of Teachers of this conviction on November 28, 2000, one week after accepting Marcel Lalonde's resignation effective September 2001. The Ontario College of Teachers' Discipline Committee found Marcel Lalonde guilty of professional misconduct and his certificate of qualification and registration was revoked in February 2002. By that time, Marcel Lalonde had already retired.

The CDSBEO acted appropriately in removing Marcel Lalonde from teaching duties immediately on receipt of news of charges. I have considered whether they might have acted earlier, in October 1996, knowing of an ongoing investigation. At that time, however, they had very little information from the police and had not received a report from a student, parent, or the CAS.

The Ontario College of Teachers Act, 1996,¹⁷ provides that an employer must report promptly to the College if there is a charge or conviction that involves sexual misconduct and a minor. It is not clear whether the CDSBEO reported Mr. Lalonde's arrest and charges to the Ontario College of Teachers or whether it waited for a conviction to be obtained. I am of the view that the Board should immediately submit a report when a teacher is charged with a sexual offence.

The CDSBEO was provided by the OPP with a copy of the charges against Marcel Lalonde, which indicated that those related to C-68 were sexual and involved a minor, and the name of this complainant was on the charge. In April 1998, the CDSBEO provided a record to CPS Constable Desrosiers showing that Marcel Lalonde had taught C-68 and also providing information on the dates of attendance at Board schools of other male students who were complainants with respect to Marcel Lalonde.

The Board of Trustees accepted Marcel Lalonde's resignation on November 21, 2000, making it effective on his early retirement date, as Mr. Lalonde had requested. Although Marcel Lalonde was convicted on November 17, 2000, he remained a CDSBEO employee until September 1, 2001, albeit without pay, including during a period in which he was serving a sentence of incarceration.

The CDSBEO does not have any policy regarding termination of employees who are convicted of criminal offences. Each case is considered on a "case-by-case basis." If a teaching certificate is revoked, however, termination of a teacher is automatic since a teacher must have a certificate or a letter of permission in order to teach.

The CDSBEO should develop a policy to address discipline or termination of convicted or charged employees. It has accountability as an employer and should not just wait for action by the College or the courts. There could be some delay between court decisions and action by the College of Teachers. In addition, even if an individual is acquitted of criminal charges, an internal investigation or review by the School Board could result in a decision that the individual is not a suitable teacher.

Gilf Greggain

Greggain's Career As a Teacher

Gilf Greggain started teaching at the SD&G County Roman Catholic Separate School Board in October 1967. He taught at St. Peter Catholic School and reported to the school principal, Percy Beaudette. In 1971, he transferred to St. Anne's Catholic School. These were both elementary schools.

In September 1987, Gilf Greggain took a leave of absence from his teaching position and resigned the following summer. A decade later, he was re-hired by the SD&G County Roman Catholic Separate School Board. In 1998, as a result of an amalgamation of school boards, he became an employee of the Conseil de District des Écoles Catholiques de Langue Française de l'Est Ontarien (C.S.D. 65). In April 1998, he transferred to the Catholic District School Board of Eastern Ontario.

Gilf Greggain was absent on sick leave from January 22, 2001, and did not return to his employment. The Ontario College of Teachers suspended Mr. Greggain's certificate of qualification as a teacher on April 30, 2003, for non-payment of fees.

Marc Latour Reports to Project Truth

On June 19, 2000, Marc Latour called the OPP Project Truth hotline. He reported that Gilf Greggain, his grade 3 teacher at St. Peter Catholic School, had abused him in 1967. The case was referred to the CPS. Constable Carroll of the CPS conducted a videotaped interview of Mr. Latour. This investigation is discussed in Chapter 6.

Mr. Latour testified that Mr. Greggain had unnecessarily kept him after school. He indicated that the abuse had escalated over time from physical abuse to sexual abuse. Mr. Latour testified that after a particularly harsh incident, he had told his father, who confronted Gilf Greggain, telling him to stop the physical abuse.

After this incident, Marc Latour did not immediately return to school. He testified that there was a meeting with his mother, Principal Beaudette at St. Peter, and himself. The principal promised that Gilf Greggain would not hurt Marc Latour in future and the student was returned to his class. The abuse stopped. During this interview, Principal Beaudette asked about physical abuse but made no inquiry about sexual abuse. He also did not ask about the severity of the abuse.

Marc Latour also reported that his grade 2 teacher, Ms Gosselin, had confronted Gilf Greggain about the abuse. She did this in the classroom, possibly in front of other students. Ms Gosselin said that she would report Gilf Greggain to the School Board. I have heard no other evidence that would allow me to determine that it was reported.

I have heard no evidence suggesting that the CPS informed the CDSBEO that the former teacher, Mr. Greggain, was under investigation or that the matter had been reported to the Children's Aid Society.

Response of School Authorities

The incidents that Marc Latour reported occurred in 1967. Regrettably, there is very little documented information from this period. Today, I understand that there would be action taken following a report of either physical or sexual abuse. The policy of the CDSBEO is to report allegations of abuse to the CAS. Teachers have a similar obligation. Pursuant to the current CDSBEO policy, teachers who are investigated for physically or sexually abusing children are removed from the classroom.

Lucien Labelle

Allegations Reported Against Principal Lucien Labelle

The principal of École Marie Tanguay was Lucien Labelle. This elementary school was in the French-language section of the SD&G County Roman Catholic Separate School Board.

In 1985, the Cornwall Police Service conducted an investigation regarding Mr. Labelle. There were ten alleged female victims, aged ten to twelve years. The complaints regarding the principal came to light when several girls disclosed incidents to the vice-principal. The investigation started in March 1985, and Mr. Labelle was charged in June 1985. Mr. Labelle was suspended with pay when the investigation started and without pay in June 1985.

Mr. Labelle was acquitted of the charges in January 1986. He testified and denied touching students inappropriately. The Crown appealed, but the acquittals were upheld.

A better understanding of the institutional response in the case of Lucien Labelle could have been useful for this Inquiry. It appears that the relevant school authorities made a determination regarding Principal Lucien Labelle's fitness to continue as an employee of the Board, independently of the outcome of any prosecution. After first suspending him with pay, they suspended him without pay—which Mr. Labelle referred to as being “fired”—in discussions with Constable Brian Payment of the CPS, who was investigating the case. It appears that Mr. Labelle did not return to his employment at the School Board. This suggests that the Board may have conducted its own review of the situation.

Lack of Information

This Inquiry had difficulty in obtaining full information on the Lucien Labelle case. The French-language section of the former school board did not become part of the current Catholic District School Board for Eastern Ontario (CDSBEO) in 1998, and Mr. Labelle's school was in the French section of the predecessor board. The French section became part of the Conseil Scolaire de District des Écoles Catholiques de Langue Française de l'Est Ontarien (C.S.D. 65). The CDSBEO indicated it could not assist this Commission by obtaining records or by identifying individuals who might have recollection of the case because another school board that was not a party to this Inquiry had responsibility for related records following reorganization.

However, the Upper Canada District School Board provided information related to La Citadelle. Since 1997, La Citadelle has also been part of the French-language Catholic school board, the Conseil Scolaire de District des Écoles Catholiques de Langue Française de l'Est Ontarien (C.S.D. 65). In 1989, it had been transferred to a Catholic school with both French- and English-language sections.

I am concerned that those legitimately pursuing information about historical sexual abuse may find navigating the processes to obtain information difficult, due to complex reorganizations. The CDSBEO should develop protocols with the Catholic French-language boards and the public boards for dealing with information requests, with a view to ensuring accountability for provision of information and respect for the legitimate needs of those seeking information.

As I indicated earlier in my discussion of the UCDSB, sexual abuse is generally underreported. As with the UCDSB, there may be victims of the CDSBEO who have not yet come forward. For this reason, in addition to both the confirmed cases, and additional allegations of sexual abuse of young people by employees of the CDSBEO, the Board should make a public appeal and consider making an apology. As with the UCDSB, I recommend that the CDSBEO offer counselling and support to any alleged victims of abuse by Board employees who come forward.

Recommendations

Policies, Procedures, and Protocols

1. The Boards should implement or augment existing policies, procedures, and protocols related to the abuse of children and young people to address the following issues:
 - discipline or termination of employees charged with or convicted of sexual offences;
 - the preparation of communications plans that provide direction on information sharing to Board staff, students, parents, and the public at large following disclosure, charges, or convictions related to incidents of abuse. These plans should balance the rights of the alleged victims to privacy with the broader public interest of encouraging other alleged victims to come forward and to receive support.
2. The Boards should implement or augment existing policies, procedures, and protocols to address the following issues pertaining to circumstances in which the alleged victim of sexual assault/abuse¹⁸ is sixteen years of age or older:
 - reporting to the Children's Aid Society in appropriate circumstances, such as when there are concerns that the alleged offender has continued access to children and young people;
 - the response to sexual misconduct by Board employees, volunteers, or others associated with the school.
3. The Boards should ensure that all policies, procedures, and protocols related to the abuse of children and young people are regularly updated. These updates should occur triennially and more frequently if needed to reflect legislative change.

Training

4. The Boards should offer training about sexual abuse that includes information on how to identify inappropriate patterns of behaviour by authority figures.
5. The Boards should circulate periodic questionnaires to staff to ascertain the extent to which information on policy and procedures on sexual abuse are understood and where to focus training needs.

18. The reference to sexual assault/abuse refers to the sexual abuse of children and young people, whether current or historical, unless defined otherwise.

6. It is important that Board employees and volunteers receive training regarding their statutory reporting duties to the Children's Aid Society under the Child and Family Services Act to ensure that children at risk are protected.

Physical Audits

7. The Boards should ensure that physical audits of their schools are conducted. The focus of these audits would be to make appropriate changes to reduce the opportunity for sexual abuse by removing unnecessary locks or putting glass in office doors to facilitate observation.

Transportation Providers

8. The Boards should continue to conduct periodic audits of transportation providers to ensure they comply with Board policy on the screening of school bus drivers.

Information Requests

9. Given the reorganization and/or amalgamation of school boards, the Boards operating within the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas, and Glengarry should develop protocols for dealing with information requests on historical incidents, with a view to ensuring accountability for the provision of information and respect for the legitimate needs of those seeking information.

Screening and Hiring Persons With Access to Board Schools

10. The Boards should ensure that they receive copies of criminal record checks and any screening information for priests or members of a religious order, counsellors, psychologists, and other professionals who are regularly present at Board schools. Additionally, as a minimum, a yearly declaration of criminal record should be obtained.

11. If the Board pays the salary of a priest, member of a religious order, or other religious representative, counsellor, psychologist, or other professional, or provides a school office to such a person, it should satisfy itself as to the suitability of this person, and ensure that, in the event of a complaint of sexual abuse, the same policies apply as are in place for teachers, other employees, volunteers, and school bus drivers, in terms of reporting and removal from or restriction of duties pending resolution of the complaint.

Public Appeal and Apology

12. The Boards should make a public appeal, urging any victims of sexual assault/abuse to come forward. Given that there have been a number of confirmed cases of sexual assault/abuse of young people by employees of the Boards, that there have been many other allegations of sexual assault/abuse of young people reported against the Boards' employees, and it is known that sexual assault/abuse is generally underreported, it is likely that there are still victims of sexual assault/abuse within the Cornwall area who have not yet come forward. Therefore, the Boards should convey the message that any individuals who come forward with allegations of sexual assault/abuse will be treated with respect, dignity, and compassion. The Boards should offer counselling and support to any alleged victims of sexual assault/abuse who come forward.
13. The Boards should consider making a public apology to all confirmed victims of sexual assault/abuse of young people by an employee of the Boards and that this apology be delivered by the Director of Education of each Board. Given that the Apology Act, which came into force in Ontario in April 2009, allows institutions to make apologies without admitting civil liability, it is also recommended that the Boards consider extending such an apology to alleged victims who have reported allegations that have not been confirmed through a civil or Board process and to victims and alleged victims who have either opted not to come forward or who are yet to come forward.

Recommendations for the Boards and Other Public Institutions

Child Protection Protocol, 2001

14. The Boards are partners in the Child Protection Protocol: A Coordinated Response in Eastern Ontario (July 2001). Since this protocol has not been updated, the Boards should meet as soon as practicable with other partners to review and update the protocol. For those partners actively involved in the investigation and prosecution of sexual assault/abuse cases, consistent roles for the participants should be set out as well as guidance on the sharing of information between investigating bodies. The process of reviewing and updating the protocol should continue triennially.

Institutional Response of the Ministry of the Attorney General

Introduction

The Attorney General for Ontario, a member of the Cabinet and an elected member of the Ontario legislature, heads the Ministry of the Attorney General. The authority of the Attorney General with respect to all matters related to the administration of justice is found in section 5 of the Ministry of the Attorney General Act. The chief public servant in the ministry is the Deputy Attorney General. Several departments report to the Deputy Attorney General through Assistant Deputy Attorneys General accountable for divisions such as Court Services, Legal Services, Policy and Corporate Services Management, Victim Services, and Criminal Law.

The office of the Attorney General predates Confederation and has its roots in the British legal system. In 1972, the Ontario Department of Justice was divided to create the Ministry of the Attorney General and the Ministry of the Solicitor General (now the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services); the latter was given responsibility for the law enforcement functions that had been included in the Department of Justice.

Responsibilities of the Criminal Law Division and the Role of the Crown

The Criminal Law Division has twelve branches. For the purposes of this Report, eight are relevant: the Crown Law Office—Criminal, the Criminal Law Policy Branch, and the six regional Directors of Crown Operations.

The Crown Law Office—Criminal is responsible for appellate work and has some trial counsel who conduct complex or high-profile trials. This branch also conducts prosecutions of justice-related officials, such as police officers. The Criminal Law Policy Branch was established in 2001 and provides policy guidance to Crown prosecutors on the exercise of Crown discretion. It is also responsible for creating and updating the Ontario Crown Policy Manual, which contains directives and guidelines for Crown counsel, and for advising Crown attorneys on case law or statutory change affecting their responsibilities. This branch provides advice on criminal law policy, such as potential changes to the Criminal Code.

There are six Directors of Crown Operations. The approximately fifty-four Crown attorneys in Ontario report to these regional Directors. The Crown attorney for Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry reports to the Director of Operations for the Eastern Region. Crown attorneys have assistant Crown attorneys who in turn report to them. Crown attorneys and assistant Crown attorneys provide legal representation for criminal matters under the Criminal Code, the Youth Criminal Justice Act, and other federal statutes. Crown attorneys prosecute a wide range of offences, including fraud, domestic violence, child abuse, sexual assaults, impaired driving, robberies, and homicides.

The Attorney General has authority for criminal prosecutions under section 2 of the Criminal Code. Authority is delegated from the Attorney General to Crown attorneys under section 10 of the Crown Attorneys Act, whereby Crown attorneys become agents of the Attorney General for the purposes of prosecutions under the Criminal Code.

Crown attorneys and other agents of the Attorney General are independent of partisan political influence, but the Attorney General has the legal authority to give direction to Crown attorneys in particular cases or to personally intervene in a prosecution. It is unusual for the Attorney General to have direct involvement in individual cases, given the danger of allegations of political interference and the high volume of cases in Ontario.

Crown attorneys have a responsibility to see that justice is done in individual cases. The role of the Crown is articulated in the 1954 Supreme Court of Canada Boucher decision, which states that the purpose of a criminal prosecution is not to obtain a conviction but to put credible information forward. Crown attorneys have duties to the public, victims, witnesses, and accused persons. Rule 4(3) of the Rules of Professional Conduct of the Law Society of Upper Canada explains that the prosecutor's duty is not to seek to convict, but to see that justice is done through a fair trial of the merits of the case.

Crown counsel have broad areas of discretion to ensure prosecutions are carried out in a way that is consistent with the public interest and that there is justice in individual cases. The Supreme Court of Canada has ruled that discretion is essential to the criminal justice system, in that it would be “unworkably complex and rigid” were police and prosecutorial discretion not exercised.¹

Today, approximately 900 Crown counsel work in the Criminal Law Division, sixty-three of whom were hired in the 2004–2006 period as part of efforts to ensure infrastructure for case management, and bail and remand best practices. In Cornwall, there is a Crown attorney with eight full-time assistant Crown attorneys and three per diem lawyers reporting to him. This compares to the period 1974 to 1991, when there were two assistant Crown attorneys reporting to Crown Attorney Don Johnson.

Crown attorneys are given training and resource materials specific to their responsibilities. This includes programs for those starting out as assistant Crown attorneys. This training for newer Crown counsel includes training on the respective roles of the police and Crown counsel. Usually Crowns attend at least one week of “summer school”; there are also spring conferences and fall regional conferences. The sexual assault prosecutor conference, which began in 1994, includes panels on historical sexual assault, but there is otherwise no specific training on dealing with historical cases of child abuse. Some Crowns participate in annual conferences with the Victim/Witness Assistance Program; the topic focus is usually domestic violence but sometimes includes child and sexual abuse. Those working in the Crown attorney system also receive practice memoranda, a monthly newsletter, and, since 2000, an update on appellate decisions.

The Crown Policy Manual states that Crown counsel should participate in police training but does not provide for joint training.

Child Abuse Coordination, Victim Services, and Child-Friendly Courts Provided by the Ministry of the Attorney General

In or around 1988, the Ministry of the Attorney General developed a policy whereby a Crown counsel in each Crown Attorney’s Office was designated as a Child Abuse Coordinator. He or she would receive training to act as a resource and mentor for other Crowns and as the contact for any Victim/Witness Assistance Program in the jurisdiction. The 1994 Crown Policy Manual indicated that the local coordinator should handle the most serious cases of child abuse. A province-wide coordinator position was created, who was also counsel to the Victim/Witness Assistance Program. Today, the policy states that the Crown attorney in each jurisdiction “should” designate an experienced, trained, full-time Crown as the local Child Abuse Coordinator.

Some areas, such as Toronto, have a designated child abuse court with a “child-friendly” court. Child-friendly courts have closed-circuit equipment, booster seats, microphones, and other testimonial aids. There are such courts in eight or more locations in Ontario, such as in Chatham and Peel, but those testifying on behalf of the Ministry of the Attorney General did not know if Cornwall was one of those locations. The Court Services Division is responsible for child-friendly courts and provisions of testimonial aids such as screens.

At one time, the Victim/Witness Assistance Program (VWAP) was part of the Criminal Law Division. It has been part of the Victim Services Secretariat of the Ministry of the Attorney General since 2001. VWAP was established in Cornwall in October 2001.

The Basic Course of Prosecution of an Offence—Who Does What and When

The process of a criminal charge begins with a police investigation, which may include interviewing potential witnesses, gathering evidence, executing search warrants, and wiretaps. The processes outlined here represent the procedures in place today; subsequent sections explain the introduction over time of various policies and processes affecting the usual course of a prosecution in Ontario.

The police have responsibility for selecting the applicable charge and deciding whether an individual should be charged with a criminal offence. While some Canadian jurisdictions require Crown attorneys to be involved in pre-charge approval and screening, Ontario does not. There are some cases in which consent of the Attorney General is required before proceedings can be commenced, such as with Criminal Code provisions related to sex tourism or public nudity. Once a police officer decides that there are “reasonable and probable grounds” to believe the individual investigated committed an offence, he or she swears an information before a Justice of the Peace. The police officer may seek the advice of Crown counsel regarding legal issues related to establishment of reasonable and probable grounds and whether there is a legal basis for a charge.

Once an accused is charged, he or she is either detained or released from custody. In most cases, police will decide whether an accused should be released or proceed to a bail hearing. If a Crown attorney opposes bail, there is a hearing before a Justice of the Peace unless the accused person consents to detention. At the hearing, the Crown may consent to release or seek a detention order. The Justice of the Peace decides if the person should be detained or released subject to a surety or deposit, or subject to conditions such as prohibiting contact with alleged victims or Crown witnesses, geographical or curfew restrictions, or prohibitions on weapons.

Once a charge is laid, the Crown counsel assigned to the case screens the charge. This means that he or she assesses whether there is a “reasonable prospect of conviction” and whether it is in the public interest to proceed. In conducting this assessment the Crown reviews the material provided by the police, which is often called a “Crown brief.”

A Crown may ask the police to further investigate the matter. It is also common that at the initial screening phase, the Crown determines that further disclosure material is required and contacts the police for this material. The Crown has an obligation to make full disclosure to the accused or defence counsel.

Some offences, termed “hybrid offences,” can proceed either summarily in the Ontario Court of Justice or by way of indictment. In the latter case, the accused can choose the venue: either the Ontario Court of Justice or the Superior Court of Justice, where there is the option of a jury trial. Many sexual offences are hybrid offences, but if the offence is based on an event that occurred more than six months in the past, it must proceed by indictment.

The first appearance of an accused permits the setting of a trial or preliminary hearing date and, at this point, the Crown provides initial disclosure to the defence. Discussions often occur between Crown counsel and defence counsel to see if issues can be narrowed or the case resolved by a plea. This discussion can also proceed at a judicial pre-trial conference, which could include discussion of potential sentences.

A preliminary hearing is held to determine if there is sufficient evidence for a trial. At a preliminary hearing, an accused could be committed to trial or discharged if there is insufficient evidence.

At trial, the accused may be convicted, acquitted, or the charges may be stayed. There are two types of stays: a judicial stay and a stay entered by the Crown. A judicial stay is akin to an acquittal and can occur when there is a breach of the accused’s rights under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (the Charter). A Crown stay gives the Crown one year to determine whether or not to reinstate charges, for example to give time to a witness who is ill. A stay may also be entered if the Crown believes there are reasonable grounds for conviction but it would not be in the public interest to proceed with the charge.

If an accused is convicted, there is a sentencing hearing and the Crown attorney may call evidence about victim impact, including the reading of a victim impact statement by the victim.² A pre-sentence report may be ordered; these are prepared by probation officers, outlining the background of the accused for the assistance of the court in determining an appropriate sentence.

An accused person is presumed innocent until proven guilty. The accused has rights under the Charter that support the presumption of innocence, including the right to a fair trial. This includes the right to full disclosure by the Crown and to a trial without delay.

Criminal Code Provisions Concerning Sexual Abuse Have Changed Over Time

The development of case law related to sexual abuse of children and young people and an overview of statutory change provides critical context to the understanding of policies at the Ministry of the Attorney General. Ms Mary Cameron Nethery, in providing evidence on behalf of the Ministry of the Attorney General, noted, as did other witnesses, that many of the statutory changes were outcomes of the 1984 Badgley Report and the 1990 Rix Rogers Report. These reports also influenced policy development for the guidance of Crown counsel, notably the 1994 Crown Policy Manual.

The following are relevant statutory changes affecting sexual offences against children or young people. Unless otherwise noted, these are changes to the Criminal Code:

- 1976: repealed requirement for instruction to the jury on corroboration of complaint; possibility of publication ban
- 1983: repealed offences of rape and indecent assault on a female or male; created new offences of sexual assault, sexual assault causing bodily harm or with a weapon, aggravated sexual assault; abrogation of rules regarding recent complaint; removal of judicial discretion to raise corroboration with the jury; automatic publication ban if requested by Crown or complainant; jury can consider whether accused believed there was consent, but belief does not have to be reasonable
- 1987: repealed several offences; created offences of sexual interference, invitation to sexual touching, sexual exploitation, anal intercourse unless married or consenting adults over eighteen, parents or guardian procuring sexual activity, exposing genitals to persons under fourteen for sexual purposes, living off avails of prostitution if prostitute under eighteen, obtaining sexual services if person under eighteen; consent precluded as a defence where complainant under fourteen; consent precluded as a defence for some sexual offences if complainant was under eighteen (e.g., sexual exploitation); complainant under eighteen at time of proceeding may testify behind a screen; use of videotape for those under eighteen permitted; provided processes for those under fourteen to testify to facilitate admissibility of such evidence
- 1988: introduction of victim impact statement provisions; expansion of publication ban provisions to non-sexual offences and to cover witnesses in the case of certain offences; witnesses under eighteen must be informed by the judge of their right to request a publication ban

- 1992: clarification regarding consent in context of sexual offences; clarification of circumstances where no consent obtained; provisions restricting application of accused's belief in consent as a defence
- 1993: created offences of child pornography and criminal harassment; provision for recognizance orders where fear of sexual offences against person under fourteen; child abduction provisions; testimony aid provisions for those under fourteen; abrogation of rule requiring corroboration of a child's testimony; provision to prevent cross-examination of a witness under fourteen by accused personally and appointment of counsel to conduct cross-examination if accused has no counsel
- 1994: summary conviction incarceration penalty for sexual assault raised to eighteen months
- 1995: created scheme to authorize search warrants for DNA samples
- 1997: created offences of child sex tourism and sexual offences against children committed outside Canada; created aggravated offence for living off the avails of prostitution where steps were taken by accused to force prostitute into activity, creating a minimum of five years and a maximum sentence of fourteen years for this offence; created aggravated offence of soliciting prostitute under eighteen; made breaching court order mandatory aggravating factor for criminal harassment; clarified that female circumcision is aggravated sexual assault; expanded use of testimonial aids and screens; expanded publication ban provision to additional sexual offences and historical sexual offences; created provisions for process and criteria for dealing with production of records from third parties in sexual offence proceedings
- 1999: authorized a support person to accompany a witness under fourteen or with a disability when testifying; provision to prevent cross-examination of a witness under eighteen by the accused personally and appointment of counsel to conduct cross-examination of that witness; created process for authorizing publication bans for any witness or victims in any proceeding; made safety and security of victim or witness a factor in pre-trial release decisions by police or judicial officer; provided for non-communication order while accused is on bail or in custody; allowed victim to read victim impact statement in court.

Policies to Guide Crown Counsel Have Increased Over Time

In terms of policy guidance to those prosecuting offences, the system prior to 1988 was described in testimony as “ad hoc.” From time to time, the Attorney General, Deputy Attorney General, or Assistant Deputy Attorney General sent out memos on various matters. The work to develop comprehensive policy materials started in 1988 and led to the issuance of the Crown Policy Manual in 1994. These policies were intended to evolve over time, and the manual has continued to be updated and supplemented by memoranda. The policies are to guide Crown counsel in the exercise of discretion but are not to provide specific or absolute direction. The Crown Policy Manual has always been a public document.

The development of 1994 policies was influenced by the 1993 Report of the Attorney General’s Advisory Committee on Charge Screening, Disclosure and Resolutions Discussions (Martin Report). This report was in response to the 1990 case R. v. Askov,³ in which the Supreme Court of Canada set out parameters for trial within a reasonable time. Since many criminal cases exceeded these times, many were withdrawn.

The 1999 Criminal Justice Review Committee Report that looked at efficiency measures to decrease delays also influenced Crown policies. The work of this committee led, among other things, to an annual Justice Summit to develop efficiency measures, in turn leading to the development of several policies and protocols. These include the Bail and Remand Best Practices Protocol and Criminal Case Management Protocol.

Policies and Protocols Related to Relationships Between the Crown and Other Institutions

The 1994 Crown Policy Manual indicates that Crown counsel should participate in development of local protocols to establish and implement inter-agency procedures to respond to child abuse cases. In 2000, a practice memorandum set out Crown counsel’s obligation to liaise with child protection agencies. It also encouraged each Crown attorney to develop a local protocol on reporting to the local Children’s Aid Society, the police, and Victim/Witness Assistance Program where available; this protocol was to be shared with local agencies such as probation offices.

The 2000 practice memorandum stated that Crown counsel have a duty to report any case where there is a reasonable suspicion that a child is or may be in need of protection. The duty is described as an ongoing obligation that cannot be delegated. However, the policy says that it is unclear if Crown counsel falls within the definition of a “professional performing official duties with children” under the Child and Family Services Act. In my view, this lack of certainty should be rectified: it should be clear that Crown counsel, as professionals prosecuting allegations of abuse made by children, have an obligation to report suspicion of abuse.

Although the failure to report child abuse is a provincial offence, not an offence under the Criminal Code, the 2000 Crown Policy Manual states that Crown counsel should prosecute violations of reporting requirements.

The relationship between the police and Crown counsel has been the focus of policy change, given the ongoing interactions between those who investigate and prosecute offences. While the police and Crown counsel are often required to work in partnership, they have separate responsibilities in the criminal justice system, and separation between the Crown and the police is of fundamental importance to the proper administration of justice.

In 1997, a policy on police relationships with Crown counsel updated the original policy in the 1994 Crown Policy Manual. It qualified the relationship between a Crown and a police officer as being mutually independent, but also requiring cooperation and reliance at all stages of an investigation and court proceedings. The policy stresses that while it would be inappropriate for Crown counsel to provide the “overall blueprint” for investigation, it is appropriate for Crown counsel to give advice to the police on legal issues. When giving specific advice, Crown counsel should keep a record of the advice given to ensure it is not misunderstood. The policy reiterates that the final selection of an appropriate charge and swearing of any information is the exclusive responsibility of the police, but in difficult cases, the 1997 policy recommended the following routine for advising the police:

1. Obtain a full written investigative brief from the police.
2. Give advice in writing addressing the issue of reasonable and probable grounds.
3. Set out the subjective and objective legal tests that apply.
4. If reasonable and probable grounds exist, but there is not a reasonable prospect of conviction, set this out.
5. State that this legal opinion is not binding on the police and that it cannot be disclosed to third parties.

The policy stressed that once charges are laid, Crown counsel has authority under section 11(a) of the Crown Attorneys Act to cause the charges to be further investigated and to collect additional evidence. While rare, police may refuse to follow this advice, in which case counsel should then put any request in writing and then follow the “chain of command” to take it further. The same policy notes that police have an obligation to disclose to the Crown any new evidence and that this is independent of any obligation arising from a request by Crown counsel.

Policies in the 2005 Crown Policy Manual reiterated principles articulated in early documents, such as the importance of separation of police and Crown roles as part of an overall system of checks and balances, and the importance of working relationships of mutual respect and professionalism. However, the 2005 policy also pointed to the need for timely advice from Crown counsel in large and complex police investigations.

A 2006 practice memorandum gave suggestions for the relationship between police and Crown counsel, and replaced the 1997 policy on the same topic. It reiterated that the role of Crown counsel at the pre-charge stage is advisory and not directive, and that police have responsibility for the selection of the appropriate charge and the decision to swear an information. The practice memorandum also reiterated that it is inappropriate for Crown counsel to provide overall direction for an investigation or gather evidence, but that Crown counsel can give advice on legal issues. However, such advice is not binding on the police.

If case-specific advice is given, counsel could be a witness at trial and may therefore be prevented from prosecuting the charge. The practice memorandum states that if a Crown becomes a close member of the investigative team, he or she should not be involved in prosecuting the case, and the role the Crown counsel is expected to perform should be clarified in writing. If counsel is providing advice on the sufficiency of grounds to lay a criminal charge in a difficult, complex, or potentially controversial case, a procedure was established that was substantially similar to the 1997 procedure discussed above. The only significant change was in relation to the fourth step, which was revised to read: “Advise the police when there are reasonable and probable grounds but no reasonable prospect of conviction unless there is a change in evidence.”

The practice memorandum also provides that the “Crown attorney for each jurisdiction may wish to develop a protocol to facilitate the process of advising the police, which would include a list of the types of cases in which these five recommendations should be followed.” I am of the view that a standard draft-type protocol should be prepared and forwarded to all offices to assist the Crown attorneys. The language in the practice memorandum could be made mandatory, or a review process could be put in place to ensure that such protocols are now in place in each jurisdiction, where necessary.

The 2006 memorandum reiterated the same material provided in the 1997 Crown Policy Manual regarding requests for additional investigation or evidence in the post-charge period, the process to follow if police decline to pursue these requests, and the independent obligation of police to disclose any evidence obtained after charge, whether obtained due to requests of the Crown attorney or otherwise.

Policies and Protocols Related to Prosecutions of Child and Sexual Abuse Cases

The 1994 Crown Policy Manual covered inter-agency coordination and vertical prosecutions, whereby one Crown counsel handles the case so there is continuity. It provided that multi-victim, multi-perpetrator cases be handled by local Child Abuse Coordinators or those with similar expertise. Police were to be encouraged to contact the local Crown Attorney's Office at the outset, and a specific Crown counsel or the Child Abuse Coordinator should be available for advice throughout the police investigation. The policy stated that psychological or psychiatric evidence should be considered for issues such as child sexual abuse syndrome, delayed reporting, gradual disclosure, and recantation. This part of the policy also applied to adult victims testifying about events that occurred when they were children.

The Victim/Witness Assistance Program has had a protocol for multi-victim, multi-perpetrator cases since 1992, and this was updated in 1996. The main thrust of these protocols is to ensure that an experienced person is assigned to these high-demand cases and relieved of other duties to concentrate on them. The 2006 VWAP Policy and Procedures Manual refers to these multi-victim, multi-perpetrator cases as "special prosecutions." The manual notes that there may be an additional need for victim services in such cases, but no commitment should be made to provide additional resources until these resources have been identified and secured.

A 2001 discussion paper on a major case protocol stated that historical sexual abuse cases with multiple victims are considered major cases. It set out roles and responsibilities of those involved and specified that major case teams include at least one VWAP staff member. The Major Case Advisory Group, a group of senior Crowns, was established in 2001 to provide advice for major case prosecutions. Under the major case protocol, the Crown attorney and the police are to determine together who performs various responsibilities, particularly those related to disclosure. An additional responsibility of the Major Case Advisory Group is to examine unsuccessful cases. Before 2001, review processes were informal.

One issue that arises in major cases is the assignment of Crown counsel so that a small or busy local office can handle a major case. Current processes involve identification of a matter as being a major case and assigning a lead Crown attorney or prosecutor. Then one or two additional Crown counsel are brought in to assist. In the Eastern Region, there are two senior Crowns who move to local offices as the need arises. The flexible assignment of Crown counsel to major cases was first instituted in the period 2000–2002 in conjunction with the establishment of the Major Case Advisory Group.

While there appear to be practices for managing major cases and infrastructure in the Major Case Advisory Group to govern major cases, there is no formal policy in the Crown Policy Manual on the topic. In addition, there appears to have been no update following the 2004 regulation to the Police Services Act that dealt with police management of major cases. As a result, there are some inconsistencies: the Ontario Major Case Management Manual says that historical sexual assaults will not necessarily be subject to major case management by police, but the Ministry of the Attorney General policy is that major case management applies to such cases when there are multiple victims. It may be that there is a different meaning given to “major case” by the Crown attorney system and the police, but it is a concern that the policies appear to exist without reference to each other. Crown and police policies related to major case management should be reviewed together to identify inconsistencies or gaps.

The practice of charge screening used after 1993 resulted from the Martin Report. Before 1994, there was no specific policy, but the test for proceeding with a prosecution was (1) whether there was a “triable” case and (2) whether it was in the public interest to proceed. There was no definition of a “triable” case, nor were the public interest factors defined. The first charge screening policy came out as part of the Crown Policy Manual in January 1994. The “threshold” screening test is whether there is a reasonable prospect of conviction. The secondary test is whether it is in the public interest to proceed. The reasonable prospect of conviction test is objective, and the threshold is higher than the test for committal at a preliminary inquiry. However, reasonable prospect of conviction does not require that Crown counsel conclude there is a probability of conviction.

In 1995, a charge screening memorandum clarified the test for reasonable prospect of conviction. It also explained that a single fragile witness could form the basis of a conviction. An updated charge screening practice memorandum was issued in 1997 dealing with the approach to be taken when a witness recants his evidence. Recantation is not in itself a bar to conviction. The policy singles out cases of child sexual abuse and spousal prosecutions but is silent on historical sexual abuse. The suggested process is to:

1. investigate the recantation;
2. re-screen the case to consider whether reasonable prospects for conviction exist; and
3. disclose the recantation and resultant investigation.

The 1997 practice memorandum was replaced with a 2002 memorandum that included a similar policy but added some guidance as to which cases should and should not proceed to trial in the face of a recantation.

In looking at the test of whether there is a public interest in proceeding, the 1994 policy stated that the race, religion, sex, national origin, political association, or position in the community of the accused could not be considered. The 2002 practice memorandum on charge screening reiterated that in screening charges for prosecution, consideration of whether it was in the public interest to proceed should be engaged only once there was a determination that there was a reasonable prospect of conviction.

In terms of interviewing techniques, the 1994 Crown Policy Manual indicated that the Crown attorney should interview a child at least once to establish rapport. It also stated that complainants should be interviewed well in advance of the trial or preliminary hearing and referred to VWAP, if available, or to other available community services.

The manual stated that if adults are testifying regarding events that occurred when they were children, the Crown attorney should consult with them prior to requesting any publication ban.

A 2002 practice memo that was generic in nature did point out that there should be no suggestive techniques used during interviews and there should be pre-charge interviews only in very limited circumstances. In addition, Crown counsel should not conduct investigative interviews. It stated that if, in a preliminary interview, an issue arises that requires investigation, Crown counsel should request the police to investigate.

There was a policy on delays in the 1994 Crown Policy Manual, which stated that due to the trauma for victims occasioned by lengthy waits, and public policy interest, sexual offences should be given scheduling priority.

In 1981, guidelines were adopted to govern disclosure. While the defence was to be provided with all evidence against the accused, including will-states,⁴ witness statements and police notes were not required to be disclosed by Crown attorneys.

The 1994 Crown Policy Manual articulated a disclosure policy that complied with the test in the 1991 Supreme Court of Canada decision in R. v. Stinchcombe.⁵ The governing principle is that Crown counsel is under a duty to disclose all information in his or her possession relevant to the guilt or innocence of the accused unless excluded by a legal privilege. Crown counsel have an obligation to make inquiries of police to ensure they have full disclosure. Crown management teams provide support for the system of disclosure and keep track of disclosure.

4. A will-state is a summary of the evidence a witness expects to give during testimony. They are commonly prepared by police officers with respect to the actions they took during an investigation.

5. [1991] 3 S.C.R. 326.

A 2006 practice memorandum on disclosure provides more detailed guidance. Each local Crown Attorney's Office should have a protocol for disclosure. There are no policies setting out what to do if a police officer refuses to disclose certain evidence, other than raising the issue as a management matter. It would be useful, in my view, to augment policies to encourage the development of local protocols to deal with situations where police refuse to disclose or refuse to investigate on the request of Crown counsel, so that the process for discussing differences of opinion is known before such differences arise.

In 1994, a resolution discussion policy mandated that Crown counsel should balance the interests of the victims, the protection of the public, and the rights of the accused in resolving a case. The policy also stated the Crown counsel cannot accept a guilty plea to a charge knowing the accused is innocent or if a material fact cannot be proven, unless he or she has disclosed this fact to defence counsel. In resolution discussions, Crown counsel are not to bind the Attorney General's right to appeal a sentence. If a Crown counsel is considering not proceeding or resolving the case with a lesser offence, he or she must look at the impact on the victim and consult with the local Crown attorney.

In terms of sentencing considerations, the 1994 Crown Policy Manual has been updated with practice memoranda over time. The relevant sentencing considerations include:

- protection of the public;
- the violation of personal privacy felt by victims;
- psychological harm;
- violation of bodily integrity;
- the great need for general deterrence;
- the prevalence of sexual assault; and
- society's revulsion for such acts.

The 1994 policy reminded Crown counsel that protection orders could be part of sentences in child abuse cases, such as ordering offenders to stay away from employment related to children. Revisions to the 2006 Crown Policy Manual indicated that conditional sentences are not appropriate for child sexual abuse cases, but the manual is silent on historical cases of child sexual abuse.

The Ontario Sex Offender Registry that was the outcome of "Christopher's Law" was in force in 2001, and the National Sex Offender Registry began in 2004. An individual convicted of a designated offence is automatically entered in the provincial registry, which has geographic mapping databases.

This may be of assistance to trace possible offenders in the case of an abduction. Registration in the federal database is not automatic, nor does it have geographic mapping capacity.

The effort involved in delineating policies, particularly in recent times, is very helpful to a large system of Crown counsel, promoting principled decision making and greater consistency. However, it should be clarified whether any policy does or does not apply to historical cases of sexual abuse of children or young people.

Victim-Related Policies

It was not until the issuance of the 1994 Crown Policy Manual that the Ministry had formal policies related to victim issues.

In 2004, a practice memo was issued regarding use of victim impact statements that provided three forms: one for children, one for older children and teenagers, and one for adults. The memo also provided information about the purpose and admissibility of statements and the process of preparation.

The 2005 preamble to the Crown Policy Manual set out that Crown counsel owe victims a special duty of “candour and respect.” In the 2006 Crown Policy Manual, no specific policy deals with the treatment of victims of historical sexual abuse; there is a policy on child abuse and sexual offences generally.

An updated 2006 practice memorandum on “Child Abuse and Offences Involving Children” compiled most policy-related factors for Crown counsel to consider and applies both to abuse and to cases where children have witnessed traumatic events. The memo reminds Crowns of the obligation to have a local Child Abuse Coordinator to facilitate inter-agency coordination, act as a resource person, and ensure cases of child abuse are assigned and scheduled as soon as possible. It recommends updating local protocols, highlights the importance of the Victim/Witness Assistance Program, and suggests maintaining resource lists of programs and agencies for referral.

The memo also explains the obligation to ensure communication to victims, including apprising victims of significant steps in the proceedings such as bail, application for records, trial dates, and sentencing. In particular, it states victims or their family should be aware of plea negotiations, any probation terms, or any conditions or orders related to bail. The need for the victim’s safety is stressed in relation to bail policies.

A practice memorandum on “Sexual Assault and Other Offences” does refer to allegations of historical sexual abuse in the context of the use of psychological or psychiatric evidence, the use of expert evidence related to memory, publication issues, and the management of multi-victim or multi-offender cases. Again, the lack of clarity regarding what policies apply to historical sexual abuse cases should be rectified to provide better guidance to Crown counsel and to reassure victims of historical abuse that their circumstances have been given thorough policy consideration.

In the sections that follow, I will address a number of prosecutions and related Crown work in respect of cases involving historical child sexual abuse, during the period beginning in the early 1980s and continuing for more than 20 years. These include pre-Project Truth prosecutions and legal opinions; opinions, investigative advice and prosecutions in the period 1993-1996; Project Truth prosecutions; external pressures on Project Truth prosecutions; other prosecutions within this time period that did not arise out of Project Truth and finally, the issue of victim/witness assistance services.

Nelson Barque Not Charged in 1982

Don Johnson Receives Investigative Brief From Ministry of Correctional Services About Nelson Barque

On June 14, 1982, Inspector Clair McMaster, of the Ministry of Correctional Services, sent a letter to Cornwall Crown Attorney Don Johnson enclosing a copy of an investigative report, which attached the report of Peter Sirrs, Area Manager of the Cornwall Probation and Parole Office, regarding former probation officer Nelson Barque. This investigation and report were discussed in detail in Chapter 5, on the institutional response of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services. Inspector McMaster wanted Crown Johnson to review the report and provide an opinion. Although Mr. Johnson did not recall what decision Inspector McMaster was asking him to make, based on Mr. Johnson's response it is clear that Inspector McMaster was asking him for an opinion as to whether criminal charges should be laid against Mr. Barque.

According to Mr. Johnson, it was not common for a ministry to refer an internal investigation of an employee to the Crown to determine whether charges should be laid. If a government agency came to the Crown with concerns about whether an employee had engaged in criminal conduct, the standard practice was that the Crown would advise the ministry to take the matter to the police. Mr. Johnson admits he did not do that in this case. Mr. Johnson also testified that he would not, in a case like this, open a file. Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald also believed it was very unusual for a ministry to send an internal investigation to the Crown to review and provide an opinion on whether charges should be laid. He expected, however, that an internal office file would be opened if such a request were made.

I am of the view that a Crown counsel providing a formal, case-specific legal opinion to police or another investigative body should immediately open a file, identify what information or documents he or she is relying on, and keep a copy of the advice or opinion provided. If Mr. Johnson had kept copies of the documents he received from the Ministry of Correctional Services, the Crowns who prosecuted Mr. Barque in 1995 would have had access to and knowledge of this information.

There was no formal policy in place in 1982 dealing with the relationship of police with Crown counsel, nor was there a policy for the review of an internal investigative report from another ministry. The current practice memorandum that deals with the police relationship with Crown counsel should also be applicable to a request for a Crown opinion such as the one made to Mr. Johnson in 1982. The policy directs that when providing case-specific advice:

The advice given by Crown counsel will likely be recorded by the recipient in his or her police notebook. To ensure that the advice given by Crown counsel is not misunderstood, where practicable, Crown counsel should keep a record of the advice given. This can be done by confirming the advice in a letter, reading the officer's notes or having them read back, obtaining a copy of the officer's notes to ensure their accuracy, or keeping contemporaneous notes of the advice. Some Crown counsel maintain a notebook in which they keep a record of all of the advice they give to police.

I am of the view that in this instance Mr. Johnson failed to ensure that notes, correspondence, and records were properly kept and stored, that an opinion provided to the Ministry of Correctional Services was recorded, and that a file was opened with respect to the allegations.

Mr. Johnson had prior professional dealings with Mr. Barque in his capacity as a probation officer. He did not, however, believe he was in a conflict in being asked to provide an opinion because he knew Mr. Barque only in a professional capacity. Mr. Barque worked as a probation officer in Cornwall for almost nine years, from August 19, 1974, until May 4, 1982. Don Johnson was the Crown Attorney in Cornwall from 1974 until 1991. There is a close working relationship between the Crown and local probation officers. This was illustrated during the prosecution of Mr. Barque in 1995, when Mr. Johnson represented Mr. Barque. During his submissions to the Court at the sentence hearing, Mr. Johnson was able to comment on Mr. Barque's work as a probation officer based on Mr. Johnson's experience of working with him, when he was the Crown attorney.

Had the police conducted an investigation and laid a charge, Mr. Johnson's office would probably not have handled the prosecution. In my view, if a conflict would have precluded Mr. Johnson or his office from prosecuting Mr. Barque, that conflict should also have precluded Mr. Johnson from giving an opinion about whether criminal charges should be laid. There was no conflict of interest policy in place in 1982 that dealt with this situation. There was a 1976 memorandum distributed to all Crown attorneys that dealt with the prosecution of police officers. It provided that the Crown had the discretion to require an outside prosecutor deal with the matter. This memorandum modified a previous 1971 policy that made it mandatory for an outside prosecutor to be involved. The 1976 policy provided that “if the charge is of a serious nature or if you are personally familiar with the defendant you no doubt will wish to require an outside prosecutor, for otherwise the appearance of even handed justice might be impaired.”

Although there was no policy in place, Mr. Johnson was clearly in a conflict and should have declined to offer an opinion on this matter.

Don Johnson Provides Opinion: Insufficient Evidence to Lay Charge

In a letter dated June 22, 1982, Mr. Johnson told Inspector McMaster that he had reviewed the material and concluded “that in the circumstances criminal charges would not be warranted”:

My decision is based on the fact that Mr. Barque when confronted with the allegations resigned immediately. It appears also that one of the homosexual relationships involved an individual who was 21 years of age, therefore, a charge under the criminal code would not succeed.

Dealing with the other individual, Mr. Robert Sheets, the fact that he denies any homosexual relationship with Mr. Barque although Mr. Barque admits to it, there is no support evidence, and I feel it would be fruitless to proceed with any charge.

Mr. Johnson’s understanding was that an internal investigation had been concluded and the Ministry of Correctional Services had determined that no further action was necessary on its part. He considered this a factor in reaching his conclusion.

During his testimony, Mr. Johnson was asked about the connection between Mr. Barque’s resignation and Mr. Johnson’s decision that criminal charges were not warranted. He acknowledged that there were other issues at play, such as consent and the admissibility of Mr. Barque’s statement, that he should have expanded upon in his letter. Mr. Johnson disagreed that Mr. Barque’s resignation was irrelevant in determining whether criminal charges should be investigated:

Well I got the impression, I would assume, from the correspondence from Mr. McMaster that they were quite satisfied with the fact that Mr. Barque had resigned and that was it; that was a fait accompli at that point.

In my view, Mr. Barque's resignation, noted in the internal investigation conducted by Inspector McMaster, should not have been a determining factor in deciding not to lay criminal charges. It is the first factor mentioned by Mr. Johnson in his letter. The resignation was clearly a relevant issue for him in deciding whether criminal charges should be considered against Mr. Barque. Mr. Johnson should not have placed any emphasis on Mr. Barque's resignation in formulating his opinion.

Mr. Johnson also concluded that criminal charges were not warranted because one of the homosexual relationships involved an individual over the age of twenty-one. His understanding at the time was that if the individual was over twenty-one years old and consented, there could be no criminal charge. The statement of C-44, who admitted to having a homosexual relationship with Mr. Barque, indicates that he was twenty-one years old at the date the statement was taken. In the statement, C-44 says that the relationship with Mr. Barque lasted for "about a year" and that the last time he saw Mr. Barque was March 31, 1982. C-44's birth date is May 13, 1961.

Mr. Johnson could not recall what materials he was given by the Ministry of Correctional Services. He said he was not provided with C-44's birth date and that the information he had led him to believe that C-44 was twenty-one. He admitted that the issue of age "could have been explored" but he "assume[d] the investigators would have explored that and provided that information." Had Mr. Johnson been informed that C-44 was under twenty-one it might have changed his perspective. A police investigation might have verified some of this conflicting evidence.

With respect to the other individual, Robert Sheets, Mr. Johnson concluded it was fruitless to proceed with a charge because although Mr. Barque admitted the relationship, Mr. Sheets denied having any homosexual relationship with Mr. Barque. The fact that Mr. Barque admitted the relationship should have prompted Mr. Johnson to refer the matter to the police for further investigation or advise the Ministry of Correctional Services to do so.

Another concern Mr. Johnson had was that the statement given by Mr. Barque would be inadmissible. In the statement, he admitted to homosexual relationships with C-44 and Mr. Sheets. In particular, Don Johnson was concerned about the voluntariness of the statement since it was being given to Mr. Barque's employer. This concern was not articulated in his opinion letter. Mr. Johnson acknowledged that he should have stated that criminal charges were unlikely because, in the circumstances, the evidence was likely inadmissible.

Mr. Johnson did not have a Crown brief when he provided his opinion to the Ministry of Correctional Services. During his testimony, he acknowledged the possibility that if the police had investigated in 1982, they might have uncovered other information and possibly other allegations of abuse. He emphasized that his opinion did not prohibit the Ministry from going to the police: “if they weren’t satisfied with my letter, they could have walked on to the Cornwall Police Department and said ‘look it, this is what we got, we want further investigation and charges laid.’” Mr. Johnson testified that if presented with the same circumstances again he would write the opinion letter and not refer the matter to the police: “Well, what am I going to tell the police, sir? I’m going to tell them that, ‘You don’t have any evidence to lay a charge but go ahead and conduct an investigation.’ It doesn’t make sense to me.”

In my view, this matter should have been referred to the appropriate police authorities for investigation. As Mr. Johnson acknowledged, the Crown is usually asked to provide opinions to the police, presumably after an investigation has been conducted. He could not have known whether a police investigation would have been fruitless or whether it would have uncovered relevant evidence.

The investigative report of the Ministry was not an appropriate substitute for a thorough and objective police investigation. Mr. Johnson did not consider the possibility that other individuals may have been abused by Mr. Barque.

It never crossed Mr. Johnson’s mind that it may have been in the Ministry’s best interest not to have the matter prosecuted. As discussed in Chapter 5, Mr. Sirrs felt the resignation of Mr. Barque was an appropriate response. He concluded it was not necessary for the Ministry to take further action because of his concern that if the matter became public, it would tarnish the image of the Cornwall Probation Office. In my view, Mr. Johnson failed to recognize the seriousness of the allegations, which involved the breach of trust of a probation officer, and provided inappropriate advice to the government agency.

R. v. Father Gilles Deslauriers

On July 2, 1986, Crown Attorney Don Johnson met with Cornwall police investigators regarding charges against Father Gilles Deslauriers. Following the meeting, charges were laid against Father Deslauriers for indecent assault on a male and gross indecency, and a warrant was issued for his arrest. The investigation and background of this matter are discussed in detail in Chapter 8, dealing with the institutional response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall.

Assignment of a Crown Attorney to the Prosecution

On August 25, 1986, Bruce Young, Deputy Director of Crown Attorneys, confirmed with Mr. Johnson that Rommel Masse, a bilingual Crown, would prosecute the matter. Mr. Johnson was not involved in the prosecution of Father Deslauriers.

Public Interest in the Prosecution

Peter Ayling, a concerned citizen, wrote a letter to the local Crown attorney, Mr. Johnson, on September 11, 1986, stating that he wanted to ensure that Protestants were included in the composition of the jury since the accused was a Catholic priest.

If a French speaking jury is chosen I believe from the nature of the population of the area from [which] the jury will be chosen that all juryman and jury ... will be Roman Catholics. It would be naive to believe that justice could be done in this case if the jury composition excluded Protestants.

I therefore draw to your immediate attention the absolute necessity of selecting a jury that will in[clude] Protestants and so guarantee the degree of impartiality required for an exemplary decision in what will likely become a leading case and set precedent in this [area] of Criminal Law.

Mr. Johnson forwarded the letter to Mr. Masse and noted, "it appears this trial had taken on religious overtones." They did not discuss the letter further.

Preliminary Inquiry and Discussion Between Jacques Leduc and a Victim

The preliminary inquiry in the matter took place before Justice Claude H. Paris from September 15 to 18, 1986.

Benoit Brisson, one of the victims of Father Deslauriers, testified at the preliminary inquiry. At the end of the first day of his testimony, Mr. Brisson was advised not to discuss his testimony with anyone as he was returning to testify the next day.

Gilles Charlebois, defence counsel, advised Mr. Brisson prior to his cross-examination that he was not obliged to disclose anything he had divulged to Father Deslauriers during confession:

Avant qu'on commence, j'aimerais que ça soit bien clair entre vous et moi que toute révélation que vous auriez faite au Père Gilles dans le cadre du secret de la confession, vous n'êtes pas obligé de nous le dévoiler en cour, à moins que vous ne le décidiez de le faire, bien entendu.

According to Jacques Leduc, who at the time was counsel for the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, it became apparent that information that was being put to Mr. Brisson during cross-examination might have been the subject matter of a confession. Mr. Leduc testified that he asked Mr. Masse if he could speak with Mr. Brisson; Mr. Masse agreed. Mr. Leduc also testified he advised Mr. Brisson that if he believed that he was being asked about something that was discussed in confession, he could advise the Court.

Mr. Brisson testified that Mr. Leduc advised him that everything discussed with Father Deslauriers was considered confession:

LE COMMISSAIRE: ... je veux juste comprendre une chose là. En fin de compte, ce que tu me dis c'est que Me Leduc te disait que si on te parlait de choses qui auraient—

M. BRISSON: Qui avaient été discutées avec Gilles.

LE COMMISSAIRE: Au confessionnel.

M. BRISSON: Oui—bien, non, non. Non, non. Même quand c'était dans son bureau, juste entre lui et moi.

LE COMMISSAIRE: M'hm.

M. BRISSON: Tout ce qui avait été dit entre lui puis moi c'était en confession.

Following this discussion between Mr. Leduc and Mr. Brisson, defence counsel asked Mr. Brisson what was discussed with Mr. Leduc. Mr. Brisson said that Mr. Leduc reminded him to advise the Court if matters were discussed that had been the subject of confession.

There is a discrepancy between Mr. Brisson and Mr. Leduc as to what communications are covered by the confessor-penitent privilege. In hindsight, the Crown prosecuting this case should not have allowed Mr. Leduc to speak to Mr. Brisson on this issue or any other matter while he was giving his evidence. Alternatively, it would have been prudent if someone from the Crown's office were present to hear what Mr. Leduc told the witness so there would be no misunderstanding.

However, the question of whether certain matters were privileged or not is not relevant to the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General. As I will discuss in more detail in the section "Prosecutions Related to Allegations Reported by Claude Marleau," the courts in Ontario do not recognize the confessor-penitent privilege. Any advice about its non-admissibility was erroneous.

On September 18, 1986, Father Deslauriers was committed to stand trial on seven counts of indecent assault on a male and four counts of gross indecency. He had initially been charged with eight counts of indecent assault and eight counts of gross indecency. Mr. Masse advised Mr. Johnson that some of the charges had been withdrawn because of insufficient evidence.

Pre-Trial Conference

Mr. Masse wrote to Mr. Johnson on October 24, 1986, advising him that at a pre-trial, Justice Jean Forget indicated that if Father Deslauriers pleaded guilty the sentence would be imprisonment of fifteen to thirty days consecutive on each count plus probation for a significant period. Mr. Masse stated that defence counsel was distressed at the prospect of his client serving jail time and wanted a further pre-trial to be heard before Justice Gratton, who would be presiding over the trial.

Father Gilles Deslauriers Pleads Guilty and Receives a Suspended Sentence

On November 10, 1986, Father Gilles Deslauriers pleaded guilty and was convicted of four counts of gross indecency. The remaining counts were withdrawn at the request of the Crown. He received a suspended sentence and probation for two years with a condition that he conform to the directives of Bishop Adolphe Proulx: "Qu'il se conforme aux directives de Monseigneur Adolphe Proulx afin de s'assurer que ce dernier puisse exercer une surveillance efficace de l'accusé."

Mr. Brisson recalled being advised by the investigating officers that Father Gilles Deslauriers had pleaded guilty and received a sentence of two years of probation. Denyse Deslauriers, Mr. Brisson's wife, and Lise Brisson, his mother, testified that they were frustrated by the inadequacy of the sentence in comparison to the impact of the crime.

Unsuccessful Request for Crown Appeal

Mr. Masse sent a lengthy letter to the Crown Law Office requesting an appeal of the sentence imposed on Father Deslauriers. He noted:

I feel that this sentence is totally inadequate in that Mr. Deslauriers should have gone to jail even if for only a short and sharp period of time. This case has attracted a great deal of media attention and the community is now in an uproar over the sentence. I felt that this case involved a blatant breach of trust on the part of the accused and that such a blatant breach of trust should have been met with a denunciatory sentence. The public perception of this case is that the accused received a lenient sentence only because of his position as a Roman Catholic priest. Consequently, this results in the administration of justice being held in disrepute.

Mr. Masse also wrote to Mr. Johnson advising that he was not satisfied with the results and was requesting a Crown appeal:

It seems to me that this case concerns a blatant breach of trust on the part of the accused and also a gross abuse of his position of authority as chaplain at La Citadelle High School. Consequently, the facts cried out for a term of incarceration.

In January 1987, Mr. Masse tried again to convince the Crown Law Office to appeal, given that the Crown was appealing a suspended sentence imposed on Father Dale Crampton, a priest convicted of sexual offences in the Ottawa area. This appeal resulted in Father Crampton being sentenced to a period of eight months of incarceration. In a letter to the Director of the Crown Law Office, Mr. Masse wrote that it was important for the Crown to be consistent in similar matters. He wrote that a media representative had already contacted him about the Crampton appeal.

On January 21, 1987, Mr. Johnson also wrote to the Director of the Crown Law Office and echoed Mr. Masse's request to reconsider the appeal. Mr. Johnson wrote that citizens of the community and the media would be calling upon him to answer questions as to why the Crampton and Deslauriers cases were being treated differently. He asked the Director to advise him of the principles that were considered by the Ministry in arriving at its decision with respect to these matters.

Mr. Johnson did not receive a response to this letter. He wrote a further letter on March 23, 1987, to the Director of Crown Attorneys advising that he had read in the newspaper that the Attorney General would not appeal the Deslauriers case. He was dismayed that he found this out from the media. In the article Mr. Johnson referred to in his letter, Mr. Masse was quoted as saying that Father Deslauriers' sentence was "at the low end of the scale" and he thought he should have gone to jail to send a message to the public. Edward Then, Director of the Attorney General's Crown Law Office, provided an explanation as to why the Deslauriers case differed from the Crampton matter. The article said:

"There were similarities between the cases," said Ed Then, director of the Attorney General's Crown Law office.

"Both cases were horrible, but there were differences too," he added.

"In deciding whether to appeal each sentence, impact statements from the court proceedings are considered," Then said.

"In the case of Father Deslauriers, while it was still very serious, the boys were 17, 18 and 19 years old. They were almost adults.

"In the case of Father Crampton, we were talking about much younger children—ages 10 to 18.

"The devastation brought on them as a result of the incidents was horrific," Then said. "It was bad enough to be molested, but it also caused them to lose their faith in God and authority.

"And it happened to quite a number of small boys over such a long period of time in the Crampton case, too," Then said.

No Evidence on the Distinction Between Cases

Crown counsel in both the Deslauriers and the Crampton matters requested that the sentences imposed at trial, neither of which included a period of incarceration, be appealed. The sentence in the Crampton case was appealed, resulting in a period of incarceration. Mr. Then's comments as reported in the media appear to draw some distinction between the Crampton and the Deslauriers matters. Unfortunately, none of the materials reviewed by the Crown Law Office in determining whether to appeal were filed as exhibits at the Inquiry. Without the benefit of those materials, I am not prepared to comment on the decision of Crown Law Office not to proceed with an appeal of Father Deslauriers' sentence.

R. v. Jean Luc Leblanc, 1986

The investigations into Jean Luc Leblanc in 1986 and again in the late 1990s were discussed in Chapters 6 and 7, on the institutional responses of the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) and the Ontario Provincial Police, respectively. This section looks at the prosecution of Mr. Leblanc in 1986 following the CPS investigation into allegations of sexual abuse made by Jason Tyo and Scott and Jody Burgess. The prosecution arising out of charges in the late 1990s will be covered in a later section.

Crown Opinion From Don Johnson Regarding Allegations

Constable Brian Payment testified that on January 27, 1986, he met with Crown Attorney Don Johnson regarding the Jean Luc Leblanc matter. Constable Payment's notes read: "Met with Don Johnson in my office: re: 531/86. Mr. Johnson read statements and agreed charges of gross indecency be laid." Although Mr. Johnson could not recall this meeting with Constable Payment, he agreed that the meeting probably occurred.

On January 27, 1986, Constable Payment swore an information containing three counts of gross indecency against Mr. Leblanc. Mr. Johnson acknowledged that the statements in the Crown brief alleged multiple acts that spanned over four years. The information sworn by Constable Payment refers to one count of gross indecency against each of three boys, rather than multiple acts against each of them, as they had alleged. In addition, allegations of anal sex were not captured in the charges laid. When asked about this, Mr. Johnson said he did not draft the information but agreed that he could have amended it.

Release Conditions of Jean Luc Leblanc

As discussed in Chapter 6, Mr. Leblanc was released on an undertaking without any condition requiring him to abstain from communicating with the alleged victims or with other young people. Mr. Johnson testified that today restrictions on communication with victims are automatically added to undertakings given on release. He agreed that Mr. Leblanc's terms of release should have included a term that he would not be in contact with the alleged victims or any person under the age of eighteen.

Mr. Johnson acknowledged that he could have amended the undertaking and added terms of release. However, he did not believe there was a policy at the time requiring that undertakings be reviewed by a Crown attorney to ensure they had the appropriate terms of release. He explained that, at the time, he relied heavily on the terms suggested by the police.

Disclosure Request and Plea Negotiations

In May 1986, defence counsel for Mr. Leblanc suggested that his client might plead guilty to one of the charges if the other two were withdrawn. Mr. Johnson responded a few months later and suggested that Mr. Leblanc plead guilty to two counts of gross indecency, because he felt they were “two separate and distinct incidents and should be treated as such.” The Crown ultimately withdrew the count related to the allegations of Scott Burgess. Mr. Johnson did not consult with Mr. Burgess in making this decision.

Mr. Johnson testified there may have been credibility issues with regard to Mr. Burgess. He said that if he had been aware that the three boys witnessed the abuse on each other and that Mr. Leblanc had made an inculpatory statement to Constable Payment, it would have minimized his concerns about Mr. Burgess’ reliability. The inculpatory statement by Mr. Leblanc was “if they felt uncomfortable, all they had to do was to tell me not to do it anymore and I would have stopped right away.” This information was contained in the Crown brief.

Mr. Johnson also stated, in his August 1986 letter to defence counsel, that with respect to sentence it was the Crown’s position that Mr. Leblanc was not in a position of trust with the victims and that they willingly cooperated with the act. In his testimony, he maintained his position that the victims’ willingness was a mitigating factor. This position has been denounced and decried by experts with whom I agree.

Mr. Johnson testified that he did not believe Mr. Leblanc was in a position of trust vis-à-vis the alleged victims because he did not have authority over them. He acknowledged that today, in the right circumstances, the law is such that any relationship between an adult and a child could be characterized as a position of trust.

Sentence

On May 13, 1986, Jean Luc Leblanc pleaded not guilty to all three counts. At trial, on November 6, 1986, he pleaded guilty to two counts, the remaining count having been withdrawn at the request of the Crown.

Before the trial date, Mr. Johnson received a report from Dr. John Bradford, a psychiatrist and the Director of Forensic Service at the Royal Ottawa Hospital, who examined and treated Mr. Leblanc between April and October 1986. Mr. Johnson relied heavily upon the recommendations of Dr. Bradford in determining his position on sentencing. In his conclusions Dr. Bradford recommended, “I believe a noncustodial disposition with a Probation Order, possibly with conditions of psychiatric treatment to allow more formal monitoring, is likely the appropriate disposition in this case.”

Mr. Leblanc received a non-custodial sentence of three years probation with the condition that he attend a counselling program arranged by the probation office. The Crown did not appeal the sentence, which Mr. Johnson felt was appropriate.

There were no terms in the probation order with regard to contact with victims or youth. Mr. Johnson acknowledged that there was a policy in effect at the time that there should be no contact with children in such matters. He did not know if the Crown counsel who handled the sentencing asked for this condition.

Constable Payment testified that he became aware of the fact that one charge was dropped and of the sentence only afterward. However, according to Mr. Johnson, it was his general practice to confer with the investigating officers to tell them what had been put on the table during plea negotiations and to ask for the officers' position.

Crown Contact With Complainants

Jason Tyo testified that he was made aware of Mr. Leblanc's court dates and was invited to attend court for the sentencing. He believed the Crown attorney read his victim impact statement in court.

Scott Burgess testified that he did not meet with the prosecutor and was not told that the charges involving him were withdrawn. In addition, he was not told about the sentencing hearing and so did not have the opportunity to attend. Mr. Johnson acknowledged that he had no contact with Mr. Burgess.

Mr. Johnson testified that in 1986 there was no Witness/Victim Assistance Program in the Crown Attorney's Office. He noted that in his nineteen years as Crown attorney in Cornwall, there was no written policy that required an alleged victim to be contacted if charges were being dropped against an accused. He could also recall no policy requiring Crown counsel to inform alleged victims about what was happening with their particular charges.

Mr. Johnson explained that he assumed that the investigating officer would contact complainants and tell them if charges were being withdrawn. According to Mr. Johnson, investigating officers were typically involved throughout a prosecution and he believed they were the ones who updated complainants or victims. It appears that in this matter the investigating officer and the victims found out about the plea arrangement only after the fact, and thus I find that Mr. Johnson did not inform the investigating officer, which, in hindsight, he should have.

A Missed Opportunity

Don Johnson's failure to provide advice on these charges, and his unfortunate view that the victims' apparent willingness was a mitigating factor, led to Mr. Leblanc not being appropriately charged, in my view. Had Mr. Leblanc been charged with additional or more serious offences, he may have received a harsher sentence that may have included a period of incarceration or more restrictive conditions in his probation order.

Jean Luc Leblanc pleaded guilty to two counts of gross indecency and received a suspended sentence. He was placed on probation for a period of three years, without a condition that he be prohibited from contacting victims. Within weeks, he was abusing one of the same victims. His abuse of that individual and many others is discussed in more detail in Chapter 7.

Crown Opinions Provided to the Children's Aid Society Before 1991

As mentioned in Chapter 9, on the institutional response of the Children's Aid Society, the Crown Attorney's Office occasionally interacted with officials from the CAS. Don Johnson was the acting Crown attorney in Cornwall from 1972 to 1974 and then the Crown attorney from 1974 to 1991.

Mr. Johnson testified there were infrequent calls in limited situations between the CAS and the Crown's office. When he was Crown attorney in Cornwall, Tom O'Brien headed the local CAS office. Although Mr. Johnson had no recollection of meetings with Mr. O'Brien, he accepts that they had meetings. Mr. Johnson testified that if CAS officials told him about circumstances where he believed there was sufficient evidence of a criminal offence, he would have told the CAS officials to contact the police. Mr. O'Brien testified that he would have expected the Crown to tell him to go to the police if that was the appropriate thing to do. If Mr. Johnson had told Mr. O'Brien to go to the police, he would have done so. According to Mr. O'Brien, Mr. Johnson never told him to go to the police.

Cieslewicz Foster Home

As discussed in Chapter 9, a matter came to the attention of the Crown involving allegations of abuse against the foster father at the Cieslewicz foster home. On October 31, 1978, Mr. O'Brien wrote a letter to Barry Dalby, Director of Child Welfare, Child Welfare Branch, advising him of both past and present allegations made by girls in the Cieslewicz foster home. Mr. O'Brien further advised that he would be meeting with the Crown attorney that day.

On November 1, Mr. O'Brien wrote to Mr. Dalby that he had met with Crown Attorney Johnson, Assistant Crown Attorney Guy DeMarco, and Angelo Towndale. The letter stated that after considering the facts presented to him, Mr. Johnson was of the opinion that there was insufficient evidence to proceed with any charges against Mr. Cieslewicz.

Mr. Johnson testified that he has no recollection of this meeting. Mr. Johnson does not know what facts were presented to him nor whether Mr. O'Brien showed him the letter he sent to Mr. Dalby outlining the allegations. Mr. O'Brien testified that the information provided to the Crown attorney would be fairly well reflected in the information provided to the Director of Child Welfare.

In providing an opinion in this matter, Mr. Johnson would have relied entirely on the information provided to him by CAS. He cannot recall what was discussed and does not recall requesting to view the case files.

Lapensee Group Home

Another CAS matter that came to the attention of the Crown was an incident in late 1982 at a CAS group home run by Mr. and Ms Lapensee. One of the girls alleged that she and the other girls in the home were being sexually molested by Brian Lapensee, the son of Mr. and Ms Lapensee. A serious occurrence report was prepared regarding this matter, and Mr. O'Brien took the matter to the Crown Attorney's Office. In a letter to Robert Nadon, Program Supervisor of the Children's Services Area Office, dated December 2, 1982, Mr. O'Brien wrote, "While I do not expect any action on the part of the Crown Attorney or the Police, I have decided to discuss the whole matter with the Crown Attorney and have made an appointment with him."

Four days later, Mr. O'Brien wrote to Mr. Nadon again, advising that he had met with the Crown on December 6 and that "after a brief discussion and perusal of the report it was felt that no further legal action would be taken."

Mr. Johnson does not recall meeting with Mr. O'Brien about these allegations. He testified that perhaps the conversation was between Mr. O'Brien and Assistant Crown Attorney Guy DeMarco, as they were close friends.

There was another incident at the same group home in April 1983, with allegations against the same individual. The details of this incident have been discussed in Chapter 9. On April 20, Mr. O'Brien discussed this incident with Assistant Crown Attorney Alain Ain. Mr. Ain's opinion was that there was no point in pursuing charges against Brian Lapensee at that time. On April 22, Mr. O'Brien followed up with a letter to Mr. Ain enclosing a copy of the serious occurrence report and outlining why Mr. O'Brien felt it was not necessary to lay charges. It does not appear that Mr. Ain was provided with a copy of the December 1982 serious occurrence report. Nor does Mr. O'Brien, in this letter, discuss the earlier complaints and investigation. Mr. O'Brien testified that he did not recall why Mr. Ain was not told the entire history relating to Brian Lapensee. Mr. O'Brien admitted he should have provided the assistant Crown attorney with enough information for him to make a decision regarding charges.

With respect to these incidents, Mr. Johnson testified that he thought Mr. O'Brien was an honest individual doing the best he could with the resources he had available to him. He hoped that in seeking an opinion from the Crown, Mr. O'Brien would provide him with all the information he had. In both the Lapensee and Cieslewicz cases, the police were never notified about the complaints. According to Mr. Johnson, an opinion from the Crown did not prevent the CAS from going to the police. With respect to both of those homes, Mr. Johnson said if he did speak to CAS about these matters, his instruction would have been, "If you have sufficient evidence, please contact the police."

Mr. Johnson testified that, when asked by agencies for an opinion, he considered that it might be their hope that the answer they would get was that there was insufficient evidence to lay charges. He acknowledged that this happened with the opinions he gave.

In my view, these are examples of the Ministry of the Attorney General providing advice to Ministry agencies without allowing for a proper and sufficient investigation by police authorities. The Ministry here also failed to ensure that notes and records were properly kept and stored, that opinions provided were properly recorded, and that files were opened with respect to allegations of sexual abuse. A policy should provide that allegations of sexual abuse reported to a Crown counsel be immediately turned over to police authorities for investigation.

Second Street Group Home

As discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service (CPS), in 1989, a former CAS ward named Jeannette Antoine alleged that she was abused at the Second Street group home when she was a child. She recounted physical abuse and sexual acts by staff members at the group home. On September 25, 1989, Crown Attorney Johnson met with CPS Deputy Chief Joseph St. Denis, Inspector Richard Trew, and Mr. O'Brien. Mr. Johnson did not recall the meeting but accepts that he was there. He agreed that a meeting with the Director of the CAS and high-ranking police officers was significant and did not happen often. Mr. Johnson does not recall opening a file.

Mr. O'Brien's notes of the meeting state:

During the course of our meeting we talked about the strapping that had taken place in the group home, and the fact that this was not necessarily a criminal action in that it was not against any section in the Criminal Code.

As a result of our conversation it was suggested that I send a registered letter to Jeanette inviting her to come to see me, and that in it I ought to enclose a copy of our Complaints Procedure. It was suggested that if Jeanette did not take any further action, there need be nothing further done on our part.

It appears that no instances of sexual improprieties were discussed. Although it is not indicated in his notes, Mr. O'Brien recalled providing the entire file to Crown Attorney Johnson, who reviewed it and told Mr. O'Brien he did not have to take further action.

Mr. O'Brien recalled that he went to the Crown because he knew many of the Crown attorneys personally. It was easier for him to go directly to the Crown and he had confidence in Mr. Johnson's abilities. Mr. O'Brien believed that if a Crown attorney thought the police should be involved he or she would have told him. Mr. O'Brien did not recall if the Crown ever told him to go to the police.

Deputy Chief St. Denis remembered attending the meeting but not specifically what was discussed. He did not think anything was decided during the meeting other than that there was no reason to go any further. He believed those remarks came from Crown Attorney Johnson.

Tom O'Brien Advises Don Johnson He Went Back to Police

On October 3, 1989, Mr. O'Brien had another contact with Mr. Johnson about this matter. Mr. O'Brien's notes read:

I was finally able to reach the Crown Attorney, Don Johnson, today and advise him that I had gone back to the Police, my reasons for doing so, and the kind of information I had given to them. I asked whether he wished a copy of this material at the present time and he said he did not because he felt if the police were going to pursue the matter further, they would be alerting him with the information they had, whereas if their decision was not to proceed further, then there was no point in circulating a lot of damaging documents.

It appears from Mr. O'Brien's notes that he went back to the police because of information in a case worker's notes that suggested inappropriate sexual behaviour by CAS staff while the group home was in operation.

Mr. Johnson has no recollection of this discussion. According to Mr. Johnson, he did not tell them not to circulate anything. His understanding was that the police were going to investigate. Mr. O'Brien felt that the Crown's office was content at this point to leave the matter in the hands of the Cornwall police.

Constable Kevin Malloy Advises Tom O'Brien Insufficient Evidence; Crown Agrees

According to Mr. O'Brien's notes, on February 7, 1990, Constable Kevin Malloy advised Mr. O'Brien that there was not sufficient evidence on which the police could proceed and the Crown attorney agreed with this decision.

According to Constable Malloy, he had credibility issues with Ms Antoine's statement that he discussed with Inspector Trew, and then he sought advice from Crown Attorney Johnson. He showed Mr. Johnson all the statements and believes Mr. Johnson read Ms Antoine's statement in its entirety. The purpose of the meeting, according to Constable Malloy, was to look at the issue of reasonable and probable grounds to lay charges.

Constable Malloy understood that following this meeting, Crown Attorney Johnson would be sending information about this matter to the Regional Director of Crown Operations. Constable Malloy was waiting for a response from the Crown and put the file in abeyance.

Mr. Johnson testified that he would never tell a police officer whether to lay charges. That is not his job. His job is to instruct on evidence and procedure.

Don Johnson Sends Letter to Regional Director of Crown Attorneys

On April 4, 1990, Mr. Johnson sent a letter to Norman Douglas, Director of Crown Attorneys, Eastern Region, enclosing the statement given by Jeannette Antoine to Constable Malloy regarding allegations of abuse by CAS staff. The letter stated:

Although there appears to be some factual basis for a further investigation, I cannot find any indication of specific dates when the alleged incident occurred, or any names and addressed [sic] of any witnesses whom [sic] may substantiate the allegations.

Mr. Johnson further wrote that he was informed that an investigation had been carried out in the late 1970s and certain CAS employees had been let go but no charges were laid.

Mr. Johnson testified that it was rare for a Crown attorney to send this type of a letter to the Director of Crown Attorneys. He did so in this case because it involved another ministry of the government of Ontario and because the publicity could cause embarrassment. He acknowledged that he took a different approach here than he did with the Nelson Barque situation in 1982 because new processes had since developed, and Crown attorneys were instructed to provide certain information to their Directors to make them aware of situations that might be developing in their regions.

Mr. Johnson testified that his primary concern was a lack of specificity in the allegations. He brought the lack of dates and names of witnesses to Mr. Douglas' attention because it would have caused great difficulty for the Crown to prosecute a case like this. Mr. Johnson testified that it has been his experience that complaints of historical sexual abuse typically lack specific details relating to dates and that certain investigative steps can be taken to determine a general time frame. He agreed it would not have been fatal in 1990 in a historical sexual abuse case not to have a specific date but maintained that it was necessary to have a time frame, location, identification of the parties, and any supporting evidence that may be available.

Mr. Johnson concluded the letter:

I have not brought up the matter of laying charges with the Cornwall Police as names and dates are not available. Should you wish to discuss the possibility of laying charges, I would request an interview with Cst. Malloy and myself. I await your reply.

Constable Malloy testified that between February 5 and April 4, 1990, he had not asked Ms Antoine for names or addresses of fellow residents of the group home and that he never asked CAS for that information either. Constable Malloy does not recall Mr. Johnson mentioning that he was concerned about not knowing names and dates and said that if he had, Constable Malloy probably would have contacted the CAS for that information.

The letter does not refer to the credibility of Ms Antoine or the concern Constable Malloy said he had about her having a different version of the events. Finally, the letter does not give any conclusion about reasonable and probable grounds. Constable Malloy testified that he was surprised that the topic was not covered in the letter because the purpose of the meeting with the Crown was to look at the issue of reasonable and probable grounds.

This letter was copied to Constable Malloy and he recalls receiving it. He did not raise any objections with the Crown about the letter.

Norman Douglas Requests Police Keep Investigating

Mr. Douglas wrote a reply to Mr. Johnson on April 10, 1990, advising:

You are quite correct that we ought to be very careful on these matters, and have the police investigate every allegation of abuse. I would like you to make sure the police begin an investigation if they already have not done so. Perhaps Cst. Malloy can dig a little deeper to secure specifics.

Mr. Johnson testified that he does not recall receiving this letter. He recalls being approached in the mid-1990s by Constable Malloy and Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie, who asked if he recalled receiving the letter. If Mr. Johnson did not in fact receive this letter, he acknowledges that he did not follow up on his April 4 letter. He said that at the time there were no reminder systems in place to indicate that he had not heard back from Mr. Douglas.

As discussed in Chapter 6, Constable Malloy was not aware of this correspondence or the direction from Mr. Douglas to “dig deeper” and saw this letter for the first time during the internal investigation conducted by Staff Sergeant Derochie in 1994. Constable Malloy testified that if he had seen this letter he would have shown it to his superiors and continued with his investigation.

Mr. Johnson agreed that the miscommunication that resulted in his not receiving this letter is “unacceptable.” He also acknowledged that that because Mr. Douglas’ instructions to dig deeper were not followed, many other aspects of the Jeannette Antoine investigation were muddled up. He maintained, however, that it was not his practice as Crown to do nothing in respect of matters brought to his attention.

This is another example wherein the Ministry of the Attorney General failed to ensure that notes and records were properly kept and stored, that opinions provided to police and other agencies were properly recorded, and that files were opened with respect to allegations of sexual abuse. In my view, Don Johnson failed to follow up with the Director of Crown Attorneys, Norman Douglas, with respect to Mr. Johnson’s letter of April 4, 1990, regarding the investigation of Ms Antoine’s allegations of abuse.

Police Waiting for Response From Crown

According to Inspector Trew, he and Constable Malloy never had a concluding meeting to go over the whole file because they were waiting for a responding letter from the Crown attorney. Therefore, the file was left in abeyance. It is clear from the evidence that the police were never directed to continue with their investigation. As I indicated in Chapter 6, the CPS should also have done more to follow up on this matter before its re-investigation in 1994.

Crown Opinion Provided in 1994 Second Street Group Home Investigation

In January 1994, Constable Shawn White of the Cornwall Police Service was assigned to re-investigate Jeannette Antoine’s allegations of abuse at the Second Street group home. As discussed in the previous section, Ms Antoine initially came forward with these allegations in 1989. Constable White’s initial understanding was that the complaint dealt with physical abuse. The details of that investigation have been discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service.

During the course of the investigation, Constable White also heard allegations that John Primeau, a worker at the Second Street group home, had abused young residents. On June 14, 1994, Constable White met with Peter Griffiths, Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region, at his office. During this meeting, Constable White told Mr. Griffiths how the investigation was conducted and advised him of the three alleged incidents of sexual abuse committed by Mr. Primeau. Constable White also told Mr. Griffiths that he had received allegations of sexual abuse in other foster homes.

The fact that a number of people were making similar allegations about occurrences in group or foster homes caused Constable White some concern. He was also concerned that there was a systemic problem with the handling of complaints of sexual abuse made against employees of the Children's Aid Society and foster parents. Constable White's notes show a discussion about the "possible need to develop a protocol in this area." Although it was discussed during this meeting, the potentially larger problem within Children's Aid Society (CAS) foster or group homes was not the crux of Constable White's concern. Constable White also testified that there was no information to suggest any criminal activity on the part of the CAS itself.

In my view, allegations of physical and sexual abuse made against employees and foster parents who are employed or supervised by the CAS is suggestive of criminal activity within the institution if there were concerns about how those allegations were handled or, more accurately, were not handled or mishandled.

Constable Shawn White Provides Brief to the Crown

Constable White prepared an extensive brief, which included his handwritten notes and copies of all the written statements taken during the investigation. The brief was provided to Mr. Griffiths. According to Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie, the brief was sent to Mr. Griffiths rather than to the local Crown attorney, Murray MacDonald, because Mr. MacDonald had "declared that his office might be in a conflict" given that former Cornwall Crown attorney Don Johnson was the consulting Crown on the original complaint and had involvement in the matters being reviewed. When asked about his involvement in this matter, Mr. Griffiths testified that he believes he was providing a "second opinion." Since Mr. MacDonald was present at a meeting with Constable White and Mr. Griffiths in October 1994, Mr. Griffiths believed the local Crown was not precluded from involvement in this matter.

As Mr. Griffiths did not have a specific recollection about why he was brought in, I accept the evidence of Staff Sergeant Derochie that Mr. Griffiths was consulted from the outset because Mr. MacDonald's office was in a conflict due to Don Johnson's previous involvement in the matters being investigated.

Constable White sought a Crown opinion in this matter because there was a legal issue as to whether the police had a prima facie case and whether they could lay a criminal charge. He recalled that the policy at the time was that there had to be a reasonable prospect of conviction in cases of historical sexual assault before the Crown would initiate a prosecution. Regardless of whether there was such a policy specific to historical sexual assault cases, the original Crown policy on charge screening issued on January 15, 1994, and updated on February 10, 1995, provided that if "the Crown determines there is no reasonable prospect of conviction, at any stage of the proceeding, then the prosecution of that charge must be discontinued." The Crown was thus required to assess if there was a reasonable prospect of conviction for any prosecution.

Constable White did not have reasonable and probable grounds or he would have laid the charges. This is why he sought advice from the Crown. In my opinion, if Constable White thought he did not have reasonable and probable grounds, there was no need for him to seek the advice from the Crown. I accept that police officers will occasionally seek advice or input from the Crown in order to determine what specific charges are appropriate, particularly in cases of historical sexual assault or other areas where the law has changed over time. In these cases, however, I would expect that the police officer have reasonable and probable grounds to believe that a crime was committed. Once a police officer has established reasonable and probable grounds, he or she can consult with the Crown about the reasonable prospect of conviction.

Meeting of Police and Crowns on October 19, 1994

On October 19, 1994, Mr. Griffiths and Mr. MacDonald met with Constable White. Constable White testified that he had discussed the brief with Mr. MacDonald before the meeting with Mr. Griffiths. Constable White's notes state that during the meeting, Mr. Griffiths said he had read the brief and "was in agreement with us that there was no evidence to support Ms Antoine's allegations against Bryan Keough." The police did not proceed with the allegations of sexual misconduct by other workers because the complainants were not willing to make formal complaints and had problems remembering some of the facts. With respect to the allegations of physical abuse made by Jeannette Antoine, the Crown was of the view that they could show only common assault, a summary conviction offence for which the limitation period had already lapsed.

Constable White testified that the three women who made allegations of sexual abuse against John Primeau were not prepared to file formal complaints. According to Constable White, they were willing to speak to him about these allegations only “with the understanding of trying to help [him] understand what happened in the group home.” Some of the complainants were willing to proceed with their allegations of physical abuse. These allegations included being put through a wall and being hit with a belt with enough force to cause bleeding. With respect to the latter allegation, Constable White did feel that this was excessive punishment. He sought the advice of Mr. Griffiths as to whether this constituted more than common assault.

Although certain details contained in the brief were not discussed during the meeting, Constable White had the impression that Mr. Griffiths had a good understanding of all the facts outlined in the brief. Mr. MacDonald had no recollection of the allegations that were the subject of this investigation or of this meeting with Mr. Griffiths and Constable White. However, he does not deny that he attended the meeting, reviewed the brief, and discussed it with Mr. Griffiths.

Peter Griffiths’ Opinion Letter: No Charges

Shortly after the meeting, Mr. Griffiths provided a written opinion to Constable White in a letter dated October 24, 1994. Regarding the allegation of sexual abuse made by Ms Antoine against Bryan Keough and Derry Tenger, Mr. Griffiths concluded:

Given the nature of this allegation, the age of the complaint and the lack of confirmatory evidence, it is my opinion that you do not have reasonable and probable grounds for the laying of any charges arising out of this complaint.

With respect to the allegations of sexual misconduct by other victims, Mr. Griffiths’ opinion was that they were “subject to several apparently insurmountable impediments”:

I understand that none of the victims wish to make a formal complaint to the police about any sexual assault suffered by them in the 1970s notwithstanding that they have had every opportunity and encouragement to do so during the course of this investigation and indeed the last fifteen years. Some of the victims have been adamant to the point of hysteria on this instruction to the police.

The second great impediment is that the memories of various victims are severely impaired. They appear to have a very limited ability to even recall the outline of these events complained of. They are incapable of identifying their abusers, naming a time or place for the alleged offences, or providing the most straightforward details that can be used to support their allegations.

Mr. Griffiths' opinion was based on the brief prepared by Constable White and information he received from Constable White during the meeting of October 19. Mr. Griffiths testified that he always depended totally on the police and the information they provided: "I'm not an independent investigator."

In terms of the first "impediment" mentioned in his opinion letter, Mr. Griffiths clarified during his testimony that this applied to the complaints of both the physical and the sexual assaults. Even though he believed the complainants did not want to proceed with the allegations of physical assault, Mr. Griffiths provided an opinion on the limitation period. This is inconsistent with the evidence showing that the complainants were willing to proceed with the allegations of physical abuse. Constable White's notes, for example, indicate that C-84 wanted the police to investigate his allegations of physical abuse "and if possible lay the appropriate charges."

Mr. Griffiths obtained the information that none of the victims wanted to make a formal complaint from Constable White. He acknowledged that the written brief would not necessarily have left him with that impression. Indeed, the brief contains statements that suggest alleged victims were willing to proceed. A statement was taken from C-84, who alleged physical abuse by staff at the Second Street group home. At the end of the statement, C-84 said:

At this time I feel I have told you all I know or remember through counselling. I may remember more and at such time if I feel it would help I will contact you. But this is all there is at this time.

During their testimony, both Mr. MacDonald and Mr. Griffiths agreed that this statement does not suggest that C-84 was not willing to proceed. Mr. Griffiths explained that Constable White did not advise him about the willingness of each complainant individually but rather told him that collectively all of the complainants, other than Ms Antoine, were unwilling to proceed.

Mr. Griffiths also testified that there was no discussion with Constable White about difficulties he was having in getting witnesses to come forward and whether he could get them to come forward by some other means. Mr. Griffiths also admitted that he did not have a specific recollection today of Constable White telling him that all complainants other than Ms Antoine did not want to proceed. However, Constable White's notes of the meeting on October 19 do mention "the fact that none of complainants were willing to make a formal compl[aint]."

It is logical that information about whether or not an alleged victim wishes to make a formal complaint would be within the knowledge of the investigating officer, and therefore I believe that Mr. Griffiths was so advised by Constable White. It is unfortunate, however, that more was not done in respect of the allegations, such as notifying the CAS about them.

Should the CAS Have Been Notified?

The Director of the Children's Aid Society, Richard Abell, was not provided with the brief for this investigation. Apart from being informed that Ms Antoine made allegations against Mr. Keough, he was not given the names of additional alleged victims or abusers. He testified that, having since seen the brief, he believes it is something he should have reviewed at the time given the extent of the allegations: "If I could do it over again, I would have pressed much harder to get the details of his findings. I didn't and that was a failing of mine."

Mr. Abell suggested that had the CAS known of the allegations made during Constable White's investigation, an effort could have been made to connect with the alleged victims to obtain additional information and provide them support. Knowledge of the allegations would also have given Mr. Abell a different picture of Ms Antoine and "a more sympathetic picture of the entire situation." In addition to being able to reach out to some of these former wards, having this information would have allowed Mr. Abell to take steps internally to satisfy himself that such circumstances would never arise again. In particular, he could have reviewed what had happened in the past and, even if the police did not take action, the CAS in its role as an employer could have done so.

At the time he provided his opinion, Mr. Griffiths did not consider sending a letter or report to the Director of the CAS. He testified that in retrospect, perhaps he viewed the issue too narrowly: "I was being consulted about a specific issue. I thought I was responding to that issue in returning the material to Officer White ... I would hope if this came to me today it would be reported to the CAS." In hindsight, Mr. Griffiths believes that perhaps he should have reported to the CAS or suggested the police do so.

There were two reporting issues that arose in this case. The first is the duty to report allegations of abuse of children to the CAS. Mr. Griffiths was not the only witness to testify that there was a lack of clarity surrounding the obligations under the duty to report. The duty to report issue was further complicated in this situation by the fact that allegations were made against individuals who were or had been employed by the CAS or who were otherwise supervised by them, as the agency they were to report to. Since this situation arose, the Child Protection Protocol: Coordinated Response in Eastern Ontario was drafted in 2001. This protocol provides direction when an investigation involves potential conflicts of interest and, in particular, when complaints are made against employees of the CAS. I am pleased that this protocol now addresses this situation.

The second reporting issue that arose was whether the CAS should be contacted in its role as the employer of the individuals accused of abuse. There is an understandable concern about reporting the results of an investigation to third parties, especially an employer, in cases where no charges are laid. Mr. Griffiths acknowledged this concern and said that if he found himself in that situation again he would consider that issue before he would, for example, notify the CAS. In my view, the protection of children trumps the privacy interests of any employee who in the course of employment with a public institution works with children.

Murray MacDonald's Advice During Investigation of David Silmsen's Complaint

The complaint made by David Silmsen to the Cornwall Police Service in 1992 regarding allegations of sexual abuse by Father Charles MacDonald and probation officer Ken Seguin has been covered in extensive detail in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the CPS. Cornwall Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald interacted with CPS officers about the investigation into Mr. Silmsen's allegations. He also provided an opinion not to proceed with charges once Mr. Silmsen indicated that he did not want to continue with or participate in the criminal investigation.

Murray MacDonald was appointed Crown attorney for Cornwall in 1992. Early in his career, he gained experience in the prosecution of historical sexual assault cases through his work on cases arising out of the St. Joseph's Training School investigation. He was one of five members on the prosecution team led by Robert Pelletier. Because of this experience, Mr. MacDonald was familiar with some of the unique characteristics of victims of childhood sexual abuse, including their reluctance to disclose allegations and the fact that many victims provide incremental disclosure.

Investigative Advice to Constable Heidi Sebalj

As discussed in Chapter 6, Constable Heidi Sebalj met with Crown Attorney MacDonald only once during her investigation, on March 2, 1993, according to her notes. However, Mr. MacDonald recalls having numerous meetings with Constable Sebalj.

According to Mr. MacDonald, Constable Sebalj first met with him in February 1993 and filled him in on the case. It was an informal meeting. He recalled that they met to discuss this case between seven and ten times between February and August 1993. Most of these meetings were between February and April or May; he saw her only once in June or July because she was attending a course at the Ontario Police College or she was otherwise absent. He disagreed with the suggestion that Constable Sebalj was not actively involved in the investigation between late April and August 1993. He thought there was follow-up “that had gone nowhere” and that she was on vacation and attending Ontario Police College part of that time. In considering the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service, I found that no work was done on the case during these months.

According to Mr. MacDonald, the first two meetings were close together and subsequent meetings were on a weekly or bi-weekly basis. He testified that this number of meetings between the Crown and investigating officer was “unusual” but was due to unusual circumstances. This was not a “run of the mill assault case” and it became more complex every time he and Constable Sebalj spoke. Although the case was not legally complex, factually it took many “twists and turns.”

Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet, who was Constable Sebalj’s supervisor, was aware that she was having informal meetings with Mr. MacDonald. Although her notes indicate only one meeting, Staff Sergeant Brunet recalled Constable Sebalj telling him on more than one occasion that she had met with the Crown attorney.

Most of these meetings between Crown Attorney MacDonald and Constable Sebalj were informal, often in hallways. Crown attorneys were in court four or five days a week and the only way police could get in touch with them was to meet at the courthouse. Mr. MacDonald did not take notes of these meetings and did not recall Constable Sebalj taking notes either. He testified that his practice changed after this case.

During the first meeting, the CPS Constable advised him that she was having difficulty with the case, which she felt was sensitive because of the target of the investigation. According to Mr. MacDonald, Constable Sebalj told him she was not close to having reasonable and probable grounds and she wanted to know where to go to help construct those grounds. She indicated she had just started her investigation. Mr. MacDonald believes she was seeking his assistance in part because this was a high-profile matter with a high-profile accused. He had the impression that her difficulties partly stemmed from Mr. Silmsner and his personality as well as the nature of the allegations.

Mr. MacDonald recalls that in either the first or second meeting, Constable Sebalj showed him the handwritten statement provided by David Silmsner. In this statement, Mr. Silmsner made allegations against Father MacDonald and probation officer Ken Seguin. Murray MacDonald knew Mr. Seguin and had dealt with him in a professional capacity for years. He did not know Father MacDonald but understood he was an active priest.

Murray MacDonald read the statement and thought there was a need for more detail about a number of things. In particular, he was concerned about a reference to a judge being present when criminal conduct was taking place. There is in fact no reference to a judge in Mr. Silmsen's statement. Mr. MacDonald testified that if the reference was not in the statement then Constable Sebalj told him about the judge. There is also no reference to a judge in Constable Sebalj's notes. Despite this, Mr. MacDonald is certain that Constable Sebalj knew in February or early March that a judge had been implicated in Silmsen's allegations. That was the first person he instructed her to get more information about. I have not seen or heard any evidence from Constable Sebalj's investigation or the evidence given by Mr. Silmsen himself that suggests that he referred to a judge in February or March 1993. As discussed in Chapter 12, on process, I did not have the benefit of Constable Sebalj's evidence.

Mr. MacDonald also wanted more information about the probation officer. In his statement, Mr. Silmsen did not provide any details of the abuse by Mr. Seguin. Mr. MacDonald instructed Constable Sebalj to ask the complainant to provide more information about the probation officer.

As discussed in detail in Chapter 6, on January 28, 1993, Sergeant Ron Lefebvre, Constable Sebalj, and Constable Kevin Malloy interviewed Mr. Silmsen. Although Constable Sebalj told Murray MacDonald she had met with Mr. Silmsen before their first meeting, he doesn't recall if he knew about this lengthy interview of Mr. Silmsen in January 1993. Constable Sebalj never showed him the transcript of that interview or the officers' notes. In fact, the only document Mr. MacDonald saw between February and September 1993 was the handwritten statement from Mr. Silmsen. As will be seen later, these notes were important in terms of providing details about the allegations against Mr. Seguin.

On March 2, 1993, Constable Sebalj met with Mr. MacDonald at the Criminal Investigation Bureau (CIB) office and he asked her about the progress of the investigation. After providing him with some details of her investigation, Constable Sebalj's notes indicate that Mr. MacDonald became concerned about her grounds. He suggested that she meet with the victim and asked to be kept up to date. Mr. MacDonald's recollection of this meeting is that Constable Sebalj had some bad news about some of the investigative follow-up she was doing. He said they discussed strategy with respect to the investigation, and the meeting was not just a two-minute meeting, as Constable Sebalj's note suggests.

Although Staff Sergeant Brunet did not recall knowing that the Crown had concerns about Constable Sebalj's reasonable and probable grounds, he knew she had concerns about her grounds throughout the investigation. These concerns started before March 2, 1993, because she was sharing her concerns with Staff Sergeant Brunet in early February.

Mr. MacDonald testified that Constable Sebalj was not looking for legal advice but wanted suggestions about where to turn next in collecting evidence. Mr. MacDonald did not suggest to her until weeks later that she should confer with her supervisor. He thought Constable Sebalj came to him for advice because the Cornwall Police Service was encumbered by illness and the staff was overwhelmed with work. She was very busy, as was her supervisor, Staff Sergeant Brunet, so Mr. MacDonald thought it would be more expedient if he “cut to the chase” and advised her to obtain certain additional information.

Murray MacDonald testified that he never considered speaking to the Chief of Police or the Deputy Chief about the investigation in the context of resources in the CIB. He did not consider going to any of Constable Sebalj’s superior officers to discuss her ability to conduct the investigation. Constable Sebalj seemed to be complying with his requests and “showing due diligence and a keen interest in the case.”

Mr. MacDonald characterized Constable Sebalj as a new officer starting out with average ability but who got better and more skilled as time went by. The Crown attorney felt that she was over her head and needed guidance from someone, and he thought he could help her in this case to keep her head above water. Mr. MacDonald expected that Constable Sebalj might have gone to Staff Sergeant Brunet for assistance earlier if he had not been trying to provide her with investigative help. Looking back, he agrees that Constable Sebalj would have been better served getting advice from Staff Sergeant Brunet, since he was a better investigator than Mr. MacDonald: “[T]hat’s his job.” Mr. MacDonald testified that he accepts responsibility for his advice: “I took on the role of trying to advise on investigating and if she took any wrong turns as a result of my advice in terms of investigating I take responsibility for that, not Heidi.”

I am of the view that Crown counsel and police officers should be encouraged to collaborate. The current Crown practice memorandum on the relationship between Crown counsel and the police provides, “While the mutual independence of the relationship is of fundamental importance, account should also be taken of the need for mutual co-operation and reliance at all stages of an investigation and court proceedings.” It also states, “While it would be generally inappropriate for Crown counsel to provide the overall direction for an investigation, it is proper for Crown counsel to advise the police on legal issues.” I believe that Mr. MacDonald may have gone too far in providing direction to the investigation, which perhaps should have come from others at the CPS. He was doing so without the benefit of a Crown brief and without having reviewed any of the notes or witness statements. The problem was compounded by the fact that Constable Sebalj was a relatively new investigator, with little supervisory support, dealing with allegations of historical sexual abuse that were bound to become a high-profile case if charges were laid.

According to Mr. MacDonald, the first thing he told Constable Sebalj was to get a more detailed statement. He also suggested that she seek out other altar boys and records such as school records and information about where Mr. Silmsen's family lived at the time of the alleged abuse. Constable Sebalj's notes show that she called Mr. Silmsen and requested that he contact the school board to obtain records as early as February 3, 1993. Mr. MacDonald could not recall if he was aware that she had done this by this time.

At no time did Mr. MacDonald suggest to Constable Sebalj that she interview Father Charles MacDonald. According to Murray MacDonald, "she had nothing to interview him on." He thought Constable Sebalj advised him that Malcolm MacDonald, counsel for Father MacDonald, told her that Father MacDonald was prepared to take a polygraph, and Murray MacDonald told her not to do the polygraph.

As mentioned above, the Crown attorney was aware that Mr. Silmsen had made an allegation against probation officer Ken Seguin but had not provided any additional details. Mr. MacDonald testified that he asked the Cornwall Police Service to look more closely at Mr. Silmsen's reasons for not wanting to proceed against Mr. Seguin. He did not ask the officers to inquire into whether there had been any contact between Mr. Silmsen and Mr. Seguin. Mr. MacDonald did not recall turning his mind to the question of whether it was possible Mr. Seguin had exerted influence over Mr. Silmsen, the alleged victim.

Should the Children's Aid Society Have Been Notified of David Silmsen's Statement?

Murray MacDonald was aware that Mr. Seguin was a probation officer in Cornwall and that Father MacDonald was an active priest. Both of these professions involve regular contact with children and youth. With respect to Father MacDonald, Murray MacDonald did not think there was enough evidence to report the matter to the Children's Aid Society at the time. He "didn't think the CAS would have the success that the CPS could have." This statement exhibits a lack of understanding about the role of the CAS. Unlike the police, the CAS is not concerned with trying to secure a conviction but rather with the protection of children.

Regarding the allegations against Mr. Seguin, in Murray MacDonald's view there was no obligation to notify the CAS of an unsubstantiated, unfounded allegation. He thought there was not sufficient information regarding Mr. Silmsen's allegation against Mr. Seguin to report to the CAS. Again, the Crown attorney did not have any of the details provided to the CPS officers during their interview of Mr. Silmsers on January 28, 1993.

The Crown attorney testified that he knew about the duty to report and thought he understood it well, but in hindsight he agreed that after reading Mr. Silmsers statement there was a duty to report. The issue of giving notice to the CAS did not arise until Mr. MacDonald conferred with Staff Sergeant Brunet and later Chief Claude Shaver in the fall of 1993. Mr. MacDonald did not have any concerns about providing the CAS with the information; he just did not know how he would articulate a report at that point. It is unfortunate that he did not suggest to Constable Sebalj or Staff Sergeant Brunet that the CAS be notified.

Murray MacDonald Learns David Silmsers Is Negotiating With the Church

At one point, Constable Sebalj advised Murray MacDonald of a negotiation between Mr. Silmsers and the Diocese. He thinks he was told about this during their second or third meeting in approximately late February or early March 1993: “She told me that he had expressed to her the desire to commence a lawsuit.” Although in his statement to the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) in July 1994, he said that Constable Sebalj told him about this in March or April 1993, Mr. MacDonald testified that he thinks the reference to April was wrong and it was more likely to have been March.

Mr. MacDonald’s impression was that Mr. Silmsers took the initiative to contact the Church. It is clear in my mind that although Mr. Silmsers first reported the matter to the Church, it was the Diocese that initiated the settlement discussions. Mr. MacDonald did not know at the time if Mr. Silmsers had a lawyer but presumed he did. He recalls speaking in the spring of 1993 to Don Johnson, a lawyer in Cornwall, who said that he had been approached by Mr. Silmsers but was not interested in representing him. Although the Crown attorney was aware there was direct contact between Father MacDonald’s lawyer, Malcolm MacDonald, and Mr. Silmsers, he presumed another lawyer was involved during settlement negotiations because he thought the minutes of settlement had to go to a lawyer for an independent opinion.

Mr. MacDonald initially thought Sean Adams was Mr. Silmsers’s lawyer. Mr. MacDonald later learned that he was involved only in providing independent legal advice at the conclusion of the settlement and was not involved in the negotiations. The extent of his involvement was to explain the document to Mr. Silmsers and witness his signature.

The Crown attorney was also told that Constable Sebalj had conferred with Malcolm MacDonald. In Murray MacDonald’s experience, it is not often that the accused’s lawyer contacts the investigator during the investigative stage:

“I wouldn’t say it’s the only time I’ve ever seen it happen, but it’s very rare.” Murray MacDonald told Constable Sebalj to keep him apprised of any information Malcolm MacDonald relayed to her. He said he would not have discouraged her from speaking with him and probably would have said she should use him as a source of information. Police investigators should be careful when speaking to defence counsel during their investigation in order to guard against being influenced by defence counsel or relying on them for evidence that should be independently ascertained.

Murray MacDonald’s Discussions With Malcolm MacDonald and Jacques Leduc

Murray MacDonald received calls from Malcolm MacDonald two or three times regarding this matter. Initially Murray MacDonald was under the impression that Malcolm MacDonald was the lawyer for the Church, but Constable Sebalj informed him that he represented Father MacDonald. In his statement to the OPP in July 1994, Murray MacDonald said that Malcolm MacDonald first contacted him approximately four to six weeks before the settlement was reached. During his testimony, however, he stated that this time estimate was incorrect and that the first time they spoke was before July, probably in April. Murray MacDonald knew Malcolm MacDonald had been a Crown attorney. He did not know him on a personal level but dealt with him professionally on a weekly basis.

The first call with Malcolm MacDonald was brief. Malcolm MacDonald told Murray MacDonald that Mr. Silmsers had cause to be angry with the Church for not supporting him and his mother years ago. Murray MacDonald presumed he meant that the priest and the Diocese were inclined to negotiate with Mr. Silmsers because they felt he had been wronged generally by the parish or by a priest.

Murray MacDonald’s impression was that Malcolm MacDonald was trying to stay on “high ground” in disclosing to the Crown that he was trying to pursue a civil settlement during the course of a criminal investigation. Murray MacDonald thought Malcolm MacDonald was doing this because he knew that although this was lawful, it could still have potential ramifications for the criminal investigation, and he was trying to give the Crown notice and proceed in an open fashion.

The second call Murray MacDonald received from the priest’s lawyer was in late August or early September 1993, immediately after Constable Sebalj told him that the settlement had been reached. During this call Malcolm MacDonald advised that a settlement had been reached. He also said he could have easily discredited Mr. Silmsers in a criminal trial; they considered it a nuisance claim and so settled and gave the complainant some money for counselling. According to Murray MacDonald’s evidence, the tenor of this conversation was different from the first call, and he felt uncomfortable. It concerned him because it was more “dismissive of the complainant’s” credibility and also left him with the impression that Malcolm MacDonald could believe that the settlement would also end the criminal case. Murray MacDonald testified, “So I specifically told him, ‘As you know, this will not end the criminal case,’ because I wanted to make it very clear at this point, now that I was sensing this new attitude.”

His message was that the criminal investigation would continue and that charges might be laid. He believed that Malcolm MacDonald got that message loud and clear. The fact that Malcolm MacDonald appeared to believe the civil settlement would end the criminal case did not raise a red flag for the Crown attorney: “I thought that he had the impression from the discussions with the complainant or his lawyer that if he got the settlement that that’s all he wanted.” Murray MacDonald also thought that Malcolm MacDonald was presuming that as a result of the settlement, the Crown and police would no longer have an interest in the matter. It did not cross Murray MacDonald’s mind that Malcolm MacDonald had obstructed justice.

This is difficult to understand. If Malcolm MacDonald was contacting the Crown attorney during the investigation and before knowing whether charges would be laid, Murray MacDonald should have been suspicious that something was not right. By the time Murray MacDonald received the second phone call from Malcolm MacDonald he should have known that the civil settlement was related to the criminal investigation. We now know that during this second phone call, Malcolm MacDonald knew the release contained a clause providing that the settlement would end the criminal investigation.

Murray MacDonald also had contact with Jacques Leduc, a lawyer representing the Diocese. He believed this was after his second call with Malcolm MacDonald. Murray MacDonald did not know Mr. Leduc was involved until this conversation, although he was not surprised, as he knew Mr. Leduc acted for the Diocese on other matters. Murray MacDonald knew Mr. Leduc professionally but not socially.

According to Mr. MacDonald, Mr. Leduc contacted him to advise him that the Church had reached a settlement with Mr. Silmser. The tenor of this call was akin to that of the first call with Malcolm MacDonald. Murray MacDonald thought Mr. Leduc called him in order to be transparent about the negotiations and demonstrate that he was not trying to interfere with the police investigation. However, because of the second call received from Malcolm MacDonald, Murray MacDonald thought it was important that he also caution Mr. Leduc that the criminal case would continue. Both lawyers told Murray MacDonald that they understood this. I am of the view that Murray MacDonald was too trusting in these circumstances.

Although there is no mention of Murray MacDonald's conversation with Mr. Leduc in his statement to the OPP in 1994, the Crown attorney is certain he spoke to the Diocese lawyer about this matter. Mr. Leduc testified that he had a brief meeting with Murray MacDonald at the Provincial Court before the settlement with Mr. Silmsner was concluded. Mr. Leduc testified that he told Mr. MacDonald that he acted for the Diocese and was about to settle a civil claim with Mr. Silmsner. He also advised him of the circumstances of the settlement. Mr. Leduc testified that Mr. MacDonald's response was "do what you have to do." Murray MacDonald also told him that if the criminal process continued it would do so notwithstanding the civil settlement.

Although there is some discrepancy in the evidence about how they communicated, I accept that Murray MacDonald and Mr. Leduc had a conversation and that both lawyers have roughly the same recollection of what was said. The only distinction between the two accounts is that Mr. MacDonald recalls that Mr. Leduc called him after the matter had been settled and Mr. Leduc recalls that the contact was before it was settled. If it was after the matter had already been settled, Murray MacDonald should have been suspicious of the reason for the call.

In his statement to OPP, Malcolm MacDonald said he went to see Crown Attorney MacDonald and discussed the settlement. When Malcolm MacDonald said that the settlement would cover the totality of the matter, both civil and criminal, Murray MacDonald replied something to the effect of "well fine, if everybody's happy, I'm happy." Murray MacDonald strongly disagrees with this statement and flatly denies that he had knowledge that the settlement would stipulate that both civil and criminal matters would come to an end. I find that Murray MacDonald did not have knowledge that the settlement involved the criminal proceedings.

Constable Heidi Sebalj Locates Additional Victims

As discussed in Chapter 6, Constable Heidi Sebalj interviewed individuals in March and April 1993 who also alleged that Father MacDonald had sexually assaulted them in their youth.

According to Murray MacDonald, on the eve of the settlement, Constable Sebalj contacted him and told him that her investigation had come up with an indication that Father MacDonald had "homosexual tendencies." She had spoken to someone who was reluctant to assist the police investigation but who claimed to have had homosexual relations with Father MacDonald. In his 1994 OPP statement, Murray MacDonald noted that this was the first time in many contacts he had with Constable Sebalj where there was "something in favour of the complainant, as oppose[d] to against his credibility.” He further stated that he asked if the police now had reasonable and probable grounds and was told they still didn’t feel they had enough to believe Mr. Silmsers, who by this time “was telling them to go away anyway.”

Murray MacDonald’s recollection is that Mr. Silmsers had provided Constable Sebalj with two or three names and early on she determined that they did not provide corroborative evidence. On the eve of the settlement, Constable Sebalj told him about two people who she had heard might have been victims of Father MacDonald or have knowledge of Silmsers’s allegations. As mentioned in Chapter 6, one of them alleged that Father MacDonald had abused him but did not want to become involved in the matter. The other person did not want to be a complainant but was willing to testify about being abused by Father MacDonald.

It is apparent from Constable Sebalj’s notes that in March 1993 C-56 and C-3 alleged that Father MacDonald had sexually abused them. Murray MacDonald was not aware of this information at the time. In April 1993, Constable Sebalj talked to an individual who did not allege any abuse by Father MacDonald but said that “under his bed there was a box full of skin mags.” He later said that Father MacDonald had taken him and his friend to his bedroom and shown them the magazines. They were eleven or twelve at the time. When he testified at the Inquiry, Murray MacDonald could not recall if he was told about this.

He testified that the police had moved from weak to strong suspicions regarding Father MacDonald because of one witness in particular. He acknowledged that by September 1993, there was the possibility that there were other victims out there. They had not yet been identified, and Murray MacDonald said that Constable Sebalj was trying to find them. He knew it was common in cases of child sexual abuse that a perpetrator abused more than one child. He also knew that a large number of victims do not have the wherewithal to make it to criminal court as complainants and many do not even go to the police at all.

Mr. MacDonald testified that despite the information Constable Sebalj received from C-3 and C-56, she never formed a subjective view that she had reasonable and probable grounds to lay a charge before Mr. Silmsers insisted he did not want to proceed further.

Murray MacDonald Discusses the Settlement With CPS

On or around September 8, 1993, Murray MacDonald met with Staff Sergeant Brunet and Constable Sebalj in Staff Sergeant’s Brunet’s office. The CPS officers reported that they had spoken to Mr. Silmsers and he did not want to continue with the criminal investigation.

Mr. MacDonald was shown a copy of correspondence the Cornwall Police Service received from Malcolm MacDonald enclosing a statement from Mr. Silmsers saying he no longer wished to proceed with criminal charges. This struck Murray MacDonald as reflecting Malcolm MacDonald's belief that the police and Crown would no longer be inclined to proceed with the criminal investigation after the civil settlement was reached. Murray MacDonald was concerned that Malcolm MacDonald did not seem to have listened when Murray MacDonald told him that the criminal matter would continue regardless of the civil settlement.

It was clear to Murray MacDonald that Mr. Silmsers's decision to withdraw the complaint was tied to the settlement. Mr. MacDonald presumed that Mr. Silmsers decided after receiving the money that he was not interested in proceeding with the criminal case any further. Alternatively, he may have felt that because of the civil settlement, the police would no longer be interested in the case. That is why Mr. MacDonald sent the officers back to advise Mr. Silmsers that he was incorrect in his presumption that the police were not interested in continuing with the investigation.

According to Mr. MacDonald, Constable Sebalj told him that the second time she saw him, Mr. Silmsers displayed more anger and said, "Why should I do anything for you guys? You didn't do anything for me when I needed you, so why should I cooperate now?" On September 13, Constable Sebalj advised Mr. MacDonald of a meeting she was to have with Mr. Silmsers later that morning. According to her notes, Mr. MacDonald said she should satisfy herself that Mr. Silmsers "acted of his own free will." Mr. Silmsers did not show up for the meeting.

Mr. MacDonald presumed that if the settlement had not been reached, Mr. Silmsers would have continued his dealings with Constable Sebalj. However, he did not think to look at the settlement document to see if it precluded Mr. Silmsers from continuing with the criminal investigation. He assumed that Mr. Adams would have told Mr. Silmsers that any bar to criminal proceedings is unenforceable and illegal. Mr. MacDonald still believed all of the lawyers involved in the settlement were acting diligently and in good faith.

Mr. MacDonald testified that he did not turn his mind to the possibility of undue influence. He recognized there was a power imbalance but thought the settlement was part of Mr. Silmsers's "agenda that he'd set out to do and that he had succeeded." He did not think the power imbalance would have consequences, except reducing the amount of the money Mr. Silmsers received from the settlement. Although Murray MacDonald considered the possibility that Father MacDonald and the Diocese hoped that if they reached a civil settlement, Mr. Silmsers might give up or soften his story, he did not consider that they were not likely to negotiate a settlement without some certainty that this matter would be concluded. Murray MacDonald testified he did not turn his mind to the possibility that the Diocese and Father MacDonald were trying to keep the allegations out of the public eye.

Correspondence Between Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet and Murray MacDonald in September 1993

As discussed in detail in Chapter 6, Staff Sergeant Brunet wrote to Murray MacDonald on September 9, 1993, stating that the Cornwall Police Service had received a letter from Malcolm MacDonald. A statement from Mr. Silmsner was attached, indicating that he had received a civil settlement and no longer wished to proceed with criminal charges. Staff Sergeant Brunet wrote that he understood the Crown's office did not prosecute without the full cooperation of the victim and requested Murray MacDonald's direction in this regard.

Staff Sergeant Brunet testified that when he spoke to Murray MacDonald and wrote this letter, he had not reviewed Constable Sebalj's notes, had not seen any witness statements, and had not put his mind to whether there were reasonable and probable grounds to lay charges.

Although it is not mentioned in Staff Sergeant Brunet's letter, Mr. MacDonald recalls that they discussed the issue of reasonable and probable grounds. Staff Sergeant Brunet does not recall discussing reasonable and probable grounds or the strengths and weaknesses of the case with Murray MacDonald. However, he testified it is possible they discussed more than just the uncooperative complainant.

Mr. MacDonald testified that at some point Staff Sergeant Brunet asked him for a letter. Mr. MacDonald did not consider at that time that there might be a problem with the legality of the settlement or consider whether it should be investigated. Unfortunately, he did not think to see a copy of the settlement before writing his opinion letter.

On September 14, 1993, Murray MacDonald wrote a letter to Staff Sergeant Brunet as requested. The letter reads:

It is our policy not to compel victims of sexual crimes to proceed against their wishes. Also, the officer was tentative on the issue of R. and P.G. before this so-called "settlement". Grounds are now even further obfuscated by the fact that he has evidently used this threat of criminal prosecution as a means of furthering his efforts to gain monetary settlement.

It is evident that Mr. Silmsner's allegations suggest a very serious breach of trust by the alleged perpetrator. These concerns can, of course, be put to the suspect's principals if you deem it appropriate. However, this case is fraught with (due to his own conduct) a very non-credible complainant, saddled with an evidence ulterior motive for making these allegations.

It is, as you are aware, exceptionally difficult to put supportive victims through the sexual offence trial process. It is for policy reasons, not in the public interest to put a reluctant witness through the same process. This is especially so when that reluctant witness will be “crucified” in cross-examination.

According to Murray MacDonald, Staff Sergeant Brunet wanted a “CYA letter” because his superiors were looking for answers about the status of the investigation and why it had taken so long. This is why Mr. MacDonald addressed both the issue of not forcing a victim to testify and the issue of reasonable and probable grounds. Mr. MacDonald wanted to show that this case did not turn on whether Mr. Silmsen could be forced to testify but also on the fact that it had not yet reached the threshold of having reasonable and probable grounds.

Murray MacDonald acknowledged that he had presumed bad faith on Mr. Silmsen’s part regarding his comments about Mr. Silmsen using the threat of criminal prosecution as a means of further his efforts to gain a monetary settlement. He presumed that Mr. Silmsen had used him and the police to get his money. In his testimony, Mr. MacDonald admitted he was wrong. Mr. Silmsen testified that he wanted criminal charges to be laid and only after he was told the criminal investigation was not going anywhere did he decide to go forward with the civil settlement.

Mr. MacDonald refers in his letter to the “so-called ‘settlement.’” He does not recall what he was trying to convey by putting the word “settlement” in quotes. He testified he had no knowledge, and presumably no suspicion, about an illegal clause at this point. If he suspected an illegal clause, he would have wanted to see the settlement document. Mr. MacDonald testified that if he were consulted about a civil settlement in the course of a criminal investigation again, he would do things differently, including asking to see settlement documents.

Murray MacDonald acknowledged that he made several statements in the letter about Mr. Silmsen’s credibility and motivations that were statements of opinion reported to him primarily by Constable Sebalj. He agreed that the opinions expressed about Mr. Silmsen and his allegations are very negative. Mr. MacDonald never met with Mr. Silmsen to assess his credibility.

Mr. MacDonald was not aware of a number of matters when he wrote this letter. However, he testified that had he known of these facts, he doubts the opinion letter would have been much different. The conclusion would have been the same although he may have drafted the letter differently. In particular, Murray MacDonald acknowledged that the statement that Mr. Silmser used the threat of criminal prosecution as a means of further his efforts to gain a monetary settlement was “a very harsh indictment on poor Mr. Silmser” and he would have drafted it differently had he been in possession of some or all of those facts.

When Mr. MacDonald wrote this letter, he had not been provided with a Crown brief. He was comfortable relying on Constable Sebalj’s verbal summaries of what occurred in the investigation. Murray MacDonald conceded that the practice he applied then was not the best practice:

It was what I thought to be the only option, but I will certainly concede to you that our practice today, personally as a result of what we’ve learned from this case, is the best practice.

When Mr. MacDonald wrote this letter he thought it was accurate. He did not think this letter would automatically end the investigation of Father MacDonald. He thought Chief Shaver would have insisted on continuing if he had anything else to work with: “I don’t think we could say the file was closed but the file was certainly in abeyance.”

It is apparent that Murray MacDonald was not aware of all of the details of this investigation when he prepared his opinion letter. Given his vast experience with victims of historical sexual abuse and the particular difficulties they have in disclosing allegations, and given his knowledge of the existence of other alleged victims, I find the tone and content of his opinion letter to Staff Sergeant Brunet troubling.

Information Murray MacDonald Did Not Have

It is clear that although Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald communicated with Constable Heidi Sebalj during the course of her investigation of Mr. Silmser’s complaint, the Crown attorney was not aware of many of the details of the investigation prior to writing his opinion letter in September 1993. Murray MacDonald never met with Mr. Silmser and received the majority of his information from Constable Sebalj and perhaps some from Staff Sergeant Brunet. Murray MacDonald did not know:

- that Silmser did not want a female investigator;
- the details of the January 28, 1993, interview of Silmser, including details of his allegations against Mr. Seguin;
- that C-56 told Heidi Sebalj on March 9, 1993, about an incident with Father MacDonald; or
- that C-3 made an allegation against Father MacDonald in March 1993.

He also did not have the benefit of reviewing the Crown brief Heidi Sebalj subsequently prepared. According to Murray MacDonald, the practice in 1993 was not to receive a prepared package of materials before charges were laid. Occasionally the Crown would look at the statement or an officer's occurrence report, but usually the Crown received a verbal report as opposed to a prepared package of documents.

Murray MacDonald testified that he was also not aware of the following events:

- that Mr. Silmsers met with Monsignor Peter Schonenbach in early December 1992 and Monsignor Schonenbach had written a letter to Monsignor Donald McDougald in which he indicated he believed Mr. Silmsers to be credible;
- that Monsignor Schonenbach wrote that Mr. Silmsers told him that "for starters" he was looking for an apology from Father MacDonald to show his mother;
- that Mr. Silmsers told Constable Sebalj he was contacted by the Diocese and they wanted to meet with him on February 9, 1993;
- the details of the meeting Mr. Silmsers had with members of the Diocese, including that he said they believed him and offered him psychological help;
- the Diocese protocol for dealing with allegations of abuse against the clergy; or
- that Monsignor McDougald called Mr. Silmsers on February 15, 1993, and wanted to discuss a settlement.

Regarding the settlement between the Diocese and Mr. Silmsers, Murray MacDonald was not aware:

- that Mr. Silmsers was unrepresented;
- whether a Notice of Action had been filed; or
- the wording of the settlement agreement.

Mr. MacDonald believed that Constable Sebalj had an obligation to tell him everything relevant before he rendered an opinion, and he presumed she was doing so. He had been relying on officers' verbal updates for five years: "[I]t's the way that we commonly worked." In this instance Constable Sebalj appeared to remember everything and had answers for every question he put to her. He thought she was being very diligent in providing him with information.

Mr. MacDonald testified that if Constable Sebalj didn't tell him everything chronologically or in detail, as she should have, he should take some responsibility for giving her the impression that this was just a reasonable and probable grounds exercise and not a full review of the case. He should have insisted on a full brief before providing an opinion in this matter.

No Outside Crown Is Consulted

Sometime between February and September 14, 1993, Murray MacDonald spoke with Crown Attorney Robert Pelletier. Mr. MacDonald testified that he told Mr. Pelletier that if the police laid charges against the priest, he would have Mr. Pelletier review the case to determine if there was a reasonable prospect of conviction. According to Murray MacDonald, the reason for involving Mr. Pelletier was not because he had a legal conflict but because he was concerned about an appearance of bias.

One to two years prior to this, Mr. MacDonald had sat on a Diocesan committee and had recommended the Diocese to “do exactly the opposite of what the Church did in this instance.” He recommended that the Church should be transparent, cooperate, and allow the police investigation to take place at the outset. This recommendation was ultimately not adopted, and Mr. MacDonald was concerned that if he was involved in this prosecution, the Church would have the impression that he was “leading the charge” or advocating the position he had recommended: “I didn’t want to be perceived as a witch-hunter.” The perceived bias was that Murray MacDonald was against the Church, not for the Church.

Mr. MacDonald thought that because of Mr. Pelletier’s experience with the St. Joseph’s Training School prosecutions and his knowledge of the Church’s operations, he would be the best choice to take the case forward.

Murray MacDonald’s position was that Mr. Pelletier was to review the case only once the police determined that they had reasonable and probable grounds to lay a charge. I heard a great deal of evidence from other individuals involved and reviewed exhibits suggesting that at least Staff Sergeant Brunet, Mr. Pelletier, and Constable Sebalj thought an outside Crown was to be consulted on the issue of reasonable and probable grounds. In a letter from Mr. Pelletier to OPP Detective Inspector Tim Smith dated September 15, 1994, Mr. Pelletier states that Murray MacDonald contacted him in the summer of 1993 and told him it might become necessary at some point for him to “review the matter with a view to determining if charges should be laid.” Mr. Pelletier had no recollection of this telephone call with Mr. MacDonald but testified that he has no reason to doubt the accuracy of this memo.

It appears that Constable Sebalj was also under the impression that an outside Crown would review the case prior to charges being laid. Her notes indicate that on August 24, 1993, she advised Mr. Silmsen that she was waiting to have a meeting with an outside Crown to review the case. Mr. MacDonald speculated that she said this because she was trying to relay to Mr. Silmsen that she was still supportive of the investigation. But when OPP Detective Constable Michael Fagan interviewed Constable Sebalj in June 1994, she stated that Murray MacDonald had said that “when it came down to a final review and decision an outside Crown would be contacted but I never spoke to an outside Crown.”

By way of another example, in a conversation with Staff Sergeant Brunet on August 29, 1993, Constable Sebalj mentioned that she was waiting for the Crown’s office to get back to her and that Murray MacDonald was “trying to get her an outside Crown Attorney that she can meet.” Mr. MacDonald testified that Constable Sebalj never asked him to set up a meeting with an outside Crown and he told her an outside Crown would be available when they needed one.

Murray MacDonald did not think that there was a “disconnect” between him and Heidi Sebalj on the issue of the independent Crown opinion but acknowledged that “it appears so today.” According to Mr. MacDonald, he was waiting for Constable Sebalj to develop reasonable and probable grounds and lay a charge before turning over the matter to Mr. Pelletier for a reasonable prospect of conviction analysis. Mr. MacDonald did not believe the police required any advice on reasonable and probable grounds.

When he was interviewed by the Ottawa Police Service in January 1994, he stated that he was waiting for an indication from the investigating officer that the police had reasonable and probable grounds to lay a charge before he would pass it over to an outside Crown.

Staff Sergeant Brunet recalls Constable Sebalj telling him about Murray MacDonald having a conflict of interest and that they were looking for an outside Crown to assist her. He doesn’t believe she told him what the conflict was about. Staff Sergeant Brunet provided a statement to the OPP in January 2000 in which he discussed a meeting with Constable Sebalj during the summer of 1993 when she said she wanted to see a Crown:

“Well basically, I would like to see a Crown right now. I’m in a position ... I’m not sure, like, I’ve got some credibility issues to deal with, but ... I would like to get some direction in the investigation.” And ... I Ok’d her to go and see Murray, and he made ... arrangements for her to see, I believe, Mr. Pelletier.

Detective Inspector Smith also testified that he understood that Constable Sebalj wanted to review her evidence with an outside Crown and it was going to be Mr. Pelletier.

The meeting between Constable Sebalj and Robert Pelletier never took place. Clearly Crown Attorney MacDonald was of the opinion that he should not make the decision whether to prosecute the case against Father MacDonald because he could be perceived as having a bias. He was asked whether it might have been prudent in light of these concerns to have another Crown deal with this case from the outset. He testified that he saw no problem in his assisting with the investigation, which he saw as different from taking carriage of the file and making a decision about whether to prosecute. He thought it was appropriate to continue to manage the case until Crown opinion or discretion was required.

Murray MacDonald Meets With Constable Perry Dunlop

In late September 1993, Murray MacDonald met with Constable Perry Dunlop at the courthouse, on Pitt Street. Mr. MacDonald was surprised when Constable Dunlop came in, and he testified that he had not spoken to Constable Dunlop or received a message from him the day before about having a meeting. Mr. MacDonald knew Constable Dunlop personally. He was a colleague of Murray MacDonald's brother-in-law, Randy Millar, and they occasionally went hunting together.

According to Mr. MacDonald, Constable Dunlop seemed to think the Crown did not know about the allegations by Mr. Silmsen. He also raised concerns about Constable Sebalj's investigative techniques and said he thought senior management knew it was not properly investigated and were trying to cover that up. Mr. MacDonald told him that Chief Shaver was aware of the allegation and that he knew about the case. He directed Constable Dunlop to speak with Staff Sergeant Brunet.

Although Constable Dunlop's will-state states that during this meeting, Murray MacDonald said he was not aware of the allegations against Mr. Seguin, Mr. MacDonald does not recall Mr. Seguin's name coming up during this meeting. If it did, he would have advised that he was aware of this allegation.

Murray MacDonald Meets With Chief Claude Shaver and Sergeant Claude Lortie

As discussed in Chapter 6, on September 30, 1993, Mr. MacDonald met with Chief Shaver. Mr. MacDonald testified that he never told the police they could not proceed with or reopen the investigation but would have left the Chief of Police with the impression that there was nowhere to go without a victim.

Mr. MacDonald testified that Chief Shaver was frustrated and angry and that after speaking with him, it was clear that Chief Shaver was going to review the investigation. According to Chief Shaver, his concern was not that the Crown was not recommending a charge or prosecution but that he didn't know where the police could go with the investigation.

Following his meetings with Constable Dunlop and Chief Shaver, Mr. MacDonald met with Sergeant Claude Lortie. Mr. MacDonald recalls that Sergeant Lortie was with Constable Mike Quinn or Constable John Parisien, who were members of the Police Association Executive at the time.

Sergeant Lortie expressed concerns about Chief Shaver's management of the file. Mr. MacDonald had the impression that he was going to be drawn into a labour-management dispute. He was not comfortable with this and told Sergeant Lortie that he was not in a position to comment. Sergeant Lortie testified that the purpose of the meeting was to try and convince Mr. MacDonald that the matter should be pursued. Sergeant Lortie agreed he was taking this issue outside the police force so that influence could be brought to bear by the Crown on the Chief of Police.

In the fall of 1993, Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie had a meeting with Chief Shaver during which Chief Shaver informed him that Murray MacDonald was not fully informed when he gave his opinion to Constable Sebalj and that the Crown attorney's advice might have been different had he possessed all the information. Earlier in this section, I discussed some of the facts that Mr. MacDonald did not know about the CPS investigation.

Murray MacDonald Learns of the Illegal Clause in the Settlement

Murray MacDonald first heard about the illegal clause in the settlement from Charlie Greenwell, a television reporter, sometime in January 1994. Mr. MacDonald thinks he received this call from Mr. Greenwell weeks or even months after his meeting with Chief Shaver. However, since Mr. MacDonald was not entirely surprised by the call, he thinks he had probably received some information shortly before the call.

Interview by Ottawa Police Service in January 1994

In January 1994, the Ottawa Police Service interviewed Mr. MacDonald. According to both Mr. MacDonald and Superintendent Brian Skinner, the meeting was quite brief, no longer than fifteen or twenty minutes. The officers asked Mr. MacDonald about his contacts with Constable Sebalj and Staff Sergeant Brunet. They also discussed his work on the Diocese committee and the reason for the perceived conflict.

The Ottawa Police Service investigation is covered in Chapter 6. As noted in that chapter, Superintendent Skinner and Staff Sergeant William (Bill) Blake were critical of Mr. MacDonald's conduct in the Silmser investigation and concluded that after declaring his conflict of interest, he should have referred the investigation to another Crown attorney. Mr. MacDonald did not think the comments of the Ottawa police officers were fair as he did not believe there was a conflict at the stage of advising Constable Sebalj about the investigative steps she was taking. Whether or not there was an actual conflict, he should have realized that any involvement on his part in the investigation, and his opinion letter recommending no further action be taken, were not advisable.

It is my opinion that Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald did not exercise good judgment in this case. He became too involved in providing investigative advice without having knowledge of all pertinent information. He then wrote an opinion letter that was extremely insensitive to the alleged victim, Mr. Silmsers, and was written without full knowledge of the facts. Although I do not wish to discourage open and frequent communication between police and the Crown, Crown counsel must ensure that they act within their sphere of responsibility and, most importantly, that they have all relevant facts and information before providing any opinions to investigating officers. I discuss the issue of Crown opinions in further detail in other sections of this chapter.

That being said, I wish to make some comments about Murray MacDonald. For years, Mr. MacDonald has been painted in an extremely negative light. Due to the fact that his father is a convicted child sex abuser, people have assumed that Mr. MacDonald would be sympathetic to people accused of child sexual abuse or even that he himself might be a child sex abuser. Contrary to these views, however, I find that Mr. MacDonald acted properly and professionally with respect to the incident involving his father, which is discussed in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the OPP, and that the inferences drawn about him as a result of that incident are entirely improper.

1994 Investigations by the Ontario Provincial Police

As discussed in Chapter 7, “Institutional Response of the Ontario Provincial Police,” the OPP conducted four separate but related investigations in the Cornwall area in 1994. One was the re-investigation of David Silmsers’ allegations of sexual assault against Father Charles MacDonald. The second looked at allegations that the Cornwall Police Service, the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, and the local Crown Attorney had conspired to obstruct justice by arranging for a cash payment to Mr. Silmsers that would terminate the criminal investigation. The third investigation concerned allegations that the settlement with Mr. Silmsers constituted an attempt to obstruct justice; the resulting prosecution is discussed in the following section. The fourth investigation involved allegations made by the family of deceased probation officer Ken Seguin that Mr. Silmsers had attempted to extort money from Mr. Seguin.

The Director of Crown Operations in the Eastern Region, Peter Griffiths, was involved in a liaison capacity in those investigations. A news release issued by the Cornwall Police Service on February 2, 1994, stated "Cornwall Police Service personnel and any other investigative agency assisting our police service in such investigations, will liaise with Mr. Peter Griffiths, East Regional Director of Crown Attorneys." Mr. Griffiths recalls that his involvement was with the OPP and he did not deal with the Cornwall Police Service or any other investigative agency. In particular, he dealt primarily with Detective Inspector Fred Hamelink, who led the extortion investigation, and with Detective Inspector Tim Smith, who was in charge of the investigations into Father MacDonald and the conspiracy to obstruct justice. Since the local Crown could not be involved, Mr. Griffiths was to provide any assistance the OPP needed from a Crown during the investigations.

Extortion Investigation

Mr. Griffiths understood that the extortion investigation was conducted concurrently with the investigation into allegations made by David Silmsner against Father MacDonald. In Mr. Griffiths' experience, it was unusual to have an individual be an alleged victim in one investigation and an alleged suspect in another. Although the situation was unusual, he thought it was appropriate for the same police department to conduct both investigations. He agreed that Mr. Silmsner was in an awkward position, but "so were the police officers ... it's very difficult for everybody to keep the separate roles and understand the separate roles."

The concurrent investigations involving Mr. Silmsner gave rise to two issues. The first issue was how to conduct the interview of Mr. Silmsner given that he was both an alleged victim and an alleged suspect. The second was how to coordinate the preparation and presentation of the briefs to the Crown for an opinion about whether charges should be laid in one or both of the investigations. The OPP perception and actions with respect to these two issues was explored in Chapter 7.

On February 10, 1994, Mr. Griffiths had a telephone conversation with Detective Inspector Smith. Although Detective Inspector Smith was not in charge of the extortion investigation, his notes indicate there was some discussion about that investigation:

Discuss method of interview with Silmsner [and] whether he should be cautioned re possible extortion. Don't know if what he's alleged to do with Seguin is extortion per Criminal Code.

Peter Griffiths to research and advise. He will know next Tues or Wed.
I will call.

According to Detective Inspector Smith, he was asking Mr. Griffiths for advice about the extortion investigation at Detective Inspector Hamelink's request. Mr. Griffiths believes he was being asked to research and advise whether or not what was alleged to have happened amounted to extortion under the Criminal Code. He was not asked about the interview or cautioning of Mr. Silmsen. Detective Inspector Smith testified that he could not remember whether he received any feedback from Mr. Griffiths. In his evidence Mr. Griffiths pointed out that Detective Inspector Smith's notes say, "I will call"; he does not think that the officer contacted him.

On February 21, 1994, a meeting was held at Mr. Griffiths' office. Present were Detective Inspectors Smith and Hamelink, Detective Constables Michael Fagan and Chris McDonell, Constable Don Genier, and law student Claudette Breault. Mr. Griffiths had no recollection of the meeting beyond what is contained in Detective Inspector Smith's notes: "Interview Silmsen—all sexual allegations [and] how did settlement come about."

Detective Inspector Smith recalled that the extortion issue was discussed during this meeting, but he did not recall whether the issue of cautioning Mr. Silmsen was discussed. As discussed in Chapter 7, when Mr. Silmsen was interviewed the next day, Detective Inspector Hamelink was present behind a one-way mirror. Mr. Silmsen was not cautioned and was not advised of Detective Inspector Hamelink's presence. During the interview, Detective Inspector Smith asked Mr. Silmsen a number of questions on behalf of Detective Inspector Hamelink. Had Mr. Silmsen said anything that could incriminate him, Detective Inspector Smith testified that he would have stopped and cautioned him.

Regarding coordination of the Crown briefs, Detective Inspectors Smith and Hamelink agreed that after completing their investigations, they would compare notes and then present their briefs to Mr. Griffiths for his opinion at the same time. Both Detective Inspectors Smith and Hamelink recall that this arrangement was discussed during the February 21 meeting at Mr. Griffiths' office. Although Mr. Griffiths does not recall the arrangement nor it being discussed with him, he does not dispute it. However, Mr. Griffiths never looked at both briefs together. He was not aware that Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Inspector Hamelink did not have an opportunity to review each other's briefs before providing them to him.

On September 29, 1994, Detective Inspector Hamelink and Detective Constable McDonell attended at Mr. Griffiths' office and provided him with an oral summary of the extortion investigation and the brief. Since Mr. Griffiths had not yet received a brief from Detective Inspector Smith on the Father MacDonald investigation, he called him on October 11 and requested that he finish the investigation soon, as he felt it was dragging. The next day Mr. Griffiths wrote his opinion letter on the extortion investigation to Detective Inspector Hamelink. Mr. Griffiths testified that the call to Detective Inspector Smith was probably prompted by the fact that he had received Detective Inspector Hamelink's brief, but he did not know whether he advised Detective Inspector Smith of this fact. According to Detective Inspector Smith, Mr. Griffiths never told him that Detective Inspector Hamelink's investigation was complete.

As discussed in Chapter 7, Detective Inspector Smith was "bitterly disappointed" when he learned that Detective Inspector Hamelink's brief had already been submitted to Mr. Griffiths and that the arrangement to compare briefs and submit them together had been breached. One of the reasons for the arrangement was to have the briefs reviewed by each investigator to see if any information related to both investigations. Some of the information in the extortion brief may have proven useful in the investigation of allegations against Father MacDonald. For example, Jos van Diepen had provided information obtained from a probationer of Nelson Barque who had resided with Father MacDonald at St. Raphael. The probationer told Mr. van Diepen that he no longer wanted to live there and "said that Father Charlie was a queer, he liked little boys but never specified."

Detective Inspector Smith expedited the delivery of his briefs so that Mr. Griffiths could review them with Detective Inspector Hamelink's brief. He did not recall whether he asked Mr. Griffiths to review the briefs together. Mr. Griffiths did not review the briefs with a view to determining if there were any inconsistencies between the investigations.

Mr. Griffiths' opinion on the extortion investigation was that there was insufficient evidence to establish reasonable and probable grounds that Mr. Silmser had committed the crime of extortion. This was the conclusion of Detective Inspector Hamelink and Detective Constable McDonell, and Mr. Griffiths agreed with it.

In his opinion letter, dated October 12, 1994, Mr. Griffiths notes that he only has one piece of evidence of an extortion threat:

The only witness statement that I can find that provides any evidence of an extortion threat comes from Malcolm MacDonald. Mr. MacDonald related inadmissible hearsay evidence from Ken Seguin and relates the following about a conversation he had with Mr. Silmser, "from what I can remember from the conversation, he was demanding money or he would go to the police, concerning Ken's behaviour" ...

Mr. Griffiths concluded that this “is a very thin statement on which to rest a criminal charge.” He also considered Malcolm MacDonald’s experience as a Crown attorney and criminal defence counsel and was of the opinion that if Mr. MacDonald believed Mr. Silmser was committing criminal extortion against his client, he would warn Mr. Silmser off or go the police: “[H]e did neither.”

Mr. Silmser reported allegations against Ken Seguin to the Cornwall Police Service in January 1993, and a threat to institute civil proceedings did not come within the Criminal Code definition of extortion. Mr. Griffiths also found that none of the other statements contained in the brief provided evidence of extortion. Mr. Griffiths concluded that there was insufficient evidence to find that there were reasonable and probable grounds to support a criminal charge of extortion against Mr. Silmser.

Investigations of Father Charles MacDonald, Conspiracy, and Obstruction of Justice

On February 8, 1994, Detective Inspector Smith called Mr. Griffiths to advise him that he was starting his investigations and that he would like to obtain a copy of the settlement between Mr. Silmser and the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. Mr. Griffiths contacted Peter Annis, the lawyer for the Diocese, and arranged for Mr. Annis to provide Detective Inspector Smith with a copy of the settlement document. Mr. Griffiths could not recall whether he had any discussion with Detective Inspector Smith about the contents of the settlement document.

Mr. Griffiths had conversations with Detective Inspector Smith periodically about the progress of the investigations. In his evidence, Mr. Griffiths was clear that he was not directing the investigation in any way and that Detective Inspector Smith was not asking him for any guidance on how to conduct the investigation. Although he had not yet received a brief from Detective Inspector Smith and the investigation was clearly still ongoing, in June 1994 Mr. Griffiths did not have any concern about the length of time the investigation was taking.

On August 11, Mr. Griffiths received another call from Detective Inspector Smith updating him on the investigation. Detective Inspector Smith’s note of this call suggests that he was questioning whether he had reasonable and probable grounds with respect to Mr. Silmser’s allegations against Father MacDonald: “1. Silmser complaint invest almost complete. R & PG—???”

As mentioned above, Mr. Griffiths contacted Detective Inspector Smith on October 11 and requested that the investigation be completed soon. Although there is no specific timeline for investigations, Mr. Griffiths felt it was “time to move this along.” He received the briefs from Detective Inspector Smith in early November 1994 and took several weeks to review them.

On December 20, Mr. Griffiths called Detective Inspector Smith and provided his verbal opinion about the investigations. This was their first discussion after Detective Inspector Smith sent the briefs. According to the officer's notes, Mr. Griffiths advised him that with respect to Father MacDonald there was objectively enough credible evidence but subjectively there was not honest belief. Mr. Griffiths also made a comment about the credibility of Mr. Silmsen being a problem. Mr. Griffiths followed his verbal opinions with written opinions the following day. As will be discussed, the written opinion on the Father MacDonald investigation differs from the notes Detective Inspector Smith took of their initial conversations, which once again illustrates why it is a good practice for a Crown counsel to confirm their legal opinions in writing. I interpret those notes as indicating that Mr. Griffiths did not subjectively believe Mr. Silmsen.

Peter Griffiths' Opinion Letter on the Father Charles MacDonald Re-Investigation

At the outset of his letter, dated December 21, 1994, Mr. Griffiths noted that he had received a two-volume brief of the police investigation into allegations of indecent assault made by Mr. Silmsen. Although the letter refers specifically to a charge of indecent assault, Mr. Griffiths considered whether any criminal charges were possible on the facts presented to him. He outlined the four incidents of abuse that Mr. Silmsen complained of to the police and determined whether there were grounds to support the laying of a criminal charge.

The first alleged incident occurred when Father MacDonald touched Mr. Silmsen's thigh following a mass when Mr. Silmsen served as altar boy. Mr. Griffiths concluded that there was "no indecent context that would give rise to reasonable and probable grounds to support a charge of indecent assault."

The second incident was alleged to have occurred at a retreat in or around June 1972, when, Mr. Silmsen alleged, Father MacDonald came naked to his bed and grabbed his genitals. According to the facts laid out in Mr. Griffiths' letter, Mr. Silmsen also maintained that Father MacDonald was walking through the boys' dormitory naked telling dirty jokes. Mr. Griffiths noted that the police interviewed many people who attended that retreat and they all denied any suggestion of Father MacDonald walking around the dormitory naked:

This is an event so astonishing that had it occurred, it doubtless would have been recalled by other young people attending the retreat. Not only do they not recall it happening, they have a positive recollection that it did not happen. In the face of that evidence, it cannot be said that the objective standard of reasonable and probable grounds has been met with respect to that allegation.

The evidence, however, is that other people told Mr. Silmser that Father MacDonald was walking around naked. Unfortunately, Mr. Griffiths wrongly attributed that allegation to Mr. Silmser.

The third incident was alleged to have occurred in the church office at St. Columban's Parish in 1972 and involved Father MacDonald grabbing Mr. Silmser's genitals. The fourth allegation was that Father MacDonald took Mr. Silmser for a ride in the country and committed an act of non-consensual buggery. Mr. Griffiths noted that Mr. Silmser's recollection of these events was extremely vague and although "it is not uncommon for individuals who have survived very stressful events to block out part or all of the memory of those events ... the absence of those specific memories makes it all but impossible to commence prosecutions." Mr. Griffiths testified that having an understanding as to why someone cannot provide a detailed complaint does not excuse the necessity of proving it in court. This was a stumbling block for Mr. Griffiths in this case.

Everybody Mr. Griffiths spoke to about Mr. Silmser's allegations against Father MacDonald believed something inappropriate had happened between Mr. Silmser and people in authority. The question was whether his allegations were specific enough to support a criminal charge. In his letter, Mr. Griffiths concluded that reasonable and probable grounds did not exist to lay charges in respect of any of the four alleged incidents:

It is my advice, based on the material provided in the police investigation brief that the vagueness of the allegations, the difficulty in placing them within a reliable time frame, and the lack of corroboration all combine to prevent the evidence from reaching the threshold of objective reasonable and probable grounds. In addition as I understand from your material, you are not personally, or subjectively, satisfied that you have reasonable and probable grounds to lay criminal charges. Since a subjective belief is an essential element in the swearing of an information, it is my advice that absent that belief charges cannot be laid by you.

It is clear from this letter that Mr. Griffiths' opinion was that the police had neither objective grounds nor subjective belief. This is inconsistent with the notes of the telephone conversation between Mr. Griffiths and Detective Inspector Smith on December 20, from which it appears Mr. Griffiths told Detective Inspector Smith there was enough objective evidence. When asked about the discrepancy, Detective Inspector Smith said he did not know why that change occurred. He did not think he had a discussion with Mr. Griffiths between the time of the telephone call and receipt of the letter.

Mr. Griffiths also was unable to explain the apparent change except to point out that on August 11, 1994, Detective Inspector Smith was questioning whether he had reasonable and probable grounds to lay a charge. As discussed in Chapter 7, Detective Inspector Smith thought this was a very close case in terms of reasonable and probable grounds. Mr. Griffiths also believed that this was a close case on every aspect of the reasonable and probable grounds test.

Mr. Griffiths agreed that he was giving an opinion on the objective element of reasonable and probable grounds and not the subjective part, which is within the police officer's domain. At the end of his letter, Mr. Griffiths states that this is his opinion and is not binding upon Detective Inspector Smith:

The Ontario Provincial Police operate independently of the Crown Attorney's office and are legally entitled to lay charges if they see fit without the approval of the Crown Attorney.

According to Mr. Griffiths, this reflects the practice in Ontario, where the final decision on reasonable and probable grounds rests with the police, and I agree with that practice.

Peter Griffiths' Opinion Letter on the Conspiracy Investigation

On December 21, 1994, Mr. Griffiths also provided a written opinion to Detective Inspector Smith with respect to the "investigation into allegations of collusion between the Cornwall Police Service, the Crown Attorney and the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall to not charge and prosecute Father Charles MacDonald for improper reasons." Mr. Griffiths concluded that the evidence did not reveal criminal activity. As he explained, conspiracy is an unlawful agreement between parties, and he found there was no direct or indirect evidence of any agreement between those parties.

As I discuss in Chapter 7, this investigation suffered from several deficiencies. Mr. Griffiths could have requested that investigators follow up on some of these deficiencies, including the interview of Father MacDonald, the interview of Malcolm MacDonald, and the apparent lack of investigation into the involvement of the lawyers Jacques Leduc and Sean Adams.

Clarifying the Roles of the Police and the Crown

In all of these investigations, Mr. Griffiths' opinions were based on the information provided by the investigating officers. Neither Detective Inspector Smith nor Detective Inspector Hamelink received any direction or request from Mr. Griffiths for further follow-up or clarification. Mr. Griffiths acknowledged that if, for example, an alleged victim's statement contained in the brief is unclear, it would be open to him to request the police to follow up or investigate, but he "preferred not to" because he distinguished his role as a Crown from the police role as investigators.

According to Mr. Griffiths, his opinion letter sets out what he thinks are weaknesses in the case, and if the police think they can remedy those weaknesses they can conduct further investigation. He did not see it as part of his role to scrutinize the sufficiency of the police investigation. Detective Inspector Smith, however, said that when the police send a brief to a Crown, the Crown will often, within his or her recommendations, request further investigation and the police will follow those instructions. He felt that if a Crown was not satisfied with portions of a brief it should be brought to the attention of the police.

It appears that in this instance, the police and Crown may not have been clear with respect to their respective roles. The Crown and the police have distinct roles, and the line between them should be respected. However, to ensure the efficiency and effectiveness of investigations, it is crucial that the Crown and police have a common understanding of what role each plays. Practice Memorandum PM [2005] No. 34, dated March 31, 2006, provides Crowns with direction on their relationship with the police: "Generally, the role of a Crown counsel at the pre-charge stage is advisory in nature and not directive." The memorandum essentially provides that Crowns should advise police only on legal issues before charges are laid.

R. v. Malcolm MacDonald: Attempt to Obstruct Justice

Peter Griffiths Receives Brief on Attempt to Obstruct Justice Investigation

The fourth matter mentioned in the previous section was the investigation into the alleged obstruction of justice by lawyers who brought about the civil settlement between David Silmsen and the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, which terminated the Cornwall Police Service investigation of David Silmsen's sexual assault allegations. The settlement document provided that in return for $32,000, Mr. Silmsen would not proceed with a criminal or civil action against Father Charles MacDonald. As early as January 1994, Peter Griffiths was concerned about a potential obstruction of justice. He was quoted on this matter in the Ottawa Citizen on January 25, 1994: "It's certainly a question I would ask the (Ottawa) officers to consider in their investigation: whether there was an obstruction of justice."

Mr. Griffiths received a brief from Detective Inspector Tim Smith on the attempt to obstruct justice investigation on or about November 7, 1994. Included in the brief was a synopsis prepared by the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), which said of the civil settlement:

This document was prepared, and reviewed by three practicing lawyers for the Province of Ontario.

It is difficult to understand how three knowledgeable, and experienced solicitors, could condone, and approve such a document, not realizing Section two of the contract clearly obstructs justice.

This synopsis reflects the fact that at the time, Detective Inspector Smith was concerned about all three of the lawyers' actions with respect to the settlement. Although nothing in the synopsis singles out Malcolm MacDonald, counsel for Father Charles MacDonald, he was the only one ultimately charged. No additional information arose between the receipt of the brief by Mr. Griffiths in November 1994 and February 1995, when Mr. MacDonald was charged by the OPP. All of the information and documents Mr. Griffiths had to base his opinion on came from the OPP.

After reviewing the brief, Mr. Griffiths contacted Detective Inspector Smith on December 20, 1994, and provided him with a verbal opinion. He told Smith that it was appropriate to contact the Law Society of Upper Canada about the three lawyers involved, Mr. MacDonald, Jacques Leduc, and Sean Adams: the obstruct justice did not constitute an offence but was unprofessional. Two days later, Mr. Griffiths contacted Detective Inspector Smith and advised him, as noted by the officer, "problem with Malcolm MacDonald, possible obstruct. Further consultations to be done."

Peter Griffiths Obtains a Second Opinion

With respect to the obstructing justice allegations, the issue was not whether the release signed by David Silmsner, in which he agreed not to pursue a civil or criminal complaint in exchange for a monetary settlement, was a lawful document, but whether a criminal offence had been committed in the creation of the document. There was no doubt in Mr. Griffiths' mind that the clause in the release prohibiting Mr. Silmsner from bringing a criminal complaint was illegal; the question was whether the individuals involved in drafting the document had committed a crime. Mr. Griffiths wanted another opinion, so he asked Don McDougall, a senior Crown attorney, to review the brief. On January 6, 1995, Mr. Griffiths advised Detective Inspector Smith that Mr. McDougall would be reviewing the brief and would have recommendations by the end of the month.

On January 30, Mr. Griffiths advised Detective Inspector Smith that Mr. McDougall thought there were reasonable and probable grounds to believe Mr. MacDonald had attempted to obstruct justice. There was also a reasonable prospect of conviction, and it was in the public interest to prosecute. During this telephone call, Detective Inspector Smith advised Mr. Griffiths of a release that was sent by Mr. Leduc to Mr. MacDonald, which contained no mention of criminal matters. Detective Inspector Smith was referring to a one-paragraph French precedent that Mr. Leduc had given Detective Constable Michael Fagan.

It was only after receiving the opinion from Mr. McDougall that Mr. Griffiths was comfortable providing an opinion to Detective Inspector Smith that Mr. MacDonald should be charged. Mr. Griffiths did not believe there were reasonable and probable grounds to charge the other two lawyers with attempt to obstruct justice. The entire brief was forwarded to Mr. McDougall for his opinion, and he recommended charges only against Malcolm MacDonald.

As I have found in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the OPP, the investigation of the attempt to obstruct justice allegation was deficient. Based on the information that was available for review at the time, it was unlikely the Crown would conclude that charges should be laid against Mr. Adams or Mr. Leduc.

No Written Opinion Provided

Unlike the opinions provided in the Father MacDonald, the extortion, and the conspiracy investigations, Mr. Griffiths did not prepare a written opinion on the obstruction of justice investigation. During his testimony, he agreed the better practice is to provide written opinions. In my view, a written opinion should have been provided in this case.

The current practice memorandum, dated March 31, 2006, on “Police: Relationship With Crown Counsel” examines aspects of the working relationship between Crown counsel and police officers. It provides that Crown counsel who provide advice about laying criminal charges should, where feasible, do so in writing.

Brockville Office Assigned

Once Malcolm MacDonald was charged, Mr. Griffiths assigned the file to the Brockville Crown Attorney’s Office. The Cornwall Crown Attorney’s Office could not conduct the prosecution because Malcolm MacDonald was a lawyer from the Cornwall area. In addition, since Cornwall Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald had had some conversations with Malcolm MacDonald regarding the circumstances leading to the charge of obstructing justice, it would have been inappropriate for his office to act. Brockville Crown Attorney Curt Flanagan, who had sole carriage of the prosecution, had no previous dealings with Malcolm MacDonald and did not know him personally or professionally.

Although the Cornwall Crown Attorney’s Office was not handling the prosecution, Mr. Flanagan wrote to Murray MacDonald and asked that either Guy Simard or Lynn Robinson, both assistant Crown attorneys in the Cornwall office, act as agent for the first court appearance. Mr. Flanagan did not see a problem with having a Cornwall Crown act as an agent, as he or she was instructed simply to adjourn the matter. Even though the Cornwall office was in a conflict, it was acceptable to use the office for routine matters such as the coordination of disclosure and the arrangement of adjournments. However, someone from the office should have been designated to handle these issues, and all correspondence should have been addressed to that individual rather than to Murray MacDonald.

In preparation for the prosecution, Mr. Flanagan had access to the brief prepared by Detective Inspector Smith, which he used when providing disclosure to the defence. He also provided materials to Justice Lennox before the pre-trial, which was standard practice at the time.

Role of Jacques Leduc and Sean Adams

As noted above, the synopsis that was contained in the Crown brief refers to the fact that the settlement document was prepared and reviewed by three practising lawyers. Mr. Flanagan did not recall any discussion with Detective Inspector Smith about the culpability or responsibility of the other lawyers. He did not think that Mr. Adams and Mr. Leduc were as responsible as Mr. MacDonald, and he understood from the synopsis that Detective Inspector Smith was of the opinion that Mr. Adams and Mr. Leduc were not criminally responsible for the contents of the release: “[A]lthough he believes that it may have been some negligence on their part, he didn’t believe that they were committing or party to the criminal offence.”

Mr. Flanagan’s understanding was that Mr. Leduc prepared a draft of a release that did not mention criminal proceedings. The draft was then sent to Mr. MacDonald, who prepared the release and sent it back to Mr. Leduc in a sealed envelope, which Mr. Leduc did not open. In terms of Mr. Adams’ role, Mr. Flanagan gleaned from Mr. Adams’ statement to the OPP that he had not noticed the insertion of the word “criminal” into the release. Mr. Flanagan was never asked for a legal opinion about whether Mr. Leduc, Mr. Adams, or Bishop Eugène LaRocque should be charged in connection with the settlement document. When the matter came to Mr. Flanagan’s office, the charge against Mr. MacDonald was already laid. He was never asked for an opinion about that charge either.

Mr. Flanagan reviewed the brief and assessed how the statements by Mr. Adams and Mr. Leduc could assist him in determining Mr. MacDonald’s culpability, but he did not take it upon himself to reassess all the circumstances surrounding the Silmser settlement.

Pre-Trial, Guilty Plea, and Sentencing

A pre-trial conference was held before Justice Brian Lennox during which the guilty plea that was eventually entered crystallized. On September 12, 1995, Malcolm MacDonald pleaded guilty to the offence of unlawfully attempting to obstruct justice for arranging a monetary payment to Mr. Silmsen in order to dissuade him from participating in the Father MacDonald investigation.

The defence submitted that an absolute discharge was an appropriate sentence. Mr. Flanagan did not object to the defence position on sentencing, and he cited four reasons for taking this position. First, the plea of guilt avoided what would have been a somewhat lengthy trial.

Second, the police decided independently, separate from the issue of the release, not to lay criminal charges in relation to the allegations against Father Charles MacDonald. Mr. Flanagan believed it would have been an aggravating factor had the police laid a charge. He believed that charges were not laid because there was no reasonable prospect of conviction. As of September 12, 1995, Mr. Flanagan did not know that John MacDonald had come forward with allegations against Father MacDonald in August 1995. He had not been given any indication that charges were contemplated or that an investigation was ongoing into Father MacDonald.

The third submission by the Crown in support of an absolute discharge was Mr. MacDonald's exemplary background. The fourth was the fact that the matter would be reported to the Law Society of Upper Canada. Although the Crown was not opposed to an absolute discharge, Mr. Flanagan stated to the Court that "obviously it was a gross error, at the very least, in judgement of Mr. MacDonald. And on the other hand, one could say that, to put in the vernacular, 'he should know better.'"

According to Mr. Flanagan, reporting to the Law Society of Upper Canada was a factor he took into consideration when providing the Court his submissions on sentencing, because he believed the complaint would have some repercussions for Mr. MacDonald. He was not aware, however, whether any action was taken in this regard. In hindsight, as a condition of its agreement with the defence position on sentencing, the Crown should have required that the defence prove to the Court that the complaint had been or would be filed with the Law Society.

Appropriateness of Sentence and Public Opinion

Malcolm MacDonald's sentence of an absolute discharge attracted media attention in Cornwall, with headlines such as, "Priest's lawyer fall guy in sex abuse case: Counsel," and "Priest's lawyer pleads guilty but gets off scot-free." Mr. Flanagan was aware that this case was well known in Cornwall, but he did not know the full extent of the circumstances. He was not aware at the time that there were protests after the sentencing of Mr. MacDonald.

Regional Crown Griffiths was aware that Mr. MacDonald pleaded guilty and received an absolute discharge. He was comfortable that he had put the case in the hands of a senior and experienced Crown attorney to prosecute and this was the result. Mr. Griffiths was not aware of the concern expressed in the local media about the outcome of the case nor that there were protests in Cornwall about the sentence.

John MacDonald Expresses Concerns to MPP John Cleary About Sentence

On October 20, 1995, John MacDonald, one of the complainants in the Father Charles MacDonald matter, had a meeting with MPP John Cleary about the outcome of the Malcolm MacDonald case. John MacDonald told him he did not think the sentence was right. During this meeting, Mr. Cleary asked John MacDonald to put his thoughts on paper so he could forward the letter to the Attorney General's Office. John MacDonald subsequently wrote a letter addressed to the Attorney General, dated October 24, 1995. In writing this letter, Mr. MacDonald was seeking clarification from the Attorney General's Office of "how a man can plead guilty to something and walk away with an absolute discharge." Mr. Cleary forwarded Mr. MacDonald's letter to Attorney General Charles Harnick on or around November 1.

Mr. Griffiths was asked by someone at the Attorney General's Office to respond to Mr. MacDonald's letter. Addressing correspondence on behalf of the Attorney General was a normal part of Mr. Griffiths' job. On or about December 1, Mr. Griffiths wrote a letter to John MacDonald telling him that the sentence received by Malcolm MacDonald was equal to similar cases decided in courts in other provinces. Mr. Griffiths did some research or had some research done on this issue, and during his testimony he recalled in particular a case in Saskatchewan that involved a lawyer.

John MacDonald still had concerns and followed up with another letter requesting further details. In this letter, dated January 8, 1996, he requested that Mr. Griffiths provide him with "either a copy of each of the other decisions, or refer to all the rulings used to decide this case." He also requested the transcripts from Malcolm MacDonald's case. Mr. Griffiths did not respond to this letter and did not ask anyone to respond on his behalf. John MacDonald was not a party to any of the offences, and Mr. Griffiths felt that his response to the initial inquiry was sufficient. As well, in early January 1996, Mr. Griffiths was seconded to be Acting Assistant Deputy Attorney General. He was working in Toronto and "had a lot of other things on [his] mind at the time." Mr. Griffiths testified that he should have at least acknowledged receipt of the letter and explained that he could not provide the material requested or advised Mr. MacDonald how he could go about getting it: “It was not appropriate not to answer the second letter.”

On or around February 1, 1996, John MacDonald wrote Mr. Cleary that he had yet to receive a response from Mr. Griffiths to his January 8 letter. Mr. MacDonald met with Mr. Cleary on February 19 and discussed some of the concerns he had, one of which was the lack of response from Mr. Griffiths. Mr. Cleary wrote two further letters to Attorney General Harnick requesting that either he or Mr. Griffiths respond to Mr. MacDonald’s January 8 letter.

In my view, Mr. Griffiths should have responded to John MacDonald’s second letter.

R. v. Nelson Barque and Subsequent Complaint

Don Johnson Is Defence Counsel

In 1995, Nelson Barque was prosecuted by the Cornwall Crown Attorney’s Office for sexual offences committed against a former probationer, Albert Roy. The allegations by Mr. Roy and the investigation and arrest of Mr. Barque have been discussed in earlier chapters of this report. Don Johnson had left the Crown’s office about three years previously and was working as a criminal defence attorney in Cornwall. He was retained to represent Mr. Barque in these proceedings. In a letter dated January 16, 1995, Murray MacDonald, who at the time was the Crown attorney in Cornwall, raised the issue of an appearance of conflict with Mr. Johnson:

As I indicated in conversation with you there may be an appearance of conflict with you as counsel in light of the fact that you were consulted by probation authorities in respect to charges against the above noted individual during your tenure as Crown Attorney. You have indicated to me that a plea is anticipated in which case you feel a potential conflict is not an issue.

There were no formal policies or protocols regarding potential conflicts of interest for these situations. However, Mr. MacDonald recognized there could be a potential conflict of interest, which is why he alerted Mr. Johnson to that issue.

Mr. Johnson did not believe there would be a conflict if the matter were resolved by way of a guilty plea. If the matter went to trial, Mr. Johnson acknowledged there would have been a conflict and he would have stepped down. According to Mr. Johnson, if there was in fact a conflict or a concern for the administration of justice, the Crown could have made a formal complaint before a judge to have him removed as counsel, which they had done in the past.

Guy Simard, an assistant Crown attorney in the Cornwall office, was assigned the prosecution. On February 14, 1995, he wrote a letter to Mr. Johnson again raising the issue of a potential conflict if the matter went to trial. Mr. Johnson responded, in a letter dated February 27, "I do agree, if this matter does go to trial that I would have a conflict of interest and I would turn Mr. Barque over to another counsel."

Crown Attorney MacDonald agreed with Mr. Johnson's position that there was no conflict as long as Mr. Barque pleaded guilty. If there was a guilty plea, Mr. Johnson would not be using confidential information gained from one client to use adversely in the course of his acting on behalf of a second client.

Both Crown attorneys involved in this matter raised the issue of Mr. Johnson's potential conflict of interest and it had been documented. In my view, the matter was properly dealt with, and there is no reason why the Crown's office should have insisted on Mr. Johnson's removal from the file unless the matter was to proceed to trial.

The Ministry of the Attorney General set up a specialized prosecution team to help deal with issue of conflicts. The Director of Criminal Prosecutions Branch was set up in 1989. In 1994 this office became a part of the Crown Law Office—Criminal and was renamed Special Investigations. The name was changed in May 2002 to Justice Prosecutions. The office is responsible for prosecutions of justice-related officials, including police officers. It is unclear to me if this office would become involved with the prosecution of a former probation officer. I am not aware of a practice memorandum on conflict of interest in the current Crown Policy Manual, but it would be useful to define conflicts and provide Crown counsel with some direction on how to deal with them when they arise.

On July 10, 1995, Mr. Barque pleaded guilty to indecent assault and the matter was put over for sentencing on August 18. He was sentenced to four months incarceration and eighteen months probation. One of the conditions of his probation was that he not be in the presence of any young person under the age of eighteen unless in the company of another responsible adult.

Constable Heidi Sebalj Provides "Report" to Murray MacDonald:
C-44 Ready to Proceed Against Nelson Barque

On or about February 7, 1996, Crown Attorney MacDonald received a letter from Constable Heidi Sebalj from the Cornwall Police Service in which she provided a report about allegations of sexual assault involving Nelson Barque. Before writing this letter, Constable Sebalj had a meeting with Mr. MacDonald in his office. After what had transpired in 1993, the Cornwall Crown's office had adopted a practice of requiring officers to make requests in writing.

The letter explained that the alleged victim, C-44, had not wished to be involved in the prosecution of Mr. Barque in 1995 but now wanted to formally proceed in respect to allegations of sexual abuse by Mr. Barque. As discussed above and in earlier chapters, C-44 was one of the probationers involved in the 1982 investigation of Mr. Barque. Constable Sebalj provided some details about the 1982 investigation, including the fact that Mr. Barque admitted to having sexual relations with C-44 while he was a probationer. Constable Sebalj enclosed the 1982 report as well as a statement provided by C-44 on December 21, 1995. She was seeking advice as to whether charges could be laid against Mr. Barque in respect of C-44's allegations.

Murray MacDonald Forwards Material to Peter Griffiths for Opinion

Crown MacDonald forwarded Constable Sebalj's letter and the attached material to Peter Griffiths. According to Mr. MacDonald, it was understood between himself and Constable Sebalj that she was sending him the material "for the purpose of relaying it to an outside Crown." At the time, Mr. Griffiths was Acting Assistant Deputy Attorney General. He felt Mr. MacDonald may have been asking for his opinion because of his familiarity with "the other outlying issues."

Mr. MacDonald was acting as a conduit between Constable Sebalj and Mr. Griffiths, and he did not have any discussions with Mr. Griffiths about the matter other than the receipt of his opinion, which Mr. MacDonald then relayed to Constable Sebalj. For example, Mr. MacDonald did not advise Mr. Griffiths that Mr. Barque had pleaded guilty to a similar offence in 1995. He thought Mr. Griffiths would have known this, but Mr. Griffiths was not aware that Mr. Barque had been convicted of the charge involving Albert Roy in 1995.

The letter from Constable Sebalj that was forwarded to Mr. Griffiths referred to the fact that Mr. Barque had been charged the previous year for sexual offences. Mr. Griffiths did not ask anyone if Mr. Barque had been convicted: "I didn't ask anybody for anything. I was given material and said, 'Based on this material, what's your opinion?'" Mr. Griffiths testified that since each case turns on its own facts, he could not say whether knowledge of Mr. Barque's previous conviction would have had an impact on his ultimate opinion.

Peter Griffiths Provides Opinion: No Charges

After reviewing the material received from Mr. MacDonald, Mr. Griffiths concluded that criminal charges should not be laid in this case. On February 27, 1996, Mr. MacDonald met with Constable Sebalj and advised her of this opinion. Mr. MacDonald provided her with a written opinion in a letter dated March 5:

I forwarded your materials to the Regional Director of Crown Attorneys for opinion. I have recently received same. In a word, Mr. Griffiths has determined the charge of indecent assault lacks these essential elements:

- no assaultive behaviour
- no coercion or threats used to compel the consent of [C-44] to the sexual acts
- well beyond the age of consent

With this lack of essential elements to support the charge of indecent assault, criminal proceedings are not available herein.

Mr. Griffiths testified that in giving his opinion, he considered whether Mr. Barque's position as probation officer and C-44's position as probationer might have vitiated consent. Mr. Griffiths acknowledged that this was possible based on the law at the time, but that it was the application to the facts of this case where that fell apart. He also acknowledged that given the relationship between C-44 and Mr. Barque, actual threats would not be necessary to show coercion "because of the power imbalance."

Based on the information he was provided, Mr. Griffiths knew that Mr. Barque was C-44's probation officer, that Mr. Barque gave C-44 money for alcohol and drugs, and that C-44 had a history of troubles with alcohol. However, Mr. Griffiths considered it relevant that the money and alcohol given to C-44 at Mr. Barque's residence preceded the sexual contact. When asked why he considered that relevant, Mr. Griffiths replied:

What the complainant says is that he is afraid of Mr. Barque because of his position. And yet this person who he's afraid of he's also breaching his probation with, he's getting money from. He's going to his residence. He has this person in his pocket.

There are a number of passages in C-44's statement that could be interpreted as evidence of some coercion. For example:

... I was, I was afraid maybe, you know ... if I went and said something to his superiors there, mention it to anybody, you know. Word would get around and I would get breached on probation, I would've went back to jail. I didn't want to go back to jail. That's the last thing, you know. I just finished like six and a half, seven months in jail and ... I never want to go back.

... It started happening and then I just kept goin' back cause I was scared. You know, like I didn't know what was goin' on. I didn't understand all this, you know. To me I probably thought it was a normal part of life. We never talked about ah, homosexuals or gays or stuff like that when I grew up, you know. I didn't even know anything about sex til I was seventeen years old ... I was just lost, I didn't know, I was scared. I didn't want to say anything to anybody cause I'da got breached and I would'a went back to jail and then I didn't wanna go back to jail.

Mr. Griffiths agreed that taken in isolation these statements indicate there could be some coercion but “you can't pick and choose. I mean I'm looking at the statement as a whole.” Certain portions of the statement caused Mr. Griffiths to question whether C-44 was afraid of Mr. Barque. As an example, he pointed to the reference in the statement to C-44 stealing Mr. Barque's car: “He steals his car and there is reference to that in the statement of the—the monikered individual steals the probation officer's car and clearly thinks that he's safe from being reported.”

It is true that C-44 admits to stealing Mr. Barque's car as a way to “get back at him somehow.” However, in my view, the statement does not indicate that C-44 felt he would be safe from being reported. In fact, C-44 states that his plan “back fired on me.” He related that he and his friend were stopped by the police while hitchhiking on the 417 after the car had run out of gas, and that an Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) officer questioned him about the incident after he had returned to Cornwall. He said he “play[ed] stupid” about the incident and that his probation was not breached because there was no proof that he stole the car.

It is clear that Mr. Griffiths did not feel there was coercion:

... my view, looking at the statement as a whole, was that coercion was not a factor, notwithstanding what those individual statements say.

... Or if it was a factor it wasn't something that I could prove.

This may have been a reasonable conclusion in 1996. Today, with our better understanding of victims of historical sexual abuse and the grooming process they are subjected to by the perpetrators, I would expect such issues as coercion to be examined and investigated more thoroughly.

It certainly appears that Mr. Griffiths was not in possession of all of the relevant facts before providing an opinion regarding this investigation. He had not been advised of the 1995 conviction of Mr. Barque or made aware that there were other potential victims, such as Robert Sheets. He had not been provided with other available information, such as OPP Detective Constable William Zebruck's notes on the interview of witnesses in the Albert Roy investigation. The OPP's involvement is further discussed in Chapter 7. Mr. Griffiths also never had the opportunity to meet with Constable Sebalj. In my view, a Crown attorney providing an opinion should wherever possible communicate with the investigating officer. In this case, Mr. Griffiths relied on materials forwarded to him by Mr. MacDonald and did not have any discussions with the investigating officer.

R. v. Father Charles MacDonald: Charges Laid and Preliminary Inquiry

In late 1994, Peter Griffiths provided an opinion to the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) that reasonable and probable grounds did not exist to lay charges in respect of David Silmser's allegations against Father Charles MacDonald. In the following year, John MacDonald and another individual, C-3, disclosed allegations against Father MacDonald, and the police investigation continued. The Crown attorney was kept apprised of the OPP's ongoing investigation, which is discussed in detail in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the OPP. On May 19, 1995, Detective Inspector Tim Smith called Mr. Griffiths and advised him of the new allegations against Father MacDonald.

Second Brief Prepared and Robert Pelletier Assigned to Prosecute

On January 3, 1996, Mr. Griffiths received a call from Detective Inspector Smith updating him on the investigation. Detective Inspector Smith said the OPP would have a brief prepared within two weeks and he wanted Mr. Griffiths to review it and provide recommendations. Detective Inspector Smith's notes of the telephone call say that "we feel with additional two victims there are RPG [reasonable and probable grounds] to lay indecent assault charge." Mr. Griffiths told Detective Inspector Smith he would review the brief and "possibly have Bob Pelletier's office prosecute."

Mr. Griffiths testified that given what had happened in the past, there was still a concern about having the local Crown prosecute. As a result, he had to find another prosecutor in the Eastern Region. Mr. Griffiths thought Robert Pelletier was the "perfect" person to take on this matter because he:

... was one of the most experienced Crowns in the province with historical sexual assaults, and particularly involving young boys and young men and church figures as a result of his work in Alfred. He had worked for many years with Inspector Smith in those prosecutions and had been very successful in those prosecutions.

On January 15, Mr. Griffiths called Mr. Pelletier and asked him to become involved in the Father MacDonald investigation and prosecution. On January 18, Mr. Pelletier attended Mr. Griffiths' office to obtain the brief.

In a note to file, Mr. Pelletier wrote that Mr. Griffiths requested that he "conduct the prosecution if charges were to be laid." Mr. Pelletier testified that when he wrote this memo, he was not sure if Mr. Griffiths had any opinion about whether charges should be laid. It was clear to him, however, from reviewing subsequent memos that determining whether or not charges should be laid was also part of his responsibility. The synopsis prepared by Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Michael Fagan, which formed part of the brief, did not include a recommendation that charges be laid. Detective Inspector Smith testified that he had reasonable and probable grounds and therefore could lay charges, but he had concerns about the reasonable prospect of conviction:

I'm going to see what they say about it—the Crown say about it—and if they feel that there's not reasonable prospect of a conviction, then I'm going to wait and I'm going to find myself another victim somewhere along the line because once I lay a charge, the clock starts ticking, and if there's no reasonable prospect of a conviction those charges are gone.

In the meantime, on January 16, Detective Constable Fagan advised Detective Inspector Smith that he spoke briefly to Mr. Griffiths about the allegations of C-3. Mr. Griffiths said that the indecent assault on C-3 when he was sixteen would be considered consensual, so no charges should follow, and the "fondling prior will be reviewed by Bob Pelletier." According to Detective Inspector Smith, this was Mr. Griffiths' analysis of C-3's allegations. The Detective Inspector's notes do not reveal whether or not Mr. Griffiths considered a charge of gross indecency.

One of the distinctions between the charges of gross indecency and indecent assault was that consent was not a defence to a charge of gross indecency unless the act occurred in private between a husband and wife or any two persons twenty-one years of age or older, both of whom consent to the act. It is unclear if Mr. Griffiths considered laying such a charge. This might have been a possible solution to his concern about consent. As will be discussed later in this section, some of the Crown counsel involved with the Project Truth prosecutions had different views on the elements of the offence of gross indecency, and I am not going to find fault with any of their views or interpretation. However, had one Crown been assigned to the management of the prosecutions, there may have been greater consistency on the applicability of that charge.

After assigning the matter to Mr. Pelletier, Mr. Griffiths had no further involvement with the Father MacDonald investigation and prosecution until April 1997.

Robert Pelletier Meets With Investigating Officers

On January 31, 1996, Mr. Pelletier met with Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan. Mr. Pelletier had reviewed the brief and intended to request additional materials from the officers. He requested the records of the civil proceedings filed by the complainants, David Silmsen, John MacDonald and C-3. According to Detective Inspector Smith's notes of the meeting, Mr. Pelletier stated that without them he could not make a decision. Mr. Pelletier testified that his preference was to have all available information, but it was not his position that the Crown was unable to make a decision without first seeing those documents. Mr. Pelletier wrote his opinion before obtaining copies of the civil transcripts.

During this meeting, Mr. Pelletier was provided with a number of additional investigative briefs, including the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) investigation by Constable Heidi Sebalj in 1993 and the Ottawa Police Service's 1994 report. He was also given the settlement agreement between the Diocese and Mr. Silmsen, and materials related to a complaint by Mr. Silmsen against the CPS and the Crown's office regarding the initial decision not to lay charges. At this time, Mr. Pelletier also became aware of the 1994 Crown brief on the investigation of allegations of extortion against Mr. Silmsen concerning his demand for compensation from Ken Seguin. Mr. Pelletier received this brief on February 7, 1996.

It was agreed at this meeting that Mr. Pelletier would review the additional materials and meet with the officers again on February 21 to discuss possible charges.

Robert Pelletier Has Discussions With Counsel for Father Charles MacDonald

The day after Mr. Pelletier first met with the OPP investigating officers, he received a call from Colin McKinnon, counsel for Father MacDonald, to discuss the possibility of criminal charges. Mr. Pelletier testified that he was surprised to receive a call from Father MacDonald's counsel the day after meeting with the OPP officers. He was curious to know how Mr. McKinnon knew that there might be charges laid before he had made any such determination.

In a note to file dated February 1, 1996, Mr. Pelletier wrote that he told Mr. McKinnon "that there appeared to be certain difficulties in relation to the David Silmser complaints however those would be further examined prior to a decision being made.” Mr. Pelletier testified that he could not recall what difficulties he was alluding to. He said that he came to know that the information provided by Mr. Silmser was in some areas problematic and because of that he recommended against charges for one allegation. Mr. Pelletier could not recall how much detail he and Mr. McKinnon discussed in this conversation, nor how much Mr. McKinnon knew about the allegations at the time. It appears that Mr. Pelletier also told Mr. McKinnon that on their face, the allegations made by John MacDonald and C-3 appeared legitimate.

During this phone conversation, Mr. Pelletier told Mr. McKinnon that he was interested in receiving copies of all materials relating to the civil suit brought by the three complainants against Father MacDonald and the Diocese. Mr. McKinnon’s firm was acting for Father MacDonald in this civil action.

Shortly after his telephone call with Mr. McKinnon, Mr. Pelletier received a call from Mike Hébert, civil counsel to Father MacDonald. In his February 1 note to file, Mr. Pelletier wrote:

Mr. Hébert informed me that Silmser had been cross examined during the examinations for discovery and that it had apparently been a rather difficult time for Mr. Silmser. I advised Mr. Hébert that it would be my intention to review the civil pleadings as well as any transcripts he could obtain in determining whether charges should be laid in respect of Silmser.

At this point, Mr. Pelletier was interested in reviewing the transcripts of the examinations for discovery in the civil suit, as it would be one of the considerations in assessing whether charges should be laid.

Although he did not discuss the possibility of a plea with Mr. McKinnon, Mr. Pelletier recalled requesting he speak with his client “with a view to determining whether there was ‘any middle ground’ with regard to the various allegations.”

Mr. Pelletier asked that Mr. McKinnon provide him with his client’s instructions by the time Mr. Pelletier met with the investigators on February 21.

All three complainants against Father MacDonald were involved as plaintiffs in civil litigation. It is common practice for defence counsel, in examining the motive of the complainant in pursuing a criminal prosecution, to look at financial considerations, including whether the complainant has initiated a civil lawsuit.

Mr. Pelletier testified that as a Crown, whether the complainants are involved in a civil suit is a factor to consider in preparing to prosecute a case. When asked how a Crown would attempt to neutralize the impact of a complainant also suing civilly, Mr. Pelletier responded:

In a judge alone trial, a judge knows well that public prosecution serves the community and a lawsuit serves the plaintiff. So that in a judge alone trial you would submit at the end of the case and remind the judge to instruct himself or herself that the financial aspect is a consideration, but there are two forms of justice, as it were. In a judge and jury trial, what I had done in the past is call a civil lawyer to explain to a jury, give a little lesson on Civil Law 101 to explain that these people are entitled to sue for their personal damages. It's not something the criminal courts can give them.

In my opinion, it is important that all individuals who come in contact with the justice system realize the distinction between the criminal and civil processes. An individual has the right to pursue both processes simultaneously, and everyone should be reminded that the criminal burden of proof, beyond a reasonable doubt, is much higher than the civil burden of proof, which is on a balance of probabilities.

Robert Pelletier Reviews the Briefs

Mr. Pelletier made notes while he was reviewing the briefs and providing his recommendations for charges in February 1996. He testified that he reviewed the relevant Criminal Code provisions at the date of the allegations and the relevant sections pertaining to indecent assault. He recommended three charges of indecent assault for the incidents with Mr. Silmsen, three charges of indecent assault for the incidents with John MacDonald, and one charge of indecent assault for the incident with C-3.

Mr. Pelletier did not consider recommending a charge of gross indecency. In his experience, gross indecency was difficult to prove, because it required more than contacts of a sexual nature and involved contacts that were offensive and an affront to people's sensibilities. Having prosecuted several such charges, he remembers securing only one conviction involving conduct that was extraordinarily offensive. Mr. Pelletier believed that the information they had best supported the charge of indecent assault. He did not think gross indecency would apply to an incident of fondling over the clothes.

Shelley Hallett, the Crown attorney who later took over this case from Mr. Pelletier after the preliminary inquiry, had a different view on the offence of gross indecency. She testified that gross indecency was an offence that could be laid with respect to sexual misconduct with a young person that represented a marked departure from the decent conduct expected of the average Canadian in the circumstances. Where appropriate, Ms Hallett suggested a charge of gross indecency be laid in cases she was assigned to prosecute or provide an opinion about. She testified that had the evidence justified a gross indecency charge, she would have asked the judge to commit Father MacDonald to trial on charges of gross indecency. However, Father MacDonald had already been committed to trial when she took over the case, and she was not prepared at that point to try to change the offences. When C-2, a former altar boy, came forward with his allegation against the priest in 1998, Ms Hallett suggested laying a charge of gross indecency.

Crown attorneys have some discretion in interpreting the law. Mr. Pelletier's approach is more traditional, while Ms Hallett's approach includes the element of public approbation and is more of a purposive approach, in other words, an interpretation based on the underlying purpose of the law. Both approaches to the charge of gross indecency are an appropriate exercise of Crown discretion.

Robert Pelletier Provides an Opinion

Mr. Pelletier met with Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan on February 21, 1996, to discuss the Crown attorney's review of the file. According to Detective Inspector Smith's notes of the meeting, Mr. Pelletier had reviewed the brief and it appeared he would recommend charges against Father MacDonald, but he wanted to read the transcripts from the complainants' civil cases before giving his written recommendation.

In early March, Mr. Pelletier advised Detective Inspector Smith that his written recommendation was completed. He met with Detective Constable Fagan on March 5 and provided him with written instructions regarding the seven charges recommended. Mr. Pelletier also provided Detective Constable Fagan with a draft information regarding the seven counts.

In his written opinion memo, addressed to Detective Inspector Smith, Mr. Pelletier concluded that "reasonable and probable grounds exist for the laying of a total of seven counts of indecent assault in respect of the three complainants." In addition, he wrote that it was his view "that in the event that the complainants testify in a forthright and credible manner, there exist reasonable prospects of conviction in respect of each charge."

Mr. Pelletier referred to previous decisions, in 1993 and 1994, not to pursue this matter through the criminal courts. He noted that in 1993 Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald decided not to pursue the matter largely because of the complainant's wishes not to proceed. In 1994, regional Crown Peter Griffiths decided not to proceed because of a lack of detail, corroboration, and similar fact evidence. Mr. Pelletier was able to distinguish those earlier decisions:

The situation has changed somewhat given that there now exist two complainants who provide, if their accounts are believed at trial, corroboration of the Silmsers complaint in the nature of similar fact evidence. More particularly, the three complaints now relate to the same suspect, allege similar types of sexual abuse, refer to a similar pattern of behaviour and method, relate to allegations at a time when the complainants were of the similar age, in a similar location, and in the same general time frame. The case against Father Charles MacDonald is certainly reinforced by the most recent complaints by John MacDonald and [C-3]. Accordingly, any prior decision not to proceed with regards to the Silmsers complaint has to be viewed in that light.

There was one incident for which Mr. Pelletier recommended against laying a charge and that was the allegation made by Mr. Silmsers of attempted buggery. Mr. Pelletier based this decision on the fact that Mr. Silmsers gave various contradictory accounts of the incident and could not provide any details about how it took place.

Mr. Pelletier's opinion letter concluded that there was no need to arrest Father MacDonald, but rather arrangements could be made with his counsel to surrender himself. Detective Inspector Smith testified that the Crown would normally not provide this kind of advice and ultimately it was Detective Inspector Smith's decision. On March 6, an information with seven counts was sworn. Father MacDonald was charged on March 11 with three counts of indecent assault against Mr. Silmsers, three counts of indecent assault against John MacDonald, and one count of indecent assault against C-3.

Although Mr. Griffiths was copied on Mr. Pelletier's opinion memo, it was Mr. Pelletier's decision to prosecute. Mr. Griffiths testified that he was copied only as a courtesy.

Mr. Silmsers testified that he did not find out about the charges against Father MacDonald from a police officer or from a Crown attorney. Rather, he found out from John MacDonald, his lawyer, and the media. As will be discussed below, this is an example of the lack of communication between the Crown attorney and the alleged victim that could have been resolved by the assistance of a victim liaison person.

Robert Pelletier's Relationship With David Silmsers

Mr. Pelletier had a difficult relationship with Mr. Silmsers throughout the prosecution. He said that during their first telephone contact on February 7, 1996, Mr. Silmsers explained that he was not satisfied with how the matter was proceeding and became "abusive and vulgar." Mr. Pelletier asked him if he spoke to everyone in that way, because he was taken aback by Mr. Silmsers's attitude. In response, Mr. Silmsers "became even more upset, declared war against the OPP and myself and hung up the phone.” Mr. Silmsers testified that something must have triggered his call to Mr. Pelletier, such as a media report, which may have made him frustrated that things were not being properly handled. Mr. Silmsers does not believe he was abusive or vulgar during phone calls with Mr. Pelletier. Rather, he was frustrated and at times may have expressed that frustration in an angry manner.

Mr. Pelletier had the impression that if this first conversation had degenerated any further, some threats or veiled threats might have been made, and under those circumstances Mr. Pelletier could not represent the Crown with Mr. Silmsers as a complainant. As a result, he made the decision that it would be prudent to have no further direct contact with Mr. Silmsers. After this conversation with Mr. Silmsers, Mr. Pelletier contacted Mr. Silmsers’s lawyer, Bryce Geoffrey, and informed him that he did not intend to speak directly with Mr. Silmsers anymore and that if Mr. Silmsers had anything to communicate, he should do so through his lawyer. Mr. Pelletier advised his secretary, Mireille Legault, that he would not be taking calls from Mr. Silmsers. He advised Mr. Geoffrey that it would be counter-productive if he spoke to Mr. Silmsers, and that if a serious conflict between them developed it could result in Mr. Pelletier being unable to conduct the prosecution.

Mr. Pelletier never met with Mr. Geoffrey and Mr. Silmsers, and was surprised that Mr. Geoffrey did not suggest such a meeting: “I had expected that Mr. Geoffrey was going to extend his client’s apology and undertaking not to conduct himself that way, and that never came.” Mr. Pelletier acknowledged that he never told Mr. Geoffrey that he was expecting a meeting or an undertaking from Mr. Silmsers’s counsel.

Despite his arrangements with Mr. Geoffrey about Mr. Silmsers not contacting him, Mr. Silmsers continued to call Mr. Pelletier’s office. Mr. Pelletier did not speak to Mr. Silmsers, but his secretary took the calls. On March 18, 1996, Ms Legault prepared a memo for him about a call from Mr. Silmsers during which he told her that Detective Constables Fagan and McDonell were interviewing former altar boys and that Detective Constable McDonell was Father MacDonald’s first cousin. Mr. Silmsers also said that during one interview of an former altar boy, Detective Constable McDonell told him that “Silmsers was a thief and bringing Silmsers down.” Mr. Silmsers agreed that the memo’s description of his conversation with Mr. Pelletier’s secretary is fairly accurate.

Mr. Pelletier testified that he does not recall asking investigators to follow up on whether Detective Constable McDonell was related to Father MacDonald. He did not recall dealing with that officer or receiving any documents from him. Detective Constable McDonell had been involved in the extortion investigation in 1994, but he was not involved in the investigation into Father MacDonald at this time.

Mr. Silmsers recalled calling Mr. Pelletier's office and expressing considerable dissatisfaction. He testified that he did not understand many things, such as why Detective Constable McDonnell was an investigator on the case when he was Father McDonald's cousin. According to Mr. Silmsers, he brought up many points, and "Pelletier was just ignoring them, and not giving me any advice on them. He wouldn't talk to me about it." Mr. Silmsers was also upset about the lack of communication with the Crown: "There was no information given to me at all, I was just sitting there in limbo." Mr. Silmsers did not think he made an excessive number of phone calls to Mr. Pelletier's office.

Because of the March 18 phone call, Mr. Pelletier wrote a letter to Mr. Geoffrey in which he outlined the concerns voiced by Mr. Silmsers and reminded Mr. Geoffrey that communications between Mr. Silmsers and Mr. Pelletier's office should flow through him. Mr. Geoffrey wrote a letter back to Mr. Pelletier on March 21, in which he apologized on behalf of Mr. Silmsers but said that Mr. Silmsers was easily upset from time to time. Mr. Geoffrey said he had spoken to Mr. Silmsers and requested he not contact Mr. Pelletier's office directly, and that he would "renew this request with him" as soon as he could contact him. Mr. Pelletier responded that day with another letter, reiterating that communications should flow through Mr. Geoffrey "in order to maintain a certain level of civility."

Although Mr. Silmsers could not recall whether his lawyer showed him any of these letters, he did recall that his lawyer told him not to phone the Crown Attorney's Office.

On May 2, 1996, Mr. Pelletier wrote a letter to Mr. Geoffrey updating him on recent developments in the Father MacDonald case. He asked Mr. Geoffrey to communicate these developments to his clients. Although Mr. Silmsers did not recall seeing this letter, he acknowledged that Mr. Pelletier was communicating with him through his lawyer.

Mr. Silmsers contacted Mr. Pelletier's office several times on July 19, 1996. Ms Legault took the calls and prepared memos for Mr. Pelletier detailing each call. During the first call, Mr. Silmsers said the lawyers in Toronto had lost the file, which showed how much of a cover-up was going on. Mr. Pelletier testified that he did not know what Mr. Silmsers was referring to with respect to the Toronto lawyers. According to Ms Legault's memo, during the second call, Mr. Silmsers became very angry and said it was costing him money each time he communicated through his lawyer and that he would continue to call the office. Mr. Silmsers also referred to another victim who had been located by a private investigator. The final call that day was a message left by Mr. Silmsers in which he said he was extremely upset and that the Crown did not have the right to refuse his calls because he was a victim and that if he "goes through his lawyer it costs him a lot of money."

Although Mr. Silmsers did not have a specific recollection of these calls, he remembered making a phone call where the secretary hung up on him and he may have phoned two or three times trying to speak to somebody. He said he was probably calling because of the lack of progress on the case and the fact that he was not getting any information. He did not communicate through his lawyer because it cost him money: "Again, every time I phoned my lawyer, he was charging me by the minute on the phone. So if I had to go through my lawyer, I had to pay him and I know I didn't have any money at the time."

Following these calls from Mr. Silmsers on July 19, Mr. Pelletier prepared a memo to file noting his concern that if he spoke with Mr. Silmsers at that time, a conflict would develop that would require him to step down from the case. Mr. Pelletier was concerned about the delay that would be caused if a new prosecutor had to be assigned. As discussed above, this potential for a conflict with Mr. Silmsers had been Mr. Pelletier's concern since the initial conversation he had with Mr. Silmsers in early February 1996.

Mr. Pelletier contacted Detective Constable Fagan about the potential fourth complainant mentioned by Mr. Silmsers but cannot recall if he heard back from the officer about this. Mr. Pelletier testified that it never occurred to him that Mr. Silmsers may have been referring to C-8, an individual who made allegations against Father MacDonald for which charges were later laid. Mr. Pelletier did not know whom Mr. Silmsers was referring to at the time, and he never spoke with Mr. Silmsers about this issue.

If Mr. Pelletier had been speaking with Mr. Silmsers, he may have discovered who this fourth complainant was. As I discuss below, the revelation of C-8's allegations later caused some delay in the prosecution, which may have been partly avoided had his name been known to the Crown as early as July 1996. In my opinion, this is an illustration of the problems caused by the lack of communication between the Crown and a victim in this case.

Both Mr. Silmsers and Mr. Pelletier agreed their relationship was difficult. Mr. Pelletier did not have a meeting with Mr. Silmsers and his lawyer to discuss the situation, nor did he attempt to explain to Mr. Silmsers directly his concerns about the development of a conflict. Mr. Silmsers testified that nobody from the Crown's office ever explained this to him. Mr. Pelletier acknowledged that he had never taken the step of cutting off direct communication with an alleged victim before and it was "a somewhat extraordinary measure." He testified that he did not have any similar arrangement in place with the other two complainants. He said John MacDonald may have called him once and he never spoke with C-3 on the phone.

In my opinion, this once again demonstrates the lack of understanding that Crown counsel at times had for alleged victims of historical sexual abuse and their circumstances. A liaison person could have played the role of an intermediary and perhaps have assisted in resolving their differences. The introductory paragraph to the “Sexual Assault and Other Sexual Offences” practice memorandum adopted on July 21, 2006, states:

Sexual offences are unique because they involve the violation of sexual integrity and autonomy. Sensitivity to the perspective of victims, their privacy interests, and in particular, the deeply personal and potentially degrading nature of their victimization, must always be borne in mind.

Mr. Pelletier did not consider the fact that it would be costly for Mr. Silmsen to communicate through his lawyer. Mr. Silmsen testified that he was contacting Mr. Pelletier’s office in part because he was not receiving information and was frustrated. Crown Policy V-1, “Victims of Crime,” dated January 15, 1994, states:

In all cases the victim has a right to be informed of the status of the case with which he or she is involved. To this end, Crown counsel are to make themselves reasonably available to respond to inquiries or requests for interviews, from victims at any stage in the trial process. Respect and sensitivity for the victims’ gender, race, culture or disability must be shown.

Requests for information in routine cases can be routed through the investigating officer. In appropriate cases, Crown counsel should communicate with the victim or the victims’ family directly. This kind of communication is essential in most serious cases ...

Mr. Pelletier pointed out during his testimony that the Victim/Witness Assistance Program was not established in Cornwall until 2001. However, as will be discussed in a later section, the VWAP office in Ottawa did provide services to some of the complainants in the Father MacDonald prosecution starting in early 2000. In my opinion, Mr. Pelletier could have taken steps to involve the Ottawa VWAP office in assisting Mr. Silmsen and other complainants in 1996. As Mr. Silmsen said in his testimony, “If a Crown attorney doesn’t want to contact the victim ... he should have a person to relate information to that victim.”

Crown Policy SO-1, “Sexual Offences,” dated January 15, 1994, provided the following:

The complainants shall be interviewed well in advance of the trial and preliminary hearing, and as well be referred to the Victim/Witness

Assistance Program if one is available, other victim services, counselling, or other community services where appropriate. Crown counsel should explain the court process to the victim and arrange to show her the courtroom. Where appropriate and feasible the interview should be conducted in the presence of a support person. At all times the dignity and feelings of the complainant must be respected.

Despite the absence of VWAP services in the area, other alternatives could have been considered by the Crown to assist him in his dealings with Mr. Silmsr. Perhaps he could have asked one of the investigators to provide the information Mr. Silmsr was requesting or have someone else from his office assigned to communicate with Mr. Silmsr. At the very least, Mr. Pelletier should have had a meeting with Mr. Silmsr and his lawyer to discuss a way to facilitate appropriate communication between them.

Judicial Pre-Trial

The case was scheduled for a pre-trial on May 30, 1996. Mr. Pelletier testified that he did not know why the matter was scheduled for such an early pre-trial. The pre-trial was adjourned for a continuance in August 1996, in part because it was agreed that the pre-trial was premature, given that the complainants were being examined in civil discoveries in respect of the same alleged incidents.

At the pre-trial, Justice Paul Bélanger stated that the parties should examine the transcripts of the civil proceedings in order to determine how the matter should proceed. On May 31, Mr. Pelletier wrote a letter to Michael Neville, Father MacDonald's criminal lawyer, requesting copies of the transcripts from the examinations for discovery in the civil suit. At some point, he received portions of the transcripts.

Following the pre-trial in August, the matter was scheduled for a week-long preliminary inquiry in February 1997.

Preliminary Inquiry and C-8's Complaint

The preliminary inquiry commenced on February 24, 1997, and the first witness called was John MacDonald. That evening, C-8 appeared on television and discussed his allegations against Father MacDonald. Mr. Pelletier did not see the media story and became aware of C-8's allegations the following morning when defence counsel raised it with him. Mr. Pelletier was not familiar with C-8's name before February 25.

Mr. Pelletier now understands that a statement was taken from C-8 on January 23, 1997, in which he disclosed allegations against Father MacDonald. Mr.

Pelletier testified that the videotaped statement was not part of the disclosure received from the OPP. It appears that this non-disclosure was inadvertent. Detective Constable Fagan was present in court that morning. He contacted Constable Don Genier and asked him some questions about C-8's allegations. Constable Genier noted, "Fagan apologized because he thought the video he received was a video pertaining to Marcel Lalonde."

The issue of C-8's complaint was raised on the record on February 25. Defence counsel stated that he was not willing to proceed with the preliminary inquiry because of the existence of the videotaped statement of C-8, which dealt with certain allegations against his client. Therefore C-8 could be either a witness or complainant. He argued that what C-8 was alleging could influence the cross-examination of other witnesses. Mr. Pelletier objected to any form of delay or adjournment:

... I don't see how any other potential witnesses at some later date have any bearing on the case presently. There is no indication that this particular person was in any way enlisted by anybody or brought forward through any connection with any other persons who are presently involved in the present preliminary inquiry.

Mr. Neville is suggesting, if I understand correctly, that there may remotely be a connection between this individual and others who Mr. Neville feels are part of a larger scheme and, with the greatest respect, we don't have any evidence of that.

The preliminary inquiry was recessed in order to allow counsel to view the videotape in question. During this time, Mr. Pelletier met with Detective Constable Fagan and Constable Genier. The three of them then met with defence counsel.

The meeting did not resolve their differences: the Crown wished to proceed and the defence did not. There was a meeting in the judge's chambers, and defence counsel requested an adjournment until the following morning.

The preliminary inquiry was continued on February 26. The continued cross-examination of John MacDonald was adjourned and C-3 took the stand. After C-3's testimony, the defence requested a further adjournment, which Mr. Pelletier opposed. Mr. Pelletier understood that defence counsel was concerned about his obligation to determine how C-8's complaint came about and if it had any bearing on how the other complainants came forward. However, Mr. Pelletier's position was that the matters were unrelated and the preliminary inquiry should proceed. In his submissions to the Court, Mr. Pelletier noted that C-8:

... makes his statement in January of 1997 in relation to the conduct of this accused vis-à-vis himself. He does not speak of Silmser, he does not speak of MacDonald, he does not speak of [C-3]. He does not provide any, in my respectful view, information or any detail that would change counsel's approach vis-à-vis those witnesses on the merits.

In ruling against an adjournment, the judge stated:

Until there is some concrete evidence before this Court that there is some connection—albeit any connection—between these parties that would impact upon the issues before this Court, I see really no need to delay this matter further.

At this point, the defence indicated his intention to obtain an extraordinary remedy in the nature of a prohibition order. Because of this request, the preliminary inquiry was adjourned to permit counsel to obtain instructions and file his application for a prohibition order. With respect to the delay caused by this development, Mr. Pelletier testified that if the defence requested an adjournment that was denied and then brought a prerogative remedy, the delay would be borne by the defence. An application for a prerogative remedy was never filed.

On March 7, 1997, Mr. Neville wrote to Mr. Pelletier requesting to be advised of any new developments in the police investigation of the C-8 matter. Mr. Pelletier responded by letter dated March 17 that from his most recent discussions with Detective Constable Fagan it appeared as though no further investigation would be made into the circumstances surrounding C-8's complaint. Mr. Pelletier agreed that he was telling Mr. Neville that it was the circumstances surrounding the complaint coming forward, rather than the complaint itself, that would not be further investigated.

In December 1996, Constable Perry Dunlop's lawyer, Charles Bourgeois, had delivered a brief of materials (the "Fantino Brief") to London Chief of Police Julian Fantino. The content and delivery of these materials has been discussed in detail in previous chapters. That material consisted of statements from alleged victims of sexual assault, newspaper clippings, Constable Dunlop's notes, and pleadings from a civil suit he initiated against a number of individuals and institutions. Mr. Pelletier was first advised of the existence of the Fantino Brief on March 18, 1997. Arrangements were made with Detective Inspector Smith to bring him the documents. Mr. Pelletier agreed that the Father MacDonald case began to snowball into a more complex case with the disclosure of the Fantino Brief.

On March 20, Mr. Pelletier met with Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan to discuss the new allegations contained in the Fantino Brief and the statement by Ron Leroux. Detective Inspector Smith's notes of the meeting state that they discussed the direction of the investigation and agreed that the new allegations and information would have to be discussed with Mr. Griffiths. Mr. Pelletier explained that Mr. Griffiths was being advised because he was the Director of Crown Operations for the Eastern Region.

On the same day, Mr. Pelletier sent a package to Mr. Neville containing a number of disclosure items including a statement and affidavit of Mr. Leroux, a statement of Gerald Renshaw, an affidavit of Robert Renshaw, a copy of C-8's videotaped statement of January 23, 1997, and an OPP brief compiled in February 1997 following an interview of Mr. Leroux.

Robert Pelletier's Memo to Peter Griffiths of April 2, 1997

Mr. Pelletier advised Mr. Griffiths of the new allegations arising out of the Fantino Brief, and they decided there should be a meeting with the OPP to discuss them. The meeting was scheduled for April 24, 1997. Before the meeting, Mr. Pelletier prepared a memo for Mr. Griffiths, dated April 2, regarding recent developments in the R. v. Father MacDonald case.

Mr. Pelletier outlined the investigation, beginning with the 1993 investigation by the Cornwall Police Service, the settlement between Mr. Silmsier and Diocese, and the subsequent investigation by the Ottawa Police Service. He discussed the fact that Malcolm MacDonald, the lawyer representing the Diocese during the settlement negotiations with Mr. Silmsier, was investigated, charged, and prosecuted for obstructing justice and received an absolute discharge upon pleading guilty. Mr. Pelletier outlined the OPP's 1994 investigation of Father MacDonald and the decision at the time not to recommend that charges be laid.

The memo also discussed the two new complainants, John MacDonald and C-3, coming forward in 1995 and Mr. Pelletier's suggestion that seven charges be laid in relation to allegations of these two new complainants and the initial complainant, Mr. Silmsier. Although charges had been laid, the memo explained that it was not a strong case:

The decision to recommend charges was made on the slimmest possible reasonable prospect of conviction test being met. Clearly, the fact that there now existed three complainants alleging of a similar type of conduct by the priest at a specific location at a particular point in time was the major consideration in recommending charges. It was decided that at the very least, the complainants would be given an opportunity to testify at the preliminary inquiry and the reasonable prospects of conviction could be assessed thereafter.

The role of Constable Dunlop in the matter was also raised in the memo:

The complicating factor in this particular prosecution is the involvement of Perry Dunlop. Mr. Dunlop was exonerated by the Police Service Act Court and has since began [sic] a crusade aimed at exposing what he perceived to be a conspiracy in Cornwall by a certain number of named conspirators to obstruct justice, suppress evidence, and generally undermine the credibility of those such as Dunlop who have attempted to expose this conspiracy. Dunlop has instituted civil proceedings claiming several millions of dollars against a number of named defendants both individuals and bodies corporate.

Mr. Pelletier outlined some of the allegations made by Constable Dunlop against people and institutions in the community. He noted that although Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald was not named as a defendant, he “is named in various paragraphs in the context of various clandestine meetings and arrangements involving certain named defendants and others.”

Mr. Pelletier then reviewed the most recent allegations against Father MacDonald made by C-8 and Mr. Renshaw, in the Fantino Brief. He also wrote about the claims concerning a “clan of pedophiles,” whose members allegedly included Father MacDonald and Murray MacDonald.

Mr. Pelletier wrote that he was not convinced that the allegations were well founded. He also testified that early on he had some concerns about the allegations about a clan of pedophiles. In particular, he did not feel that the allegations against Murray MacDonald were well founded.

Mr. Pelletier noted in the memo that Constable Dunlop and others believed there was a conspiracy “involving illegal sexual activities and cover ups”:

Given three unfortunate coincidences, firstly the conviction of Murray MacDonald’s father, secondly Murray MacDonald’s decision initially not to pursue criminal charges in respect of David Silmser, and thirdly, Malcolm MacDonald’s conviction for obstructing justice, the Dunlop group are convinced of the existence of a conspiracy.

When asked about what he meant by “unfortunate coincidences,” Mr. Pelletier testified that he considered each of these matters to be unfortunate and that the convergence of the three could be a confirmation for those who believed there might be a conspiracy:

You've got a Crown Attorney's father who's convicted for sexual assault; you've got the same Crown Attorney who initially decided there shouldn't be charges; and you've got a former Crown Attorney who's convicted for obstructing justice in relation to arrangements made with the same complainant. So it's the convergence of those three events that led me to phrase it in that way.

Mr. Pelletier also raised the issue of a potential conflict in his continuing with the prosecution given his personal and professional relationship with Murray MacDonald. It is worth setting out this paragraph in its entirety:

Ultimately, a decision will have to be taken whether or not to recommend further charges against Charles MacDonald in relation to the new complainants Robert Renshaw and [C-8]. A decision to recommend charges would lend credence to these individuals' claims including the conspiracy theory. A decision not to recommend charges would in all likelihood be seen as the latest in the obstructive measures employed by those in authority. It is in this connection that my personal as well as professional affiliations with Murray MacDonald become a complicating factor. Your views in this regard would of course be very much appreciated.

Mr. Pelletier testified that he thought that laying charges would validate the Fantino Brief and elevate its claims to a higher standing. On the other hand, the decision not to recommend charges could lead those who felt there was a conspiracy to view that decision as the latest in "obstructionist measures." Mr. Pelletier felt that he should not review the brief or make any recommendations regarding the new allegations. He was concerned because Murray MacDonald was mentioned as a member of the group that conspired together, and Mr. Pelletier was well acquainted with him both professionally and personally. He was asking Mr. Griffiths for instructions on whether he should be involved in any of the Fantino Brief review.

In my view, it is clear that in this memo, Mr. Pelletier is expressing less confidence in the case than he did when he recommended that charges be laid in March 1996. He was also concerned about the allegations being made against his friend Murray MacDonald.

Mr. Griffiths understood at the time that Mr. Pelletier thought he should not review these new allegations, and Mr. Griffiths agreed. He testified that "he wasn't comfortable doing it ... and I respected that." According to Mr. Griffiths, there was no thought given to transferring the prosecution of Father MacDonald at that time, as all of these matters were to be discussed and considered at the meeting scheduled for April 24, 1997:

The Dunlop brief fell like a bomb in the middle of the preliminary hearing of Father MacDonald, which at that point was ... 13 months, 14 months since Mr. Pelletier's initial involvement in February of '96 and the onset of the charges. So time was ticking with respect to that preliminary hearing with those three complainants. And a decision was made to keep Mr. Pelletier in place to the conclusion of the preliminary hearing so that there would be no loss of time on that.

Mr. Griffiths' understanding was that once the preliminary hearing was completed, Mr. Pelletier would no longer be involved. Mr. Pelletier has a different recollection of that matter. He believed he would continue with the prosecution of Father MacDonald after the completion of the preliminary inquiry. Mr. Pelletier does not recall that his involvement would terminate after the preliminary inquiry.

Mr. Pelletier continued as prosecutor in the R. v. Father Charles MacDonald case until spring 1999 when the prosecution was assigned to Shelley Hallett. The circumstances leading to this transfer will be discussed in the section "R. v. Father Charles MacDonald: New Charges Laid and Trial."

The Initiation of Project Truth and Assignment of Crowns

As discussed in Chapter 7, "Institutional Response of the Ontario Provincial Police," on March 20, 1997, Detective Inspector Tim Smith, Detective Constable Michael Fagan and Crown Attorney Robert Pelletier met to discuss the Fantino Brief. It was decided that Mr. Pelletier would review the Fantino Brief and arrange a meeting with the Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region, Peter Griffiths. This meeting was scheduled for April 24, 1997.

Meeting of April 24, 1997

The meeting on April 24, 1997, was attended by Detective Sergeant Pat Hall, Detective Constables Fagan and Don Genier, Detective Inspector Smith, and Crown Attorneys Peter Griffiths, Murray MacDonald, and Robert Pelletier. Mr. Griffiths made the decision to have Mr. Pelletier and Mr. MacDonald at the meeting. The purpose of the meeting was to determine the course of action in light of the Fantino Brief. However, the brief included allegations against Murray MacDonald personally.

Mr. MacDonald testified that when he arrived, the meeting had already started and that he left before everyone else. According to Mr. Griffiths, Mr. MacDonald was invited to the meeting because these events were occurring in his jurisdiction and the instructions as to how the matter was to proceed needed to be clear to him. It was decided at the meeting that neither he nor any staff from his office would provide legal advice or prosecute cases arising from the investigation of the Fantino Brief. He was also advised that his conduct would be reviewed. In hindsight, I question the appropriateness of having Murray MacDonald attend the meeting because of the conflict of interest arising from the allegations against him.

It was also decided at the meeting that the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) would investigate all of the allegations in the Fantino Brief. Detective Inspector Smith suggested that Mr. Griffiths write to the Superintendent of the OPP. The Detective Inspector believed that Mr. Griffiths had the authority under the Crown Attorneys Act to request that the OPP conduct an investigation. Mr. Griffiths was not aware of any such statutory authority but agreed to write a letter requesting that someone be assigned to investigate the Fantino Brief.

On May 27, 1997, Mr. Griffiths wrote a letter to Superintendent Larry Edgar requesting “that Det. Insp. Smith be assigned to investigate the Dunlop/Bourgeois brief.” After writing this letter, his involvement in Project Truth was minimal. He was appointed as a judge of the Ontario Court of Justice in May 1998.

Should There Have Been a Dedicated Crown?

Mr. Griffiths testified that at or around the time of the April 24, 1997, meeting, Curt Flanagan, the Brockville Crown attorney, was asked to be the liaison person with the OPP investigation on behalf of the Crown. Mr. Griffiths explained that Mr. Pelletier was not to be the point person as he had expressed his discomfort in being involved. Somebody needed to fulfill that function, and Mr. Flanagan had some experience with the prosecution of Malcolm MacDonald for obstructing justice. The OPP’s operational plan for Project Truth provided that Mr. Flanagan would be the Crown to provide legal opinions and prosecute cases. I also reviewed evidence that Shelley Hallett recalled Mr. Flanagan recommending that there be a team of Crowns to work on Project Truth. However, Mr. Flanagan had no recollection of making that recommendation. He never assumed the liaison role, and unfortunately no one else did either.

James Stewart, Mr. Griffiths' successor as Director of Crown Operations for the Eastern Region,⁶ noted that when he became involved, the prosecutions were "up and running." He does not recall any discussion about having a dedicated team of Crowns. He thought at the time that things appeared to be under control but acknowledged that the assignment of Crowns may have been approached differently "if we knew everything that we knew right now."

As for his role, Mr. Stewart maintained some supervisory control over the files in the sense that both Alain Godin and Ms Hallett informed him about what was happening in the cases, although it "wasn't very often." Mr. Stewart explained that they had to be careful about a potential conflict because Murray MacDonald worked directly for him.

Mr. Pelletier agreed that in large prosecutions with multiple offenders and multiple victims, thought should be given to assigning a dedicated Crown to conduct the prosecutions. He explained, however, that one of the complicating factors with Project Truth was that it was a work in progress. Project Truth began with three complainants against a local parish priest and became an investigation into complaints by dozens of people against almost as many local figures.

Detective Inspector Hall agreed that having a dedicated Crown from the beginning would have been "helpful." He believed that not having a dedicated Crown led to a major delay in the OPP concluding its investigation in Cornwall.

I am of the view that a dedicated Crown should have been assigned early on in the Project Truth investigations to assist the investigators and direct the prosecutions. When Project Truth officers were first made aware of the Fantino Brief and the allegations made by Claude Marleau, there were allegations against twenty-seven individuals. As early as the summer of 1997 it became apparent that serious consideration should have been given to the need for a dedicated Crown. This issue should have been discussed at that time.

This Crown would not have been prosecuting specific cases but could have provided direction to some of the investigations, given pre-charge advice, provided timely opinions to the investigators, reviewed Crown briefs, assigned cases to be prosecuted, and monitored their progress. A dedicated Crown would have been familiar with every prosecution. This would have ensured consistency in decision making, encouraged the sharing of expertise, and opened lines of communication to discuss cases. A dedicated Crown could also have assisted in the request for and management of resources and assisted in the set-up of a disclosure tracking system. I recommend that in future special projects of this magnitude, a dedicated Crown should be assigned to assist throughout the investigation.

6. Robert Pelletier was the Acting Director after Peter Griffiths left in May 1998. James Stewart took over the position in January 1999.

Murray MacDonald's Office Handles Disclosure Prior to Crowns' Being Assigned to Prosecutions

Mr. MacDonald had been told during the April 24, 1997, meeting that his office was not to prosecute Project Truth cases or provide legal advice to Project Truth officers because of a perceived or real conflict of interest. The Cornwall Crown's office did, however, have some minor involvement in Project Truth prosecutions.

In July 1998, a number of Crown briefs were sent to the Cornwall office because there was not yet a Crown assigned. Requests for disclosure from defence counsel were also sent to the local Crown's office during the summer to be forwarded to the appropriate Crown. Mr. MacDonald testified that he forwarded these requests to Mr. Pelletier as soon as they were received. As late as October 1998, even after Crowns had been assigned to prosecutions, disclosure was being sent through the Cornwall office. As we have seen in earlier sections, the Cornwall Crown Attorney's Office was also called upon to attend routine court appearances in Project Truth cases.

Although it had been determined early on that Murray MacDonald was not to be involved in any of these investigations and prosecutions, he ended up in possession of some of the briefs to be disclosed. This is another problem created by not having a dedicated Crown assigned to these investigations. Although I find it was acceptable to use the Cornwall Crown Attorney's Office for routine matters, someone from the office should have been designated to handle these issues, and any correspondence or material should have been addressed to that individual and not Murray MacDonald.

Assignments of Project Truth Prosecutions

One of the difficulties in Project Truth prosecutions was the initial assignment of Crowns. At the outset, Mr. Pelletier took on a number of matters and reviewed them to provide an opinion on charges.

On July 24, 1998, Detective Inspector Smith wrote to Mr. Pelletier that "it has been several months since we first attempted to have outside Crown Attorneys assigned to prosecute the charges resulting from the investigation 'Project Truth.'"

By then, Ms Hallett had been assigned to the Jacques Leduc, Dr. Arthur Peachey and Malcolm MacDonald matters, but a number of cases had yet to be assigned. Mr. Pelletier, who, at the time, was Acting Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region, was looking for a bilingual Crown from outside the jurisdiction to assume responsibility for some of these cases.

In mid-August 1998, he sent a number of Crown briefs to Tom Fitzgerald, Director of Crown Operations, Northern Region, who was going to assign them to one of his Crown attorneys. In mid-September it was confirmed that Mr. Godin would take carriage of these prosecutions.

Resources Available to Crowns in Project Truth Prosecutions

Both Ms Hallett and Mr. Godin addressed the lack of resources available to Crowns in the Project Truth prosecutions and mentioned that they were accustomed to dealing with a certain lack of resources. Mr. Godin had worked in rural communities in Northern Ontario where resources were not readily available. Ms Hallett explained that in her experience conducting special prosecutions throughout the province, there are often problems with physical resources such as office space. She said the problem arises because of the desire of the local Crown's office to maintain the perception of an arm's-length prosecution because of an allegation of a conflict of interest.

In January or February 2001, Ms Hallett asked the local Crown attorney, Murray MacDonald, if she could be assigned a separate office, but there were none available. Ms Hallett also "pleaded" unsuccessfully for an office with James Stewart. Mr. Stewart testified that he did not realize Ms Hallett had concerns about office space. During the Jacques Leduc trial, Ms Hallett was provided with a sort of cloakroom in the courthouse with a few chairs and a washroom. The Crowns and the police would leave their shoes, boots, and coats there during the day. According to Ms Hallett, this was not an adequate place to have interviews with witnesses or meetings with defence counsel.

For the most part, victim and witness interviews took place at Ontario Provincial Police detachments. Both Mr. Godin and Ms Hallett used their hotel rooms as an office and would often meet with the officers in their hotel rooms.

I am of the view that it is difficult enough to conduct the prosecution of conflict cases without the additional burden of dealing with inadequate resources. If an outside Crown is required to prosecute a case, it necessarily means that the local Crown's office is in a conflict of interest or at the very least in an appearance of a conflict. These prosecutions will probably never be able to rely on the local Crown's office. The Justice Prosecutions Unit should provide sufficient staff and equipment to properly set up temporary offices to permit Crowns to prosecute these cases.

One of the recommendations from the 2008 LeSage-Code Report of the Review of Large and Complex Criminal Case Procedures provides that the "conduct of long complex criminal prosecutions must be assigned, to the greatest extent possible, to the most able and most respected prosecutors." In my view, the prosecutors assigned must not only be able in terms of their competence but also must be provided with adequate resources and be relieved of other responsibilities to allow them to be dedicated solely to the major prosecution.

Although the LeSage-Code Report provides excellent recommendations for how to manage major cases, it does not address major case management in small communities. A number of issues arise in small communities, such as the fact that prosecutors may need to travel significant distances. In addition, the threshold for defining a major case and the factors that make a case “major” may be different in a small community than in a large urban centre.

Prosecutions Related to Allegations Reported by Claude Marleau

Claude Marleau disclosed allegations of historical sexual abuse against a number of men from the Cornwall area. The details of these allegations have been set out in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), and Chapter 8, on the institutional response of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. On July 31, 1997, Mr. Marleau provided a statement to Detective Constable Don Genier.

Crown Briefs Provided to Crown for Opinion on Charges

On April 1, 1998, Crown Robert Pelletier was provided with briefs pertaining to a number of alleged abusers of Claude Marleau: Roch Joseph Landry, Father Paul Lapierre, George Sandford Lawrence, and Dr. Arthur Blair Peachey. On April 3, Mr. Pelletier was provided with a further brief of allegations against Father Kenneth John Martin. Mr. Pelletier was to review the Crown briefs and provide an opinion on criminal charges.

On May 7, 1998, Mr. Pelletier provided Detective Inspector Tim Smith with a memorandum on all of the allegations in these Crown briefs. Mr. Pelletier was of the opinion that the matters involving Dr. Peachey, Father Martin, and Mr. Lawrence should proceed to a preliminary inquiry. Mr. Pelletier suggested that following the preliminary inquiry, the merits and public interest of each case be assessed to determine if they were sufficient to prosecute the accused. Furthermore, he wrote that consent was an issue in these cases. Mr. Pelletier had “no hesitation whatsoever in recommending charges against Roch Joseph Landry” and Father Lapierre.

Mr. Pelletier’s memorandum to Detective Inspector Smith raised the issue of who would prosecute these cases:

As we have discussed, it would likely be impossible for myself to conduct all of these prosecutions particularly given my present posting at the Regional Office in Ottawa. I would be pleased to further discuss with you the possibility of resorting to the services of the special prosecutions unit of the criminal law division. Similarly, we may wish to consider the services of experienced and bilingual prosecutors within the region.

Mr. Pelletier testified it was never his intention to take on these prosecutions.

Assignment of Crowns to the Prosecutions of Claude Marleau's Allegations

Mr. Pelletier had started in his position as Acting Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region, on May 1, 1998. He was responsible for finding a Crown to conduct a number of prosecutions, including those arising from Claude Marleau's allegations: Father Lapierre, Father Martin, Mr. Lawrence, and Mr. Landry. The case of Dr. Peachey, a former Coroner, would be prosecuted by someone from the Special Investigations Unit, the office responsible for prosecutions of justice-related officials.

As of July 30, 1998, no Crown had yet been assigned to the cases. On August 11, Mr. Pelletier wrote to Tom Fitzgerald, Regional Director of Crown Operations, Northern Region, confirming that he agreed to assign one of his Crowns to these cases, which required a bilingual Crown from outside of the jurisdiction. Alain Godin was assigned to conduct these prosecutions. He was advised that it was a large project. Detective Inspector Pat Hall received confirmation that Mr. Godin was assigned to these cases on September 17, 1998.

Meanwhile, on July 2, Milan Rupic, Acting Director of Special Investigations, the office responsible for prosecutions of justice-related officials, met with Shelley Hallett and advised her that Murray Segal, the Assistant Deputy Attorney General, Criminal Law Division, had requested that she assist with the prosecutions in Cornwall.

Ms Hallett was designated as a "specialist" in child abuse and domestic violence prosecutions in 1983. As part of her work with the Crown Law Office—Criminal and the Special Investigations Unit, she had prosecuted several sexual assault cases where charges had been laid against individuals involved in the administration of justice.

She was asked to conduct the prosecution of Dr. Peachey, as well as that of Jacques Leduc, another Project Truth prosecution. She was also asked to review and provide an opinion about whether to lay charges against Malcolm MacDonald. Ms Hallett was asked to take on these three prosecutions because the accused were involved with the administration of justice.

Ms Hallett received the Crown briefs for these investigations from the OPP on July 7, 1998. The Jacques Leduc and Malcolm MacDonald cases are discussed in later sections of this chapter.

At the time of Mr. Godin and Ms Hallett's assignment, all alleged perpetrators related to the Marleau allegations had been charged. The two Crowns did not recall being provided with Mr. Pelletier's opinion on the charges in these cases. Ms Hallett noted that she would have appreciated receiving more background information when she got involved in Project Truth. I have previously given my views on the value of having Crown opinions to investigators reduced to writing and delivered in a timely fashion and the basis for the opinion documented. These opinion letters should follow the prosecution file regardless of which Crown counsel eventually prosecutes the matter. Crown counsel should have a tracking system so their opinion letters can be retrieved if and when charges are eventually laid.

Interactions and Relationship Between the Crowns and Claude Marleau

Mr. Marleau first met with Ms Hallett and Mr. Godin at the OPP Long Sault Detachment on October 19, 1998. During this meeting, Mr. Marleau was advised that Ms Hallett was assigned to the Dr. Peachey prosecution and that Mr. Godin would be prosecuting the remaining cases.

In preparation for the upcoming preliminary inquiries, Mr. Marleau met again with the Crowns, Mr. Godin and Ms Hallett, and Detective Constable Steve Seguin on March 4, 1999. During this meeting, the workings of the criminal justice system were explained to Mr. Marleau. Another meeting took place on March 5 between Mr. Marleau, Detective Constable Seguin, and Mr. Godin during which they discussed the fact that fourteen was the age of consent at the time of the alleged offences. Charges of indecent assault had been laid against a number of individuals, and some of them were also charged with gross indecency. As discussed in the section “R. v. Father Charles MacDonald: Charges Laid and Preliminary Inquiry,” one of the distinctions between the two charges is that consent can be a defence to the charge of indecent assault but not to gross indecency.

As discussed in Chapter 7, there were some language issues with the investigation of Mr. Marleau’s allegations and the subsequent prosecution of his alleged abusers. Mr. Marleau was bilingual but had a preference for and a greater facility in the French language. His first language is French, and he had worked in French for more than twenty-five years.

When Mr. Godin met with Mr. Marleau, they spoke French. However, when Ms Hallett was present they spoke in English, because according to Mr. Godin, Ms Hallett did not understand French. Yet Ms Hallett was designated as a bilingual prosecutor in 1980 and had prosecuted a number of cases in French. Ms Hallett eventually stopped prosecuting cases in French, as she did not feel comfortable holding herself out as a bilingual prosecutor in complex cases.

Ms Hallett did not recall having a discussion with Mr. Marleau about his linguistic preferences. Mr. Godin, on the other hand, recalled advising Mr. Marleau of his right to testify in French.

As I have indicated in Chapter 3, “The Impact of Child Abuse,” victims of historical sexual abuse are fragile and emotional, and require a great deal of courage to tell their story to an investigator or a prosecutor. They should be accommodated in the language of their choice throughout the entire process.

Relationships Between Crowns and Police and Between Crowns

Because Mr. Marleau was involved in a number of prosecutions, he had the opportunity to witness the interactions between the Crowns and police officers. He testified that the relationship between the Project Truth officers and Ms Hallett seemed strained. Mr. Marleau also said he observed disagreements between the police officers and the Crown about the direction to take concerning Constable Perry Dunlop. Mr. Marleau recalled that Ms Hallett and Mr. Godin had different approaches to their cases. The Crowns discussed the use of expert testimony in his presence and seemed to have opposing views on the matter. Both Ms Hallett and Mr. Godin acknowledged that they had a difference of opinion concerning the use of expert testimony. Despite these differences, Ms Hallett described her relationship with Mr. Godin as a good working relationship. According to Ms Hallett, they had animated discussions in Mr. Marleau's presence because he was a lawyer himself. Mr. Godin also agreed that there were some vigorous discussions about expert testimony in the presence of Mr. Marleau and that perhaps they could have resolved their differences outside of his presence.

Crown counsel at times forgot that Mr. Marleau was a complainant of historical sexual abuse. He should have been treated as a victim rather than a colleague.

Crown Preparation and Views on Expert Testimony

Ms Hallett's standard practice was to request assistance from students working at the Crown Law Office to prepare research memoranda in preparation for prosecutions. In the case of Dr. Peachey, Ms Hallett received assistance from Ellie Venhola in the preparation of legal memoranda.

Ms Hallett considered calling expert testimony and requested a memorandum on the admissibility of expert testimony. The 1998 R. v. D.D. decision from the Ontario Court of Appeal held that expert testimony on delayed disclosure and timing of disclosure was inadmissible. But at the time, there was conflicting case law on the admissibility of such evidence. Ms Hallett retained the services of an expert, Dr. Louise Sas, for testimony in R. v. Peachey. She intended to present expert testimony on delayed disclosure, incremental disclosure, youth at risk of sexual exploitation, and medical standards of practice. Years later, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal regarding the inadmissibility of such evidence.

Ms Hallett had several other memoranda prepared for her on topics such as the issue of consent and the factors that might vitiate consent, retrospective offences, invalid law, and delayed disclosure. Ms Hallett testified that many of the arguments made in these memos were incorporated in her pre-trial conference report, which she shared with Mr. Godin. For example, she indicated in the pre-trial conference report that she intended to call expert evidence in the R. v. Peachey case. Mr. Godin submitted a pre-trial conference report in the R. v. George Sandford Lawrence matter, dated September 7, 1999, which stated that he would possibly call an expert on the behaviour and reactions of young persons subjected to lengthy periods of sexual abuse. Mr. Godin testified that he included the reference to expert testimony to keep the door open. He explained that initially he considered calling an expert but was satisfied that the evidence could establish that consent was vitiated. As discussed below, he was precluded from calling this evidence at trial.

Disclosure Requests by Defence

On November 20, 1998, Don Johnson, the former Crown attorney who was the defence counsel for a number of Mr. Marleau's alleged abusers, requested the disclosure of Constable Perry Dunlop's involvement in these matters. As discussed in Chapter 7, the contacts between Mr. Marleau and Constable Dunlop were very limited. At the time, Mr. Godin reviewed four binders of material from Constable Dunlop that were in the possession of Project Truth and determined there was no relevant material in them and they should not be disclosed.

On April 21, 1999, shortly before the commencement of the preliminary inquiries, Mr. Johnson requested further disclosure following comments made by MPP Garry Guzzo in the media. Among other things, Mr. Johnson requested the affidavits and documents that Constable Dunlop had delivered to the Ministry of the Attorney General and the Ministry of the Solicitor General (referred to in this Report as the "Government Brief"), and to London Chief of Police Julian Fantino (the "Fantino Brief"), as well as any notes or statements taken by Constable Dunlop, his wife, or his brother-in-law, Carson Chisholm. Mr. Godin had a telephone conversation with Mr. Johnson and they agreed on which documents should be disclosed.

Mr. Godin took the position that the materials in the Government Brief were irrelevant and he would not disclose them. He advised Mr. Johnson that if he wanted these documents disclosed, he should bring an application to compel disclosure. Mr. Godin further advised that all relevant materials that Project Truth had obtained from the Dunlops or Carson Chisholm had been previously disclosed.

On May 6, 1999, defence counsel brought an application before Justice Gilles Renaud for the adjournment of the preliminary inquiry to permit the defence to bring a disclosure application. In his ruling, Justice Renaud stated that he was not prepared to grant the adjournment, pending an application for disclosure before the Superior Court. At the Crowns' suggestion, Justice Renaud agreed to review the documents in question and provide guidance on disclosure. On May 7, he ruled, “With respect to all of this material, there is absolutely nothing that in any way appears to remotely assist the defence from any perspective.”

Justice Renaud and the Crown were being innovative by having the preliminary inquiry judge make such a decision, despite his not having the jurisdiction to bind the parties. The 2008 Lesage-Code Report of the Review of Large and Complex Criminal Case Procedures addressed the difficulties associated with “the trial judge” being the only one with jurisdiction to deal with these types of applications and binding the parties. In particular, Justice Patrick LeSage and Professor Michael Code made three recommendations (numbers 9, 10, and 11) that would permit a judge to make these types of rulings at an early stage of the proceedings. I endorse these recommendations and invite the Ministry of the Attorney General to consider the proposed amendments.

The Perry Dunlop issue resurfaced around June 2001 when the OPP obtained several banker’s boxes of materials from Mr. Dunlop. Mr. Godin determined that there was nothing in the banker’s boxes relevant to the matters he was prosecuting and invited defence counsel to review them.

Mr. Dunlop was called as a witness in the R. v. Father Paul Lapierre trial. Defence counsel agreed that he would testify in these proceedings and that the transcript of his testimony would be filed in the other proceedings related to Mr. Marleau.

Preliminary Inquiries

On May 17 and 18, 1999, Justice Renaud presided at the R. v. Roch Joseph Landry preliminary inquiry in Cornwall and committed the accused to stand trial.

From May 19 to 27, 1999, Justice Renaud heard the preliminary inquiries for R. v. Father Paul Lapierre, R. v. Father Kenneth John Martin, R. v. George Sandford Lawrence, and R. v. Dr. Arthur Blair Peachey. On May 27, Justice Renaud committed all four accused to stand trial.

In the course of these preliminary inquiries, on May 20, Mr. Godin advised the judge of the theory he wanted to put forward:

There will be a theory put forward by the Crown that there was a type of grooming going on with Monsieur Marleau. A grooming from a young age and that as a result of being groomed and he was introduced to another party. He was then subject to further abuse and the grooming started when Mr. Landry was committing the acts and then afterwards this continued on from party to party and that there was a thread between all the parties which was common.

The grooming of victims was explained to this Inquiry by Dr. David Wolfe and is discussed in Chapter 2, “Expert Evidence on Child Abuse.” Mr. Godin explained the applicability of the grooming theory by noting:

... the grooming goes as to what is in Monsieur Marleau's mind, at the time, and it goes to the issue of consent, whether he could consent or not consent, because the ages overlap to the point where we have to look at certain ages when certain things occurred. And to do that, then we have to go into the other ones and ask him to comment on when he was introduced. So it's not so much a conspiracy but what Monsieur Marleau thought and felt when he was being introduced to other parties.

Justice Renaud accepted Mr. Godin's argument and ruled in favour of holding a joint preliminary inquiry for Father Lapierre, Father Martin, Mr. Lawrence, and Dr. Peachey. Justice Renaud thus agreed to have Mr. Marleau testify about the abuse he suffered from many of his alleged abusers, rather than testifying about his experiences with each accused singly. This permitted the Crown to advance the "grooming theory" to answer an argument that Mr. Marleau may have consented to some of the acts.

Although this certainly assisted Mr. Godin in obtaining a committal to trial, it may have given him a false sense of security as to the strength of his case at the upcoming trials, which would be held separately. Mr. Marleau testified that he was able to speak of all allegations of abuse during the preliminary inquiries but he was never again able to testify about the entire sequence of events surrounding his abuse by multiple perpetrators.

Media Coverage

Mr. Godin's statement during the preliminary inquiry proceedings that there was a connection between the various accused was reported on May 21, 1999, in a broadcast by Maureen Brosnahan of CBC Radio 1. In the same report, Klancy Grasman, Deputy Director of the OPP's Criminal Investigation Branch, was quoted saying that "there is no evidence at all that there was any type of organized ring or common thread through any of this."

Detective Inspector Hall was concerned by the conflicting messages being sent out by the OPP and the Crown in relation to whether or not there was a ring. He discussed the matter with Mr. Pelletier and Ms Hallett. He also spoke to Mr. Godin about the report. Detective Inspector Hall believed the report breached the publication ban order issued in these cases.

On July 12, 2000, he wrote to Marlene Gillis, Assistant Coordinator at the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Service in the Ministry of the Solicitor General. He enclosed a transcript of the Brosnahan report and said that he had discussed the matter with three Crown attorneys, "who all agreed that Brosnahan had violated the order." Ms Hallett testified that she never saw this letter and that she did not believe there was a breach of the publication ban or that further action was required.

In my view, in a major or high-profile case there should be a media representative speaking on behalf of both the police and the Crown Attorney's Office to ensure that the message disseminated to the public is clear, accurate and represents the position of both institutions. The Ministry of the Attorney General should perhaps have a practice memorandum dealing with media issues.

Trials

R. v. Dr. Arthur Blair Peachey

Dr. Peachey died in December 1999, before the start of his trial. The charges against him were withdrawn on December 8, 1999.

R. v. Roch Joseph Landry

Shortly before Mr. Landry's trial, Mr. Godin learned that Mr. Landry was very ill. Defence counsel made a request for an adjournment before the trial judge on September 29, 2000, indicating at the outset that a waiver of section 11(b) of the Charter would apply. This waiver was an acknowledgment by Mr. Landry that he agreed with the delay and would not later argue that his right to be tried within a reasonable time had been breached as a consequence of this specific adjournment.

Terrance Cooper attended for the Crown and said that the Crown was prepared to proceed on the date set for trial and was neither joining in the defence application for an adjournment nor opposing it. Justice Gordon Sedgwick granted the adjournment. Mr. Landry died on October 24, and the charges against him were withdrawn on December 20, 2000.

R. v. Father Paul Lapierre

The trial of Father Lapierre was held from September 4 to September 7, 2001. Mr. Godin chose to start with the trial of Father Lapierre in order to have the accusations heard chronologically. He was of the opinion that this case had the most evidence.

One of the central issues in the case was the age of Mr. Marleau at the time of the alleged abuse. If Mr. Marleau was more than fourteen years old at the time of an incident, evidence had to be led that he had not consented to the act. Mr. Godin intended to put forward a theory of grooming to establish that Mr. Marleau had not consented. However, unlike the preliminary inquiries, which were heard jointly by one judge, each accused was tried separately before a different judge.

Mr. Godin was faced with objections from defence counsel when he attempted to question Mr. Marleau on his allegations against the other accused. Justice Paul Lalonde ruled that Mr. Marleau could be asked questions to establish the grooming theory and reserved his decision on whether the theory was established. On the following day, defence counsel raised further objections to the Crown leading evidence with respect to allegations related to Father Martin, because Mr. Johnson was also acting as defence counsel for Father Martin. After a recess the judge returned and ruled:

I will sustain the objection of Mr. Johnson. ... First of all, it's supposed to be admissible as part of a narrative ...

In my case, I think I'm beginning to understand what's go on [sic] with the evidence that I've had so far and I don't need the evidence concerning Ken Martin, especially if it means that counsel Johnson will be placed in a conflict of interest in that he might have—I'm not saying that he would—that he might have to call his clients in rebuttal and cause a mistrial. I don't want any mistrial in this matter and I'm not going to take this chance.

As such, Mr. Godin was unable to present evidence pertaining to Father Martin, Mr. Lawrence, and Dr. Peachey.

Another issue raised at the Father Lapierre trial was penitent-confessor privilege. During Mr. Godin's cross-examination of Father Lapierre, he said that he had received confidential information during the confession of other priests. He was prepared to disclose the content of the confession if he could do so. Mr. Godin accepted the privilege and said he did not wish to further explore the issue, although this is not a form of privilege recognized by courts in Ontario. Mr. Godin explained that from a tactical standpoint, instead of making submissions and prolonging the matter, he believed he had sufficiently explored Father Lapierre's credibility on the issue. This was an unfortunate lost opportunity to obtain information of allegations against other priests.

On September 13, 2001, Justice Lalonde acquitted Father Lapierre because the Crown had not proven its case beyond a reasonable doubt. He did, however, state that he believed Mr. Marleau and that consent was not an issue. He found that Father Lapierre represented an authority figure and that there was a power imbalance in the relationship between a priest and a young boy.

At the end of his decision the Judge raised one last issue, which I believe was in obiter. Justice Lalonde noted:

My assessment of the evidence leaves me with a conflict, and as unsatisfactory as it may be, that is not unusual, especially in historic sexual cases involving only two persons who would be able to identify the truth, Claude Marleau and Paul Lapierre. Maybe, just maybe one day the Criminal Code will be able to impose a limitation period for sexual offences. It would mean an earlier denunciation by the victims, an earlier closure of sad episodes in their lives, and evidence that can be more easily investigated.

If Justice Lalonde was suggesting that a limitation period be imposed in cases of historical sexual abuse, I respectfully disagree.

Mr. Godin testified that he did not believe that an expert on the issue of recent complaint would have helped the matter, because Mr. Marleau could sufficiently explain his reasons for the delayed complaint. I am of the view that it is entirely within Crown counsel's discretion to call the evidence as he or she sees fit. However, in hindsight, expert evidence on the characteristics of victims of historical sexual abuse may have proved useful in this prosecution.

R. v. Father Kenneth John Martin

Mr. Marleau and C-109 had both reported allegations of abuse by Father Martin. The Crown joined both informations in a single indictment, and the matter proceeded to trial on September 17 to 19, 2001. Mr. Godin led evidence pertaining to the allegations against the other alleged perpetrators of Mr. Marleau.

Mr. Godin prepared written submissions on the issue of consent, which were presented to the trial judge. Mr. Godin focused on the abuse of trust in the relationship between Father Martin and Mr. Marleau. Mr. Godin agrees that the issue of consent was not sufficiently explored or canvassed with Mr. Marleau.

On November 9, 2001, Justice Robert Cusson acquitted Father Martin. Justice Cusson stated that the accused:

was in a position of trust vis-à-vis the complainant. That does not place him in a position of authority and, of itself, does not show the accused as having exercised such authority to influence Mr. Marleau into submitting or consenting to the sexual activity against his will.

Justice Cusson noted in his judgment that the acts between Mr. Marleau and Father Martin were "consensual acts held in private, between two individuals who were of consenting age." At the time Father Martin would have been around thirty-five or thirty-six years old and Mr. Marleau would have been around fifteen. Recent amendments to the Criminal Code have since raised the age of consent to sixteen. Justice Cusson further noted that with respect to the allegations of C-109, it was feasible that the alleged victim may have misinterpreted the gestures of the accused and although he accepted the evidence in question he had not been convinced of the guilt of Father Martin to the charge of indecent assault, beyond a reasonable doubt.

R. v. George Sandford Lawrence

On September 29, 2000, defence counsel brought an application to adjourn the trial date for medical reasons. The issue of delay was raised, and the accused waived his right to a trial within a reasonable time as guaranteed by section 11 (b) of the Charter. The trial of Mr. Lawrence was held from October 1 to 3, 2001. Mr. Godin led evidence that Mr. Marleau had been sexually abused by Mr. Landry, who introduced Mr. Marleau to Father Lapierre and Mr. Lawrence, both of whom sexually abused him as well. On October 2, after the Crown closed his case, defence counsel brought a motion for dismissal of the case for lack of evidence. The charge of indecent assault was dismissed by Justice Michel Charbonneau in a directed verdict, because the Crown had failed to prove that Mr. Marleau had not consented to the sexual activity. Mr. Godin testified that it did not help his case that he was not able to present the full portrait of Mr. Marleau's allegations. Despite this, Mr. Godin does not believe the testimony of an expert in the matter would have assisted. The trial continued on the remaining charge of gross indecency. On October 5, Mr. Lawrence was acquitted of this charge because the Crown had failed to prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt.

Connections Between Claude Marleau's Alleged Abusers

A significant issue raised by Mr. Marleau's allegations was the link between the alleged perpetrators. Mr. Marleau testified that he was introduced by one alleged perpetrator to another. He characterized his experience in being passed between alleged abusers as, "J'étais une espèce de jouet qu'on passait d'un à l'autre."

According to Mr. Godin, there was a common thread among the alleged perpetrators. Mr. Godin considered charges of conspiracy before the preliminary inquiry, but he felt the evidence was insufficient to support a charge of conspiracy under the Criminal Code. The fact that people know each other or introduce people to each other is insufficient to support a criminal charge of conspiracy. It is difficult to establish that there was a "common goal" among the parties.

Mr. Godin did attempt to use the links between the alleged perpetrators to establish that consent was not an issue. However, because the trials were heard separately and before different judges, it was difficult for Mr. Godin to present the links between the alleged abusers of Mr. Marleau.

Appeal Process and Appeal Considerations in Some Prosecutions

Mr. Godin requested that the Crown Law Office consider appealing the decision in R. v. Lapierre on September 14, 2001. The Crown Law Office approved the appeal, and a notice of Crown Appeal was filed and a factum prepared.

On November 13, 2001, Mr. Godin requested an appeal of the decision in R. v. Martin. The Crown Law Office did not agree with the grounds of appeal he proposed, and the appeal did not proceed.

On October 9, 2001, Mr. Godin filed a further checklist for Crown Attorney Requesting Crown Appeal in the matter of R. v. Lawrence, but no appeal was filed.

The appeal in R. v. Lapierre was abandoned in March 2003 because “there was no question of law which could properly ground a crown appeal request against the acquittal.” Mr. Godin contacted Mr. Marleau and advised him the matter was not proceeding.

Mr. Godin testified that he did not receive the memoranda written by the lawyers who reviewed the appeal requests, outlining their opinions on the potential for an appeal. He usually received a telephone call advising him whether the case would be appealed. I am not aware of the current protocol for advising Crowns of the status of a requested appeal; however, I am of the view that Crowns should be advised so that victims can in turn be informed.

Related Quebec Criminal Proceedings of R. v. Father Paul Lapierre

As discussed in Chapter 7, some of Mr. Marleau’s allegations were reported to police authorities in Quebec because the incidents were alleged to have occurred in the Montreal area. As a result, criminal prosecutions against two priests of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, Father Lapierre and Father René Dubé, were held in Montreal. Father Lapierre was convicted and Father Dubé was acquitted.

It is important to look at a few distinctions between the two trials of Father Lapierre, in order to dispel the theory advanced by some that the difference in the results of these cases illustrates that one cannot get justice in Ontario.

On June 8, 2004, Justice Gilles Garneau of the Cour du Québec rendered his judgment in the Father Lapierre matter:

Le Tribunal a écouté très attentivement le plaignant témoigner et les différents repères qu’il a donnés pour se souvenir de l’époque des événements. Également, de tout le sérieux qu’il a mis dans la recherche de ces repères.

Aussi le Tribunal a pris en considération les contradictions faites dans ses déclarations: identité de l’accusé Dubé, oubli de la septième année, entre autres, mais il les a admises de plein gré et corrigées à la première occasion. Le Tribunal tient compte aussi des fausses informations qu'il a données à une certaine époque.

Le Tribunal, en tenant compte de l'ensemble de la preuve, accepte le témoignage du plaignant comme étant fiable et crédible.

That is, the Court found the evidence of Mr. Marleau to be reliable and credible and convicted Father Lapierre on the charge of gross indecency. On October 1, 2004, he was sentenced to twelve months imprisonment followed by three years probation.

Father Lapierre did not testify in the Quebec proceedings, and according to Mr. Godin this made a difference. Because he did not testify, he could not benefit from the first two parts of the test on acquittals as set out in R. v. S. (W.D.). The Supreme Court recommended the following jury instructions on the issue of credibility as it relates to the principle of reasonable doubt:⁷

First, if you believe the evidence of the accused, obviously you must acquit.

Second, if you do not believe the testimony of the accused but you are left in a reasonable doubt by it, you must acquit.

Third, even if you are not left in doubt by the evidence of the accused, you must ask yourself whether, on the basis of the evidence which you do accept, you are convinced beyond a reasonable doubt by that evidence of the guilt of the accused.

By not taking the stand to testify in his trial, Father Lapierre did not benefit from the first two parts of the test enunciated by the Supreme Court because there was no evidence to assess.

In the Father Lapierre proceedings in Quebec, the trial judge accepted the notion that a perpetrator introducing a victim to another perpetrator demonstrated that there appeared to be a ring. Mr. Godin testified that he used the notion of the victim being passed between the accused in support of his theory on grooming.

On September 11, 2006, Justice Lise Côté, Justice François Doyon, and Justice Jacques Dufresne of the Cour d'appel du Québec upheld the finding of guilt and the sentence imposed by Justice Garneau.

7. R. v. S. (W.D.), [1994] 3 S.C.R. 521.

When asked about the distinction between the treatment of his cases in Ontario and in Quebec, Mr. Marleau testified:

En 1983, j'ai fait le serment de toujours honorer la justice et je dois vous dire qu'avant d'accepter de venir ici, j'ai eu énormément de problèmes avec cette question-là.

C'est des jugements qui ont été rendus pas mal à la même époque dans un système ou ... j'avais ... la confiance que l'administration de la justice était la même partout. J'ai plus cette conviction-là.

Je ne sais pas quoi vous dire de plus, mais ça a tout au moins ébranlé ma foi dans le système.

That is, Mr. Marleau, a lawyer, participated as a complainant in a number of criminal proceedings in Ontario and one in the province of Quebec. The outcomes of the Ontario matters have shaken his faith in the administration of justice.

Claude Marleau's Views of the Justice System

Claude Marleau was disappointed by his involvement with the criminal justice system. His reported allegations were mostly believed but did not proceed to trial or result in convictions for a number of reasons. In some cases, details of the time and specifics of the offence were not clear, no doubt because of the passage of time, and left the judge with a reasonable doubt. In other cases, issues arose about the age of the complainants and their consent. The Crown at times was not permitted or failed to present his argument on grooming in a manner that would convince the Court that Mr. Marleau had not voluntarily consented to the acts.

Mr. Marleau came to Cornwall with the intent of preventing the continuation of the abuse he had been a victim of in his youth. I hope he is comforted by the fact that some of the issues, problems, and difficulties with the investigations and prosecutions of his case have been examined, which will improve the institutional response to allegations of historical sexual abuse.

R. v. Harvey Joseph Latour

Investigation and Crown Opinion on Charges Regarding Allegations of C-96

C-96 attended the Project Truth office with Claude Marleau on July 31, 1997, and provided a videotaped statement. C-96 alleged that he had been a victim of historical sexual abuse by Roch Landry and Harvey Joseph Latour. With respect to Mr. Latour, C-96 said that he worked in his restaurant when he was in junior high school, and that the abuse occurred in the basement of the restaurant while he was working.

As mentioned in the previous section, Robert Pelletier was provided with a number of Crown briefs on April 1, 1998, one of which related to these allegations against Mr. Latour.

On May 7, Mr. Pelletier provided Detective Inspector Tim Smith with a memorandum setting out his opinion on charges against several alleged perpetrators, including Mr. Latour.

Mr. Pelletier stated that the offence dates placed Mr. Latour's alleged offences "both inside and outside the legal ages of consent" for C-96 and further noted:

... there are sufficient details provided of conduct amounting to charges contemplated clearly at a time when the victim was not of legal consenting age. In the circumstances, I would recommend this matter proceeds as presently contemplated.

Mr. Latour was charged on July 9, 1998, with one count of indecent assault against C-96.

Involvement of Murray MacDonald in Disclosure

Don Johnson represented Mr. Latour. On July 20, 1998, Mr. Johnson requested disclosure from the local Crown attorney, Murray MacDonald. At the time, no outside Crown had been assigned to the matter. Mr. MacDonald forwarded the letter to Mr. Pelletier and asked that he "please send this [letter] on to the Crown ultimately assigned to this file."

On August 4 and August 26, 1998, Mr. Johnson wrote to Mr. MacDonald advising he had not yet received disclosure in this matter. Mr. MacDonald testified that as soon as he received these letters, he passed them on to Mr. Pelletier's office. Because of the restrictions on Mr. MacDonald's office, the Crowns in that office could not respond directly to these requests. As I have found before, there should have been a person in the Cornwall Crown Attorney's Office, other than Mr. MacDonald, assigned to deal with these types of issues. This once again is an example of some of the difficulties that arose as a result of not having a dedicated Crown counsel assigned to the Project Truth prosecutions, which caused delays that might have had a critical impact on the prosecution of this case.

As discussed in the previous section, Alain Godin was assigned to a number of Project Truth prosecutions in September 1998, including the prosecution of Mr. Latour.

Preliminary Inquiry

On May 19, 1999, Justice Gilles Renaud heard the preliminary inquiry in R. v. Harvey Joseph Latour and determined there was sufficient evidence to commit Mr. Latour to stand trial. Mr. Godin prepared an indictment with one count of indecent assault on a male, dated July 29, 1999.

The R. v. Latour matter proceeded to trial on June 26, 2000, before Justice Richard Byers. In rendering his decision on June 27, Justice Byers noted:

So, did Mr. Latour molest [C-96] 35 years ago in that basement?
Well, I think he did. I am pretty sure he did.

I am troubled by two things: [C-96]’s use of the word “flashback” and the matter of the tattoo ... That word [flashback] used in historical sexual cases raises a bit of a red flag. No effort was made to explain what [C-96] meant when he used that word. By itself, I might be inclined to ignore it. But, [C-96] thought his perpetrator had a tattoo, an anchor, on his arm. Mr. Latour has no tattoo. Plainly, [C-96] is wrong on this point or he is right, and has identified the wrong man.

I do not hold [C-96] to the standard of perfection. He was a young man at the time and it happened many years ago. But, in the context of this case, I think that the tattoo is not an insignificant detail that can be explained away by the young age of the complainant or the simple passage of time.

As I said, this case is 35 years old. It requires me to assess the credibility and historical memory of a young man, on the one side, and a reformed alcoholic, on the other. In law, credibility means truthfulness and it means reliability. I am satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that [C-96] was a honest and truthful witness, but I must also be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that his evidence is reliable and is dependable, that he got it right, not just parts of it right, but all of the important parts, including the part about identity.

This is not a civil case. Probably guilty, is not good enough. It is a criminal case. Proof beyond a reasonable doubt is the required standard. In my view, the tattoo raises that doubt. [C-96] just might have got identity wrong. I don’t think he did, but he might have. The law under these circumstances, therefore requires that I find this accused not guilty.

Justice Byers found Mr. Latour not guilty because the Crown had not proved all the elements of the offence beyond a reasonable doubt, mainly the issue of identification.

Difficulties Prosecuting Historical Abuse Cases

This case illustrates some of the difficulties that prosecutors have to overcome when dealing with historical cases of sexual abuse. Justice Byers said that C-96 was probably abused by Mr. Latour, but that the test for a conviction, beyond a reasonable doubt, was not met.

R. v. Marcel Lalonde

Cornwall Police Service Investigation

As discussed in Chapter 6, dealing with the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service, Marcel Lalonde was an elementary school teacher with the Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry County Roman Catholic Separate School Board from 1969 until he was relieved from his teaching duties on January 9, 1997. He was first investigated for sexual abuse in the late 1980s by the Cornwall Police Service (CPS). On January 9, 1989, Constable Kevin Malloy of the CPS spoke with C-60, who alleged he had been sexually abused by Mr. Lalonde but refused to involve himself in the process. On January 10, Constable Malloy interviewed C-57, who alleged that when he was sixteen years old Mr. Lalonde frequently provided him with alcohol and sexually abused him on a couple of occasions. C-57 also said that Mr. Lalonde wanted to take nude pictures of him and showed him a photo album with photos of nude males.

Crown Don Johnson Provides an Opinion

Constable Malloy sought legal advice and direction from Crown Attorney Don Johnson. Constable Malloy testified that he did not at the time have reasonable and probable grounds to charge Mr. Lalonde but he wanted confirmation from the Crown.

Mr. Johnson had no recollection of discussing the Marcel Lalonde investigation with Constable Malloy in 1989.

According to Constable Malloy, he attended the Crown Attorney's Office but did not take notes of the conversation. He said taking notes was not permitted due to solicitor-client privilege, and officers had to remember the advice provided by the Crown. Constable Malloy testified that today notes are taken during meetings and then are reviewed for disclosure purposes, but that in 1989 officers did not take notes of meetings with the Crown.

Mr. Johnson did not recall ever telling police officers that they were not permitted to take notes during a meeting. I am not aware of any policy from the Ministry of the Attorney General that would prevent a police officer from taking notes during a meeting with Crown counsel. All of the policies dealing with the relationship between police and Crown counsel specifically remind Crowns that their advice is likely to be recorded in the police officer's notebook. The first policy on the relationship between the Crown and police was adopted on August 5, 1997. I am of the view that it is unlikely a policy against note taking existed even before the written policies were put in place.

Constable Malloy testified that he had a second meeting with Mr. Johnson after the investigation was more complete to discuss the issue of consent and the possibility of seeking a search warrant. According to Constable Malloy, the Crown said he did not have the grounds to obtain a warrant and that consent would be an issue. Mr. Johnson did not recall this meeting with Constable Malloy either.

According to Constable Malloy, Mr. Johnson did not recommend that he interview Mr. Lalonde and did not suggest that he contact the Children's Aid Society or the school board to report the allegations.

Constable Malloy testified that when he attended Mr. Johnson's office he had all the victim statements and asked Mr. Johnson to review them. Based on his conversation with the Crown attorney, Constable Malloy decided not to proceed with charges.

This is another example of the Ministry of the Attorney General's failure to ensure that notes and records were properly kept and stored, that opinions provided to police were properly recorded, and that files were opened with respect to allegations of sexual abuse.

As discussed in Chapter 6, on June 22, 1989, Constable Malloy placed the file in abeyance in the hopes that more information would come forward in the future that would allow the investigation to proceed. My concerns about Constable Malloy's actions in this case were discussed in that chapter.

David Silmsner's Allegations of Abuse by Marcel Lalonde and Subsequent Investigation

As discussed in previous chapters, in August 1994 the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), the CPS, and the Children's Aid Society were aware of David Silmsner's allegations of abuse by his former teacher at Bishop Macdonell School, Mr. Lalonde. However, the Ministry of the Attorney General had no involvement in or around this time since CPS Staff Sergeant Luc Brunet had determined that "without cooperation of the victim, no further action can be taken."

In late 1996 and early 1997, a number of other complainants came forward alleging they were abused by Mr. Lalonde. These complaints and subsequent investigations are covered in detail in Chapter 6 and in Chapter 7, dealing with the institutional response of the OPP.

Mr. Lalonde was arrested by the OPP and charged with one count of indecent assault on a male on January 7, 1997, with respect to the allegation of C-68. He was arrested again on April 29 by officers of the CPS and charged with eight counts of indecent assault on a male, seven counts of gross indecency, and one count of sexual assault with regard to the allegations of C-45, C-8, C-58, Kevin Upper, C-66, and another person. A search warrant was obtained and executed on the day of Mr. Lalonde's arrest.

Assignment of the Prosecution

OPP Detective Constable Don Genier's notes indicate that on April 1, 1997, he met with Assistant Crown Attorney Guy Simard, who explained there was a conflict of interest with the Cornwall Crown Attorney's Office and that the case would be reassigned. The prosecution of Mr. Lalonde was referred to the Brockville Crown Attorney's Office in May 1997. Brockville Crown Attorney Curt Flanagan assigned Assistant Crown Attorney Claudette Wilhelm to the case.

The preliminary inquiry in the R. v. Lalonde matter was held on January 13 to 15, 1998, before Justice Fontana. Mr. Lalonde was committed to stand trial on all seventeen counts.

Constable Perry Dunlop's Involvement in the Prosecution

On January 15, 1998, Constable Perry Dunlop testified for the defence in the preliminary inquiry. It became evident that he had not disclosed all documents in his possession, including those pertaining to C-8.

On April 29, 1998, Detective Constable Genier spoke with Ms Wilhelm, who requested that "all notes from Cst. Dunlop ... be disclosed pertaining to Lalonde investigation."

The trial of Mr. Lalonde was originally scheduled for February 1999. It was adjourned to October 4, 1999. In October, the matter was further adjourned to September 11, 2000, due to disclosure issues.

On October 1, 1999, Detective Constable Genier met with the Crown and was provided with notes from Constable Dunlop regarding C-8, which CPS Constable René Desrosiers had obtained the day before. As I have indicated in Chapter 6, Constable Desrosiers also learned that a CPS investigation of Mr. Lalonde had taken place in 1989, and he understood that this material was also subject to disclosure.

In the afternoon of October 4, Detective Constable Genier, Ms Wilhelm, Constable Desrosiers, CPS Staff Sergeant Rick Carter and CPS Staff Sergeant

Garry Derochie met and discussed the Dunlop notes in relation to the Marcel Lalonde matter. Ms Wilhelm said she had no confidence that the Crown had received all the documents from Constable Dunlop. She told Staff Sergeant Derochie that she could not say to the defence with any certainty that full disclosure had been made.

On October 5, Detective Inspector Hall met with Detective Constable Genier and Ms Wilhelm on the Marcel Lalonde matter. Detective Inspector Hall called Shelley Hallett and asked her to speak with Ms Wilhelm about the Marcel Lalonde matter.

By way of letter dated October 5, 1999, the Crown requested that Detective Inspector Hall again attempt to obtain full disclosure from Constable Dunlop. Ms Wilhelm was also concerned about Constable Dunlop continuing to contact witnesses and requested that Detective Inspector Hall ask him whether he spoke to complainants and whether he did so in an official capacity as a police officer. The Crown advised that the defence position was that he was contaminating the prosecution of the case.

On October 13, Detective Inspector Hall met with Marc Garson, a Crown from London, Ontario, to discuss the issue of Constable Dunlop having committed perjury.

On November 19, 1999, Mr. Garson issued a legal opinion on three issues arising from the meeting. The letter was addressed to Staff Sergeant Derochie and copied to Ms Wilhelm and regional Crown James Stewart. The issues Mr. Garson considered are:

Issue One: What are the requirements of the Cornwall Police Service at law to ensure that full disclosure has been made?

Issue Two: What is the Crown's responsibility in this matter?

Issue Three: What are the next steps to be taken?

With respect to the next steps to be taken, Mr. Garson suggested that a meeting be held with Constable Dunlop and that written confirmations be kept of any and all requests made for information from Constable Dunlop. In addition, he recommended:

Should any further disclosure be forthcoming from Constable Dunlop and should this disclosure be material or relevant to other persons charged with offences, we recommend that you ensure such additional disclosure is provided to the appropriate Crown counsel.

Upon receiving Mr. Garson's opinion, the CPS, in consultation with Assistant Crown Attorney Wilhelm, prepared a comprehensive order to Constable Dunlop.

The content of this order is further discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service. As a result, Constable Dunlop provided a 110-page will-state and pages of notes. Detective Constable Genier and Constable Desrosiers reviewed these materials for disclosure purposes in the Lalonde matter. This issue has been examined in Chapters 6 and 7.

R. v. Lalonde Trial

The trial in the Marcel Lalonde matter was held in September 2000. Mr. Dunlop failed to attend as a witness. On September 12, one of the complainants in the Lalonde matter, C-8, testified under oath that some of his allegations were not true. In particular, he admitted that the allegation that he was abused by Mr. Lalonde during a school trip to Toronto was not true. C-8 told the Court that Constable Dunlop had told him that if something happened at the school or on a school activity, he could sue the school board.

On November 17, 2000, notwithstanding the recantation of C-8, Justice Monique Métivier found Mr. Lalonde guilty on six counts relating to C-45, C-8, another victim, and C-66. The submissions on sentencing were heard on April 12, 2001. On May 3, 2001, Mr. Lalonde was sentenced to a term of incarceration of two years less a day.

R. v. Father Charles MacDonald: New Charges Laid and Trial

Preliminary Inquiry Completed and Father Charles MacDonald Committed to Trial

As previously discussed, the 1993 and 1994 investigations by the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) and the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), respectively, did not lead to charges being laid against Father Charles MacDonald. In 1996 charges were laid in respect of allegations of historical sexual abuse made by three victims: David Silmser, John MacDonald, and C-3. The preliminary inquiry began in February 1997 and was adjourned in part because of new allegations that surfaced against Father MacDonald. During this time, Project Truth was commenced. The preliminary inquiry resumed on September 8, 1997, and was completed on September 11. On October 24, Father MacDonald was committed to stand trial on all charges.

New Charges Laid—Robert Pelletier Reviews New Crown Brief

As discussed in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the OPP, Project Truth investigated additional allegations against Father MacDonald, and by the end of October, additional charges were being contemplated by the OPP. Detective

Constable Joe Dupuis had several contacts with Crown Attorney Robert Pelletier about this matter during the fall of 1997. However, most of the direction he received was from Detective Inspector Pat Hall. According to Detective Constable Dupuis, the protocol was that Mr. Pelletier would deal with Detective Inspector Hall who would in turn instruct him.

Mr. Pelletier was provided with a brief on January 6, 1998, and reviewed it to determine whether new charges should be laid. He recommended that a number of charges be laid against Father MacDonald. Detective Inspector Smith's notes of a call with Mr. Pelletier on January 21 include a comment about joining the charges: "charges can be transferred later hopefully to marry up with present charges."

Mr. Pelletier testified that it was always his intention to conduct one trial with all of the complainants. However he did not discuss this with any of the three original complainants. He did not know whether they were made aware of his intentions with respect to joining the charges.

Mr. Pelletier did not recall preparing an opinion letter regarding the new charges. He testified that he was surprised that he would recommend eight charges be laid in respect of five complainants without putting it in writing. He did not believe he would simply tell the officers to go ahead and lay charges, since the relevant Criminal Code sections had changed over the years in question. However, no letter was written.

Detective Constable Dupuis swore an information with the new charges on January 26, 1998. Father MacDonald was charged with one count of indecent assault against each of Kevin Upper and C-5, two counts of indecent assault against C-8, one count of sexual assault and one count of gross indecency against Robert Renshaw, and one count of indecent assault and one count of gross indecency against C-4.

Communication With David Silmsers Lawyer

On or around February 25, 1998, Mr. Pelletier received a letter from Alain Robichaud, who was the new lawyer representing David Silmsers, inquiring into the status of the matter. In particular, Mr. Robichaud asked if the Crown intended to join the new charges against Father MacDonald with those presently before the courts. It thus appears that at this time, the Crown's intention to join the charges had not been communicated to the initial three complainants, Mr. Silmsers, John MacDonald, and C-3. Mr. Pelletier responded in a letter dated February 27. He summarized the state of affairs for the two sets of charges and discussed the possibility of a joinder of all counts:

There is of course the possibility of a motion for joinder of all counts enabling the Crown to proceed to trial with regards to all fifteen charges and eight victims. That would no doubt improve the merits of the case and allow for similar fact evidence, however, this would necessarily result in some delays in conducting the trials on the first series of charges. These are among the matters that will be discussed at the judicial pre-trial on the original charges and presumably as well at a judicial pre-trial in the Provincial Division on the new set of charges.

As will be discussed, the issue of delay was not raised during any pre-trial appearances.

Delays in Scheduling Judicial Pre-Trial

There was some difficulty in scheduling the judicial pre-trial. On April 1, 1998, Mr. Pelletier wrote to Mary Simpson, the scheduling clerk and Chief Justice's assistant, copied to defence counsel representing Father MacDonald, Michael Neville. The letter outlined a summary of the issues to be discussed, including joining the charges and the potential resulting delays.

On November 20, 1998, Mr. Pelletier wrote a letter to Mr. Neville, telling him that as a result of scheduling difficulties that had arisen in the General Division pre-trial list earlier in the year, the judicial pre-trial could not be conducted as earlier planned. Mr. Pelletier noted his intention to have all counts heard together and his concern that a judicial pre-trial be held soon: "My principal concern is ensuring that a judicial pre-trial is conducted as quickly as possible, particularly given the direct instructions of the Justice presiding at the last assignment court."

Mr. Pelletier believed that his intentions about joining the charges were clear in November 1998. He was aware that the preliminary inquiry on the second set of charges was scheduled for March 1999. He was concerned about the delay, as was the Justice presiding at the Assignment Court.

January 1999 Adjournment: No Waiver of Section 11(b) Rights

Following the pre-trial conference with Justice Robert Desmarais, Mr. Pelletier received a letter from defence counsel on January 19, 1999. Mr. Neville said he could not attend for the next appearance. He understood that because of the upcoming preliminary inquiry on the new charges in March, Mr. Pelletier would ask that the present indictment be adjourned to an Assignment Court sometime after March 1999. Mr. Neville stated that the adjournment was "not to be taken as a waiver of any rights that Father MacDonald may have under s. 11(b) of the Charter," which provides that every accused has a right to a trial within a reasonable time. Mr. Pelletier testified that he understood at this point that there would be no waiver of Father MacDonald's rights under section 11(b).

The adjournment hearing was heard on January 21, 1999, before Justice Jean Forget. The agent appearing on behalf of Mr. Neville stated that he was instructed not to waive Father MacDonald's section 11(b) Charter rights on the record. The matter was adjourned to Assignment Court on May 12, 1999, pending the completion of the preliminary inquiry on the other charges. Therefore the delay proceeding to trial on the first set of charges could affect Father MacDonald's right to a trial within a reasonable time.

Mr. Pelletier testified that he could not recall whether there was a discussion about delay at the pre-trial on the first set of charges, which was conducted before Justice Desmarais. He does not recall there being any request at the pre-trial that the defendant waive his rights under section 11(b).

The Inquiry heard some evidence that there was an earlier discussion between Crown Pelletier and defence counsel about a waiver of Father MacDonald's section 11(b) rights in the context of having the charges tried together in one trial. Detective Constable Dupuis testified that he recalled a chance meeting in an Ottawa courthouse hallway during which there was a short discussion between Mr. Pelletier and Mr. Neville about consolidating the two indictments in the Father MacDonald case. Mr. Pelletier advised Mr. Neville that there were further charges coming and asked if he wished to have one trial or two. Mr. Neville said one. They then discussed section 11(b), and Mr. Neville said he would waive it. Detective Constable Dupuis did not specifically recall when this conversation occurred but thought it was before the swearing of the new information on January 26, 1998. The officer did not record anything about this conversation in his notes.

Detective Constable Dupuis did not discuss this conversation with any Crown attorney until the stay application was brought in 2002, at which time he brought it up with Crown Lorne McConnery and possibly with Detective Inspector Hall.

Detective Constable Dupuis testified that the conversation did not affect the way that he conducted the investigation from that point in time. He did not, for example, think that delay was not an issue to be concerned about.

Although Mr. Pelletier did recall a meeting with Mr. McConnery sometime later, during which he wanted to know whether Mr. Pelletier was aware of any discussions between counsel bearing on the issue of delay and possible waiver of section 11(b), Mr. Pelletier did not recall having this type of discussion with Mr. Neville in an Ottawa courthouse hallway. According to Mr. Pelletier, although the issue would have come up in their discussions about the consequences of doing both trials together, he did not recall any request that Mr. Neville waive his client's 11(b) rights at the pre-trial, nor was there ever any such waiver.

Mr. Pelletier testified that if Mr. Neville had waived a constitutional right in a discussion, he would without a doubt have sent him a letter confirming the waiver. There are no documents indicating a waiver by Mr. Neville. I am of the view that even if such a discussion occurred around that time, it was not confirmed in writing. If I were to accept it at face value it would not in itself constitute a waiver of Father MacDonald's section 11(b) rights under the Charter.

Preliminary Inquiry on Second Set of Charges—March 1999

The preliminary inquiry on the second set of charges was held in March 1999. Father MacDonald was committed to stand trial on these charges on May 3, 1999. Mr. Pelletier prepared an eight-count indictment on May 5.

Robert Pelletier in a Conflict

Shortly after the preliminary inquiry, Mr. Pelletier determined that he was in a conflict and requested that the file be assigned to a new Crown. It became clear to Mr. Pelletier that certain individuals in the community were convinced that Murray MacDonald might be part of a group alleged to be undertaking a campaign to obstruct justice and to prevent charges from being laid and cases going to court. Mr. Pelletier testified that since the trials were "looming" and Murray MacDonald might be a witness, "it became abundantly clear to me that I could not go on as prosecutor."

According to Mr. Pelletier, this issue was different from the one he identified in his memo to Peter Griffiths on April 2, 1997. In 1997, Mr. Pelletier was concerned about being involved in any investigation and prosecution of allegations of conspiracy. The issue that arose in spring 1999 was that Mr. MacDonald might have to testify, and Mr. Pelletier could not cross-examine a colleague and good friend.

At a meeting on April 9, 1999, between Mr. Pelletier, James Stewart, Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region, John Corelli, the Director of Special Investigations, and OPP Detective Inspector Hall, it was decided that Shelley Hallett would be assigned to prosecute Father MacDonald.

File Transferred to Shelley Hallett

Mr. Pelletier met with Ms Hallett on one or two occasions to transfer the file and brief her about the case.

Ms Hallett received a letter from Mr. Pelletier dated June 25, 1999, advising that the next judicial pre-trial was scheduled for September 7, 1999, and he would make himself available "in order to ensure that the transition is as seamless as possible." He suggested meeting at the end of August once she had an opportunity to review the materials. According to Ms Hallett, Mr. Pelletier was going to attend the pre-trial with her because he knew more about the issues and the history of the case.

When Ms Hallett was assigned to take over this file, no trial date had been set for either set of charges. The first set of charges was approximately three years old and the second set of charges approximately one and a half years old. Mr. Pelletier had held back the first set of charges to allow the second set to proceed to the preliminary inquiry. There was clearly some delay caused by this decision. Ms Hallett said when she took over the file, she was not aware of any other significant delays in the proceedings.

Robert Pelletier and Shelley Hallett Prepare for Pre-Trial

On August 27, 1999, Mr. Pelletier and Ms Hallett had a meeting to prepare for the upcoming judicial pre-trial on September 7. A memorandum was prepared by Nadia Thomas, an articling student with the Crown Law Office—Criminal, on August 31. It lists some of the issues discussed during the meeting including matters to be determined at the pre-trial conference, potential defence motions, order of witnesses to be called, evidence the Crown needs to obtain, potential expert evidence to be called, potential judges, and things still to be done.

According to the memo, one of the issues to be determined at the pre-trial conference was whether to join the indictments. Mr. Pelletier testified that at the time the file was transferred his intention was to conduct one trial, but he was no longer the prosecutor and this may still have been a question for Ms Hallett. Indeed, she had Ms Thomas collect case law to assist the Crown in determining whether to proceed on one indictment or two. Ms Thomas prepared a memo for Ms Hallett on this topic on August 30. Ms Hallett testified that she wanted some information about this issue because she was not sure she had had any experience with joining indictments:

I believe that my main concern was whether or not the joining of these two indictments was going to create any prejudice in terms of the defence of Charles MacDonald and ... in turn, whether or not that prejudice might result in some successful ... challenge to the charges or a stay or a finding of not guilty.

After considering all the issues with respect to joining the indictments, Ms Hallett was of the view that the charges should be joined.

The potential defence motions discussed during the meeting included abuse of process, pre-charge delay, lost evidence, and lack of trial fairness due to publicity. What does not appear to have been discussed is post-charge delay. Ms Hallett did not believe post-charge delay was considered during this meeting.

Judicial Pre-Trial—September 7, 1999

Mr. Pelletier attended the pre-trial on September 7, 1999, with Ms Hallett to ensure a transfer of information from the preliminary inquiries. Mr. Pelletier testified this was going to be the end of his involvement in the prosecution.

There was discussion at the pre-trial of a potential severance motion.⁸ The division was not necessarily going to be between the first and second sets of charges but rather on the basis of distinguishing features between the eight complainants. Ms Hallett's concern at that point was that they get sufficient notice of any pre-trial motions so they could prepare properly. There was no commitment by Mr. Neville, defence counsel, at that time to bring a severance motion.

Although Ms Hallett believed they had advised defence counsel by this point that they were going to proceed by joining the indictments, it appears this issue was not discussed in any detail during the pre-trial conference.

Another issue that was not discussed was delay and section 11(b) of the Charter. Ms Hallett acknowledged that delay should have been discussed at this time.

As noted above, a significant amount of time had already passed since charges were laid in this case. I would expect that the Crown would by this time at least consider the issue of delay and the risk that the defence would bring a section 11(b) application to have the charges stayed for unreasonable delay. As will be discussed further below, this did happen and the charges were stayed, a result which may have been avoided had the Crown considered the issue of delay and how to deal with it proactively rather than simply reactively.

Joinder of Charges

Once a person is committed to stand trial, the Crown has the discretion to proceed with one or more than one indictment. Ms Hallett elected to join all charges in a single indictment. Throughout the prosecution, Mr. Pelletier felt strongly that the charges should be heard together and it was his "duty" to join the indictments: "As soon as I found out there were going to be five other complainants, my mind was made up to conduct one trial with eight complainants."

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he and his team understood that, to the extent possible, if the Crown had multiple charges against an accused the Crown would want them joined together because it would increase the likelihood of convictions. Unlike Detective Inspector Hall, Detective Constable Dupuis did not know what the Crown's thought process was on this issue. He testified that nobody told him that if he laid additional charges, the Crown would want to join them together with the first charges.

8. This is a motion to separate the charges and have them prosecuted individually rather than together.

Mr. Pelletier testified that if he had been required to conduct two trials, he would have called the three complainants in the first case, and presented the other five as similar fact witnesses. A similar exercise would be repeated in the second trial. The difficulty from the Crown's perspective is that every time witnesses testify, they give a different version of events they recall:

So as a prosecutor one of my concerns is not exposing complainants to more testimony than is necessary. They're often interviewed three times, they testify at the preliminary inquiry ... and if they have to testify at two trials, then the defence has five or six versions with which to work.

Mr. Pelletier agreed this was an issue in this prosecution where the complainants had given more than one statement, some had been examined for discovery, and there were some discrepancies in the different statements.

Mr. Pelletier weighed the pros and cons of joining the indictments in terms of the issue of delay. He testified that it was a calculated risk he was taking and one that ultimately favoured the prosecution:

... had the case proceeded to trial sometime in '99 or 2000, I didn't think delay was going to be a problem, but obviously there was a risk. And I calculated that risk, assessed the risk and chose to proceed with what I felt would be a much stronger case with eight complainants as opposed to three in one case and five in the other.

During his involvement in the Father MacDonald prosecution he did not at any point become concerned about the possibility of a successful 11(b) application. He explained that the state of the law at the time was such that time requirements inherent in a case were a significant consideration in respect of an 11(b) application. The time requirements in this case were significant because of the way the case had developed: "I felt that the Crown was on a very solid footing on delay, at least up until the summer of '99."

In his testimony at the Inquiry, Carson Chisholm, Constable Perry Dunlop's brother-in-law, spoke about a conversation he allegedly had with Mr. Pelletier during which Mr. Chisholm said, "Charlie is going to walk under Askov,"⁹ and Mr. Pelletier sneered at him, "You're delusional." Mr. Pelletier testified he did not recall this conversation and that he would not tell a member of the public they were delusional.

9. R. v. Askov, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1199, is a Supreme Court of Canada decision that set out parameters for trial within a reasonable time.

As discussed above, Ms Hallett asked for some research on the issue of joining indictments, and she agreed the charges should be joined. Ms Hallett signed the joint indictment on September 10, 1999. Around this time, a six-week trial was scheduled to begin on May 1, 2000.

I am of the view that the Crown could have proceeded separately with the indictments. This may have prevented a stay of proceedings on the first set of charges. However, I do not believe that at the time either Crown could have predicted how events would unfold, which I will now discuss in more detail. I agree with Mr. Pelletier that there was a risk with joining the charges, but it was a calculated risk.

Pre-Trial Conference—October 22, 1999

On October 22, 1999, there was a follow-up pre-trial with Justice Desmarais attended by Ms Hallett, Mr. Neville, and Detective Constable Dupuis. Ms Hallett took notes of the meeting. It does not appear that the issue of delay was discussed at this pre-trial conference either. I am of the view that both Robert Pelletier and Shelley Hallett should have been more alert to issues surrounding the delays in this prosecution and should have addressed it with the pre-trial judge.

Order of Production to Constable Perry Dunlop on January 10, 2000

In the fall of 1999, a related prosecution was proceeding against Marcel Lalonde, a schoolteacher charged with similar offences as Father MacDonald and with some of the same complainants. Claudette Wilhelm, the Crown involved in the Marcel Lalonde prosecution, was concerned that Constable Dunlop might be in possession of relevant evidence that should be disclosed. She was assisted with the preparation of an extensive written order with respect to disclosure and ongoing disclosure requirements.

Ms Hallett was aware of the existence of this order, although she was not aware of the details or discussions regarding the drafting of the order. She was not asked to provide any input into the order but did receive a copy of it.

Ms Hallett received disclosure of Constable Dunlop's materials following this order.

C-2's Allegations

As discussed in Chapter 7, the OPP became aware of another alleged victim of Father MacDonald during a meeting with Constable Dunlop on January 17, 2000. A statement was taken from C-2 on January 26. Project Truth officers advised Ms Hallett of C-2's allegations against Father MacDonald shortly after they learned of them.

Ms Hallett received two further volumes of the Father MacDonald brief, one of which dealt primarily with C-2's allegations, on March 23, 2000. On March 30, Ms Hallett wrote a letter to Detective Inspector Hall providing her opinion with respect to C-2's allegations. Ms Hallett testified that she provided an opinion within the week given the urgency of the opinion. Ms Hallett noted that although the first allegation by C-2 was unusual, there had been other "bizarre allegations" made by other complaints against Father MacDonald. The second allegation, she noted, bore some resemblance to the allegations of two other complainants. Ms Hallett recommended that four counts be laid against Father MacDonald in respect of C-2's allegations.

Ms Hallett testified that she was concerned about how these new counts might affect the outstanding Father MacDonald prosecution. She advised defence counsel about this new complainant and the new charges that would be laid in a letter dated April 6, 2000.

This was the first notice the defence received of the new alleged victim. In the letter, Ms Hallett set out various options for dealing with these new charges: including them on the existing indictment; seeking an adjournment of the May 1, 2000, trial date to allow for an expedited preliminary inquiry on the charges, then consenting to their inclusion on the current indictment; or having the Crown proceed separately on the charges. Ms Hallett testified that she outlined some of these options in part because of her concern about possible delay.

Given that the trial was scheduled to begin on May 1, Ms Hallett acknowledged that she expected the defence might request an adjournment, although not necessarily on the basis of these additional counts. Constable Dunlop had disclosed new documents pursuant to the January 10, 2000, production order and he was being criminally investigated for perjury. Ms Hallett testified that the perjury investigation had "a significant impact on the Charles MacDonald trial since Constable Dunlop had identified so many of the original complainants on that matter."

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he thought the principal reason for the adjournment of the Father MacDonald matter was the laying of additional charges with respect to C-2's allegations. Detective Inspector Hall said that if the police had heard about C-2's allegations in 1998, when C-2 disclosed them to Constable Dunlop, Project Truth would have investigated them, and if viable, those charges would have been laid in 1998 rather than 2000. This could have resulted in two years less delay. In fact, Detective Inspector Hall noted on April 16, 2000, "[G]ave my opinion on MacDonald trial. Should go ahead or at least put off for a short period of time only." He did acknowledge that without the new allegations by C-2, other problems, such as the disclosure by Constable Dunlop, might have led to an adjournment. Detective Inspector Hall agreed that neither he nor Ms Hallett could do anything about those things.

I disagree with Detective Inspector Hall that an earlier disclosure of the C-2 allegation could have prevented a two-year delay. In fact, after the adjournment of the original trial date, a new date was set in early 2001. The additional delay was as a result of other circumstances, which are discussed below.

With regard to Ms Hallett providing an opinion about whether charges should be laid in respect of C-2's allegations, Crown counsel should not be providing opinions on matters that they are currently prosecuting. As was indicated in the 1997 Policy P-1, "Police—Relationship with Crown Counsel," "a Crown counsel who gives advice to the police is a potential witness. If charges are laid, Crown counsel may be subpoenaed to testify on the trial proper, the voir dire determining the admissibility of evidence, or a Charter motion." Although the opinion never became an issue, Ms Hallett should have been more careful and not risked any further delays in an otherwise problematic prosecution. Once again, the assignment of a dedicated Crown to provide advice and opinions to the police may have been useful throughout the entire Project Truth investigation.

On April 10, 2000, Detective Constable Dupuis swore an information containing four charges regarding C-2's allegations against Father MacDonald. As will be discussed below, Lorne McConnery later withdrew these charges.

Adjournment of Trial

Defence counsel agreed to have the new counts added to the existing indictment following an expedited preliminary inquiry. In light of these events, Ms Hallett wrote to defence counsel on April 12, 2000, about bringing the Father MacDonald matter to Assignment Court on April 18:

If this matter cannot proceed on May 1 due to new material coming to light which was unanticipated by either the defence or the Crown, then the Court should be advised as soon as possible so that the scheduled trial time can be re-allocated to another case. I trust that the defence will join the Crown in seeking an adjournment on this basis.

Ms Hallett stated that she was prepared to attend in any available Ontario court to deal with the preliminary inquiry. She also canvassed some alternative options, including arranging for a discovery at a special examiner's office. Ms Hallett was providing these options to prevent any delay in getting to trial. She noted in the letter that there was time in the fall for the trial and asked Mr. Neville to provide his availability. She also said that if the expedited preliminary inquiry could not take place over the summer, the Crown was prepared to proceed separately on the counts to allow the trial on the existing counts to take place as soon as possible.

Murray MacDonald was copied on this letter. According to Ms Hallett, he was copied because they were dealing with dates and allocations of court facilities and it was a courtesy to advise him. She was aware of the conflict but was not aware that it would preclude him from being informed of the allocation of court resources in the trials. She said she had to deal with him, for example, in terms of space at the courthouse. As I have indicated previously, in my opinion in situations where it was necessary to communicate with the Cornwall Crown Attorney's Office, an individual other than Mr. MacDonald should have been designated to deal with these issues. For the sake of public perception, Mr. MacDonald should not have been receiving any correspondence or material related to Project Truth matters.

The matter was spoken to on April 18, 2000, before Justice Robert Desmarais. Ms Hallett advised the Court of three things. The first was the identification of a new complainant in the Father MacDonald matter. She outlined the options she had proposed to Mr. Neville to deal with the new charges.

Second, she advised the Court that on April 5, 2000, Project Truth investigators had become aware of banker's boxes of materials that had been brought to the Cornwall Police Service by Constable Dunlop. Ms Hallett told the Court that an OPP officer had reviewed the materials and there was nothing relevant to the Father MacDonald case that had not already been disclosed. However, she intended to review the contents of the boxes herself. She also said that on April 10, 2000, Mr. Dunlop had provided a will-state with four volumes of appendices. She said that she had received a copy of those materials on April 17.

The third matter concerned the perjury investigation of Constable Dunlop, which she requested be heard in camera. Ms Hallett testified that she felt it was important this be done in camera because it involved a criminal investigation that could have severe repercussions for the person being investigated. She felt it was best to await the outcome of the investigation before the matter was publicly brought to light.

The Crown said that although she would be prepared to proceed to trial on May 1, she felt that in light of the ongoing investigation and new materials the correct position to present to the Court was a joint request for an adjournment. Ms Hallett proposed coming back and reporting, perhaps sometime in June, on the progress to date in terms of sorting out the new material. Although she agreed the case had become more complex, she did not think it was as "unwieldy" as characterized by defence counsel in his submissions.

The Judge made the following comments about the trial scheduling:

... it is unrealistic to anticipate that any of the parties would be prepared to proceed to trial in May of this year, that is to say next month. It's also pure speculation in my view that the parties would be available for trial some time in the fall, there being too many unknowns at this present time or “imponderables” as indicated by counsel on behalf of the accused. There will be some time required in order to assess the various disclosures and indeed, the Crown will need time as well to determine the relevancy of additional information received by her, prior to any disclosure being made to the defence counsel.

The pre-trial was adjourned to August 23, 2000, at which time it was expected counsel could indicate their state of readiness for trial and that a trial date would be set. In my view, this was a missed opportunity to address the issue of delay on the record. It may have been beneficial for the Crown to know what the defence position was at that time.

Shelley Hallett Reports to James Stewart

Although it was not raised during the court appearance on April 18, 2000, it is clear that the Crown was concerned about delay and about a potential 11(b) application by the defence. On April 19, Ms Hallett wrote a letter to regional Crown James Stewart advising him that the Judge felt the scheduled trial date of May 1 was unrealistic. She also advised that defence counsel had not protested the Judge’s opinion and that she expected he would attempt to use the delay to support an application for a section 11(b) stay.

Ms Hallett testified that she was concerned about the possibility of an 11(b) application, but there were a number of developments, many of which she did not have a lot of control over. She wrote Mr. Stewart that section 11(b) was always going to be an issue, but she felt the complexity of the case would prevent a successful 11(b) application: “I am trusting that the unique features of this case, characterized by Neville himself in yesterday’s proceedings as ‘too complicated to begin to address’ will ultimately prevent a stay on the basis of delay.”

Mr. Stewart agreed with Ms Hallett and testified that in his experience, how complicated a case is and the issues that arise can sometimes be a relevant factor on an 11(b) application.

Ms Hallett also wrote that she would be returning to Cornwall to review the contents of the nine boxes of material delivered to the CPS by Constable Dunlop. Although a Project Truth officer had conducted a preliminary review of the boxes, Ms Hallett testified that she was not going to rely on the police officer regarding the contents of the boxes and was going to thoroughly review the boxes herself.

Constable Perry Dunlop’s Boxes Delivered to Project Truth Office

On April 5, 2000, Constable Dunlop delivered nine banker’s boxes of materials to the Cornwall Police Service. On April 10, Constable Dunlop delivered a will-state and four volumes of appendices, also to the CPS. Following the April 18 court appearance, Ms Hallett attended at the CPS and asked that the boxes be transported to the Project Truth office. It was her understanding that Project Truth officers would take possession of the boxes on that day:

I'm not sure that I wanted it done. I thought that that was the plan and I thought it was a good plan because ... if the boxes were brought to the Project Truth office ... it would facilitate my review of the content of the boxes which I felt duty bound to do.

In addition, since the boxes had been produced pursuant to an order that Constable Dunlop turn over all material related to Project Truth matters, it made sense for Project Truth officers to seize those boxes. Ms Hallett also thought that because of the allegations of cover-up being made by Constable Dunlop against the CPS, it would be “imprudent and unwise” for the CPS to retain those boxes.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he was not happy that Ms Hallett had brought the boxes to the Project Truth office and that he made that clear to her. His concern was that he did not want Constable Dunlop later to say there was something missing from the disclosure and blame Project Truth for losing it. With respect to Ms Hallett's position that Project Truth should have control of the boxes because CPS was still being investigated for conspiracy, he said, “I made the comment ‘well, the allegations ain't any more severe against Cornwall Police than they are against the Ministry of the Attorney General.’”

In my opinion, this illustrates why it was best that the boxes be kept at the Project Truth office. I am of the view that these boxes were part of the OPP investigation and it was the OPP's responsibility to be the custodians of that information.

Although Detective Inspector Hall testified that he made his views about the boxes known to Ms Hallett at the time, she became aware only later that he wanted to keep the boxes at the CPS.

Review of Constable Perry Dunlop's Boxes: Shelley Hallett's Concerns About Privacy and Privilege

Ms Hallett reviewed the Dunlop boxes over three or four visits to Cornwall. Based on Detective Inspector Hall's notes, it appears that she was still reviewing the boxes in June. Ms Hallett testified that at this point she had not formulated a plan with regard to the defence reviewing the boxes; it was going to depend on their content.

In my view, it is clear that the review of these nine boxes was a major undertaking for Ms Hallett that inevitably led to further delay in providing disclosure and preparing for trial. She should have requested additional assistance or resources to help her deal with this material more quickly and efficiently.

On June 27, 2000, Ms Hallett had an unannounced visit from Constable Dunlop at her Toronto office. As there were no officers present, she asked a clerk to attend and take notes. Constable Dunlop gave Ms Hallett a box of documents addressed to Attorney General Jim Flaherty. Ms Hallett testified that these documents appeared to be duplicates of the April 10 will-state and its appendices but she “wasn’t absolutely sure if that was the case.” Ms Hallett advised Constable Dunlop at the outset of the meeting that this was not the way for documents to come into her possession. She told him it was ill-advised to serve documents on the Ministry of the Attorney General himself and that the criminal justice system provides for this kind of information to be given to the police who turn it over to the Crown.

Ms Hallett discussed with him some personal material he had disclosed in the nine boxes. They also discussed the definition of records and privacy interests. Ms Hallett testified that she had almost completed her review of the boxes and it was clear that a lot of the material included in the boxes would be properly defined as a record within the meaning of section 278.1 of the Criminal Code pertaining to third party records. This section governs the disclosure of personal, private, and confidential records of complainants and witnesses in sexual assault prosecutions. Ms Hallett recalled some of the material being of a highly confidential and private nature, such as doctors’ prescriptions.

She advised Constable Dunlop that while some of the material in the boxes was personal and therefore should not be disclosed, some documents fell “in between ‘personal’ and ‘public’ documents.” She said some of these should be handed over to the defence and she would like his consent to release those documents. She suggested that Constable Dunlop get some legal assistance with regard to waiving his rights to privacy regarding the release of some of the documents. She was hoping these disclosure issues could be dealt with on consent rather than by application, in order to keep things moving in the Father MacDonald proceeding.

Although the notes of this meeting suggest a possible future meeting between Constable Dunlop and Ms Hallett to go through the documents to see “what deals with MacDonald,” they never had such a meeting. Constable Dunlop left the province for British Columbia shortly thereafter.

Ms Hallett wrote a letter to Detective Constable Dupuis on July 4, 2000, enclosing the notes of her meeting with Constable Dunlop as well as his letter to the Attorney General dated June 27, 2000.

Over the course of the summer, Ms Hallett completed her review of the Dunlop boxes.

Pre-Trial Conference—August 23, 2000

On August 23, 2000, this matter again came before Justice Desmarais. On this day, Ms Hallett provided the defence with Volume 9 of the Crown brief. She told the Court that she had reviewed the nine boxes provided by Constable Dunlop and that she believed that full disclosure had been made to the defence. She further advised that the criminal investigation of Mr. Dunlop was completed and that, although charges were not going to be laid, the results of the investigation were in the possession of the Crown and had been given to the defence.

At this time, the Crown was in a position to set a trial date, and Ms Hallett's position was that the items provided to the defence that day could be reviewed in sufficient time before the next trial date, which was April 2, 2001.

Defence counsel said he needed more time to review the new disclosure. In addition, Mr. Neville made some comments about the Dunlop boxes and the attempts being made to determine if Mr. Dunlop would consent to the disclosure of the boxes:

Albeit it has been turned over on various occasions, or parts thereof, to the authorities, parts of which I may indeed have in other forms, but we don't know for sure until we see it all, but that is going to be pursued as well.

Ms Hallett testified that she felt the relevant material in the boxes had been disclosed to the defence, but she was prepared to allow defence counsel time to review the boxes. She does not believe Mr. Neville accepted her offer. Ms Hallett testified that she understood Crown McConnery later released the entire content of the boxes to Mr. Neville. She never discussed the matter with him and was not aware that defence counsel later found a copy of notes by a CPS officer of David Silmser's first interview with the Cornwall police in the Dunlop materials. She was no longer working on Project Truth cases at that time.

Due to the new disclosure provided to the defence that day, the Judge agreed to adjourn the matter to October 18, 2000, and set a trial date at that time:

The adjournment is being granted on the basis of disclosures which have been made available to defence counsel as of today and it would appear to me, that out of fairness to defence counsel, that the adjournment in question is not an unreasonable request.

In my view, it took an inordinate amount of time for the Crown to review the Dunlop materials and disclose them to the defence. The untimely disclosure led to delays, and once again, the issue of further delay was not specifically addressed on the record.

Preliminary Inquiry on C-2 Allegations; New Indictment on October 18, 2000

The preliminary inquiry on charges relating to C-2's allegations was conducted from August 28 to 30, 2000. Father MacDonald was committed to stand trial on those charges, which included two charges of gross indecency and two charges of indecent assault. On October 18, 2000, a new indictment was prepared consolidating the previous indictment of September 1999 with these new charges.

As discussed above, defence counsel had earlier agreed before the Court to have these new counts included in the indictment. Ms Hallett testified that prior to the consolidation of those charges, she was not aware of defence counsel departing from this position.

She testified that she did not believe the decision to charge Father MacDonald in relation to the allegations of C-2 contributed to the delay in this case:

It may have been characterized later as contributing to the delay, but there were these other significant developments that were occurring at the time as C-2 had come forward and been identified, and I believe that those really were the significant contributors. But we wrapped all of it up at around the same time; that is, I concluded my review of the nine boxes from Dunlop. We had the results of the criminal investigation that became available at the end of July ... I looked at the two sets of notes and appendices and the will say from Constable Dunlop and was satisfied that they were, in fact duplicates that we—we made sure that we had a duplicate copy and that those had been provided to Mr. Neville. So things were coming to a conclusion, I think, more or less at the same time.

The nine boxes provided by Constable Dunlop were essentially duplicates of documents already in the possession of Project Truth. He delivered them on April 5, 2000, but it was not until August 23 that Volume 9 of the disclosure was provided to the defence and an offer extended to review the Dunlop boxes. The preliminary inquiry on the charges involving C-2 proceeded in the last week of August. I am of the view that the Crown timed the completion of the review of the Dunlop materials with the preliminary inquiry. Ms Hallett knew that the charges, if committed to trial, would be added to the existing indictment. There was therefore no reason to expedite the review of the materials.

The review of those boxes should have been a priority and should have been completed in the days following their release by Constable Dunlop. It is unclear to me whether the Crown or the Project Truth investigators were using a tracking system to determine what had been disclosed and what documents were duplicates.

Ms Hallett should have involved the Project Truth investigators in organizing and tabulating the documents. The organization and the disclosure of the fruits of an investigation is primarily a function of an investigator.

Mr. Pelletier testified that the police were providing the disclosure on the Crown's instructions, and he kept an exact copy of the disclosure in the Crown file. He did not keep a ledger to keep track of disclosure. Rather, when the police delivered materials to the defence, they copied Mr. Pelletier with a note indicating that this material was disclosed on a certain date. This tracking system was inadequate given the complexity of the prosecution and the volume of disclosure involved.

On October 18, 2000, Ms Hallett wrote to the trial coordinator and requested that the trial date be given priority. She provided the trial coordinator with defence counsel's and her available dates. A jury date was set for May 28, 2001.

Leduc Decision: Shelley Hallett Removed From Project Truth Cases

As discussed in the following section of this chapter, Ms Hallett was also the prosecutor in another Project Truth case, R. v. Jacques Leduc. On March 1, 2001, Justice James Chadwick stayed the proceedings in the Leduc case on the basis of wilful non-disclosure by the Crown. The Judge concluded that Ms Hallett had intentionally withheld the disclosure of police notes describing contacts Constable Dunlop had with the mother of an alleged victim. This decision had a significant impact on other Project Truth investigations and prosecutions, because Ms Hallett was removed from those cases. This led to a scramble to find new Crown attorneys to take over these files.

Ms Hallett testified that it was not that she did not want to continue with the Father MacDonald prosecution, but she believed that if she continued it would have "been perceived as somehow harmful to the prosecution." She was not confident that she could do her best on the case because of the breakdown in communication with Detective Inspector Hall, also discussed in the next section. Ms Hallett testified that the decision not to continue was dictated by the finding of wilful non-disclosure made against her in R. v. Leduc and was confirmed by the legal advice she received.

Although Mr. Stewart could not recall whether the decision to remove Ms Hallett from Project Truth cases was mutual, he did not think she would want to continue conducting these cases. Detective Inspector Hall had a conversation with Mr. Stewart on February 27, 2001, during which the officer expressed concerns about Ms Hallett being able to handle the Father MacDonald case:

I advised I didn't think Ms Hallett from my observations of her in the past two years could handle the case. In my view she didn't have it to be a front line Crown bearing in mind the type of victims she was dealing with and that there would be issues brought up that would go right back to 1993.

According to Detective Inspector Hall's notes, Mr. Stewart "seemed to agree and has more of a concern with MacDonald case than that of Leduc." Mr. Stewart had no recollection of this call or what the note "he seemed to agree" means. He testified that he had no concerns about Ms Hallett's ability to prosecute the Father MacDonald case. Detective Inspector Hall's notes further state that he advised Mr. Stewart that Ms Hallett had previously said she did not want to do the Father MacDonald case. Mr. Stewart did not remember Ms Hallett ever suggesting this to him.

I disagree with the suggestion made by Detective Inspector Hall that Ms Hallett was not able to handle the Father MacDonald case. I heard Ms Hallett testify and have reviewed her credentials. After hearing all of the evidence, I have no difficulty concluding that she was an experienced Crown attorney who was more than capable of conducting the Father MacDonald prosecution.

James Stewart's Efforts to Find a New Crown

The case probably most affected by Ms Hallett's departure from Project Truth cases was R. v. Father Charles MacDonald. As the initial charges were now five years old, delay was a significant issue. A trial date had been set for May 28, 2001. It was critical that a new Crown be found as soon as possible.

On March 6, 2001, Mr. Stewart sent an e-mail to Assistant Crown Attorney Terrance Cooper about finding a replacement Crown for the Father MacDonald prosecution. Mr. Stewart wrote that "due to the history of this case, the numerous sub-plots, etc." the replacement senior Crown should have a number of characteristics. These included trial experience, excellent judgment, the ability to mentally focus on what is important due to the "background 'noise' in the case," and preparedness for personal sacrifice such as being away from family and friends. The final requirement noted was availability, since the new Crown would need "ample time to review and prepare as there is a substantial history."

Mr. Stewart testified that he knew the trial was approaching and that an experienced Crown was needed quickly. He suggested a number of people, including Lorne McConnery who ended up taking this on. This e-mail was about finding a Crown only for the Father MacDonald prosecution and not the other Project Truth briefs that had been assigned to Ms Hallett.

On March 8, Mr. Stewart met with Detective Inspector Hall in Kingston. The officer's notes of the meeting say, "will have another Crown Attorney do Father Charles MacDonald trial. Won't be going until fall probably." Even though Mr. Stewart could not remember if he was already contemplating a possible adjournment of the matter, it appears clear from these notes that an adjournment was being considered due to Ms Hallett being replaced.

On March 28, Mr. Stewart received an e-mail from Crown Christine Bartlett-Hughes about the Father MacDonald matter. Ms Bartlett-Hughes had occasionally assisted Ms Hallett with the case. She was inquiring about the search for replacement counsel and made some suggestions, including having the investigating officers review all the material to assure themselves that everything had been disclosed. Mr. Stewart thought this was prudent advice in the circumstances and believed that Lorne McConnery did this once he was assigned to the file.

On March 30, Ms Hallett wrote to Mr. Stewart because she had received a videotape of C-2's statement and wanted to ensure it was disclosed and that another counsel was available to do that. She wrote that she would not be assuming any further disclosure responsibilities for the Father MacDonald case or any other Project Truth cases.

It is apparent that a Crown had not been assigned as yet. According to Ms Hallett's letter, a new Crown was expected to be available within the next two weeks: "You indicated to me that new counsel will be available within the next two weeks. I look forward to meeting with him to discuss and deliver the Crown brief in this case."

As will be discussed further below, Ms Hallett did not meet with Mr. McConnery once he was assigned in order to give him the briefs, as contemplated in this letter. She acknowledged this, but said she made herself available to him if he wanted to meet. At this point, Ms Hallett still had the entire Father MacDonald file. She did not believe anyone from the Ministry of the Attorney General asked her to return files following the decision to remove her from the Project Truth prosecutions. As a result, she kept them until another Crown was assigned and, as will be discussed below, she was responsible for providing the new Crown with the material.

I am of the view that Ms Hallett should have been required to turn over the Father MacDonald file to Mr. Stewart as soon as it was decided she would no longer continue with the case. All files belong to the Ministry of the Attorney General. The issue of the transition of the Father MacDonald file from Ms Hallett to the new assigned Crown, Mr. McConnery, will be further discussed below. Aside from ensuring a smoother transition, given the finding against Ms Hallett in the Leduc matter, she should not have remained in possession of any Project Truth files.

Lorne McConnery Assigned to Father MacDonald Prosecution

Mr. McConnery assumed carriage of the Charles MacDonald prosecution in April 2001. He was advised by Mr. Stewart that Crowns Christine Bartlett-Hughes and Kevin Phillips would be available to assist him. Mr. Stewart testified that given the history of the case and the point the matter was at, they would not assign a single Crown. Two lawyers were assigned to have carriage of this case and a third one to assist. Both Mr. Phillips and Ms Bartlett-Hughes had some trial experience. Mr. McConnery understood from his discussions with Mr. Stewart that he would be freed up from other responsibilities to work on this case full-time.

Mr. Stewart did not think he should have assigned more people to this case earlier. He did not agree that a number of Crowns were suddenly freed up because a Crown had been accused of doing something wrong:

The reality is that Ms Hallett was a senior counsel ... she had a junior Crown with her. And basically we were replacing her; when we did replace her with Lorne McConnery, senior Crown from Barrie, and Phillips from Ottawa. Ms Bartlett-Hughes may have dealt with a couple of motions but she wasn't—she wasn't on the case regularly.

MacDonald was almost ready to go, Ms Hallett had been on it for how long? So we're into a timeline thing in regards to it. And we've also had issues that were mushrooming all the time ... And so you had a situation where somebody is starting from a dead stop. And that's where McConnery is. He's never heard of the case and then all of a sudden we need him there to review all the materials, to get up to speed; hasn't been involved in the Leduc; hasn't been involved in anything.

Mr. McConnery received some background information from Mr. Stewart, relating primarily to the Jacques Leduc matter and Justice Chadwick's decision that resulted in Ms Hallett withdrawing from Project Truth cases.

When Mr. McConnery agreed to take on this assignment he was still in Barrie. The trial date was set for May 28, 2001, and the Crown hoped to still be able to accommodate that trial date. Mr. McConnery felt that this would be enough time to get ready for even a complex sexual assault trial, but the Father MacDonald prosecution turned out to be a lot more convoluted than he realized when he took on the case.

Lorne McConnery Cognizant of Delay Concerns

Because this matter had been going on for some time, Mr. McConnery was immediately concerned they would be facing an 11(b) application and thinks he may even have been advised that there would be one. Mr. McConnery thought it would be an uphill battle for the Crown on some, if not most, of the counts. According to Mr. McConnery, this is probably something he discussed with Mr. Stewart during briefings.

If the trial had proceeded in May 2001 as scheduled, Mr. McConnery would have expected an 11(b) application from the defence. In other words, he would have faced all the problems he later faced when the application was brought forward but with ten months less delay. According to Mr. McConnery, that ten months may have been significant in terms of saving the second set of charges.

Mr. McConnery testified that he discussed the 11(b) application with Mr. Neville early on, possibly the first time they met. This is in contrast to previous Crowns, who never directly addressed the 11(b) issue with defence counsel.

Defence Requests Adjournment on April 25, 2001

Near the end of April, the defence requested an adjournment of the trial. Since Mr. McConnery was still in Barrie, Mr. Stewart managed the adjournment issue on an interim basis. On April 11, 2001, Mr. Stewart wrote to Mr. Neville requesting that he deal with him for the time being.

Mr. Neville requested an adjournment on the basis that he had a case in Perth that was scheduled for the same time. He argued that a Crown mistake in that case caused it to continue longer than expected and that the Crown in the Father MacDonald case should accept responsibility for the delay resulting from Mr. Neville's unavailability. Mr. Stewart felt that whether the defence waived their 11(b) rights or not, they would get an adjournment, because "the reality is that if Mr. Neville is involved in a murder case in Perth, he can't be in two places at once."

Mr. Stewart testified that he was not sure whether at this time he turned his mind to an 11(b) application:

I had a new Crown coming on. We were going to get it on as fast as we could. Obviously, if there's a situation where the defence lawyer can't be available then we can't do it on the date that we're there because matters have been delayed.

Mr. Stewart advised Mr. McConnery that there would be an application by the defence for an adjournment and that the adjournment was related to another trial Mr. Neville was involved in. They discussed whether the Crown could maintain the position that it would be ready for trial in May. Having very limited knowledge of the scope of what he was getting involved in, Mr. McConnery's position was they would try to be ready for the May trial date. Mr. McConnery did not give any instruction about the position to be taken by the Crown with respect to requiring a waiver of section 11(b). He doesn't recall talking about a waiver.

Mr. McConnery agreed that, in retrospect, by April 25, 2001, there was no realistic possibility that the Crown would be able to proceed on the assigned trial date the following month. At the time, however, it was still his hope that the trial would proceed.

Mr. Phillips attended the adjournment hearing. He argued that the Crown was seeking an 11(b) waiver and would not oppose the adjournment requested by the defence if a waiver was given. The agent appearing on behalf of Mr. Neville advised that he was not in a position to provide such a waiver. He argued that the Crown's lack of diligence in the matter Mr. Neville was involved with in Perth had led to delays in that trial, which made Mr. Neville unavailable to proceed with the Father MacDonald trial on the set date. The matter was adjourned to March 18, 2002, and the responsibility for the delay was to be decided by the trial judge.

This was a ten-month adjournment. When he learned of this, Mr. McConnery was very concerned: "[I was] not only concerned, I was shocked that at this stage of this indictment, an adjournment was 10 months length. I thought that was outrageous."

In the next couple of months, the Crown took steps to move the trial date forward. A number of letters were written to defence counsel to determine his availability for an expedited trial date. On April 25, 2001, Mr. Phillips wrote to defence counsel about trying to get the trial underway sooner than March 18, 2002. Mr. Phillips wrote again on May 11 and May 24, requesting a reply to the April 25 letter. The Crown never received a response.

Although Mr. Stewart could not recall the letters written to try to expedite the trial date, Mr. McConnery recalled that he and Mr. Stewart talked about judicial resources and whether they could get an earlier trial date: "We were very cognizant of the issue. We were very aware of another 10 month delay."

Mr. McConnery testified that he and Mr. Neville first met and discussed the case during the summer of 2001. They talked about the timing of the trial, and Mr. McConnery appreciated Mr. Neville was a busy counsel and wasn't going to be able to adjust his schedule easily. Mr. McConnery did not put anything formally in writing about changing the trial date after that time.

Disclosure of Constable Perry Dunlop's Boxes

In April 2001, the decision was made to paginate and copy the Dunlop materials. Mr. Cooper sent an e-mail to Mr. McConnery and others about this on April 20, 2001:

In order to ensure that we are in a position to prove in court exactly what is in the 9 Dunlop boxes, and so we can track disclosure to the various defence counsel in the cases outstanding, we are proposing to employ the system that survived years of motions in the Project Toy Cumberland murders ... It involves a pile of photocopying but also provides bullet proof accountability in terms of disclosure.

Mr. McConnery testified that when he arrived in Ottawa he spent a lot of time with Mr. Stewart discussing this issue, and they determined that they should send the materials to a private photocopying firm to have multiple copies made.

According to Mr. McConnery, the decision in the Leduc case about wilful non-disclosure by the Crown influenced their approach to dealing with these materials. Mr. McConnery made the decision to give defence counsel everything in the nine boxes. He did not want to be in the position that the previous Crown had been in and was worried about missing something:

I mean, I was going to be asked to review material when I really didn't know what the whole MacDonald brief was about. And so I think I erred on the side of caution and give it all to counsel.

Mr. McConnery testified that he felt a real obligation to get this material to defence counsel. He said if Mr. Neville were acting alone in this trial, reviewing what turned out to be over 10,000 pages would be a monumental task.

Mr. McConnery understood that Ms Hallett had reviewed the boxes to some extent to determine if there was any material relevant to the trial. He believed, however, that the contents might be relevant to a section 11(b) application, and he was concerned about holding anything back that could inform the 11(b) decision or maybe even the trial.

Mr. McConnery was concerned that piecemeal disclosure would result in something relevant being missed. The risk of this occurring was compounded in this case by the fact that there was no history or log of what had been previously disclosed. As will be discussed further below, in my opinion, this was a major issue in this and other Project Truth prosecutions and is the subject of some of my recommendations.

When Mr. McConnery made the decision to disclose the material in the boxes, the issue of whether Mr. Dunlop could advance a privilege claim or privacy interest in respect of some of the material was still outstanding. Ms Hallett had discussed some of these issues with Constable Dunlop on June 27, 2000, when he dropped by her office. This issue was still being dealt with in April 2001.

On April 25, Detective Inspector Hall wrote an e-mail to Mr. Phillips and Mr. Cooper about a telephone conversation he had with Mr. Dunlop about disclosing the boxes. According to the e-mail, Detective Inspector Hall had asked Mr. Dunlop if he had any objection to the Crown disclosing the contents of the nine boxes. Mr. Dunlop initially replied no, but then his wife suggested they run it by their lawyer first and Mr. Dunlop said he would do that the next day. Mr. Dunlop also stated that he wanted to deal directly with the Crown Attorney's Office. Mr. Cooper responded to Detective Inspector Hall's e-mail with a letter the next day. On the issue of Mr. Dunlop dealing directly with the Crown's office, Mr. Cooper said:

It is our position that Mr. Perry Dunlop should deal exclusively with you or another OPP officer for a number of reasons related to future litigation. Generally speaking a Crown does not interview a witness without a police officer being present.

Despite his name coming up in the correspondence between Mr. Cooper and Detective Inspector Hall, Mr. Stewart had no recollection of having any involvement with the issue of the Dunlop boxes and disclosure. However, he agreed with Mr. Cooper's advice about Mr. Dunlop. He did not want Mr. Dunlop giving disclosure directly to a Crown; he wanted the police and in particular Detective Inspector Hall to deal with this.

Mr. McConnery never discussed the Dunlop material with Ms Hallett and did not think anyone told him that she was concerned about this issue of privilege and privacy rights. Mr. McConnery could not recall whether he received any confirmation from Mr. Dunlop one way or the other about whether privilege was being claimed or waived.

The nine Dunlop boxes were delivered to Mr. Neville's office on August 15, 2001. There were over 10,000 pages of documents contained in those boxes. Mr. McConnery testified that he did not have time to review the material before delivery but he reviewed it all before trial. He thought most of the material was irrelevant for the trial but relevant for the 11(b) issue. Mr. McConnery had some concern about his decision to disclose the boxes without first satisfying himself on the issue of potential privilege: "I felt concerned about the decision I made but I was going to live with it."

In my view, Mr. McConnery addressed some of the disclosure issues in a more practical manner. The pagination was the first attempt to track and identify exactly what had been disclosed by the Crown. The decision to disclose all of the materials at least ensured that all Crown disclosure obligations had been met.

Lorne McConnery Begins Taking Notes

Mr. McConnery took notes of much of his activity on Project Truth files, including the R. v. MacDonald prosecution. Mr. McConnery testified that it was not his normal practice to make and retain diarized notes of his day-to-day activities, although he tried to keep good trial notes. He said this was “very unusual note-taking” for him. However, Mr. McConnery said that when he became involved in Project Truth he was aware of MPP Garry Guzzo’s position and it seemed that a public inquiry was likely. He felt it was incumbent on him to try to track the time he spent on the case.

Mr. McConnery had also been made aware of some interaction between Ms Hallett and Detective Inspector Hall during the R. v. Leduc trial. That was another reason why he wanted to take notes. Mr. McConnery agreed that his working relationship with Detective Inspector Hall was not a typical, collegial, open working relationship in which parties do not feel they need to document one another’s doings and sayings. He said it became more collegial as it progressed. Mr. McConnery testified that he did not think Detective Inspector Hall was always pleased with him but does not think it ever interfered with the officer doing his job as best he could.

Lorne McConnery Learns About the Difficult Relationship Between Shelley Hallett and Detective Inspector Pat Hall

Mr. McConnery did not write in his notes the comments Ms Hallett made about the Project Truth investigators, but he testified that she expressed disappointment in Detective Inspector Hall. Mr. McConnery thought it was clear they did not appreciate each other and they had their conflicts. The impression of the Detective Inspector Mr. McConnery was left with was that things were always on the record:

If it’s during working hours and you’re talking to Pat Hall, he may sit down and make a note of it. So, you know, be careful what you say to him. And maybe that informed my decision to also keep as many notes as I did, as well.

Mr. McConnery testified that both Detective Inspector Hall and Ms Hallett expressed anger toward each other. On a number of occasions, Detective Inspector Hall told Mr. McConnery that he thought Ms Hallett was a “princess” and that she treated the officers in a way that they didn’t like. She would, for example, ask them to put her briefcases in the car. Mr. McConnery recalled that some of the officers seemed more willing to go along with that, but it “seemed to aggravate” Detective Inspector Hall. According to Mr. McConnery, Detective Inspector Hall also told him that he thought Ms Hallett worked hard but was slow to respond to things. He also had concerns about her punctuality. In all, “a major thrust of what I took from Pat Hall was that it was clear that he didn’t personally like Shelley a lot.”

Mr. McConnery testified that these issues about Ms Hallett probably came up in conversation with Detective Inspector Hall five or six times.

Transfer of File From Shelley Hallett to Lorne McConnery

As mentioned above, following the decision in R. v. Leduc and Ms Hallett’s removal from Project Truth files, she retained the files in her possession to be transferred to the new Crown(s) when assigned. The transfer of the file in R. v. MacDonald from Ms Hallett to Mr. McConnery was a slow process. Mr. McConnery said that when he was assigned to the Father MacDonald case, he did not want to press Ms Hallett to forward materials to him as he knew she was upset.

Mr. McConnery’s first conversation with Ms Hallett on this matter was on May 4, 2001, when they discussed the transfer of the file, which remained in her possession. Mr. McConnery understood that Ms Hallett was making an inventory list of what she had to turn over to him and that she hoped to turn this over to him the week of May 14. It took a lot longer for Mr. McConnery to receive the full file. He received it in portions.

Mr. McConnery knew Ms Hallett before taking on this file but does not believe they ever met face-to-face about this case. At some point she told him she did not want to speak to him about certain things, such as what happened in the Leduc matter. She had retained counsel in respect of the criminal investigation resulting from the decision in R. v. Leduc, and she had been advised not to say anything.

On May 9, Mr. McConnery received the Father MacDonald brief from the OPP. He began reviewing it the following day. This is more than one month after he was assigned to take over the Father MacDonald prosecution.

He hoped to pick up boxes of material from Ms Hallett on May 28, but they were not yet ready. According to his notes, he told her not to be concerned about expediting the Father MacDonald material, as he would be reviewing several other briefs. As will be further discussed, around this time Mr. McConnery was also assigned to review and provide opinions on a number of briefs involving allegations against clergy members as well as allegations of conspiracy.

Mr. McConnery was able to pick up some boxes of material at Ms Hallett’s office on June 4. There remained boxes containing preliminary inquiry transcripts, videotapes, correspondence, files, and casebooks, which she still needed to itemize.

On July 18, 2001, Mr. McConnery wrote a letter to Ms Hallett setting out which materials he had received and asking if there was further material forthcoming. Ms Hallett responded on July 27 that there were approximately four or five more boxes containing preliminary inquiry transcripts, videotapes, the correspondence file, and casebooks. She explained why it was necessary for her to take the steps she was taking before turning over the material to Mr. McConnery:

Because I am being kept in the dark about the contents of the report and what the police have further alleged about me, I must be extremely cautious about reviewing and copying material which may allow me to rebut false allegations against me similar to those that have already surfaced.

Ms Hallett acknowledged that the process of reviewing, copying, and creating an inventory delayed the handing over of remaining materials to Mr. McConnery. She further acknowledged that perhaps photocopying the whole thing and sending it off to Mr. McConnery would have been a better idea. She said she was doing her best under the circumstances:

... I was doing my best at this point. I was under criminal investigation at this time. I was retaining counsel and getting ready for the York Regional investigation.

I just was confronted with a couple of devastating incidents in my life at this point. I was doing my best to be professional. It was very difficult.

Mr. McConnery testified that there was no urgency as he had been told the priority was the review of the other briefs. He acknowledged, however, that at one point there was a possibility that the trial would be earlier than March 2002 and it would have been helpful for him to have all the materials in Ms Hallett's possession.

On September 14, 2001, Mr. Phillips sent an e-mail to Ms Hallett asking her about the preliminary inquiry transcripts. She responded on September 25, telling Mr. Phillips that she had been sick but had the transcripts and hoped to get them to him. They had not been sent as of October 18, when he sent another e-mail inquiring as to the whereabouts of the transcripts. On November 1, he sent a third e-mail about the transcripts: "Please please please get back to me one way or the other with respect to the transcripts for Fr. MacDonald."

Ms Hallett responded the next day that the boxes would be coming next week. Mr. Phillips made another plea for the transcripts on November 14:

I'm getting a lot of grief here because I have not obtained the prelim transcripts yet. I told Lorne that I would get them over the last month while he was away. Now he's back and I have not accomplished what I told him I would.

...

I can, I suppose, order them again but I'll have to get that ball rolling sooner than later.

On Friday, November 16, Ms Hallett responded to Mr. Phillips advising him that the box of transcripts was to be delivered in Ottawa on Monday. She provided a lengthy explanation about why the material had not been sent earlier, including her need to keep a strict record of everything handed over, her ill health during the fall, and the complications in relation to the Leduc appeal and the criminal investigation into her conduct. She described the latter as having:

... caused catastrophic disruption into both my personal and professional life with many adverse psychological, financial and other ramifications. These have necessitated consulting a number of various professionals and finding the time to prepare for such consultations as well as trying to do some of my own research on the issues of concern to me. My physical and professional survival is my priority at the moment.

She concluded by saying that she would endeavour to get the last shipment out in the following week. The transcripts were sent the following Monday, with a covering letter to Mr. McConnery saying that Ms Hallett was endeavouring to ensure that the next shipment would contain the final materials, including complete correspondence files.

Ms Hallett testified that she understands it is important for a new Crown to review preliminary inquiry transcripts before trial. Mr. McConnery also acknowledged that review of the preliminary inquiry transcripts is one of the priorities in preparation for trial. He did not recall whether he had other copies of the transcripts at this time.

The final delivery of materials, which included the correspondence file, took place on February 27, 2002. The trial was scheduled for March 18. Mr. McConnery agreed that the transition of the file was not ideal and that that he would have liked to and expected to get the materials sooner. This delivery of material was Ms Hallett's final involvement in the Father MacDonald prosecution.

During most of this time, Mr. McConnery was not in contact with Ms Hallett. He understood that she felt she was not in a position to communicate with him, and he had no recollection of speaking with her after their initial discussions in the spring of 2001. He found she was very upset when he talked to her so he tried not to bother her.

Ms Hallett testified that she did not receive any direction or assistance from her supervisors regarding the transfer of the file. When asked about the transition, Deputy Attorney General Murray Segal, who was the Assistant Deputy Attorney General of the Criminal Law Division, said he was not aware how the transition was progressing. He said Ms Hallett is a meticulous person and it was understandable that she would be concerned about accurate record keeping, because the allegations against her in the Leduc matter related in part to what she knew or did not know at the time. Mr. Segal testified that he could not comment about the pace of transition except to say that it appears to have taken some time.

When asked whether someone from the Ministry should have made the decisions about the transfer of the file rather than leaving it to Ms Hallett, Mr. Segal responded that there was direct supervision of the cases by Mr. Stewart. Mr. Segal's understanding was that Ms Hallett was not making any decisions about the case but rather was making decisions about the inventory of material she was turning over; the decisions were not substantive. He recognized, however, that time can drag and that the Ministry could do a better job in ensuring a quick transition in situations when a prosecutor has to be replaced:

... [I]t would not be great if from an institutional point-of-view, the prosecution service was—could be said to be contributing to delay in terms of the interests of the case or victims or witnesses, and ultimately under 11(b) ... it's something we should do better with.

I have previously provided my views on Crown files. This is another example illustrating why the Ministry must maintain possession and control of its files if there is a change in the Crown prosecuting the case. The delay in providing Mr. McConnery with documents relevant to the case was not acceptable. It took almost one year for the complete file to be turned over to the new Crown, with the last delivery being less than one month before the trial was set to begin. I find that the delay was inexcusable.

There was even more urgency in this case given the history of delays in this particular prosecution. In my opinion, the file should have been taken from Ms Hallett as soon as the decision was made that she would no longer continue with the Father MacDonald prosecution. If it was considered necessary, the file could have been photocopied so that Ms Hallett could make her inventory lists.

It is important to note that this case did not involve a change in prosecutor due to illness or scheduling. Rather, Ms Hallett had been accused of wilful non-disclosure in a high-profile case and, as a result, the charges were stayed and she was being investigated. Often when people are under that kind of stress they tend to close up in order to protect themselves from further criticism. It is not surprising that someone in that position would be reluctant to hand over material. In my opinion, the Ministry of the Attorney General should have a protocol in place for when a Crown counsel is accused of misconduct. Files should be removed from that person's possession and, if requested, photocopies made. In addition, a counsellor or support person should be provided to assist the person with the personal trauma associated with an accusation of misconduct.

The Crown Prepares for Trial

On January 24, 2002, Mr. McConnery and Mr. Phillips met with Detective Constable Dupuis and Detective Inspector Hall in Long Sault. They discussed potential witnesses for the Father MacDonald trial. Mr. McConnery testified that this meeting was to address the issue of subpoenas.

On February 6, Mr. McConnery met with Detective Constable Dupuis, primarily about providing transcripts and other things to some of the trial witnesses. He also spoke to defence counsel about the defence position that certain of the Crown complaints should not proceed, in particular those of C-8, Robert Renshaw, Kevin Upper, and C-5. Mr. Neville also raised the issue of who wrote notes found in one of the Dunlop boxes. Mr. McConnery made inquiries of police officers about this, although he can't recall whom he spoke to. The notes were identified as belonging to Sergeant Ron Lefebvre of the Cornwall Police Service. Mr. McConnery recalled that when the notes were identified, Mr. Neville's position was that they should have been disclosed years ago. Mr. McConnery agreed that they should have been disclosed at the time of the initial charges.

This situation again raises the issue of tracking disclosure. Mr. McConnery testified that no systems were in place to track the disclosure. He would have preferred to be able to know with certainty what had been disclosed throughout the proceedings in order to be satisfied that full disclosure had been made. In my view, if the prosecution of charges is proceeding, it is incumbent on all police officers involved in the file to provide the investigator assembling the Crown brief with a copy of their notes. If they are not claiming privilege, police notes are always relevant and should be disclosed. Perhaps it should be the responsibility of the officer preparing the Crown brief to request, obtain, and include the notes. A system has to be established to address this issue within police services.

As part of the preparation for trial, in early 2002, the Crown began to meet with the complainants. On February 27, Mr. McConnery, Mr. Phillips, and Detective Constable Dupuis met with David Silmsers. The purpose of the meeting was to introduce them. According to Mr. McConnery, they also wanted to assess Mr. Silmsers and get a sense of how to deal with him “because he was a bit of a handful.” Mr. McConnery testified that Mr. Silmsers walked out of the meeting after about twenty minutes.

Mr. McConnery said he was trying to be careful not to set Mr. Silmsers off. In his notes of the meeting, Mr. McConnery inserted an addendum about what happened just before Mr. Silmsers left the meeting:

During discussion, as he telling me he didn’t care about this trial, I said if all the [complainants] witnesses are like that it will be a short trial. I said if that’s your attitude, maybe I shouldn’t call him as a witness, and he said that was O.K., he just didn’t care about this case, it wasn’t like his civil trial. This happened shortly before he walked out.

Mr. McConnery testified that he never felt that anything Mr. Silmsers said affected his view of whether or not there was a reasonable prospect of conviction in the case:

He never gave me reason to believe that he didn’t believe in what he was saying and that he was trying to be truthful. He just—he was so angry, so upset, and I felt that he did things at times for effect.

On March 1, Mr. McConnery, Mr. Phillips, and Detective Constable Dupuis met with Robert Renshaw in Kingston. According to Mr. Phillips’ notes, they discussed an interview Mr. Renshaw had at Charles Bourgeois’ office during which Mr. Renshaw said he “wanted to be left out of it,” that Constable Dunlop wanted Mr. Renshaw “to add the stuff [he] wasn’t wanting to talk about,” and that Mr. Renshaw didn’t really have a problem with Father MacDonald. Mr. McConnery testified that he never saw any evidence to suggest that Constable Dunlop had influenced or suggested to Mr. Renshaw what he should say.

I comment further on the Victim/Witness Assistance Program in a later section, but the involvement of a Victim/Witness Assistance worker would have been useful to assist with the transition of the new prosecuting team.

Judge Reassignment Before Trial and Adjournment of Trial

Just before the trial was set to begin on March 18, 2002, there were two changes in the judge and an adjournment. The first assigned judge, Justice Michel Charbonneau, was in a conflict because of his previous involvement as the plaintiff's lawyer in a civil case in which Detective Inspector Smith was a defendant. The plaintiff in that civil case had been criminally charged because of the OPP investigation of the St. Joseph's Training School between 1990 and 1995. The lawsuit was initiated against Detective Inspector Smith and others for malicious prosecution, with the plaintiffs arguing that the defendants failed to disclose all relevant material to the Crown during the criminal trial.

Detective Inspector Smith felt Justice Charbonneau would be in a conflict of interest if he were to be called upon to assess Detective Inspector Smith's credibility as a witness in the Father MacDonald trial. Mr. McConnery testified that Detective Inspector Smith brought this issue to his attention and that he in turn spoke to Mr. Stewart about it. Although Mr. Stewart could not recall this issue, he does not dispute that he may have been the one who dealt with it.

Justice Charbonneau was removed as trial judge and replaced with Justice Douglas Rutherford. This change would delay the start of the trial by approximately one week.

On March 4, Mr. McConnery received a call from Mr. Phillips, who advised him that the Father MacDonald trial was adjourned to April 29, 2002, and was now going to be heard by Justice Dan Chilcott. Mr. McConnery was concerned that the trial had been delayed over a month with no notice or opportunity to address it in court. The delay affected not only Mr. McConnery's schedule but also other people's, as sixty subpoenas had been issued and made returnable for March 18. Mr. McConnery was also starting to meet with the complainants about preparing for trial, and they were not taking news of delay well.

Mr. McConnery had another concern. He had previously had a meeting with Mr. Neville, who expressed concerns about the assignment of Justice Rutherford. According to Mr. McConnery, Mr. Neville was quite upset and asked if he would accompany him to ask the trial coordinator for another judge, preferably Justice Chilcott. Mr. McConnery did not think that was appropriate. As a result, this change raised a flag in his mind: "Mr. Neville had suggested that I go with him to the Trial Coordinator's Office, and so what occurred to me is, not having done that, had he done it unilaterally and the change was done to accommodate his wishes?"

Mr. McConnery said he had no evidence of this. He had no difficulty with the assignment of Justice Chilcott but was bothered by the appearance that Justice Chilcott was the presiding judge because the defence had requested him.

Mr. McConnery brought his concerns regarding the adjournment and the change in trial judge to the attention of Mr. Stewart. On March 5, Mr. McConnery spoke to the Regional Trial Coordinator, Mary Simpson. She denied that defence counsel wanted the judge changed and suggested that he write a letter to Justice Cunningham, the Senior Regional Justice.

On March 7, Mr. Stewart wrote an e-mail to Mr. McConnery outlining some of the issues and options regarding the change in trial judge. Mr. Stewart noted that the Crown would not have been concerned by the assignment of Justice Chilcott, but “now that there is this appearance of judge selection by the accused it is more than a little troubling.” Mr. Stewart suggested that a judge from outside the Eastern Region would have to take over the case:

The only viable course of action is for a new judge from completely out of the East region with no ties to the case or any judge in the East in light of this history and including the appeal on the Leduc matter. The fact that the accused in this case was represented on these very charges earlier by a presently sitting judge who is part of the Leduc appeal is also the basis for an out of town judge.

According to Mr. Stewart, the issue was not with Justice Chilcott. The problem was the discussion between defence counsel and Mr. McConnery about Mr. Neville’s desire to have Justice Chilcott assigned. Mr. Stewart was aware at this point that Mr. McConnery had spoken with the Trial Coordinator.

In the e-mail, Mr. Stewart provided several options for dealing with this issue. Option A was to convene a meeting of the Senior Regional Justice and defence counsel and outline the concerns of the Crown and what the Crown intended to do as a result. Option B involved the Crown stating that a motion would be filed to have the East Bench recuse itself. In the event there was not going to be a change in trial judge, Option C was that the Crown would determine a strategy as to the documents to file on the motion and who should argue it.

Mr. McConnery testified that this e-mail summarized some thoughts regarding concerns of an appearance that the accused selected the judge he wanted for the trial. Although he did not think there would necessarily be concern about this in the public domain, he felt the optics were terrible within the legal community. Mr. McConnery recalled that he and Mr. Stewart talked about bringing a motion to prevent all judges from Eastern Ontario from hearing this matter.

Mr. Stewart attempted to follow through with Option A and convene a meeting with the Senior Regional Justice and defence counsel. He sent an e-mail to Justice Cunningham on March 14. The e-mail deals with the adjournment of the trial but says nothing about the issue of getting an out-of-region judge:

The concern that the Crown has revolves around the recent re-scheduling of this matter from the March date to the end of April a period of 6 weeks or so without any consultation by any trial co-ordinator with the Crown.

Mr. Stewart said what he wanted to do was get into Chambers and find out why the judge was changed and the matter adjourned. Mr. Stewart thought there might be a problem in trying to change Justice Chilcott because the Crown had been content with Justice Rutherford, who was also from the Eastern Region, and the Crown would have been content with Justice Chilcott had he been initially assigned. Mr. Stewart was concerned that if they attempted to remove Justice Chilcott the Crown would be accused of judge shopping. At this point, Mr. Stewart felt all he had was a coincidence and he didn't want to put in writing an allegation against senior counsel without any evidence of wrongdoing. Mr. McConnery shared Mr. Stewart's opinion that the Crown had no difficulty with Justice Chilcott but for the appearance that he was the presiding judge because the defence had wanted him assigned.

Mr. Stewart received a letter in response from Justice Cunningham indicating he felt it was unnecessary for Mr. Stewart and Mr. Neville to meet with him further on the issue. He said the change came about because of a shortage of judicial resources in the Eastern Region.

As to the fact that Justice Cunningham did not get to hear Mr. Stewart's global concerns about perception and appearance, Mr. Stewart reiterated that the problem was that the Crown had been content with Justice Rutherford and he was from the area. The Crown did not raise any concerns at that time about wanting an out-of-region judge.

At some point, Mr. Stewart and Mr. McConnery had a discussion with Mr. Segal about this issue. He advised that he did not want them to proceed with a motion to have the East Bench recuse itself.

It is clear from the documents and testimony that the Crown had concerns about the delay of the trial and the change in judge. In his letter to Justice Cunningham, Mr. Stewart raised only the issue of the delay, and this concern was addressed by the Regional Senior Justice. This was a missed opportunity for the Crown to bring to the attention of the Regional Senior Justice its concern about the change of judge. As a result, Justice Cunningham was deprived of the opportunity to deal with this issue. There should be a mechanism whereby the Crown and defence counsel can bring issues before an administrative justice in an open and timely manner.

Lorne McConnery Provides Further Disclosure to Defence

On March 11, 2002, Mr. McConnery sent a letter to Mr. Neville enclosing notes of Detective Inspector Smith and wrote that Detective Constable Fagan had retired and he was attempting to recover his original notes. On April 10, Mr. Phillips wrote a letter to Mr. Neville enclosing materials from Detective Constable Fagan. Mr. McConnery acknowledged that these notes ought to have been disclosed long before this date. He reiterated that it would have been of assistance to have some kind of summary or registry to track disclosure.

Mr. McConnery testified that early in 2002 it was clear there would be a stay application heard at the commencement of trial. He knew one of the arguments advanced would be timeliness of disclosure. According to Mr. McConnery, one has to look at the disclosure and determine whether or not it is significant. He acknowledged that the notes of Detective Inspector Smith and Detective Constable Fagan could have been critical. Mr. McConnery testified that frequently, Detective Inspectors' notes are not turned over because while Detective Inspectors direct the investigation, they do not interview or deal with witnesses. In my view, if the defence thinks certain material is important, the Crown should review the material in question and decide whether it should be disclosed. A tracking system for disclosure could have prevented a number of recurring issues that put the Crown in a difficult position.

Lorne McConnery Withdraws Charges Related to C-8 and C-2

On March 12, 2002, Mr. McConnery interviewed C-8 to prepare him for trial. C-8's earlier testimony in the preliminary inquiry and his involvement in the prosecution of another accused had caused Mr. McConnery concern about the Crown decision to proceed on his charges. When Mr. McConnery read the preliminary transcript, he thought it was abundantly clear that C-8 was not being truthful on a number of issues. Mr. McConnery had significant concerns about the reasonable prospect of conviction and wanted to meet with C-8 to assess whether he was attempting to tell the truth. Mr. McConnery wanted him to understand that if they proceeded, C-8 was going to have a very difficult time.

Mr. McConnery's notes of the interview state that C-8 wanted the charges dropped. Mr. McConnery was not taken aback by this and believes an OPP officer had told him this before his meeting with C-8. Mr. McConnery's view was that C-8 was prepared to say whatever he had to say to get out of this trial. Mr. McConnery testified that he was not obliged to withdraw the charges because the complainant did not want to proceed. However, he was already close to withdrawing the charges before this interview.

Mr. McConnery continued to talk to C-8 about his relationship with Constable Dunlop, about the videotapes seized from Ron Leroux's house in 1993, and about the allegation he made against Father MacDonald regarding the incident that allegedly occurred at his father's funeral. C-8 told the Crown that this incident never occurred. Mr. McConnery said that C-8 conveyed to him that his real concern was abuse by Mr. Leroux and that "Dunlop kept pushing the priest": "C-8 kept saying to me, that Dunlop kept saying 'More is better. More is better.'... It was like a mantra."

Mr. McConnery testified that he felt C-8 had destroyed his own credibility. Although there was a real potential that Constable Dunlop had played a role, Mr. McConnery “couldn’t jump to that condemnation alone of Perry Dunlop” based on what C-8 told him. However, it crossed his mind that perhaps Constable Dunlop had been instrumental in the untruths Mr. McConnery heard from C-8.

Mr. McConnery advised defence counsel before the charges were formally withdrawn. He does not know when C-8 was informed.

Mr. McConnery also made the decision to withdraw the counts relating to C-2. He had a meeting with C-2 on March 13. According to Mr. McConnery, he did not approach this meeting in the same way as he had the meeting with C-8, but he also had concerns about the reasonable prospect of conviction regarding C-2’s allegations before he met with him. A primary reason for this meeting was so Mr. McConnery could make a personal assessment of C-2.

During this interview, C-2 for the first time added a recently deceased family member as a possible participant in the group activity referred to in his allegation. Upon reviewing the material from C-2, Mr. McConnery felt there was a progression in his story that was concerning.

A lot of the discussion with C-2 was about Constable Dunlop. Mr. McConnery was not sure whether this was his concern or if C-2 just spent a lot of time talking about it. Mr. McConnery was, however, aware of the issue of Constable Dunlop’s involvement with the various complainants.

Mr. McConnery met with C-2 on the second day of the hearing to advise him of his decision to drop the charges. He said that C-2 was very angry.

Mr. McConnery tried to explain to C-2 that he had spoken to a number of prosecutors about his evidence and that it was Ministry policy to assess the prospect of conviction. Mr. McConnery told C-2 that he could not in good conscience say he felt there was a reasonable prospect of conviction. Although Mr. McConnery did not speak to any other Project Truth Crown other than Mr. Phillips about C-2’s allegations, he did run his decision by other members of the Barrie Crown Attorney’s Office.

Defence Brings an Application for a Stay Under Section 11(b) of the Charter

On or about March 26, 2002, the defence filed an application to have the proceedings stayed on the basis that there was an unreasonable delay in bringing the matter to trial, which violated Father MacDonald’s right to a trial within a reasonable time under section 11(b) of the Charter.

When the stay application was brought, Detective Constable Dupuis raised with Mr. McConnery, and possibly Detective Inspector Hall, the conversation he recalled between Mr. Pelletier and Mr. Neville that occurred in the hallway of an Ottawa courthouse sometime before January 26, 1998.

Mr. McConnery testified that following this discussion with Detective Constable Dupuis, he met with Mr. Pelletier. According to Mr. McConnery, the record was clear that there was no waiver and Mr. Pelletier was aware there was no waiver. Mr. Pelletier had no recollection of discussions with Mr. Neville as described by Detective Constable Dupuis. As such, Mr. McConnery was of the view that he could not advance an argument of waiver based on this information from Detective Constable Dupuis.

Stay Application Hearing

The stay application was heard over a number of days starting on April 29, 2002. During his submissions, Mr. McConnery acknowledged that there was an exceptional amount of delay, seventy-three months, and that there had been no waiver of section 11(b) rights.

Mr. McConnery's position was that in acknowledging the excessive delay, he had to examine the reasons for the delay and try to ensure the Court understood that each and every delay was at the time well reasoned and properly sought by the Crown. On the other hand, the Crown had been aware that there was a risk to those requests. It was Mr. McConnery's belief that both Mr. Pelletier and Ms Hallett were very aware of the risk and exercised the best judgment they could in light of what was becoming an incredibly complex prosecution. He thought if the Court understood that and understood the reasons for the delay, this would offset somewhat the excessiveness of the delay.

Mr. McConnery felt the most significant issue was the societal interest in hearing this allegation:

... This was a situation where we had a community that was ripped apart in many respects by this, and I can tell you I recall feeling at the end of the application that Justice Chilcott was critical of me because he kept telling me, "Mr. McConnery, do I need to remind you this is a criminal trial, it's not a public inquiry?"

Mr. McConnery's position was that Constable Dunlop was somewhat of a renegade and that the Crown should not be held completely responsible for what he had done. Mr. McConnery felt that the situation with Constable Dunlop was very different from that with other police officers.

Mr. McConnery was also of the view that everybody, including Father MacDonald, his counsel, and the Crown, preferred to have one trial, although he recognized that delaying a trial raises the risk of section 11(b) becoming a factor: “It was a very complex matter and I believe Ms Hallett felt that the complexities outweighed the delays that were being caused by the adjournments.”

The Crown called Mr. Dunlop as a witness on the stay application. Mr. McConnery felt it was necessary to call Mr. Dunlop because he felt that he was responsible for some of the delay and it was incumbent to call him to explore that delay:

I felt there was a real need to explore the issues that he presented us, to try to get some picture of the truth of what he was doing, as opposed to the general view that was out there ... I had no idea if he was going to help or hurt the 11(b) application, but I felt it was essential the court hear from Dunlop because the court would be able to assess whether or not we as prosecutors or the investigators should have, could have, done more than they did to move it along.

Mr. McConnery testified that the examination of Mr. Dunlop developed into a cross-examination more than he had intended, but “it wasn’t an angry or confrontational cross-examination.” Mr. McConnery thought Mr. Dunlop made broad over-generalizations and he felt an obligation to explore those. Mr. McConnery also thought Mr. Dunlop was evasive on many matters during the 11(b) hearing. Mr. McConnery did not think he examined Mr. Dunlop differently than he would any other evasive witness. He never asked that Mr. Dunlop be declared a hostile witness.

Mr. McConnery made notes of his contacts with Mr. Dunlop about his travel arrangements to attend at the hearing. Mr. McConnery was trying to arrange for him to come to Cornwall on Thursday, April 25, so he could review his materials. Mr. Dunlop’s counsel advised Mr. McConnery that Mr. Dunlop could not come until Saturday, April 27, because of his employment. Mr. McConnery was then advised that Mr. Dunlop wanted a flight on April 28 and a return flight on May 1. Mr. McConnery testified that he spent a lot of time on these arrangements and would not ordinarily do this.

On April 29, Mr. McConnery met with Mr. Dunlop in person for the first time. They discussed some general issues about Mr. Dunlop’s involvement and why he made some of the decisions he did. Mr. McConnery did not tell Mr. Dunlop that he was intending to take a slightly different approach with him as a witness. He did, however, tell Mr. Dunlop that he was going to disclose the notes of their meeting to defence counsel. He had Mr. Dunlop initial them. Mr. McConnery felt it necessary to disclose the notes because he had never met Mr. Dunlop. He had not previously filed an affidavit trying to capture his evidence because Mr. Dunlop would not speak to him when he called.

Mr. McConnery testified that if he had told Mr. Dunlop that he might have to cross-examine him on the stand, Mr. Dunlop would have walked out of the interview. Mr. McConnery felt that Mr. Dunlop had created this situation by his refusal to cooperate. He did not want to come down the week before or to be involved at all with police officers. According to Mr. McConnery, he did not do anything underhanded with Mr. Dunlop:

I think when I called him as a witness I tried to get as clear a picture of what he did as I could get for the court. And if that meant I pressed him a little bit, I did that.

Justice Chilcott Grants the Stay

On May 13, 2002, Justice Chilcott granted the application for a stay of proceedings based on unreasonable delay. With respect to the Crown's decision to join the charges, Justice Chilcott held that the Crown should have proceeded with the first set of charges and set a trial date as soon as possible after Father MacDonald was committed to stand trial in October 1997.

He further found that although it may have seemed reasonable and desirable to try the first and second sets of charges together, "the reasonableness aspect should have been superseded by the fear of an application for the relief as provided in Section 11(b) of the Charter." Justice Chilcott also found that the Crown contributed to the delay by using C-2 as a complainant, appreciating the impact it would have on the pending May 1, 2000, trial date.

Justice Chilcott found as a fact that the greatest contributor to the delay was Mr. Dunlop, and found that Mr. Dunlop was deceitful:

Mr. Dunlop had significant information relating to this prosecution. He had conducted his own investigation, and continued to investigate while the proceedings were ongoing. He continued to undertake to provide, and promised to provide, the material he had and to have no contact with the media. There were oral and written instructions that he was ordered to comply with. He refused to provide the statements and documentation until he had seriously imperiled this prosecution and it was too late to be salvaged.

Now it is clear that Dunlop was trusted at the time, and that was a mistake. Mr. Dunlop was the cause of a large part of the delay ... I do not attribute the delay by reason of Dunlop's actions or lack thereof to any part because of his purposeful deceit and deception. However, if I had to charge that delay to some party, I would, as a result of considering all the circumstances, have to lay it at the feet of the Crown because the Crown and the police were aware of Perry Dunlop's procrastination and deception and his reluctance to provide the material.

As discussed in Chapter 7, I have made some findings with respect to Perry Dunlop's actions. While I agree with Justice Chilcott's decision and reasoning on this issue, I find that had someone from the Ministry of the Attorney General been assigned to oversee Project Truth prosecutions from the outset and on a full-time basis, the Crown might have better appreciated Constable Dunlop's impact on Project Truth cases and as a result might have been able to take swifter and more decisive action to deal with the issue.

Mr. McConnery advised Mr. Stewart about the decision on the stay on May 13, 2002. He requested that Mr. McConnery write a letter to Paul Lindsay, the Director of the Crown Law Office—Criminal, about a possible appeal.

On June 5, 2002, Mr. McConnery wrote to Mr. Lindsay. Mr. McConnery did not see an obvious error in the decision. He was requesting a review regarding a possible appeal because of the community interest and the need for the community to have a trial in this matter. On June 18, 2002, John Pearson, the Director of Crown Operations, Western Region, wrote to Mr. Segal about the decision not to appeal Justice Chilcott's decision. The letter concluded that an appeal would not be sought:

In conclusion, it cannot be said that the trial judge disregarded, misapprehended or failed to appreciate relevant evidence bearing upon issues of significance to the decision to stay the proceedings. Moreover, His Honour's legal analysis discloses no errors of law. Consequently, it is opinion that the Reasons for Judgment in R. v. MacDonald disclose no grounds of appeal on which the Crown can appeal the stay of proceedings.

Managing Delay Due to Joinder of Charges

Father MacDonald was initially committed to stand trial on charges involving the original three complainants, David Silmser, John MacDonald, and C-3, on October 24, 1997. A number of events and decisions made by the Crowns involved in this matter delayed the proceedings. One of the most important, if not crucial, decisions was to delay the trial to permit new charges to be joined to the original ones, as complainants came forward. That decision was first taken by Mr. Pelletier, who recognized that it was a calculated risk in favour of the Crown.

Ms Hallett was then assigned to prosecute the file. She reviewed the file, assessed the situation, and ultimately came to the same conclusion as Mr. Pelletier.

Mr. McConnery then inherited the file, and by that time the stage had been set for the delay application.

The decision to join all charges together was made by experienced trial lawyers, applying the law as they saw fit at the time. While in hindsight the option to proceed on separate indictments may have been preferable, one cannot fault the decision.

However, knowing that it was a calculated risk and that the delay would become a live issue at trial, the Crown should have made the issue front and centre at every court appearance and should have constantly monitored the progress of the charges.

R. v. Jacques Leduc: First Trial

Crown Discusses Criminal Charges With OPP

In or around mid-May 1998, Ontario Provincial Police Detective Inspector Tim Smith advised Crown Attorney Robert Pelletier that complaints of a sexual nature had been made against local lawyer Jacques Leduc and that the OPP was intending to investigate. On May 22, Mr. Pelletier was updated about the investigation and it was requested that a Crown be assigned. Mr. Pelletier advised that he had not found a Crown to assign yet but should be able to advise Detective Inspector Smith the following week.

On June 18, Detective Inspector Smith left a message for Mr. Pelletier that Mr. Leduc should be arrested immediately for two reasons. First, it had become common knowledge that the police were investigating him. Second, Mr. Leduc was attempting to hire one of his alleged victims to work for him over the summer. As a result, Detective Inspector Smith did not think the police should wait until July 9, the date on which a number of suspects were to be charged, to lay charges against Mr. Leduc.

As discussed in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the OPP, charges were laid against Mr. Leduc on June 22 with respect to the allegations of C-16 and C-17. A third complainant, C-22, came forward later.

Case Assigned to Shelley Hallett

On or around July 2, 1998, Crown Attorney Shelley Hallett was assigned to the Leduc case. She had a short meeting with Milan Rupic, who was at the time the Director or Acting Director of Special Investigations of the Crown Law Office—Criminal. During this meeting, she was asked to take on a number of Project Truth matters, including the Jacques Leduc file.

When Ms Hallett was assigned to these matters, she had no knowledge of the Project Truth investigations. She believed she was assigned because the three files concerned individuals involved in the administration of justice. She relied on the Project Truth officers to provide her with some background information when she first came to Cornwall.

Amendments to Charges

The charges against Mr. Leduc were amended on July 17, 1998. Ms Hallett provided the Project Truth officers with some comments about why she thought the wording of the charges should be changed. She testified that she was thinking about issues regarding consent and the different ways in which the offence of sexual exploitation can be committed. She was considering, for example, that if this was a jury trial, and the jury had a reasonable doubt about consent, this would not be an issue for an offence where consent was not a factor.

One change Ms Hallett recommended was the addition of a charge under section 212.4 of the Criminal Code, the offence of obtaining sexual services from a youth for consideration. The police amended the charges following her suggestions.

Shelley Hallett Receives Letter From Gerry Langlois

Sometime in July 1998, Ms Hallett had a very brief telephone conversation with C-16's civil counsel, Gerry Langlois. Mr. Langlois advised Ms Hallett about a piece of additional disclosure he had received from his client. She testified that she told him "very emphatically" to contact the Project Truth officers; she was not equipped to investigate any further allegations and this should be done by the police. The officers thus became aware of further information relating to gifts given by Mr. Leduc to C-16. Ms Hallett believed the OPP took an additional video statement from C-16 in which there was an escalation in the seriousness of the alleged sexual acts.

On August 5, Ms Hallett received a letter from Mr. Langlois, dated July 23, which referred to C-16 attending counselling and to the timing and frequency of alleged incidents. As will be discussed below, this letter was disclosed only upon the request of the defence at the beginning of the trial, in January 2001.

A judicial pre-trial was held in the R. v. Leduc matter on November 23, 1998. On November 25, the preliminary inquiry date was set for April 1999.

C-22 Provides a Statement

As discussed in Chapter 7, a third complainant against Mr. Leduc, C-22, was initially reluctant to provide a statement to the police or to become involved in the investigation or prosecution. Ms Hallett was aware of an attempt to interview C-22 in June 1998, at which time he did not want to provide a formal statement although he was not denying that something had happened. On July 15, she called Detective Inspector Pat Hall and requested that he make another attempt to interview C-22.

Another attempt was made to obtain a formal statement on July 30. Although C-22 conceded that sexual misconduct had occurred with Mr. Leduc, he was not comfortable coming forward and making a formal statement. As discussed in Chapter 7, Detective Constables Joe Dupuis and Steve Seguin told C-22 that he could be subpoenaed. Ms Hallett could not recall if she was aware of that and did not believe she suggested this approach. She wanted to speak with C-22 before going this route: “That’s a rather stressful and intimidating kind of approach to a witness who might have very relevant evidence to give.”

Indeed, all investigators dealing with alleged victims of historical sexual abuse must keep in mind the emotional fragility of such witnesses, as was explained by Dr. Wolfe and Dr. Jaffe.

Ms Hallett attended with Detective Constables Dupuis and Seguin at C-22’s residence on November 24, 1998. She told C-22 that she believed he had material evidence to provide in this case and requested that he accompany the officers to the police detachment to provide a statement. According to Ms Hallett, she spent less than fifteen minutes with the officers in speaking with C-22. She told the officers that she just wanted to see if he would agree to provide a videotaped interview. They did not discuss any substantive or material part of his allegations. C-22 agreed to attend the Long Sault Detachment, where he gave a videotaped statement. Ms Hallett did not attend the interview but spoke with the officers to get a brief synopsis afterward.

Ms Hallett acknowledged that it was unusual for her to accompany the police to encourage a complainant to make a statement but said it is consistent with the duties of a Crown attorney under the Crown Attorneys Act to cause further investigation by the police and have evidence collected:

And Crown Attorneys are often in a position of trying to persuade reluctant witnesses who are holding the truth captive, as has been expressed by the Supreme Court of Canada in KGB for example. Crown Attorneys are often in a position of persuading those kind of reluctant witnesses to be forthcoming with what they know about a matter and to testify or give a truthful statement to the police and to the court.

Although it was not something she did frequently, Ms Hallett said she at times persuaded or encouraged reluctant witnesses to provide evidence and this was consistent with her duties as a Crown. Detective Constable Dupuis thought it was unusual for Ms Hallett to be involved at this stage of the investigation, but he did not think the meeting was improper.

Practice Memorandum PM [2005] No. 34 replaced the 1997 Policy P-1 “Police—Relationship with Crown Counsel. I have alluded to this memorandum in other sections of this chapter. It provides the following recommendation to a Crown at the pre-charge stage of an investigation, when giving case-specific advice:

It is unwise for Crown Counsel to participate directly in the gathering of evidence at the pre-charge stage of an investigation. Crown counsel should avoid direct involvement in statement taking or attending a fresh crime scene to supervise the gathering of evidence. Any such participation may lead to a blurring of our role as advisors and prosecutors and impair our ability to review independently a charge after an Information is sworn. Direct participation in the evidence gathering process may make us witnesses rather than advocates.

Ms Hallett’s involvement with C-22 to convince him to provide a statement and participate in the prosecution of Mr. Leduc went beyond the call of duty. As indicated in the practice memorandum, Crown counsel must be careful in becoming involved in the investigation as there is a risk that the Crown could become a witness. As long as the Crown is aware of this risk and is careful, as Ms Hallett was here, it is not improper for Crown counsel to speak with a reluctant witness or complainant.

Delay in Transcribing C-22’s Interview

Ms Hallett testified there was some delay in the preparation of the transcript of C-22’s videotaped interview, which she received only on February 18, 1999, nearly four months after the interview was conducted. She was not prepared to recommend further charges without it. She acknowledged that she could have made a decision to proceed separately on the new charges but she felt it was still early enough in the process that waiting would not prejudice the accused.

Ms Hallett did not take any steps to expedite the transcription. Although she was concerned about delay, she was also very concerned about the seriousness of the complainant’s allegations. She felt there was another month before the preliminary inquiry during which defence counsel could review the material.

In my view, the delay in having the interview transcribed was too long. Transcripts must be produced in a timely manner.

Information Sworn on C-22's Allegations

On March 9, 1999, Ms Hallett wrote a letter to Detective Inspector Hall recommending that new charges be added to the information in respect of C-22's allegations. She had had the transcript to review for more than two weeks, since February 18. She testified that she was concerned about delay but that the nature of the allegation was a countervailing consideration.

A new information was sworn on March 11. It included five counts of sexual assault, one count of sexual interference, one count of invitation to sexual touching, six counts of sexual exploitation, and three counts of obtaining sexual services for consideration, involving three separate victims.

Defence Counsel Advised of New Charges

Also on March 9, Ms Hallett advised defence counsel that a videotaped statement had been taken from C-22 on November 24, 1998, and that new charges were being laid against Mr. Leduc. The Crown attorney suggested that with respect to these new charges the matter be put over to April 8, 1999, the date of the preliminary inquiry, rather than making an interim appearance in court. She felt this would involve less publicity.

Ms Hallett further advised that she was sending a copy of the transcript of the interview separately and would provide a copy of the videotape as soon as possible. At this point, she had not yet received a copy of the videotape. She requested that Michael Edelson, defence counsel for Mr. Leduc, let her know if the arrangements outlined were unsatisfactory.

Defence Raises Disclosure Issues

Mr. Edelson responded to Ms Hallett's letter on the same day, expressing some concerns about the timeliness of disclosure. In particular, he wrote that she had not advised him during the judicial pre-trial on November 25, 1998, that C-22 had made a statement on November 24. Mr. Edelson was also concerned that Ms Hallett had not disclosed the video of C-22's statement earlier.

Ms Hallett wrote a reply to Mr. Edelson on March 15, 1999. She pointed out that the judicial pre-trial took place on November 23 rather than November 25, that is, one day before C-22 provided a statement. Ms Hallett did not know on November 23 whether C-22 would provide a statement or be a witness in this matter. She also told Mr. Edelson that she had not yet received the videotape and requested that he execute an enclosed disclosure agreement in respect of the C-22 videotape. On October 20, 1998, Ms Hallett had requested an order with respect to conditions restricting the copying and return of videotapes of the two earlier complainants in the matter. Justice Paul Bélanger further ordered that the conditions apply with respect to any other videotape.

Despite having this order from Justice Bélanger, Ms Hallett wanted an express statement from defence counsel that this order would apply to the videotape statement of C-22. She testified that the fastest thing would have been for Mr. Edelson to call her and state that he agreed the order applied to this particular tape, which “might have speeded things up a bit.” When Ms Hallett received the written undertaking on March 17, she disclosed the tape to Mr. Edelson.

With respect to the delay in advising defence counsel of C-22’s allegations and the potential for further charges, Ms Hallett said that as of November 24, 1998, she did not know if further charges would be laid. Before disclosing the statement she wanted to review the allegations, consider all the evidence obtained by the officers, and make a meaningful decision as to whether further charges should be laid.

Ms Hallett acknowledged that the issue of timeliness of disclosure was raised in 2004, when she was no longer working on the file. The events of this prosecution, which will be outlined in detail in this section, ultimately led to an application to stay the charges for delay in the fall of 2004. In preparation for this application, Crown counsel Lidia Narozniak and Christine Tier prepared a memorandum about delays. They concluded that most of them were attributable to the Crown. Attached to this memorandum was a disclosure timeline and a list of the “most troubling aspects of the delayed disclosure.” Ms Hallett had no input into these documents. While she agreed with some points contained in them, she disagreed with others. I am of the view that Ms Hallett should have been consulted when putting this memorandum together to ensure that the new Crowns were aware of Ms Hallett’s perspective about some of the delays and the circumstances surrounding them.

The list attached to the memorandum was titled, “Top Six Disclosure Problems of the Crown.” The first item listed is the November 24, 1998, videotaped statement of C-22, which was not disclosed until weeks before the preliminary inquiry. As discussed, Ms Hallett was not aware when the statement was taken whether charges would ensue. I am of the view that Ms Hallett should have advised defence counsel earlier about the existence of another complainant, despite the fact that she was not sure yet if charges would be laid, given that the preliminary inquiry was proceeding on April 8, 1999. Even if charges were never laid, I believe that the Crown would have had to disclose C-22’s statement.

The second problem mentioned in the list is the disclosure of Volume 2 of the brief, which was in Ms Hallett’s possession on August 19, 1998, but was not disclosed until March 15, 1999. This volume included C-22’s July 30, 1998, statement, in which he acknowledged, for the first time, sexual activity with Mr. Leduc but refused to provide a formal statement. Ms Hallett acknowledged that this was a mistake. She thought Volume 2 had already been disclosed:

We had both gone through the pre-trial conference, two of them, in the fall and neither of us had had Volume 2. It had come in with a number of inserts for Volume 1. That's the way I received it and so I was thinking that these were updates only that I was getting with respect to Volume 1. I didn't realize I was also getting a Volume 2. When I did find out that that had occurred, I enclosed it in a cover letter along with Volume 3.

And that was definitely a failing on my part and I was very sorry about that.

Ms Hallett did not know if keeping a disclosure log would have prevented this mistake. She explained that she has never worked with a log or register and keeps track of disclosure through correspondence since she prepares cover letters for everything disclosed. She testified that the police tracked what was disclosed and she relied on them. Ms Hallett was not sure that having a disclosure register would have helped her get Volume 2 of the brief to defence counsel sooner.

The third problem listed related to Volume 5 of the brief, which was disclosed on November 14, 2000, but included statements taken the year before. Ms Hallett testified that OPP officers assembled Volume 5 and she disclosed it to the defence as soon as she received it. She assumed that the majority of Volume 5 contained recently collected material with perhaps one or two older statements that had been overlooked. The volume in fact contained three statements taken in June and July 1999, and two statements taken in May 2000. Also included was a will-state and notes of Detective Constable Dupuis for the period March 30, 1999, to October 11, 2000. Although she can't recall why these documents were disclosed later, Ms Hallett testified that she did not delay in handing them over in any way.

The fourth item on the list is a second statement from C-17 taken on June 9, 1998, which included many additional substantive details regarding his allegations. This was disclosed ten months later on April 12, 1999. Ms Hallett testified that she did not know why it was not disclosed earlier but acknowledged that it ought to have been.

The fifth item on the list was the letter Ms Hallett received from C-16's civil counsel, Gerry Langlois, in the summer of 1998, which was disclosed at the start of trial, as mentioned above. Ms Hallett testified that she put the letter in her correspondence file and therefore was not thinking about it for disclosure purposes. She noted, however, that the information about the letter would have been recorded in Detective Constable Seguin's notes, because Ms Hallett contacted him after receiving the call from Mr. Langlois.

Most items on this list relate to delays in disclosure that could have been prevented. As I have previously stated, there should be a disclosure log or register system implemented in all Crown offices to track when disclosure is received from the investigators, when it is disclosed to the accused or defence counsel, and what was disclosed. There was no appropriate system to manage and track disclosure in the Project Truth prosecutions.

Defence Seeks an Adjournment: Shelley Hallett May Be Subpoenaed to Testify

On March 26, 1999, Mr. Leduc's lawyer, Michael Edelson, wrote a letter to Ms Hallett enclosing a notice of application for an adjournment to be heard on March 30. The defence was seeking an adjournment "pending full and complete disclosure from the Crown." As a "matter of professional courtesy," he also advised her that her personal involvement in the investigation and continuing non-disclosure would "inevitably" lead to her being served with a subpoena to testify at the preliminary inquiry or trial.

Ms Hallett was concerned about some inaccuracies in the notice of application. For example, she felt that the paragraph referring to the non-disclosure of the videotaped statements of certain complainants and witnesses stated the situation incorrectly, because she had simply insisted on the undertaking before disclosing the tape. She also took issue with the characterization, in the supporting affidavit, of a number of things as being outstanding disclosure issues.

Ms Hallett wrote a responding letter on March 29, enclosing a copy of the affidavit on which she noted some of her objections. In particular, she noted that some of the requests for additional disclosure pertained to material that had been in the defence's possession since July 1998, and this was the first time a request for follow-up disclosure had been made regarding this material. There were also a number of items listed by the defence that Ms Hallett did not think needed to be disclosed. These included requests relating to meetings between Crown counsel and witnesses to be called by the Crown in this case. In her letter, Ms Hallett advised that these meetings were not investigative interviews conducted by the police and that the Crown is entitled to have such meetings with witnesses "for the purpose of getting to know them and the nature of the evidence they will give in court."

The application was heard on March 30, and Ms Hallett consented to the adjournment. She testified that she consented although she disagreed with many of the outstanding disclosure issues the defence submitted. She was meeting the disclosure obligations as they arose.

Shelley Hallett's Memo to James Ramsay About Her Co-Counsel

Although Ms Hallett was never summonsed to testify, she was concerned at the time about having a co-counsel who could continue with the prosecution if she was removed from the case. On August 27, 1999, Ms Hallett wrote to James Ramsay, Deputy Director, Trial Assignment, and asked that Erika Chozik be assigned as her co-counsel on the Leduc matter. Ms Chozik had experience as an assistant trial Crown and Ms Hallett felt she would have been a very good, strong co-counsel on this case.

Ms Hallett testified that although Ms Tier, her co-counsel on the Leduc matter, was very good and had other strengths, she did not have much trial experience. Ms Hallett's request was not acted upon. While I did not hear any evidence about how this request was considered by Mr. Ramsay or his colleagues, I would hope that such a request would be given serious consideration.

Preliminary Inquiry

The preliminary inquiry in R. v. Leduc was held in November 1999. There were sixteen charges in the amended indictment, and the Judge committed Mr. Leduc to stand trial on thirteen of those charges. Ms Hallett prepared an indictment containing all of those counts. When she realized it would be a jury trial, she prepared a second indictment on January 15, 2001, including only the offences of sexual exploitation: "I felt that the jury would have an easier time understanding only those counts with respect to which consent would not have been available as a defence."

The first indictment remained in reserve, and Ms Hallett would have probably withdrawn it at the end of the trial. According to Ms Hallett, these counts were before the court in abeyance; she did not withdraw them herself.

Pre-Trial Conference

The pre-trial conference took place in early 2000, shortly after the preliminary inquiry. The trial date was set for January 2001. According to Ms Hallett, there were other earlier dates available but Mr. Edelson requested this date and waived any section 11(b) issue with respect to the delay in the trial.

Trial Begins in R. v. Leduc

On January 15, 2001, the trial in R. v. Leduc commenced before Justice Colin McKinnon. The first day was spent on pre-trial matters, and Ms Hallett began calling evidence on January 16. She asked Justice McKinnon for a publication ban on the identity of the alleged victims. This ban was to cover all forms in which information might be published, including the Internet. There was a particular concern about the website operated by Richard Nadeau.

On January 17, defence counsel advised Justice McKinnon that Mr. Nadeau had placed some information about the preceding day on his website. Consequently, Ms Hallett consented to the defence's request for a re-election for a trial by judge alone. On or around January 22, Mr. Nadeau was cited in contempt of court for continuing to publish information on his website. On January 29, Mr. Nadeau was ordered to remove the material from the website because it was in breach of the publication ban. These events are discussed in more detail in the "Websites" section of this chapter.

C-16's Mother Testifies About Contacts With Constable Perry Dunlop

On February 7, 2001, C-16's mother testified. While being cross-examined by defence counsel, she stated she had two contacts with Constable Perry Dunlop. Ultimately the dates of these contacts were identified as May 8 and June 15, 1998. Furthermore, she testified that Detective Constable Dupuis was aware of the second contact because he was present in her home when she received the call. Ms Hallett testified that when she heard the evidence she was "astonished," as it was the first time she had heard of any contacts between Constable Dunlop and witnesses in this matter. She believed the evidence also surprised the officers.

As discussed in Chapter 7, Detective Constable Dupuis acknowledged that he had never made Ms Hallett aware of this incident. Once Ms Hallett learned of this contact, she felt it was relevant and that any material the Crown had in its possession with respect to Constable Dunlop should be disclosed to the defence.

Ms Hallett testified that up until February 7, 2001, the trial was progressing well.

Detective Inspector Pat Hall Brings References in Perry Dunlop's Will-State of Contacts With C-16's Mother to Court

As discussed in Chapter 7, Detective Constable Dupuis contacted Detective Inspector Hall to advise him of what had occurred during the cross-examination of C-16's mother. As a result, Detective Inspector Hall came to court with copies of references from Constable Dunlop's will-state and notes, as well as a copy of his notes of the July 1998 meeting with Constable Dunlop and Detective Inspector Smith. The entry in Detective Constable Dupuis' notebook of the June 15, 1998, contact between Constable Dunlop and C-16's mother was not located until a number of days later. Immediately Ms Hallett thought this was inadvertence, mistake, or oversight. She did not think the officers had intentionally withheld information.

During the lunch break on February 7, there was a meeting between the Crown, police, and defence counsel. Crowns and police present at this meeting were Ms Hallett's co-counsel Ms Tier, Detective Inspector Hall, Detective Constable Dupuis, Detective Constable Seguin, a law student, and Ms Hallett. The meeting was brief. The materials that Detective Inspector Hall had brought to court were shared with defence counsel at this time. According to Ms Hallett, during the course of the meeting, defence counsel were aggressive and critical of the officers. They were being critical about the fact that Project Truth officers had not included references of their meeting with Perry Dunlop on July 23, 1998, in their notes and in the brief. They suggested that the officers had wilfully attempted to suppress references to contacts between Constable Dunlop and C-16's mother.

Ms Hallett testified that during this meeting, defence counsel did not indicate they intended to bring an application to stay the proceedings as a result of this disclosure issue. The defence requested material and the Crown was going to provide it. At this time, Ms Hallett was not sure what the result of the new information would be.

“This Is All News to Me” Comment by Shelley Hallett

Ms Hallett testified that when Detective Inspector Hall provided the documents of the meeting he and Detective Inspector Smith had with Constable Dunlop on July 23, 1998, to defence counsel, she said, “This is all news to me.” She was referring to the meeting between the officers and Constable Dunlop, which she was learning about for the first time. Ms Hallett had not seen any reference to that meeting in any notes, nor had she obtained Detective Constable Dupuis' notes of the contact between Constable Dunlop and C-16's mother.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he interpreted Ms Hallett's comment as meaning she did not have any knowledge of C-16's mother's contacts with Constable Dunlop. He had difficulty understanding her comment because he thought she had done a careful review of the boxes of material disclosed by Constable Dunlop.

Ms Hallett does not agree that she implied the officers had done something wrong. She always took the position that this was an oversight by the police and herself: “I always indicated that the failure to include this information in the brief was an oversight, was not wilful, was inadvertent, and that had always been the position of the Crown.”

Ms Hallett testified that regardless of Detective Inspector Hall's interpretation of her “This is all news to me” comment, he never raised his concerns with her.

Detective Inspector Pat Hall Reminds Shelley Hallett She Was Provided With the Dunlop Material in March or April 2000

Following the meeting with defence counsel, Ms Hallett met with the OPP officers. Detective Inspector Hall reminded her that she had reviewed the Dunlop material in March or April 2000. According to Detective Inspector Hall, Ms Hallett responded, “Yeah, yeah, I know.” As I have discussed in Chapter 7, Detective Inspector Hall took this as an acknowledgment that what she had told defence counsel was inaccurate.

Ms Hallett said she remembers acknowledging she had seen the Constable Dunlop will-state. She never disputed the fact that she received and reviewed those materials. In fact, she had told the Court a year earlier that she was in possession of them and was reviewing them for the purpose of disclosure in the Father MacDonald case. As a result, she was aware of the contacts between Constable Dunlop and complainants in the Father MacDonald case, but not aware at the time of contacts between Constable Dunlop and complainants in the Leduc matter. Therefore, she did not perceive that these materials needed to be disclosed to counsel for Mr. Leduc.

Ms Hallett was aware of the allegations about Constable Dunlop’s role in the Marcel Lalonde prosecution. She agreed that by 2001, if something came up in a trial about Constable Dunlop speaking with a complainant, that would have been a matter of concern for her.

She had received the Constable Dunlop will-state from a number of sources as of June 2000. She wrote in a July 4, 2000, letter to Detective Constable Dupuis that she would review the statement and appendices to ensure that the copy provided by Constable Dunlop on June 27, 2000, was a duplicate of the copy provided on April 17, 2000. She did not believe that this required close scrutiny of the content. Ms Hallett testified that she had made it clear that she did not read the content of the will-state closely. This is in contrast to the Dunlop boxes, which Ms Hallett said she reviewed diligently to ensure that Detective Constable Don Genier came to the appropriate conclusions about disclosure. Ms Hallett did not review the Dunlop materials with the Leduc prosecution in mind.

Detective Constable Steve Seguin Delivers to Shelley Hallett a Copy of Her July 4, 2000, Letter to Detective Constable Joe Dupuis

On February 8, 2001, Detective Constable Seguin provided Ms Hallett with a copy of the letter she had sent Detective Constable Dupuis on July 4, 2000. Ms Hallett recalled Detective Constable Seguin giving her this letter in the morning before she went into court. She said the only thing Detective Constable Seguin told her when he handed her the letter was “Pat likes you but he’s a ‘cover your ass’ kind of guy.” That was the only explanation Ms Hallett received about why she was being given the letter. Ms Hallett did not ask Detective Constable Seguin for a further explanation: “I was confused. I couldn’t really understand why it was that he was providing this to me. I was of course busy. I had to get into court. We were continuing to call the case.”

Ms Hallett’s perception was that Detective Inspector Hall was reminding her that she had the Constable Dunlop notes and will-state. She felt Detective Inspector Hall was “banging [her] over the head” with the issue. Ms Hallett never asked him why he sent the letter; she had too many other things on her mind. Likewise, Detective Inspector Hall never asked her what she did with the letter.

According to Detective Inspector Hall, the purpose of delivering this memorandum to Ms Hallett was to remind her of its existence, as her files were probably in Toronto, and so she would be in possession of it, if required for disclosure. His motive for delivering the letter is discussed in Chapter 7.

Ms Hallett testified that Detective Inspector Hall never told her he believed this letter, from the Father Charles MacDonald prosecution, should be disclosed to the Leduc defence. In Ms Hallett’s opinion, the letter was not the kind of item that would ordinarily be disclosed:

... It’s a piece of internal correspondence. It’s my writing to a police officer on the case ...

... the fact that there is a complainant that’s named in this document would make an additional reason either for not disclosing it or for ensuring that the name was blocked out, if, for some reason, it—I perceived it to be something that should be disclosed.

As will be discussed, Ms Hallett’s non-disclosure of this letter was later the basis for a stay of proceedings granted in the Leduc matter, which was overturned by the Ontario Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal found that the Crown “had no reason” to disclose the letter. The disclosure guidelines for Crown attorneys in force at the time provided that Crowns generally need not disclose any internal Crown counsel correspondence.

Defence Makes Several Disclosure Requests

On February 12, 2001, counsel for Mr. Leduc, Steven Skurka and Phillip Campbell, wrote a letter to Ms Hallett saying they were concerned that there had been wilful non-disclosure by the police. They requested statements from the officers and other documentation, including OPP and Cornwall Police Service records, and memoranda and correspondence related to Constable Dunlop's contact with C-16's mother.

Ms Hallett construed the defence's letter as a request for disclosure accompanied by a serious assertion of wilful non-disclosure. This was not a notice of a formal application to stay the proceedings. Although defence counsel noted they were considering whether to seek remedies for non-disclosure, Ms Hallett testified that those remedies could include things other than a stay. Ms Hallett thought defence counsel might be persuaded that this was not a matter worth pursuing.

As discussed in Chapter 7, Detective Inspector Hall's interpretation of this letter from defence counsel was that it required the disclosure of internal correspondence.

Ms Hallett shared the February 12 letter with Detective Inspector Hall and his team, who were going to help her respond to the disclosure requests. On February 15, she received a response from Detective Inspector Hall in which he stated that he had not at any time wilfully failed to make disclosure or instructed Detective Constable Dupuis to withhold disclosure. According to Ms Hallett, this was an important statement to make because that was what was at issue. Detective Inspector Hall also provided an outline of all his contacts with Constable Dunlop further to Ms Hallett's request.

The defence made further disclosure requests on February 14 and 15. The February 15 letter requested a number of things including "any correspondence, notes, memos, letter or other records reporting to the Crown about issues related to Perry Dunlop, whether generally or before and after July 23, 1998." Ms Hallett still did not believe the July 4 letter should be disclosed:

... by the 15th of February, I had advised the court in a very fulsome statement that I had come into possession of the Dunlop notes and will say in April of 2000, that I had reviewed them in a brief way, in a cursory way, that I had not seen the references to the contact between Perry Dunlop and the mother of C-16, and taking full responsibility for that failure to disclose at that time.

... I certainly wasn't reading this letter that came a day later as a request for anything other than correspondence from the police to the Crown, and certainly not requiring the disclosure of my letter of July 4th of 2000 to Detective Dupuis.

Defence Brings Application for a Stay of Proceedings

On February 14, 2001, Mr. Skurka advised the Court that he would be bringing a motion to stay the proceedings pursuant to section 24(1) of the Charter.¹⁰ The motion was to be based on the non-disclosure by Detective Constable Dupuis and other senior ranking officers. Ms Hallett responded by stating on the record that she was also surprised by the contact between Constable Dunlop and C16's mother: "That was the first of my knowledge that there had been any contact by Constable Dunlop with any witness or potential witness in this particular case."

She also mentioned that Detective Constable Dupuis had made a note of the contacts but left it out of the brief through oversight. Ms Hallett advised the Court that she was aware of Constable Dunlop's connection with victims and witnesses in other cases but did not see the connection between Constable Dunlop and this case. She also advised the Court that as of April 2000 she had the Constable Dunlop notes and will-state, and had briefly reviewed the material. She stated that she had not seen the contact between Constable Dunlop and C-16's mother and was taking full responsibility for that failure to disclose.

Detective Inspector Hall was not present in court when she made this statement. As discussed in Chapter 7, Detective Inspector Hall believes he first became aware of Ms Hallett making these representations to the Court during his testimony in the Leduc proceeding, when Ms Hallett reiterated what she had said to the Court on February 14.

After the stay application was filed, Ms Hallett discussed the response to the stay application with Detective Inspector Hall. She also discussed the stay application with Detective Constable Dupuis, who was quite upset about it: "He was sick over it and I felt terrible for him."

Ms Hallett testified that she believed there had been no intentional failure to disclose the contacts between Constable Dunlop and witnesses in this matter. In her opinion, the contact between C-16's mother had been brief and benign. It consisted of only two telephone contacts, and C-16's mother had outlined the content of each call during her testimony. Ms Hallett thought it sounded like Constable Dunlop had been providing moral support and not attempting to unduly influence the witnesses in the case.

Ms Hallett testified that she told the officers that the Crown's strategy was to argue inadvertent failure to disclose. She felt the oversight could be proven to the Court by calling the officers and, if necessary, C-16's mother.

10. This section provides, "Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances."

Richard Nadeau Testifies on Stay Application and Urges Justice Colin McKinnon to Step Down

The stay application began on February 19, 2001. The first witness called by the defence was Mr. Nadeau. At the outset of his evidence, Mr. Nadeau made a statement to the Court stating his belief that Justice McKinnon was in a conflict of interest because he had previously represented Cornwall Chief of Police Claude Shaver. He urged the Judge to step down and presented to the Court, in support of his allegation of a conflict of interest, letters written by Justice McKinnon in 1994. Justice McKinnon responded that it was known he had acted for Chief Shaver, the Cornwall police, and the Cornwall Police Services Board for many years. He did not feel that his previous involvement required him to step down:

I feel no conflict of interest. The conflict of interest of course, can be both perceived and it could also be felt. I personally feel no conflict of interest in being able to deal with the Jacques Leduc trial in a fair and impartial manner.

Ms Hallett testified that she was unaware that Justice McKinnon had been involved as a lawyer with the Cornwall Police Service and that he had been involved in recommending disciplinary action against CPS Constable Dunlop. Ms Hallett was “taken by surprise” by what Mr. Nadeau told the Court and the documents he presented. She said she wished that Mr. Nadeau had brought those letters to her attention earlier as it may have made a difference in the case.

Ms Hallett advised the Court that the Crown would not request that Justice McKinnon step down from the case. Justice McKinnon stated his intention to visit the Cornwall Police Service and review files to see if there was anything that could impede his ability to deal with this case fairly.

On February 20, Justice McKinnon advised the Court that he had reviewed files at the CPS, which refreshed his memory about his involvement with the CPS in relation to Constable Dunlop. He explained that in February 1994 he was consulted by the Cornwall police with respect to Constable Dunlop’s disclosure of a statement to third parties. Justice McKinnon took the position that this disclosure constituted “an offence against discipline” and prepared draft charges in respect of Constable Dunlop. Justice McKinnon determined that he should not hear the application for the stay of proceedings and arranged for Justice James Chadwick to hear the application.

OPP Officers to Be Called As Defence Witnesses Meet With Defence Counsel

Ms Hallett testified that when it was first announced that there would be a stay application brought based on the failure of the police to disclose, the Crown needed the notes of Detective Inspector Smith, who was retired. They received a will-state from Detective Inspector Smith dated February 9, 2001, about the meeting with Constable Dunlop in July 1998. Ms Hallett met Detective Inspector Smith for the first time on February 19, 2001. She and Detective Inspectors Smith and Hall discussed the case and went to dinner together that evening. Ms Hallett testified that the July 4, 2000, letter was not discussed. She never sensed from Detective Inspector Hall that he was concerned by a failure on her part to disclose anything and wishes that he had told her about his concerns at that point.

Ms Hallett knew the officers would be called as defence witnesses on the stay application because the defence had the onus on this application. She explained that this was an advantage to the Crown because she could lead evidence in cross-examination of those witnesses to support the position of the Crown.

According to Ms Hallett, on February 20, Detective Inspector Smith said the officers wanted to speak with defence counsel about what they would be asked during their testimony on the stay application. Ms Hallett had never heard of officers wanting to meet with defence counsel and said it was usually the other way around. She was “perplexed” by the request but recognized that the officers were named in the notice of stay application and that they appeared to be the targets. In other words, the police were being held responsible for the failure to disclose. She did not think there was anything to hide and felt that this might speed up the questioning of the officers by defence counsel:

So although I was taken by surprise and rather flummoxed, I have to say, by this request by Detective Smith, I went along with it and the officers went to meet with the defence counsel in my knowledge and with my blessing.

According to Ms Hallett, she understood the officers were going on a “reconnaissance mission” to find out what questions defence counsel were going to ask them and report for discussion. It was the first time in twenty years of practice that she had seen this.

The meeting between the police officers and defence counsel is discussed in Chapter 7. It is sufficient to note here that during the meeting Detective Inspector Hall agreed to provide defence counsel with a copy of the July 4 letter. Ms Hallett testified that when she spoke with them afterward, Detective Inspectors Hall and Smith both were vague about what had occurred during the meeting. At no point did either of them tell her that they were intending to disclose a document to defence counsel.

Detective Constable Joe Dupuis Borrows Shelley Hallett's Copy of the July 4, 2000, Letter

Following the meeting the officers had with defence counsel, Detective Constable Seguin called Ms Hallett and asked if she had the July 4, 2000, letter. She believed he said the officers could not find their copy. Ms Hallett testified that she did not know what he wanted the letter for, but she assumed that Detective Inspector Hall wanted to keep his files intact. She told Detective Constable Seguin that he was welcome to get the letter from her and make a copy.

As discussed in detail in Chapter 7, Detective Constable Dupuis testified that Ms Hallett was not advised at this point that the officers intended to give the letter to defence counsel. He thought she already knew that was why they were getting her copy of the letter, as he assumed Detective Inspector Hall had so advised her. According to Detective Constable Dupuis, they made a copy of the letter and returned her copy to her while Ms Hallett was meeting with Detective Inspector Smith. There were no further discussions with her about the letter or what the officers intended to do with it.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that the primary reason he provided the document to defence counsel was because he was going to be questioned under oath the next morning and was not going to lie. He thought handing the document over to defence counsel directly without vetting it through her was the appropriate thing to do because he “knew” she had lied to defence counsel on February 7, 2001.

Shelley Hallett and Christine Tier Have Dinner With James Stewart

On February 21, 2001, Ms Tier and Ms Hallett had dinner with Mr. Stewart in Cornwall. According to Ms Hallett, he arrived unexpectedly from Ottawa at the end of the day. She thought he came for moral support. Shelley Hallett said she had not expressed to James Stewart any concerns or problems about her working relationship with the Project Truth officers. Ms Tier was reporting to the Ministry of the Attorney General on a daily basis, and Ms Hallett believes that is how Mr. Stewart knew they were in the middle of a stay application.

Mr. Stewart testified that he recalled getting a phone call from either Ms Hallett or Detective Inspector Hall or both of them. They were not getting along, so he drove to Cornwall and had dinner at the Best Western with Ms Hallett and Ms Tier. Mr. Stewart could not recall who phoned him before he came to Cornwall. He was adamant that it is not possible that he was just checking in on them. The evidence is unclear as to who contacted Mr. Stewart, but it is clear he felt he had to go to Cornwall.

According to Mr. Stewart, Detective Inspector Hall was also in the restaurant. He came over and talked to them for a while. Ms Hallett also recalled Detective Inspector Hall joining them briefly in the dining room. According to her, they had a brief discussion and Detective Inspector Hall alluded to “some surprise that was going to occur the following day” but did not describe it further.

Mr. Stewart thought that whatever the problem was, it had been resolved. When he left Cornwall, he did not feel there was a significant problem. He did not remember Ms Hallett voicing any concern about her working relationship with any of the Project Truth team members. Had she told him about a serious problem between her and Detective Inspector Hall, he would have acted on it.

Detective Inspector Pat Hall Continues His Testimony and Is Cross-Examined

Detective Inspector Hall gave his evidence on the stay application on February 21 and 22, 2001. During cross-examination, Ms Hallett got him to agree that the Crown makes the disclosure to the defence and that the police provide the material for the disclosure. She also asked him some questions about the Dunlop material and its connection to the Leduc matter; he confirmed there was no connection. According to Ms Hallett, the intention in this line of questioning was to demonstrate that Constable Dunlop never identified Mr. Leduc as a perpetrator of sexual abuse in Cornwall.

Ms Hallett also asked Detective Inspector Hall some questions about the June 15, 1998, note in Detective Constable Dupuis’ notebook. Detective Inspector Hall acknowledged that the note was not provided to the Crown as part of the brief in this case, saying that it was “just simply overlooked by Constable Dupuis while preparing the Brief in the Leduc matter.” Ms Hallett then asked Detective Inspector Hall, “Now are you aware of any other piece of evidence or note or memo book entry that connects Perry to any other Crown witness in this case?”

Detective Inspector Hall responded that he was not. Ms Hallett testified that she was trying to demonstrate how limited the Constable Dunlop contacts were with witnesses in this case. She also asked Detective Inspector Hall direct questions about whether the Project Truth officers conspired to withhold this note from the defence. The purpose of these questions was to establish that the failure to include the information in the brief was inadvertent and not a wilful or intentional failure to disclose.

Detective Constable Dupuis was called to the witness stand after Detective Inspector Hall. Ms Hallett asked him similar questions about his notebook entry and why it was left out of the Crown brief. Ms Hallett acknowledged that both Detective Inspector Hall and Detective Constable Dupuis testified that the Crown had not intentionally withheld material disclosure from the defence.

Detective Constable Dupuis' testimony revealed that the police had provided defence counsel with the July 4, 2000, letter from Ms Hallett to Detective Constable Dupuis. He was asked about the meeting he, Detective Inspector Hall, and Detective Inspector Smith had with defence counsel on February 20. In particular, Detective Constable Dupuis testified that defence counsel asked at that meeting if the officers had any document in their possession indicating that the Crown did a review of Constable Dunlop's will-state. Detective Inspector Hall said there was such a document. Detective Constable Dupuis then testified that he and Detective Inspector Hall agreed to provide defence counsel with that document.

Mr. Skurka read the letter out in court and asked Detective Constable Dupuis questions about why the police agreed to provide the document to the defence:

Q: You thought it important enough in response to my question to bring me that document on that day, right, Sir?

A: Yes, Sir.

Q: Of course, when I stood up in court that day, and said what I did about the position of the defence, you know that I didn't have that letter or that internal document, don't you Detective Dupuis?

A: That's correct ...

Q: Right. You know I didn't have that until you brought it to me on February 20 of 2001, don't you?

A: Yes, Sir.

At the outset of Ms Hallett's cross-examination of Detective Constable Dupuis, she elicited from him that he had attended her hotel room to obtain a copy of the letter before it was turned over to the defence and that she did not have any qualms about providing it to him. In testimony, Ms Hallett pointed out that Detective Constable Dupuis testified that the police could not find the letter of July 4, 2000, "and that, unfortunately, created a suspicion around me that was palpable in the court that day, that somehow I had had something to do with trying to suppress that letter."

Ms Hallett testified there was a lunch recess, following which Mr. Campbell asked to recall Detective Inspector Hall. She did not know why defence counsel wanted to recall him. At the outset of Detective Inspector Hall's evidence, he stated that he and Detective Constable Seguin had met with defence counsel over lunch and that defence counsel had put to him specific questions about the July 4, 2000, letter. Ms Hallett had not been not advised about this lunch meeting between the OPP officers and defence counsel.

During his testimony, Detective Inspector Hall provided specific information about Detective Constable Seguin giving a copy of the July 4 letter to Ms Hallett on February 8, 2001:

Q: You gave that letter to Detective Seguin to give to Ms Hallett so that she would be aware of it and would be able to disclose it, is that right?

A: That's correct.

Q: Inspector, you recognize the relevance of that letter in that it showed that in July 2000, Ms Hallett did a review of the Dunlop notes and material, isn't that correct?

A: That's correct.

Q: And you considered that that would be relevant on the issues on this application, when you forwarded it to her via Detective Seguin, isn't that correct?

A: That's correct.

Q: You became aware two days ago, February 20th, that we, the defence, did not have that letter, correct?

A: That's correct.

Q: And until that point, until that conversation, it was your assumption that we, the defence, had been given exhibit 22, correct?

A: I couldn't say it was my assumption you'd been given it. All I knew is that I provided it to Ms Hallett.

Q: And you did so in the expectation that it would be disclosed?

A: Well, it would be her decision to do that.

Q: Right. When you became aware that we did not have it, you made personal efforts to acquire a copy of it to give to us, correct?

A: Yes, I went back and I searched her file and I couldn't find the exact copy and I instructed Constable Dupuis to go and look in the courtroom here and it couldn't be located and I further instructed him to go and get a copy from Ms Hallett and give to you.

Q: And your intention in looking for it, was to deliver it to us directly, correct?

A: That's correct.

Ms Hallett testified that she was "shocked" that this evidence was being led. She didn't understand the defence's reason for trying to introduce this letter at this point:

... [A]s I understood it, they were making an issue of a letter that I had not considered should be disclosed, especially after I had already told the Court on February 14th that I had these Dunlop notes and Will-Say since April of 2000.

According to Ms Hallett, there had been no discussion between herself and Project Truth officers about the need to disclose this letter.

Ms Hallett cross-examined Detective Inspector Hall and asked him if he was aware that she had informed the Court on February 14, 2001, that she had received the Dunlop materials. He responded that he was not in court that day, so she put to him some of the statements that she made to the Court. Ms Hallett testified at the Inquiry that it seemed to her that the evidence introduced was based on some misapprehension or misunderstanding by Detective Inspector Hall that she had not made the Court aware that she had received the Dunlop materials. She wanted to establish that Detective Inspector Hall was not aware that she had advised the Court that she had taken responsibility for the failure to disclose Constable Dunlop's notes and will-state.

According to Ms Hallett, at this point in the proceeding it occurred to her that the focus was shifting from wilful non-disclosure by police to wilful non-disclosure by the Crown. She admitted that she was starting to feel uncomfortable and probably should have stepped down or sought assistance. Had she been in Toronto she probably would have taken a break and asked someone from her office to come and make representations to assist her or give her counsel. Ms Hallett could not ask her co-counsel to take over, however, because she was junior and Ms Hallett was concerned that she would not be able to carry on with the rest of the trial.

As discussed above, in August 1999, when defence counsel Mr. Edelson indicated that she might be subpoenaed as a witness, Ms Hallett wrote a memorandum to James Ramsay requesting that Erika Chozik be assigned as her co-counsel in this matter.

Discussion With Officers After Court on February 22

After court on February 22, 2001, Ms Hallett was advised by Detective Inspector Hall that the defence did not intend to call Detective Inspector Smith as a witness. Ms Hallett testified that she was “astounded to hear” that the defence was dispensing with Detective Inspector Smith’s evidence. At that point, she confronted Detective Inspector Hall and suggested he was colluding with defence to set up the Crown for the fall on the stay application. She suggested there was an agreement that in return for some quid pro quo the police were no longer going to be the target of the application and the Crown was. Ms Hallett thought it was very obvious that there was a change in strategy based on the evidence of that afternoon and the fact that Detective Inspector Smith no longer needed to be called as a witness.

Ms Hallett thought Detective Inspector Smith was a critical witness and she would have called him to establish that he failed to disclose inadvertently. Ms Hallett did not call Detective Inspector Smith as a witness because she believed the defence had conceded that the non-disclosure was inadvertent. She thought the defence was not calling Detective Inspector Smith because the focus or target of their application was changing.

According to Detective Inspector Hall’s note of the conversation of February 22, Ms Hallett was upset and acting unprofessionally because evidence came out that did not please her. Detective Inspector Hall advised Detective Constables Dupuis and Seguin to stay away from her. Ms Hallett thought she was direct, but not unprofessional, with Detective Inspector Hall.

Final Submissions on Stay Application

Ms Hallett continued to call evidence on February 26, 2001, from the complainants who testified they had no contacts with Constable Dunlop. One of them did not even know who Constable Dunlop was.

On that date, the Crown and defence made final submissions on the stay application. According to Ms Hallett, in the course of final submissions by the defence, it became clear that the defence strategy had changed. According to her, the allegation of wilful non-disclosure by the police was now an allegation of wilful non-disclosure by the Crown. Although the defence were still making an allegation of wilful non-disclosure against the police, Ms Hallett felt the defence's argument in relation to the officers was no longer their principal argument. She noted that when you compare the passage of the transcript about the officers with the passage where the defence are inviting the Court to make a finding against Ms Hallett, there is a dramatic difference.

Ms Hallett testified that there was no suggestion from the Court that she obtain counsel at that point. She wished Justice Chadwick had advised that he wanted to hear from her under oath about the inadvertence and her part with respect to the Constable Dunlop notes and will-state, as she would have gladly given evidence under oath. Ms Hallett said part of the reason she did not remove herself from the motion and request counsel was because she was not given notice that her conduct was going to be examined. She was aware the Court of Appeal addressed this issue of notice, which will be discussed below.

According to Ms Hallett, she only became aware explicitly that she was the target of the wilful non-disclosure on February 26, during the closing submissions.

Shelley Hallett's Comments to Detective Constables Steve Seguin and Joe Dupuis About Detective Inspector Pat Hall on February 26

Following the closing submissions, Ms Hallett, Ms Tier, and the Crown's articling student met with Detective Constables Seguin and Dupuis. According to Detective Constable Dupuis' notes, Ms Hallett was very upset with Detective Inspector Hall and stated that he went behind her back and gave the memo to the defence. The notes also state that Ms Hallett said she never wanted to see or speak to Detective Inspector Hall again and if she saw him now she would "scratch out his eyes." Detective Constable Dupuis testified that Ms Hallett was clearly angry that the charges were stayed and about Detective Inspector Hall's actions. This was the first time he had observed Ms Hallett make any comments about Detective Inspector Hall and the first time he was aware there were any ill feelings between them.

Detective Inspector Hall's notes say Detective Constable Dupuis told him that Ms Hallett was holding him responsible for giving the July 4, 2000, letter to the defence; that Ms Hallett said this was done because she was a woman and that this would not happen to Crowns Pelletier or Flanagan; and that she said she did not feel she could continue to work on the Father MacDonald trial.

Ms Hallett testified that hearing Mr. Skurka tell the Court that in order to provide disclosure to the defence the police officers had had to bypass the Crown led to the lowest moment in her professional career:

And for a counsel like myself who has prided herself on an honest reputation over 20 years, that was a devastating remark which I knew was not true.

...

I knew the police officers did not have to bypass me to make disclosure here. They had simply not spoken to me about it. And that is what caused me to go directly to the officers after this was over and tell them—tell Pat Hall to keep a wide berth.

Telephone Call Between James Stewart and Detective Inspector Pat Hall

On February 27, 2001, Detective Inspector Hall contacted Mr. Stewart and advised him of the events since February 7. The details of this call were covered in the previous section, but among other things, Detective Inspector Hall said that he did not think Ms Hallett could handle the Father MacDonald case based on his observations of her over the past two years.

I am of the view that the question was not whether she could handle the case but rather whether she should continue given the clear breakdown of the relationship between the Crown and the police. I think she was right in removing herself from the prosecution of the Father MacDonald case given what had just occurred in R. v. Leduc.

Decision of Justice James Chadwick

On March 1, 2001, Justice Chadwick granted the stay application, finding that Crown Attorney Hallett had wilfully failed to disclose material. Ultimately, costs were ordered against her in the amount of $351,000. Following the ruling, Ms Hallett had a long meeting with the complainants and their families to explain what had happened and where things would go from there. Ms Hallett believed Detective Constable Seguin attended this meeting with her, as she always had an officer present.

Case Referred to Appeal Review Panel

The Ministry of the Attorney General has a process for determining whether to launch a Crown appeal of a decision. Ms Hallett was very familiar with the process because of her work with the Crown Law Office—Criminal.

First, the Crown responsible for the case prepares a Crown appeal checklist and a synopsis or background of the case, which is submitted to the local Crown attorney for approval. If the request is approved, it goes to a three-person panel which decides whether an appeal should be filed. The appeal review panel is intended to provide an independent review. As part of that process, the panel members may consult with the Crown counsel involved in the case in order to obtain complete background information.

According to Ms Hallett, she completed the Crown appeal checklist and prepared a synopsis of what happened in R. v. Leduc and a list of proposed grounds of appeal. Mr. Stewart approved the Crown appeal request. He felt strongly that an appeal was necessary in this case.

The panel that evaluated the merits of the appeal in this case consisted of John Pearson, Lidia Narozniak, and Louise DuPont. This was Ms Narozniak's initial contact with the file. She explained that it was because of Ms Hallett's position with the Crown Law Office—Criminal that the review was sent to Crowns working outside that office. Mr. Pearson prepared the first legal opinion on March 18, 2001. Louise DuPont provided her opinion on March 23, and Ms Narozniak provided her opinion on March 26. Ms Narozniak explained that although three legal opinions are provided by the appeal review panel, the majority rules. The appeal will go forward if two or three of the panel members agree. In this case, it was a unanimous decision that an appeal should be filed. Although Ms Narozniak did not know if any of the written legal opinions were sent to Ms Hallett, she said the contents of the opinions were certainly shared with the trial Crown because the panel reports back to him or her about their decision.

Ms Hallett testified that it is very common for the appeal review panel to have questions for the trial Crown seeking the appeal and she made herself available in the event that the review panel required further information. There were a number of questions from the Crowns on the panel about various aspects of the case, and she prepared several memoranda in response to those requests.

A notice of appeal was served on Mr. Leduc on March 28, 2001, and Mr. Pearson was assigned to handle the appeal. Other than appellate counsel, Ms Narozniak was not aware of anyone else dedicated to the file during the period between the lower court decision and the appellate decision. Mr. Pearson handled the disclosure required during the course of the appeal. Although there was some file management throughout the appeal process, no Crown was preparing for the continuation of trial.

Shelley Hallett Makes Comments in Media

Shortly after the appeal was launched, Ms Hallett spoke with Globe and Mail reporter Kirk Makin. She was concerned by his report on the stay application and the fact that she was found to have wilfully failed to disclose. She felt that out of fairness, Mr. Makin should publish a piece on the fact that the decision was being appealed, which he subsequently did, on April 5, 2001.

Ms Hallett was admonished for speaking to the press about this matter. On April 5, Paul Lindsay sent Ms Hallett an e-mail indicating that he was concerned that she had not followed Crown policy of not speaking to the press about the correctness of a judge's ruling. Ms Hallett testified that it was not her intention to comment on Justice Chadwick's ruling. Rather, her concern was to have Mr. Makin report that the matter had been appealed. Ms Hallett acknowledged, however, that she erred in speaking too directly with the reporter about what had happened.

Ms Hallett discussed the matter with Mr. Lindsay. She explained her concerns and suggested that perhaps more could be done to advise colleagues and the public that an appeal had been launched. Ms Hallett testified that this is now the practice. If there is a finding against a Crown or if a Crown's conduct is criticized, the division advises colleagues whether there is an appeal and the status of the Ministry's follow-up on the issue.

E-Mail From Detective Inspector Pat Hall to James Stewart

On April 3, 2001, Mr. Stewart received an e-mail from Detective Inspector Hall. The e-mail began with a discussion of issues related to the disclosure of the Dunlop material. Then Detective Inspector Hall made some comments about Ms Hallett, which Mr. Stewart felt were quite serious:

What disturbs me most is Ms Hallett not being truthful with Skurka & Campbell on Feb 07, 01 when the[y] first asked about the Dunlop material in light of the fact that on Jan. 09, 01 I had a telephone conversation with Ms Hallett when she asked me about the Dunlop involvement in the Leduc matter and how the initial complaint came in. None of us knew about the 5 lines in Dupuis note book at that time. She certainly knew Dunlop made notes and his will say entry on the [C-16] conversations.

Mr. Stewart testified that this e-mail was not something he expected or requested from Detective Inspector Hall. He forwarded the e-mail to John McMahon, Director of Crown Operations, Toronto Region, and Mr. Pearson a few days after receiving it because they were involved in the appeal.

James Stewart Drafts a Response but Never Sends It to Detective Inspector Pat Hall

Mr. Stewart drafted a response outlining some of his concerns about the allegations in Detective Inspector Hall's e-mail. In particular, he pointed out that the January 9, 2001, phone call between Detective Inspector Hall and Ms Hallett was not referred to in the officer's evidence on the stay application: "I now have some concerns after realizing that you didn't tell the court and this appears to be new information."

Mr. Stewart testified that this was significant to him because at that point Ms Hallett's knowledge was an important issue. It was canvassed a lot in the case and this phone call was never raised. This was the first time Mr. Stewart was hearing about this telephone call. Mr. Stewart believes he spent some time reviewing transcripts because of Detective Inspector Hall's e-mail.

According to Detective Inspector Hall, he had specific discussions with Ms Hallett on two occasions prior to C-16's mother testifying, about C-16's mother and Constable Dunlop being in touch with each other as noted in Constable Dunlop's will-state. The first was on April 17, 2000, when they met to discuss the recent disclosure by Constable Dunlop. The second was on January 9, 2001, during a telephone conversation in which they discussed a number of items including "the comments Perry Dunlop had made in his notes and Will State and the fact there was no evidence Perry Dunlop ever talked to the victims."

Detective Inspector Hall acknowledged, however, that there is no mention in his evidence on the stay application about either conversation with Ms Hallett. He also later conceded he did not specifically point out the will-state reference to Constable Dunlop contacting C-16's mother to Ms Hallett on April 17, 2000.

Ms Hallett testified that she had contacted Detective Inspector Hall on January 9, 2001, to discuss a number of issues. She wanted some information on Justice McKinnon, who had been assigned to the case. She was not from the jurisdiction and did not know much about him. Ms Hallett also wanted to make sure Detective Inspector Hall was comfortable with the decision to reduce the counts on the indictment to include only the counts of sexual exploitation so that consent would not be an issue at the trial. Ms Hallett also contacted Detective Inspector Hall because of a notice with respect to a challenge for cause and the questions the defence proposed to put to prospective jurors. Ms Hallett testified that she was surprised when she noticed that some of the questions pertained to Constable Dunlop.

Mr. Stewart also wrote in his draft e-mail that he had talked to Detective Inspector Hall a number of times during which Detective Inspector Hall did not indicate any problems he had with Ms Hallett:

As you are aware after the stay of proceedings on the Leduc matter I asked you if there was anything else and you said no. In addition on, I believe, two separate occasions you indicated to me that you would have no trouble if Ms Hallett were to be the Crown to decide whether charges are to be processed for the five remaining potential accused and the possible conspiracy charge. As you will recall we spent part of a day in Kingston reviewing in a global way those matters.

Finally, Mr. Stewart requested that Detective Inspector Hall prepare a supplementary witness statement accompanied by any notes made at the time and asked specifically that Detective Inspector Hall include all details of the January 9, 2001, call. Mr. Stewart said he anticipated sending the e-mail to Detective Inspector Hall and asking him to do this. He then realized, “a sort of sober second thought,” that he would end up in the middle of the situation. Mr. Stewart knew somebody was going to have to look into this matter, but he did not think that should be his role. Mr. Stewart never sent this draft response to Detective Inspector Hall because he was concerned that it would appear that he was attempting to persuade Detective Inspector Hall to change his mind about what he said.

Because Mr. Stewart knew somebody was going to have to look into this matter, he “passed it up the line” by forwarding his draft to Murray Segal, Assistant Deputy Attorney General, Criminal Law Division. Mr. Stewart testified that there was no doubt what he was going to do with this e-mail because both Detective Inspector Hall and Ms Hallett were senior people, it was a serious allegation of misconduct by the Crown, and Justice Chadwick’s ruling was on that very point. Although Mr. Stewart was aware there was going to be an investigation, the decision to have an external police force investigate Detective Inspector Hall’s allegations was not his.

Murray Segal Forwards E-Mail to York Regional Police, Which Begins an Investigation

Mr. McMahon forwarded the April 3 e-mail from Detective Inspector Hall to Mr. Segal on April 9, 2001. Mr. Segal testified that he probably spoke with Mr. McMahon, Mr. Stewart, and perhaps others about this e-mail. After receiving the e-mail, Mr. Segal reflected on it and sought outside legal advice.

Mr. Segal testified that he made the decision to refer the matter to an outside police force for such action as they deemed appropriate, which could include conducting an investigation. Mr. Segal stated it would be wrong for him to ask someone to begin an investigation because police make those decisions. In addition, people might think that because Mr. Segal is a person with higher rank, this should be done.

Mr. Segal contacted the York Regional Police and gave them a copy of the e-mail from Detective Inspector Hall. He advised Ms Hallett that he had given the e-mail to the York Regional Police and that she would be provided with counsel of her choice during any investigation that might be conducted. Mr. Segal believes he may also have informed someone in the superior ranks at the OPP about what he had done.

Ms Hallett recalled that on April 23, 2001, Mr. Segal came to her home. He told her he had received an e-mail from Detective Inspector Hall and provided her with a copy. He explained that as a result he had to request a criminal investigation into her conduct and that she would be provided with counsel of her choice. This was the first that Ms Hallett knew of Detective Inspector Hall's e-mail. She also received a call from a representative of the Law Society who advised they were opening a file and that a further investigation was possible. There were no constraints put on Ms Hallett's work at the time.

Shelley Hallett Prepares a Number of Summary Documents Responding to Concerns Raised During the Investigation

Ms Hallett prepared a document in response to Detective Inspector Hall's e-mail. This document outlines some of the reasons for her discussion with Detective Inspector Hall on January 9, 2001, which is discussed above. She notes that Detective Inspector Hall confirmed that Constable Dunlop had not been involved in the official police investigation of Mr. Leduc. According to Ms Hallett, Detective Inspector Hall had confirmed that C-16's complaint had been brought forward because of his mother speaking with a friend, who in turn spoke with an OPP officer.

An investigator from the York Regional Police sent a letter to Ms Hallett's counsel on June 14, 2001. The letter stated that a number of issues were going to be discussed during Ms Hallett's interview, including:

- Lack of preparedness for Court
- Over interviewing of witnesses
- Overall poor working relationship with the "Project Truth" investigators
- Investigative Log having been entered into evidence
- Testimony of Pat Hall re—February 14th, 2001.

Ms Hallett testified that she believed she was being investigated for attempting to obstruct justice based on the content of Detective Inspector Hall's e-mail. She was "quite taken by surprise" when these five additional issues were raised, which did not seem to relate to the criminal investigation or the attempt to obstruct justice. She did not know that the police would be investigating these additional issues and felt that they were exceeding their mandate. Ms Hallett was advised of these issues only the day before the interview. I am of the view that the York

Regional Police did not have jurisdiction to examine those other issues, which were not criminal matters.

Ms Hallett prepared a response for each item in the letter. She prepared a document regarding competency, in which she outlined her experience. She testified that she had never been challenged on the issue of competency. She prepared a document regarding preparedness for court, in which she outlined the way she prepared for her Project Truth cases.

A third document dealt with her working relationship with Project Truth officers. She noted that she always travelled to Cornwall and never required that the officers come to Toronto to meet with her. She also stated that they shared many meals and generally spent a lot of time together, including attending witness interviews together. Ms Hallett testified that she felt there were good lines of communication between her and the officers. She listed, as an example, the fact that Detective Constable Dupuis had a trip planned and would forfeit his deposit if he did not receive a subpoena. Ms Hallett therefore attended court and obtained a subpoena for him. Ms Hallett thought they were a good team:

We were different people, there's no doubt about it, from different backgrounds, but we were coming together for a common cause and I frankly enjoyed working with these officers, all of them, and I thought that they enjoyed working with me.

Ms Hallett prepared a fourth document regarding the issue of over-interviewing witnesses, in which she provided some details about the interactions she had with witnesses in the Leduc matter. According to Ms Hallett, Project Truth officers never raised with her any issues they had about her approach with witnesses. She felt she and Detective Inspector Hall had an open relationship and he could have brought this up with her. Detective Constable Seguin told officers of the York Regional Police that he had a concern that Ms Hallett interviewed witnesses too many times. She testified that Detective Constable Seguin never said to her that one of the most serious issues in the Leduc matter was her inability to leave witnesses alone and that she continued to meet with victims even if they did not want to. Ms Hallett said she was aware that the “young men did not relish the prospect of talking about this very intimate and intrusive subject matter” with her but she felt it was her duty to prepare them for court. She also had a duty to the Court to prepare the witnesses to testify in a way that would assist the Court “to discover the truth.” Ms Hallett further explained that in this case there was two dates set for the preliminary inquiry and they were sufficiently far apart. As a result, there was good reason for the victims to refresh their memories, as they would be vigorously cross-examined on their prior statements.

Although Ms Hallett acknowledged that re-victimization is an important issue, she stressed that witnesses need to be prepared. Her understanding of re-victimization is too many representatives from too many institutions re-interviewing witnesses, and she sees preparation for court as a different issue. She thought the victims in the Leduc case were young adults capable of long and more complex interactions with her. Ms Hallett testified that she tried to minimize the intrusiveness by dividing the interviews into two parts. During the first interview, she met the complainants and answered questions, and during the second, she talked about the subject of the complaint. She said part of the purpose of these meetings was to make her available for questions and to make the complainants comfortable with her, as she would be asking them questions in court.

Finally, Ms Hallett prepared a document about the failure of the police to communicate with her, in which she discussed Detective Inspector Hall's failure to discuss with her his concerns about disclosing the July 4, 2000, letter. She set out a number of instances when she believed there could have been some communication about this issue. According to Ms Hallett, if Detective Inspector Hall had brought this up with her, she would have been willing to disclose the document or to explain the admission she had made to the Court on February 14, 2001, following which he may have understood that it was not necessary for the letter to be disclosed.

Interviews by York Regional Police

The York Regional Police interviewed Ms Hallett on June 15, 2001. She said she was never provided with a copy of her statement. Ms Hallett testified that one of the officers clarified at the outset of the interview that based on the information he had received, they were not looking at criminal charges. Ms Hallett responded that this was the first time she had heard this. She went to the interview thinking she was being investigated for an attempt to obstruct justice. She characterized it as a "harrowing experience."

The York Regional Police interviewed a number of other individuals from the Ministry of the Attorney General as well as the Project Truth officers. When Mr. Stewart was interviewed, he gave the investigators the draft e-mail he had prepared in response to Detective Inspector Hall's April 3, 2001, e-mail. He said that constituted his statement because that was all he knew at the time.

Shelley Hallett Writes to Detective Sergeant Denise LaBarge

On July 7, 2001, Ms Hallett wrote a letter to Detective Sergeant Denise LaBarge, one of the York Regional Police investigators. Ms Hallett said she wrote this letter because she was concerned that the investigation appeared to be directed toward establishing that there had been a communication breakdown between the Project Truth officers and Ms Hallett, which explained or justified the actions of the officers on February 20, 2001.

Ms Hallett did not believe there had been any communication breakdown between herself and the officers, and she felt this was an improper characterization of their relationship. She stated that it was her firm position that Detective Inspector Hall's after-the-fact complaint of April 3 was nothing more than an attempt to divert scrutiny away from the police actions that led to the stay of proceedings in R. v. Leduc.

In this letter, Ms Hallett noted that Mr. Stewart's attendance in Cornwall provided an excellent opportunity for Detective Inspector Hall to take up the matter of the disclosure of the July 4, 2000, letter with another senior Crown. She further wrote that Detective Inspector Hall was well acquainted with Mr. Stewart, as evidenced by the familiar tone in the April 3 e-mail to "Jim."

Mr. Stewart testified that he knew Detective Inspector Hall only from the Project Truth investigation and never socialized with him. Mr. Stewart confirmed he was never informed by Detective Inspector Hall that he was planning to disclose the July 4 letter to defence counsel.

York Regional Police Investigation Concluded

The York Regional Police Investigation concluded that all persons interviewed, including Detective Inspector Hall, were of the opinion that Ms Hallett would not intentionally withhold information from the defence. It was the opinion of the investigative team that there was no basis for criminal charges against Ms Hallett for wilful non-disclosure of material to the defence in the Leduc matter.

Mr. Segal received a copy of their report.

Murray Segal Denies Shelley Hallett's Request for a Copy of Police Investigation

During the months of December 2001 and January 2002, Ms Hallett requested a copy of the York Regional Police Investigation from the Ministry of the Attorney General. Mr. Segal advised her that he would not provide a copy of the brief because he was concerned that it might have a potential impact on future proceedings. Mr. Segal testified that prior to advising Ms Hallett of his position he obtained legal advice from a retired jurist.

According to Mr. Segal, police briefs are confidential, and he would not provide a brief to any member of the public. In his view, the fact that the person asking was an employee of the Ministry would not give her any different status. Mr. Segal said he sought outside advice in addition to considering the human resources implications of this kind of request. He also considered the issues that Ms Hallett raised and got some input from counsel involved in the appeal.

On October 18, 2002, Ms Hallett renewed her request for access to the York Regional Police materials because counsel for Mr. Leduc was trying to bring fresh evidence on the appeal from some of those documents. Ms Hallett was concerned that she should retain legal counsel and obtain the results of the investigation and lead that evidence in the appeal on her own behalf. Again, she was not given the material. Mr. Segal recalls a second request by Ms Hallett to receive the report. He said he would have consulted with Mr. Pearson and perhaps others and his conclusion was the same—he would not release the investigative brief to Ms Hallett.

Mr. Segal did not believe Ms Hallett should be given the brief simply because she was a Crown counsel or a Ministry employee. He asked how that would square with the fact that if a member of the public asked, for example, for the investigative brief in relation to his neighbour who was investigated and not charged, the request would be denied. Mr. Segal said he tried to approach this in a way that would not show favouritism, be sensitive to Ms Hallett's needs and issues, and at the same time resemble the normal course of action if any member of the public made the same request: "I'm absolutely convinced I would be the recipient of criticism by giving an employee a brief by reason of, as you say, they're not just any person; they're an employee."

Garry Guzzo Requests Information From Shelley Hallett

On October 18, 2001, MPP Garry Guzzo requested some information about the Leduc matter from Ms Hallett, and she asked that he put his request in writing. He complied, sending her a letter asking whether or not the questions for prospective jurors were ever approved by Justice McKinnon and if so, whether and how many times Constable Dunlop's name appeared in those questions. Ms Hallett wrote to Mr. Segal to seek instructions from him about responding to Mr. Guzzo's questions. Ms Hallett testified that her involvement ended with this memo. She expected that Mr. Segal or someone would respond to Mr. Guzzo.

Mr. Stewart was tasked with responding to Mr. Guzzo. In his letter dated October 31, Mr. Stewart advised that because the matter was currently before the courts it would not be appropriate to comment. Mr. Stewart testified this is a standard response because many times the Crown does not have the luxury of commenting or answering questions.

Justice James Chadwick's Decision Overturned by Court of Appeal; Leave to Appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada Denied

On July 24, 2003, the Ontario Court of Appeal overturned Justice Chadwick's decision. The Court found that the "Crown misconduct on which the stay was based is not supported by the evidence." Nonetheless, the Court noted that the notice given to Ms Hallett that her conduct would be examined was far from ideal but was adequate. The Court stated that the Crown should not be permitted to raise the adequacy of the notice on appeal for three reasons:

First, from the beginning of the hearing of the stay application, Ms Hallett seemed aware of the allegation against her and prepared to respond to it.

...

Second, and more important, Ms Hallett did not object to the adequacy of the notice she was given. At no time during the stay, even during closing arguments when there could have been no doubt about Leduc's position, did Ms Hallett ask for an adjournment, ask for the opportunity to get advice from another lawyer, or even say that the allegation had taken her by surprise.

...

Finally, whether notice is reasonable or adequate must be assessed in the context in which it is given. Here Ms Hallett participated in the stay hearing without objection.

Ms Hallett testified that given the evidence that had been called from the officers and the minimal evidence of prejudice, she did not recognize that she was in jeopardy. She said this is consistent with something Mr. Stewart once told her—that the conflict of interest is invisible to the person who is involved in it. Ms Hallett testified that she would have appreciated a heads-up from defence counsel, whom she had known for many years. She reiterated that the jeopardy only seemed to be explicitly conveyed in the course of final submissions by defence counsel on the stay application.

As I found in Chapter 7, Detective Inspector Hall was wrong to give the July 4, 2000, memo to defence counsel without discussing the matter with Crown Hallett. I also recommended that there should be a protocol in place within police forces with respect to how to deal with disagreements between police officers and Crown counsel about disclosure. In this case, Detective Inspector Hall should have advised his supervisor of his concerns. His supervisor could then have discussed these concerns with Ms Hallett's superiors in the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Although Ms Hallett was responsible for some delays in disclosure and the preparation of Crown briefs, I believe she is a dedicated and competent professional whose compassion and expertise in dealing with alleged victims of current and historical sexual abuse made her an asset to the Project Truth team. The debacle in the Leduc matter affected her profoundly both professionally and personally. In addition, it is extremely unfortunate that it caused her to be removed from other Project Truth cases, especially the prosecution of Father MacDonald.

R. v. Jacques Leduc Retrial

Lidia Narozniak Assigned New Jacques Leduc Trial

In the fall of 2003, John Pearson asked Lidia Narozniak if she would be interested in prosecuting the retrial of Jacques Leduc, and she agreed to do so pending the Supreme Court of Canada's decision on the appeal. Leave to appeal to the Supreme Court was denied on January 12, 2004, and the trial in R. v. Leduc proceeded again. Ms Narozniak was relieved of most of her other files in order to take on this prosecution. I note that she was working almost exclusively on the Leduc matter, whereas Shelley Hallett had a number of files while working on the Leduc matter. In hindsight, Ms Hallett was overburdened.

In consultation with Mr. Pearson, Ms Narozniak decided in January 2004 that she would review the entire Project Truth file. Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) Detective Inspector Colleen McQuade sent an e-mail to Detective Constable Don Genier and others to this effect on January 22:

In essence, what Lidia needs to do is review ALL information, every piece of paper, that has ever been obtained and harboured within the confines of Project Truth. (not just the Leduc file) It is not that we are not trusted to deliver up ALL documents of relevance, it is that to objectively review the entire matter, Lidia is tasked with having to review EVERYTHING herself, so as to instil total confidence in the courts that NOTHING is outstanding.

Ms Narozniak testified that because of the oversight on a relevant piece of disclosure in the first trial, she thought it prudent to ensure that all the material was reviewed again. This was especially important since Perry Dunlop was connected to the case. She wanted to ensure they didn't miss any other relevant disclosure. Ms Narozniak's goal was to ensure that the trial proceeded on its merits.

Detective Constable Genier responded to Detective Inspector McQuade's e-mail:

It's sad to say, but I see that as a result of the first trial, the ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE are aiming at not working together on this file with the O.P.P. and I don't see that as a good thing.

Ms Narozniak's view was that Detective Constable Genier misunderstood the purpose of her review of the material. She believed that he was still affected by what happened during the first trial, and that he thought she was evaluating the police work when in fact she was ensuring that her Crown obligation of disclosure was fulfilled. She said, "It was a misunderstanding that was quickly resolved."

Ms Narozniak testified that the first hurdle she faced in the Leduc matter was the issue of delay and section 11(b) of the Charter. She felt the Crown had been tardy in some of its disclosure obligations, which caused some delay in the case. Even excluding the Dunlop disclosure issues, there was significant delay in Crown disclosure, which could have compromised the case.

Adjournment Hearing

On February 19, 2004, Ms Narozniak made her first court appearance on the Leduc matter. The case was scheduled to proceed on May 10. Ms Narozniak's instructions were to be ready "no matter what, at whatever date" to ensure a speedy trial. The Court was advised on February 19 that counsel would not be ready for that time, so another date was to be scheduled. Defence counsel, Marie Henein, made submissions to the Court about the need for an adjournment of the trial date:

The matter covers some, in my office, at least 20 boxes and I believe Ms Nerozniak's [sic] file is growing as we speak. And we both have to engage in an extensive review of the file. It's for that reason that neither of us are in the position to proceed in May.

Ms Narozniak testified that in discussions with defence counsel, she had acknowledged some of Ms Henein's comments about there being a lot of material involved and that the case was more complicated than initially anticipated. She believes these comments led Ms Henein to assume there was a joint request for an adjournment:

And with that, I believe Ms Henein assumed it was a joint request. I was ready for trial at any time, but since the time from May to October did not count due to an 11(b) waiver, I didn't bother saying anything.

Ms Narozniak advised the Court that there was a possibility of a delay motion but defence counsel had agreed there would be a waiver for the delay between May and the new scheduled trial date.

Ms Narozniak did not object to defence counsel's submission about the need for an adjournment, although her position was that she would be ready to proceed on May 10. I am of the view that it would have been appropriate for Ms Narozniak to state for the record that the Crown was prepared to proceed on the set date. The Crown should be seen as being interested in matters proceeding to trial as quickly as possible. In addition, it is important that the position of each party is made clear at the time of the adjournment to ensure that any judge reviewing the conduct of the trial in the future can properly assess the situation.

The trial was scheduled to begin in October 2004.

Transfer of File to Lidia Narozniak and Her Review of the Material

Ms Narozniak began receiving disclosure from Detective Inspector McQuade shortly after her assignment to the case in January 2004 and continued receiving material from the OPP in the following months.

On May 19, Ms Hallett sent a memo to Ms Narozniak and Christine Tier with four boxes of materials on the Leduc matter. She wrote that she believed the materials had been disclosed to the defence. Ms Narozniak testified that she agreed with Ms Hallett's opinion that there was no outstanding disclosure at this point. On May 22, Ms Hallett sent an e-mail to Ms Narozniak saying that further boxes were being provided to her and that she would then have all of the material. Ms Hallett explained in the e-mail why there was a delay in getting the file to Ms Narozniak:

In view of all of the circumstances in this case, I needed to take the time to organize and inventory the brief and the Dunlop materials and make sure the four volumes of the correspondence file (which documents all of the disclosure that was made to Leduc's counsel) was complete and in order so that I could protect myself professionally.

There simply has not been any time since Christmas to get the Leduc file to you in proper order.

Ms Hallett outlined some of the other work she was doing at the time, saying that she had felt "very jammed professionally," which is why Ms Narozniak had not received the Leduc materials earlier. Ms Narozniak testified that she did not know if she had any discussions with Ms Hallett about disclosure issues after this. She was satisfied with the e-mail.

Ms Hallett did not know when she was asked to turn over the materials. She acknowledged it took some time to prepare the description of the content of the boxes. She was concerned about the previous allegations of impropriety and wanted to make sure everything was handed over and that there would be no basis for allegations that she withheld material. Despite the finding of the Court of Appeal, Ms Hallett was still concerned that such an allegation could be made.

This matter was to commence on May 10, but it was not until May 19 that Ms Hallett completed the transfer of all relevant materials to Ms Narozniak. I fail to understand why Ms Hallett was still in the possession of those boxes three years after the end of her involvement in the file. The Ministry of the Attorney General should have arranged to retrieve that file from Ms Hallett. This is especially problematic given that disclosure was a difficulty in many of the Project Truth prosecutions. I have previously commented that prosecution files should remain in the possession of the Ministry of the Attorney General. Crown counsel should not be permitted to retain possession or control of any files when they are no longer involved with the prosecution. I appreciate that Ms Hallett had concerns as a result of the allegations made against her in the Leduc matter and the resulting investigation by the York Regional Police. In my view, this is a further reason why Ms Hallett should not have retained the file.

On May 12, 2004, Ms Narozniak attended defence counsel's office and they did a document-by-document comparison of the Dunlop materials to ensure everybody was working from the same materials. They discovered that there were some documents missing. As a result, Ms Narozniak arranged for defence counsel to attend at the Cornwall police station to review the original boxes.

On May 17, Ms Narozniak requested the originals of Constable Dunlop's duty notebooks from Cornwall Police Service (CPS) Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie. According to Ms Narozniak, Crown counsel were finding it difficult to understand the sequence from one duty book to another and had also determined that one of the duty books was missing in its original form. The copy they had showed some gaps. The Crown felt the original material would be more helpful than the copies.

At the end of May, Ms Narozniak and Detective Constable Steve Seguin attended at the CPS office and went through the nine boxes of Dunlop material. They were of the view that material was still missing. In particular, they discovered that an original police binder containing notes by Constable Dunlop, as well as his final police notebook, had not yet been provided. They discussed the possibility of a search warrant for Mr. Dunlop's house but one was never obtained. Ms Narozniak explained that Mr. Dunlop would be subpoenaed as part of the disclosure motion, and the subpoena would identify the materials required. She was also going to talk to him and she hoped he would cooperate and bring the materials in.

Defence counsel attended CPS to review the boxes on June 21, following which they requested that certain original documents be brought to court.

Ms Narozniak testified that at the end of her review of the Dunlop material she was not satisfied that he had fully disclosed all of his information or contacts. She did not go to the CPS to advise them of these concerns or to make a formal complaint.

It is unclear to me why so much emphasis was placed on the Perry Dunlop materials and concerns that he did not disclose everything. Ms Narozniak was not confident that the Crown and the defence were working from the same materials. This appears to me as being a problem resulting from not having a tracking system of what was disclosed to the defence. Those nine boxes of materials were within the control of the investigators and the prosecution and yet they had not been copied and disclosed to the defence. In my view, this was not a problem caused by Mr. Dunlop but rather a Crown disclosure problem, as noted elsewhere in this chapter. Mr. Dunlop made some mistakes and contributed to some of the difficulties in these prosecutions. However, the Crown was by this time aware of most of these difficulties and should have had better systems in place to deal with them.

Disclosure Motion—Perry Dunlop Called As a Witness for the Crown

One of the pre-trial motions brought by the defence in this case was a disclosure motion, which was heard over several days in August 2004. Ms Narozniak explained that the purpose of this motion was to explore whether there was any undisclosed material missing or in Mr. Dunlop's possession or in the Crown's possession. The motion would also examine the potential contact that Mr. Dunlop might have had with the victims in the case. The Crown called Mr. Dunlop as a witness. This was not at the request of the defence, as the Crown was equally interested in explaining Mr. Dunlop's involvement in the Jacques Leduc case.

Although this was technically a defence motion, Ms Narozniak explained that the onus is on the Crown to ensure disclosure has been fulfilled, and that is a significant factor in deciding whether it is pragmatic for the defence or the Crown to call the evidence. Ms Narozniak testified that she was confident that Mr. Dunlop would not be cooperative and would likely be hostile. As a result, even if the defence called Mr. Dunlop as their own witness it would probably turn into a situation where Mr. Dunlop would be declared a hostile witness, and defence counsel would then be in a position to cross-examine her own witness. Under the circumstances, Ms Narozniak thought it was more pragmatic for the Crown to call the evidence first.

Mr. Dunlop was living in British Columbia at the time and was summoned to attend. Prior to the motion, Ms Narozniak had a few phone conversations with him about his attendance. She explained the motion to him, outlined the issues, and identified areas of concern. She directed his attention to his previous testimony in the Father Charles MacDonald case and said that her approach would be very similar. Ms Narozniak also sent him the transcripts from his testimony in the Father MacDonald case. She testified that Mr. Dunlop was very reluctant to come in early to discuss the motion. There was no discussion of her travelling to Vancouver. Mr. Dunlop insisted on coming to Cornwall the night before he was to appear in court. Ms Narozniak did not meet him prior to his testimony, although they spoke by phone.

Ms Narozniak testified that she was aware that Mr. Dunlop maintained she had no contact with him and she disagreed:

The context within which we had our discussions were unique, in that Mr. Dunlop was not a cooperative witness or cooperative individual in terms of coming to Cornwall. At the outset, my dealings with Mr. Dunlop focussed on addressing his concerns. He was providing numerous obstacles to his attendance in the first place that I needed to accommodate and try to convince him that I was doing everything I can to minimize his visit to Cornwall.

According to Ms Narozniak, she spoke to Mr. Dunlop about his notes and the need for the originals, and explained which notebooks she was interested in. She informed him that the focus of her questioning would be on his contact with the complainants and witnesses in the Leduc case. According to Ms Narozniak, the issues she wanted to canvass with Mr. Dunlop were straightforward. For these kinds of issues, she would not have expected to have had a long preparatory interview with him in advance of testimony.

Ms Narozniak did not discuss with Mr. Dunlop any protection against self-incrimination under the Canada Evidence Act before he testified. She thought he knew about it. She did not offer or suggest that Mr. Dunlop receive independent legal advice. From her reading of the prior testimony, it was clear to her that he was “keenly aware” of his ability to consult counsel. Ms Narozniak was satisfied that Mr. Dunlop, as a professional witness given his prior experience as a police officer, was very much aware of what options were available to him. In addition, he had a lawyer, Yvonne Pink. The fact that Mr. Dunlop was a “professional witness” appeared to factor heavily in Ms Narozniak’s mind with respect to how much preparation he required:

It is most unusual to spend a lot of time with veteran police officers in preparation of routine cases because they have been trained, they're familiar with the process, they are likely to have testified before. That's the kind of preparation you'd normally leave with a civilian witness.

Although I agree that a police officer will generally require less preparation before being called as a witness, it must be kept in mind that Mr. Dunlop had not been a police officer for the last four years. This was not a routine court appearance to which a police officer might be accustomed. Under the circumstances, Mr. Dunlop required more preparation than a typical "professional witness." However, I also do appreciate the difficulties the Crown had in securing his cooperation for his attendance on the motion. Mr. Dunlop's position was that his band had a performance scheduled for the weekend before the motion, which is why he was unable to come in advance. It is unfortunate that he chose not to testify at the Inquiry. Why this was so important for him is one of the many areas I would have liked canvassed with him.

Ms Narozniak also had some preconceived notions about Mr. Dunlop based on her review of the Father MacDonald and Marcel Lalonde cases:

This was a witness that continued to persist in contacting victims and witnesses, contrary to direct orders by his superiors. This was a witness who has been described as being over-zealous, to use one description, in his approach to investigating and contacting victims and witnesses. This is a witness that has been described as being one who pushed victims to come up with certain evidence and, in fact, there were allegations that he counselled them to falsify their testimony resulting in the withdrawal of counts. This was absolutely critical information, in my view, and put him in a totally different situation. And, finally, this is a witness who clearly was not truthful while under oath. This is a witness that you have to approach with extreme caution.

On August 16, 2004, Mr. Dunlop was called to the stand to testify. He took the position that he had only received the transcripts a few days before he left British Columbia and therefore he had not had sufficient time to review them. Ms Narozniak stated at the Inquiry that the issue of Mr. Dunlop not feeling prepared was not raised with her prior to his testimony. Ms Narozniak's examination took the morning to complete. She said that she was actually leading Mr. Dunlop in order to get through the information quickly. While using this approach, she felt he was reasonably responsive to her questions.

Mr. Dunlop was cross-examined by defence counsel for three days. Ms Narozniak did not object to any of the questions defence counsel put to him. Although the Judge intervened and asked for clarification on certain points, these were not points where Ms Narozniak could have intervened. As she explained, unlike the Judge, she was aware of all of the material. In addition, most of the interventions were accompanied by an acknowledgment that counsel was conducting a proper cross-examination.

On the second day of the disclosure motion, Mr. Dunlop requested legal counsel. Ms Narozniak supported that request and asked the local Crown's office to assist her in connecting with a legal aid lawyer or duty counsel in the building. Duty counsel was contacted and Mr. Dunlop spoke to him and was prepared to proceed with his testimony.

On the third day of testimony, a statement prepared by Mr. Dunlop was put in as evidence, in which he stated he felt he was being treated unfairly, had been blindsided, and was subpoenaed under false pretences. In his statement, he said he thought he had been called solely to address the contact he had with C-16's mother. He felt the two days of testimony had been a "well-orchestrated attack" on him and that the Crown had acted unfairly and provided him no guidance or assistance. Ms Narozniak testified that the statements made by Mr. Dunlop were contrary to the advice she gave him as well as the issues she directed to his attention. In particular, she specifically had a discussion with him about the notebook issue and mentioned the concern about other materials he may have in his possession.

Ms Narozniak did not re-examine Mr. Dunlop, as most questions had already been asked. In the initial wilful non-disclosure motion, Ms Hallett had the victims testify about having no contact with Mr. Dunlop. Ms Narozniak testified that the disclosure motion was not a test of Mr. Dunlop's credibility but a motion to elicit disclosure materials. This was not the proper forum for her to call complainants to verify Mr. Dunlop's testimony:

In fact, I certainly would not have considered forcing victims to testify at a pre-trial motion for disclosure and then have them come back for trial. That would be highly insensitive on my part to do so.

Ms Narozniak testified that she was aware there was a perception that she had not done much to oppose the defence efforts in the Leduc matter. She believed that was the perception because of Mr. Dunlop's actions and behaviour during the course of his testimony on the pre-trial motion.

Section 11(b) Application for a Stay of Proceedings

In the fall of 2004, the defence brought an application for a stay of proceedings based on delay. Ms Narozniak was not surprised there was a section 11(b) Charter application. Her position, however, was that the best interests of the administration of justice were served by having Mr. Leduc's trial proceed on the merits and this remained her position throughout. Part of her task on the section 11(b) application was to explain to the Court that regardless of the prejudice to Mr. Leduc, there would be a greater prejudice in having the matter stayed.

Ms Narozniak attended a meeting with senior Crown counsel in order to brainstorm a response to the section 11(b) motion. In preparation for that meeting, she prepared a memo and attached a disclosure timeline and a document entitled "Top 6 Disclosure Problems from the Crown." The memo discussed a number of issues, including delay both before and after the preliminary hearing, the Crown's argument, and the merits of the case. The issue of delay was considered in some detail in the previous section of this chapter. As discussed there, the first five of the six disclosure problems listed related to disclosure by the former Crown, Ms Hallett. According to Ms Narozniak, they spent a lot of time preparing the timeline and identifying when disclosure was given. Ms Narozniak explained that regardless of the reason or who is at fault, when there are issues with disclosure and delay in providing disclosure it rests with the Crown. She acknowledged that five of the six reasons on this list would lie at the feet of the Crown.

As discussed earlier, Ms Hallett conceded responsibility for some of the delay and acknowledged that errors on her part led to some of the delay. However, she did not accept that all of the disclosure problems should fall at the feet of the Crown nor that they were all in fact disclosure problems.

The applicant's factum was lengthy. The Crown prepared a fifteen-page factum in response. Ms Narozniak testified that she and Ms Tier knew this was a critical motion for them and they spent a lot of time researching and discussing the issues. They called upon senior experts in the field of section 11(b) and appellate argument to discuss the best approach for the Crown's response. The decision was made to focus on their best argument. Ms Narozniak testified that a factum does not have to be lengthy. I agree. The applicant has to set out the facts, which don't have to be repeated by the respondent, if the respondent agrees with them.

The Crown agreed with the applicant's statement of facts. Ms Narozniak agreed, however, that a concession on the facts does not mean that the subsequent inferences the Court is being asked to draw are accepted. One of the things the Crown agreed to was that the connection of Mr. Dunlop to the case was discloseable and significant. Ms Narozniak testified that Ms Hallett's submission on February 14, 2001, about the notebook entry informed this particular concession. Further, Ms Narozniak testified that the Crown discovered that there was far more contact than initially thought between Constable Dunlop and the witnesses, because it was not just Constable Dunlop himself that they were looking at:

Mr. Dunlop, by his own testimony, asserted that he had a team, so to speak, of people that assisted him in examining or interviewing witnesses, including his wife, Helen Dunlop, and his brother-in-law, particularly Carson Chisholm. And it was through Carson Chisholm's evidence that we discovered how much more contact there was with the complainants' parents. Given the age and the living situation of the majority of the complainants, the contact with parents was as equally relevant as direct contact with the complainants alone.

In a memo to senior Crown counsel, she raised the concern that Constable Dunlop may have tainted witnesses in the Leduc matter. This "Dunlop connection" led the Crown to concede that the Dunlop material was relevant and had to be disclosed in its entirety, thereby resulting in the Crown having to assume responsibility for the delay "caused by the exploration of the Dunlop issue."

The argument put forward by the Crown was that the defence was barred from arguing section 11(b) because it had not been raised at the first trial. According to Ms Narozniak, this was thought to be the Crown's best argument. However, in the memo prepared regarding the section 11(b) motion (discussed above), Ms Narozniak wrote that she felt confident that the Court would be tempted to reject the foreclosure argument the Crown presented because the defence had a highly meritorious section 11(b) application.

In addition to the "uphill" battle the Crown was facing in the section 11(b) application, Ms Narozniak also had concerns about the merits of the case itself and, in particular, concerns about the credibility and reliability of the complainants. With respect to C-16, she felt the Crown could not obtain a conviction at trial and she would have considered withdrawing the charges in respect of his allegations.

Moreover, the potential that Constable Dunlop tampered with witnesses would have cast doubt even where there were highly credible witnesses:

... [E]ven if you had the complainants clearly state there's been no contact, this was clearly going to be fleshed out during the course of the trial if we survived 11(b). There was definitely going to be much evidence elicited around the contacts, the meetings and so on that we discovered during the disclosure motion.

Stay Granted by Justice Terrence Plantana

On October 18, 2004, Justice Plantana granted the defendant's application to stay the proceedings on the basis that he had not been tried within a reasonable time, contrary to his rights under section 11(b) of the Charter. The written judgment was provided on November 10.

Justice Plantana held that there was no implied waiver by the defence of the accused's section 11(b) rights by virtue of the fact that the 11(b) issue was not raised during the first trial and that, therefore, the defence was not precluded from raising the issue now. On the issue of delay, Justice Plantana said the following:

The Respondent acknowledges that most of the pre-trial delay resulted from delayed disclosure and that responsibility for this delay must rest at the feet of the Crown. Similarly, Ms Nerozniak [sic] accepts that the Crown must also accept responsibility for the delay that would have resulted from the mid-trial discovery of the Dunlop connection.

In view of the position taken by the Crown and in view of the determination that I have made earlier that any delay in this case begins from the date of the laying of charges I am certainly satisfied that any delay in this matter must be attributable to the Crown.

Regarding the issue of Constable Dunlop's connection to the case, Justice Plantana concluded that his contact with the complainants was far from innocuous:

What the evidence does clearly establish is that Mr. Dunlop's contact with the complainants, while originally thought of in incomplete material before the Court of Appeal as being innocuous, is far from benign and far from innocuous.

The Crown considered appealing the decision of Justice Plantana, but the Appeal Review Panel decided not to proceed with an appeal.

Courts' Review of Perry Dunlop's Involvement With the Complainants

I am of the view that the contacts that the alleged victims had with Constable Dunlop were considered by all courts in determining the wilful non-disclosure issue and the delay application. At the initial application before Justice James Chadwick, he had the benefit of the evidence of the complainants who were called and testified that they had no contacts with Constable Dunlop. In the appeal of this decision, the Court of Appeal had this evidence and the evidence of Constable Dunlop's call to a complainant's mother.

Neither Justice Chadwick nor the Court of Appeal had the evidence of Carson Chisholm. Mr. Chisholm gave evidence before Justice Plantana with respect to his contacts with complainants. He believed they had been at the courthouse before the trial. He also had contacts with some of the complainants' parents. He also testified at the Inquiry in a similar fashion. Justice Plantana did not have the evidence of the complainants with respect of their lack of contact with Constable Dunlop.

It is unfortunate that I did not have the evidence of Mr. Dunlop or any of the alleged victims in the Jacques Leduc matter at the Inquiry. Thus, it appears that no judicial process has had complete evidence of Mr. Dunlop's involvement or lack thereof in the Leduc matter.

R. v. Keith Jodoin

As discussed in Chapter 7, "Institutional Response of the Ontario Provincial Police," Marc Carriere reported allegations of sexual abuse by Keith Jodoin, a local Justice of the Peace, on March 22, 1999.

The Crown brief was submitted to Assistant Crown Attorney Claudette Wilhelm on May 31, 2000. On July 4, she advised that there was sufficient evidence to proceed with charges. On August 1, after being interviewed by Ms Wilhelm the previous day, Mr. Carriere signed a document requesting that the OPP not proceed with charges.

On August 8, Mr. Carriere provided a second statement to the OPP and said that he now wished to proceed with charges. Mr. Carriere advised the OPP that Richard Nadeau had reassured him that he had something important to say and had encouraged him to go back to the police. Mr. Nadeau was interviewed by the OPP that day.

Mr. Jodoin was arrested on August 24 and charged with one count of sexual assault on a male.

Mr. Carriere testified that following the second interview with the OPP in August 8, he met with Ms Wilhelm and Detective Constable Joe Dupuis. He recalled Ms Wilhelm telling him that she could not continue with the charges because there was not enough proof. He thought they did not believe he was telling the truth. Mr. Carriere also testified that Detective Constable Dupuis and Ms Wilhelm told him that Mr. Jodoin's health had suffered.

On November 15, 2000, Ms Wilhelm advised Detective Inspector Pat Hall that she felt she had to withdraw the charge against Mr. Jodoin because of the involvement of Richard Nadeau. As I indicated in Chapter 7, Mr. Nadeau was an alleged victim of historical sexual abuse and was involved with a controversial website that posted information of allegations of sexual abuse in the Cornwall area. I discuss Mr. Nadeau's involvement with websites and his contact with alleged victims of sexual abuse in the section "Handling of Information Published on Local Websites."

On or around November 20, Crowns Curt Flanagan and Alan Findlay reviewed the disclosure in the Jodoin case and agreed there was no reasonable prospect of conviction. On November 20, 2000, the charge was withdrawn.

R. v. Brian Dufour

Shelley Hallett Receives Crown Brief; Case Considered a Priority

Detective Constable Steve Seguin, who was the lead investigator on the Brian Dufour matter, submitted the Crown brief to James Stewart, Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region, on December 17, 1999. Shelley Hallett received it on January 7, 2000. The alleged victim, C-97, had provided his statement to the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) two years earlier in September 1997.

As discussed in the “Clergy and Conspiracy Briefs” section of this chapter, by January 7, 2000, Ms Hallett had also received Crown briefs pertaining to five clergy members that required her review and opinion.

Ms Hallett reviewed and provided an opinion on the Brian Dufour matter before the other briefs because he had a prior criminal record for sexual assault and he was a childcare worker, both of which were significant factors in determining which brief to review first. In addition, the allegations against Mr. Dufour were more recent than those against the clergy members.

Ms Hallett faxed her opinion on the Brian Dufour matter to Detective Inspector Pat Hall and Detective Constable Joe Dupuis on April 4, 2000. Ms Hallett testified that the Dufour matter was a priority for her. Notwithstanding this sense of urgency, three months elapsed before she provided her opinion to the police. She was devoting all of her time and energy to preparing for the Father Charles MacDonald and Jacques Leduc prosecutions.

Shelley Hallett’s Opinion on Charges and Request for Follow-up

Ms Hallett recommended laying charges on two counts of indecent assault male and two counts of gross indecency. Her letter summarized the allegations and the supporting evidence contained in the Crown brief. She also referred to a prior charge, wherein Mr. Dufour pleaded guilty to sexual assault in Hamilton in 1988.

Ms Hallett noted in the letter that she would provide some suggestions for follow-up investigation. She believed that further information could be obtained that would advance the prosecution. Ms Hallett explained that she had done this with officers in the past and that the officers were generally willing to follow her suggestions. However, Ms Hallett never sent the officers her suggestions for follow-up investigation because Mr. Dufour passed away shortly after he was charged.

Shelley Hallett and Detective Inspector Pat Hall Disagree on Conditions of Arrest

Ms Hallett concluded her opinion with a recommendation about the arrest and release of Mr. Dufour:

I would recommend that Mr. Dufour be arrested and released only upon a recognizance in a substantial amount ($7,000–$10,000) without a deposit but with a surety and conditions that include that he not be in the company of any youth under the age of 18 without the youth's parent being present.

Detective Inspector Hall interpreted this to mean that Ms Hallett wanted the officers to arrest Mr. Dufour in Hamilton, where he lived, and bring him to Cornwall for a bail hearing. The Detective Inspector disagreed with this suggestion. He was concerned about having his officers taking custody of and transporting the accused, whose health was not good.

Detective Inspector Hall raised his concerns with Ms Hallett, and they debated the matter. She thought his concerns were legitimate so she contacted the Hamilton Crown Attorney's Office to see if it was possible to have Mr. Dufour's bail hearing in Hamilton. She was unsuccessful. Detective Inspector Hall suggested that Mr. Dufour could be processed in Hamilton and released on a promise to appear with conditions by the officers and she accepted this suggestion. Ms Hallett testified she was "not insistent" in her discussions with Detective Inspector Hall, as it was ultimately the officers' decision. She said that the situation did not escalate beyond a professional discussion of options available.

On April 6, 2000, Detective Constables Seguin and Dupuis arrested Mr. Dufour in Hamilton. The terms of the release did not include a condition that he was not to be in contact with persons under the age of eighteen without the presence of a parent.

Brian Dufour Deceased

Mr. Dufour died of a heart attack on April 11. Ms Hallett was advised of his death on April 13, and all charges were withdrawn on April 17, 2000.

Timely Review

Ms Hallet incurred a delay of three months before she completed the review of the Crown brief and provided an opinion letter. The delay was excessive considering the priority this case had been given. I accept that she did not have sufficient time to devote to this task. That is another reason why a designated Crown counsel should have been assigned to these opinions. This would have permitted a more timely review of the Crown briefs.

R. v. Jean Primeau

In April 1999, a former student of Cornwall Classical College reported allegations of sexual abuse by Father Jean Primeau in the mid-1950s. The Ontario Provincial Police conducted an investigation, which is discussed in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the OPP.

On August 6, 1999, Shelley Hallett received a letter and a one-volume Crown brief from Detective Inspector Pat Hall in respect of the allegations against Father Primeau. She was requested to review the materials and provide a written legal opinion regarding criminal charges in the matter.

Ms Hallett reviewed the Crown brief, but before she rendered her opinion Detective Constable Don Genier advised her on November 9 that Father Primeau had died of heart failure the day before.

In my view, Ms Hallett delayed in providing an opinion in this matter. The brief was provided to her at the beginning of August, and three months later the opinion had not been completed. If Ms Hallett was unable to provide an opinion in a timely fashion because of her workload, she should have advised her superiors. Once again, I point out that the Ministry of the Attorney General could have averted this problem by allocating sufficient resources to the Project Truth investigations, including the assignment of a dedicated Crown, or a team of dedicated Crowns to the prosecutions.

R. v. Malcolm MacDonald: Sexual Abuse

As previously discussed in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), three people reported allegations of sexual abuse against Malcolm MacDonald.

Crown Shelley Hallett was assigned to review the investigation into Mr. MacDonald. Ms Hallett was provided with a Crown brief on July 7, 1998, in respect of the allegations of two of the complainants. She was asked to review the file and provide an opinion on whether charges should be laid.

Opinion and Recommendations for Arrest Provided by Shelley Hallett

Ms Hallett provided Detective Inspector Pat Hall with her opinion in this matter on March 9, 1999. She recommended that charges of gross indecency and indecent assault be laid and provided draft wording for the charges. In her letter Ms Hallett also noted:

I would recommend that ... Mr. MacDonald be held in custody after being charged and released only after entering into a recognizance in a substantial amount (e.g. $10,000), without deposit but with a surety, with conditions that he not communicate with the complainants or attend at their homes or places of employment and that he not be in the company of any young person under the age of 18 without that person's parent being present.

Ms Hallett explained that her main concern was recommending conditions of release in the event that there was an arrest:

My concern wasn't so much that there be an arrest, though, it was more the conditions that I felt would be appropriate in terms of a release into the community in terms of having a surety and ensuring no communication with the complainants and no association with any young person under the age of 18.

On March 11, Mr. MacDonald was charged with two counts of indecent assault and one count of gross indecency. He was released on a promise to appear rather than on a recognizance with a surety. The other conditions suggested by Ms Hallett were imposed. Ms Hallett acknowledged that under the Criminal Code, decisions about arrests are the prerogative of the police, and they can choose whether or not to follow her recommendations.

It took eight months for Ms Hallett to complete an opinion in this case. This delay is even more poignant when one considers that the first complainant provided his statement to the OPP in September 1997. As I have previously said, delays can have a significant and negative impact on victims and on the accused and should be minimized to the extent possible. In my view, the Crown should give priority to a brief with respect to allegations reported almost a year earlier. This again is a further example of the importance of assigning a dedicated Crown to the investigations. This Crown could have provided assistance to the investigators in a more timely fashion.

Follow-Up Investigation Requested and Further Disclosure of Crown Briefs

Following her review of the Malcolm MacDonald brief, Ms Hallett had some concerns and wanted the police to investigate further. She asked Detective Constable Seguin to follow up on some issues in the case.

On June 21, 1999, she requested that Detective Constable Seguin locate court documents that could narrow down the offence period and possibly confirm that Mr. MacDonald was in a solicitor-client relationship with the two complainants. Detective Constable Seguin wrote to Ms Hallett on July 22 and explained the steps taken to locate the materials.

Pre-Trial

A pre-trial was held in the Malcolm MacDonald matter on June 24, 1999. A further pre-trial conference was scheduled for a later date because there remained unresolved issues. Ms Hallett explained that at the time, preliminary inquiry dates were not set until all issues were resolved. The issues were resolved before the next pre-trial conference and the preliminary inquiry was set for January 17, 2000.

In preparation for the preliminary inquiry, Ms Hallett requested a law student conduct some research on the admissibility of homosexual disposition evidence and the admissibility of similar-fact evidence. She also requested the preparation of a memorandum on transitional provisions and sexual offences amendments, as she was concerned about whether proceedings commenced pursuant to the pre-1982 Criminal Code sections could be stayed based on constitutional invalidity.

On December 3, 1999, Ms Hallett received Volume 6 of the Crown brief, which contained the records and documents she had requested earlier.

Death of Malcolm MacDonald and Withdrawal of Charges

Mr. MacDonald died on December 23, 1999. After his death was confirmed, Ms Hallett requested that an agent attend court on January 11, 2000, to withdraw all charges against him.

R. v. Bernard Sauvé

Bernard Sauvé owned a convenience store in Cornwall. C-66 began working for Mr. Sauvé when he was fourteen years old. He alleged that Mr. Sauvé sexually abused him while he was working at the store. The investigation of these allegations has been examined in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP). Following the investigation, a Crown brief was prepared and submitted to Robert Pelletier on November 2, 1998. On February 2, 1999, he recommended that charges be laid. The OPP laid charges in respect of C-66's allegations on March 11.

Prosecution Assigned to Brockville Office

On or around March 19, 1999, the prosecution of the Mr. Sauvé was assigned to Brockville Crown Attorney Curt Flanagan. On April 26, Detective Inspector Pat Hall wrote a letter to Mr. Flanagan advising him that an additional complainant had come forward with allegations against Mr. Sauvé and that the police would put together a brief and submit it to Mr. Flanagan for his opinion on criminal charges. This Crown brief was prepared and forwarded to Mr. Flanagan on May 11, and additional charges were laid against Mr. Sauvé in respect of these allegations on July 28.

Preliminary Inquiry Held and Accused Committed to Stand Trial

On or around October 21, 1999, Mr. Flanagan assigned the matter to Assistant Crown Attorney Claudette Wilhelm. The preliminary inquiry was held from April 4 to 6, 2000. The accused was committed to stand trial, and a trial date was set for June 2001. The prosecution was transferred to Alan Findlay when Ms Wilhelm went on maternity leave.

Mr. Sauvé had significant medical problems, and as a result, the defence requested an adjournment of the trial. After reviewing the medical evidence, the Crown did not oppose this adjournment, and the trial was rescheduled for June 17, 2002.

Complainants Do Not Want to Proceed

A memo prepared by Mr. Findlay for regional Crown James Stewart in June 2002 outlines some of the events that occurred in this case following the committal to trial. It notes that during preparation for trial, one of the complainants was cooperative but the other, C-66, was not, and refused to attend scheduled appointments. According to Mr. Findlay, C-66 did not want to proceed any longer because the case was “destroying” his health: “It was apparent that [C-66] was suffering from extreme anxiety and stress.”

According to Mr. Findlay's memo, both complainants were offered victim/witness assistance. The Victim/Witness Assistance Program attempted to contact the complainants around May 2001. Louise Lamoureux, who worked in the Ottawa VWAP office, spoke with the first complainant. At the time, he was prepared to testify and indicated he would probably not require VWAP assistance. She was unable to reach C-66.

Approximately one year later, on May 24, 2002, the Manager of the VWAP program in Ottawa, Cosette Chafe, wrote an e-mail to Mr. Findlay, advising him that the complainant who had been willing to testify no longer wanted to proceed as he felt “the results of the Project Truth prosecutions have been a farce.” She also mentioned that C-66 was “not keen to testify either.”

As the trial date approached, the Crown scheduled meetings with the complainants in order to prepare them for trial. At a meeting on June 12, 2002, the first alleged victim advised that he was not looking forward to testifying in court because of personal issues. C-66 did not show up for this meeting. The next day, C-66 stated that he did not want to attend court. He advised Detective Constable Don Genier on June 14 that he was experiencing problems with his health as the trial date approached and was “feeling extremely stressed,” and as a result he wanted to stop the process. The first alleged victim was advised of this development later that day, at which time he said that he preferred to withdraw his complaint, mainly because of his spouse’s health.

Charges Withdrawn by the Crown

The charges were withdrawn by the Crown on June 17, 2002, on the basis of the complainants not being able to proceed as well as Mr. Sauvé’s health problems. Crown Findlay made the following submissions to the Court:

... [T]here are two complainants in this case and they both have suffered extreme anxiety and stress related to Court despite the best efforts of the Crown, the police and the victim witness office to assist them.

I also know that the accused person, Mr. Sauve, although medically fit to stand trial himself, suffers from various medical difficulties relating to heart disease and diabetes and complications from diabetes. And late last week Your Honour it became apparent that the complainants in this case, because of their difficulties may not be able to testify, that they may not be able to endure testifying in Court. Despite that there was some reason for the Crown to hold out some hope that over the weekend that the circumstances would change and that I would be able to call them as witnesses in this case. But, by this morning, it became clear that that was not something that was going to take place.

So based upon that factor Your Honour as well the fact of the accused’s own difficulty with his health, it’s the view of the Crown that it’s not in the public interest to proceed any further with the charges and I’m asking the Indictment to be marked withdrawn.

In my view, this is another example of victims of historical sexual abuse having difficulties in coping with their victimization and the court process. The first charges in this matter were laid in March 1999, but they were not set to proceed to trial before June 2002. It appears that VWAP services only became involved in the later stage of the proceedings. As Ms Chafe testified, when VWAP services are not involved early in the process, victims often refuse services. Perhaps earlier involvement may have assisted the victims.

Investigators and Crown counsel have to be sensitive to the fact that any delays in the prosecution of historical offences cause anxiety to victims as well as to the accused. Although delays in the court process cannot always be prevented, it is important to recognize the impact they may have on victims and accused persons.

No Charges Laid Against John Christopher Wilson

As discussed in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police, Project Truth investigated allegations of sexual abuse made by Keith Ouellette against John Christopher Wilson, a teacher at St. Lawrence College.

Crown Opinion

Alain Godin had been assigned to a number of Project Truth prosecutions in or around the fall of 1998. In June 2000, Detective Inspector Pat Hall wrote a memo to James Stewart, Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region, asking “for [Alain] Godin to review the John Christopher Wilson brief.”

Mr. Godin was provided with the Crown brief on June 27. He was asked to review the file and provide an opinion as to whether charges should be laid against Mr. Wilson. On June 29, two days after receiving the brief, Mr. Godin determined that there was no reasonable prospect of conviction. He sent Detective Inspector Hall a memorandum in which he noted:

There is also a problem with the consent issue, which if Mr. Ouellette was to be pushed, we could not distinguish where it was given and refused. The transactions cannot be clearly distinguished by the victim. On many occasions he cannot positively say that things were done to him, or who did it. In conclusion, there is not enough of a case to proceed against Mr. Wilson.

Mr. Godin thought there were too many difficulties with the evidence in this case. In addition to consent, there were too many inconsistencies in Keith Ouellette’s statement surrounding the details of where the events had allegedly occurred and what had happened.

I note that Mr. Godin was able to review the Crown brief and provide his opinion within two days. The advantage of a quick review is to provide the investigators with some direction on their next steps and allow them to advise the alleged victims of the Crown's position and status of the investigation without undue delay.

Mr. Godin testified that he will not recommend a charge be laid if there is no reasonable prospect of conviction. Crown Policy P-1, dated August 5, 1997, on "Police—Relationship with Crown Counsel" suggests the following practices when a Crown counsel is giving case-specific advice on charging:

Your written reply should set out the legal test for determining whether the threshold for laying a criminal charge is met. Both the objective and subjective elements of that threshold test should be addressed.

There are occasions where reasonable grounds exist but there is no prospect of conviction due to evidentiary problems or other reasons ... In such circumstances, it is appropriate to tell the police that though reasonable grounds exist, and that while the decision to lay the charge rests with the police, any charge laid will be withdrawn by the Crown and the reasons for the withdrawal put on the record.

Your letter should clearly indicate that you are providing a legal opinion only and that your legal opinion is not binding on the police ...

Although the opinion was provided in a timely fashion, it failed to set out the threshold for laying a criminal charge and to indicate that the legal advice was not binding on the police, as is recommended in the Policy.

R. v. Brother Leonel Romeo Carriere

As previously discussed in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police, Brother Leonel Romeo Carriere was investigated following the allegations of two complainants, C-105 and C-106. Both were under the age of fourteen when Brother Carriere, a teacher, allegedly abused them at school.

Crown Opinion on Charges Against Brother Leonel Romeo Carriere

As previously discussed in this chapter, Robert Pelletier was provided with a number of Crown briefs on April 1, 1998, including the one involving allegations against Brother Carriere.

Following his review of the Crown briefs, Mr. Pelletier provided Detective Inspector Tim Smith with a memorandum setting out his opinion on charges against several alleged perpetrators. In the matter of Brother Carriere, Mr. Pelletier wrote that a defence of consent would not be an issue but noted:

There is however one caution that I make in relation to charges against Mr. Carriere. This individual is presently 77 years of age and would likely be in his eighties before any trial would be conducted. These allegations will be 45 years old by the time they are tried and relate to fondling-type activities on a limited number of occasions. While the merits appear to be fairly strong and while there is an absence of any obvious defence except a total denial, I question whether it is in the public interest in [sic] invoke criminal proceedings in respect of an individual of this age going back two generations in time. In the event that you feel that reasonable and probable grounds exist and that the public interest would be served by a prosecution, I would recommend that the matter proceed at least to a preliminary inquiry stage in order to fully assess the merits and determine whether further proceedings are in the public interest.

Although Mr. Pelletier recognized that it is the Crown attorney's responsibility to determine whether a prosecution is in the public interest, he took Detective Inspector Smith's opinion into consideration because of his experience in the St. Joseph's Training School case. On July 9, 1998, Brother Carriere was charged with two counts of indecent assault on a male.

In my view, Crown counsel has to be careful not to delegate the determination of the reasonable prospect of conviction to investigators. It is important to maintain the separation between the roles and duties of prosecutors and police officers, and the distinction between the reasonable and probable grounds test and the test for reasonable prospect of conviction.

Alain Godin Assigned to the Prosecution

Alain Godin was assigned to the prosecution of Brother Carriere. He did not recall reviewing Mr. Pelletier's opinion memorandum upon being assigned to this matter.

On May 31, 1999, the preliminary inquiry in R. v. Brother Leonel Romeo Carriere was heard before Justice Gilles Renaud. Brother Carriere was committed to stand trial, and Mr. Godin prepared an indictment including two counts of indecent assault on a male on July 29.

The judicial pre-trial conference scheduled for September 10 before Justice Robert Desmarais was adjourned and took place on November 19, 1999. At the pre-trial conference, Brother Carriere re-elected a judge-alone trial and the matter was scheduled to proceed on June 12, 2000.

Stay of Proceedings

On June 12, 2000, defence counsel brought a motion for a stay of proceedings on the basis of Brother Carriere's health. Justice Paul Lalonde granted the stay of proceedings on June 13, noting:

Le requêreur est âgé de 79 ans et fait face à deux chefs d'accusations. Les faits supportant les chefs d'accusation eurent lieu durant les années 1954 à 1958, donc un délai variant entre 42 et 46 ans. Ce qui m'intéresse c'est le fait que durant ce délai l'accusé a subi des insultes cardiovasculaires causant une telle détérioration de son cerveau que cela lui empêche de présenter une défense pleine et entière à son procès. Donc, le droit de l'accusé à un procès juste et équitable, garanti par la Charte est mise en doute.

Leonel Carrière n'a pas le pouvoir de présenter une défense pleine et entière ou d'aider son avocat à le faire. Sur la prépondérance de la preuve, j'accepte que Monsieur Carrière n'est pas en position de présenter une défense pleine et entière et j'accorde la requête et ordonne l'arrêt de procédure en vertu du paragraphe 24(1) de la Charte des Droits et Libertés a cause d'une entrave au paragraphe 7 et 11(d) de cette même Charte.

Justice Lalonde found that Brother Carriere could not present a full answer and defence or instruct his counsel because of his health, specifically, strokes causing brain damage.

Following the decision of Justice Lalonde, Mr. Godin asked the victims if they wanted to appeal the matter, and they did not wish to do so.

A few of the prosecutions from the Project Truth investigations were stayed or withdrawn because of the health of the alleged perpetrators. This explains in part the low number of convictions relative to the number of charges laid. Elderly accused unable to stand trial because of health problems are a reality of prosecuting historical offences.

Clergy and Conspiracy Briefs

Shelley Hallett Assigned Additional Project Truth Briefs

On March 19, 1999, Detective Inspector Pat Hall met with James Stewart, Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region, and Robert Pelletier about the assignment of Crowns for a number of Project Truth cases, including those involving allegations against various clergy members and the conspiracy to obstruct justice. Mr. Stewart requested that Detective Inspector Hall go to Toronto and explain the investigations to the Director of the Special Investigations Unit.

In June 1999, Shelley Hallett met with Detective Inspector Hall in Long Sault and he asked that she take on further work to help with the Project Truth cases. At this point, Shelley Hallett was already involved in four Project Truth prosecutions. Although she was very busy with appeals, policy work, and the other Project Truth cases, she found the work interesting and “certainly wanted to help.” She was not aware of the nature of the new work nor the form it would take, but she agreed to take it on. She cannot remember this additional assignment being formalized with Mr. Stewart.

Shelley Hallett Receives Crown Briefs on Clergy Investigations

Ms Hallett received briefs on Father Bernard Cameron, Father Gary Ostler, Monsignor Donald McDougald, and Bishop Eugène LaRocque on September 22, 1999. She received the Father Kevin Maloney brief in January 2000. Ms Hallett was asked to provide an opinion as to whether there were reasonable and probable grounds to lay a charge and whether there was a reasonable prospect of conviction. Ms Hallett preferred to review the briefs together to see if there were common themes and facts. Although the briefs were separate and distinct, Ron Leroux was a common complainant in four of the five briefs and the allegations had come to the attention of Project Truth through the investigation by Constable Perry Dunlop.

Ms Hallett testified that she has reviewed many cases over the years in her role as counsel with the Crown Law Office—Criminal and has a standard practice when reviewing Crown briefs. She required a number of days to review all witness statements and cross-check the information with other statements:

So I would find that that work was very painstaking in terms of reviewing the whole brief in order to determine whether there would be a reasonable prospect of conviction and, you know, whether or not also there might be other avenues of investigation that the police could pursue that might assist in terms of arriving at, you know, whether or not charges should be laid.

Ms Hallett further explained that when she reviewed matters she would always look ahead to the likelihood of prosecution. She felt it was important to identify the evidence that supported the offence, to identify likely defences and any follow-up investigation required. She described this as an important but “very time-consuming” task.

With respect to these briefs, Ms Hallett looked at the synopsis for each and at key witness statements. From this, she was able to get a general sense of what the cases were about and who the complainants were. Ron Leroux was the common complainant in four of these cases. Ms Hallett testified that the Project Truth officers informed her they had concerns about Mr. Leroux’s credibility. Nonetheless, Ms Hallett wanted to thoroughly review the matter and see if there were suggestions she could make to the officers about obtaining further evidence. Her review of the briefs never got to that stage.

Delay in Reviewing Briefs and Providing Opinions

As will be outlined in further detail below, concerns were raised repeatedly by the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) regarding the length of time it was taking Ms Hallett to review these briefs and provide her opinions. Ms Hallett never finished her review of the briefs, and they were transferred to Lorne McConnery after the stay of proceedings in R. v. Leduc on March 1, 2001. Following this decision, Ms Hallett had no further involvement in Project Truth matters. Prior to this, four of the clergy briefs were in Ms Hallett’s possession for seventeen months and the brief on Father Maloney was in her possession for approximately fourteen months, without an opinion being rendered.

Ms Hallett did not recall being given a deadline to review these briefs. The clergy briefs were voluminous and included about 3,000 pages altogether. Ms Hallett knew it would take her some time to review them. She recalled that both Detective Constable Joe Dupuis and Detective Inspector Hall had told her that they did not think there would be charges laid in these cases. Ms Hallett was also waiting for the brief on the OPP’s conspiracy investigation, as Detective Constable Dupuis had suggested that she wait until she received it to do her final review. He advised that this brief might contain information that could be useful in determining whether charges should be laid based on these allegations.

Ms Hallett testified that at the time she was preoccupied with the R. v. Leduc matter. The preliminary inquiry took place in late fall 1999, and she was preparing for the pre-trial. She was also getting ready for the Malcolm MacDonald preliminary inquiry in January 2000, which did not proceed because of his death. In addition, Ms Hallett was getting up to speed with the Father Charles MacDonald prosecution. There was a lot going on in connection with the Project Truth investigations, which explained why she was not able to turn her attention to these briefs earlier.

Ms Hallett was less concerned by the passage of time in these cases since these were older allegations, there was not a lot of corroboration, and she had received a preliminary opinion from the officers that charges would probably not be laid. She was aware that the individuals under investigation would want to have the matter concluded, but she felt that it was in their interest to ensure that the review was thorough.

Ms Hallett agreed that it is not ideal for matters to be pending for fourteen to seventeen months. However, she felt that the more complex the brief, the more important it is to make sure that a good job is done in reviewing that brief and “that corners aren’t cut simply because people are in a hurry to get an outcome.” Ms Hallett testified that if the officers felt they had reasonable and probable grounds it was open to them to lay charges.

Detective Inspector Pat Hall Inquires About Status of Briefs

On January 6, 2000, Ms Hallett told Detective Inspector Hall that she would try to have a legal opinion on the five clergy briefs by the end of January. Mr. Stewart testified that at that date, he would not have been concerned about the length of time it was taking for the briefs to be reviewed.

On May 25, Detective Inspector Hall left Ms Hallett a message asking about the five outstanding legal opinions. Ms Hallett explained that by this time there were a number of developments regarding Constable Dunlop. In particular, she had undertaken to review the nine boxes of material he provided, which was a priority. Although she may not have advised Detective Inspector Hall at this point that she was too busy with the review of the Dunlop boxes, she believed Detective Inspector Hall was “acutely aware” of a number of concerns on other fronts at that point.

Detective Inspector Hall called Ms Hallett on June 27, and she told him she had not reviewed the other briefs yet and was waiting for the conspiracy brief to be completed.

Shelley Hallett Receives Crown Brief on Conspiracy Investigation

Ms Hallett received the nine volumes of the conspiracy brief on July 20, 2000. There were over 7,000 pages between the six briefs, and she had not realized it would be so large. Ms Hallett wanted to review the matter carefully as she knew the alleged conspiracy was one of the fundamental concerns in Cornwall. She wanted everyone to be satisfied that there had been a proper and thorough review of these briefs.

Ms Hallett testified that she wished the conspiracy brief had come to her before any of the other Project Truth briefs, as it would have assisted her in understanding more about Constable Dunlop's investigations and the issues involving him before beginning the other prosecutions.

As with the other five briefs, Ms Hallett had no discussions with Project Truth officers about a deadline for the review of the conspiracy brief. Ms Hallett was aware that Project Truth was winding down; however, in her opinion, a prosecutor must remain "impervious to those kind of pressures" in order to render a just decision.

Shelley Hallett Tells Detective Inspector Pat Hall Legal Opinions Will Be Done in October

On August 22, 2000, Detective Inspector Hall asked Ms Hallett when she would have the legal opinions concluded and she told him in October. At the time, Ms Hallett believed this was possible, although she was already working on an appeal that was argued in September. Then she was assigned to work on a high-priority legislative initiative. But for this additional assignment, she would have been free to work on the briefs in the fall of 2000.

Detective Inspector Pat Hall Under Pressure to End Project Truth

As discussed in Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the OPP, Detective Inspector Hall was under some pressure to wrap up the Project Truth investigations. Ms Hallett was generally aware of the pressures he faced. She understood that he was having meetings with the Cornwall police, the mayor, and others, and that these meetings impressed upon him a sense of urgency in terms of wrapping up Project Truth. Ms Hallett did not recall Detective Inspector Hall discussing with her the pressures he was facing at the time.

Detective Inspector Pat Hall Expresses His Concerns to James Stewart

On December 5, 2000, Detective Inspector Hall called Mr. Stewart and discussed the briefs and the fact that legal opinions had not yet been provided. Mr. Stewart said he did not want to push Ms Hallett, and that in his opinion, there was no rush. Mr. Stewart testified, "Obviously if somebody's starting a trial and you have something where you haven't laid charges yet, in terms of priority, Leduc is the priority."

Mr. Stewart did not recall a concern being raised with him prior to this call about the length of time it was taking for Ms Hallett to review the briefs.

Also on December 5, Ms Hallett told Detective Inspector Hall that she could not say when she would have the opinions completed except that it would be after the Leduc trial. Ms Hallett testified that she did not sense any urgency in respect of these legal briefs.

Ms Hallett's explanation for the delay in the review of the briefs is summarized by the following testimony:

... it was something that was going to take quite a long time to review, to do the cross-check on, to do the follow-up investigation on. These officers themselves had been working on these briefs for a couple of years before they reached me. But before they reached me there were other briefs that reached me, and those briefs included the briefs on [Jacques] Leduc, [Father Charles] MacDonald, another [Malcolm] MacDonald, [Brian] Dufour and a number of other matters. So I'm doing my best under the circumstances.

Detective Superintendent Chris Lewis Speaks to Murray Segal About Delay

According to Ms Hallett, none of her managers conveyed to her that there was urgency with respect to the review of the briefs, but she did not fault her managers as she was a senior Crown and did not require supervision. Although they may not have raised the issue with Ms Hallett, senior people within the Ministry of the Attorney General were being made aware of the OPP's concerns about the delay in Ms Hallett's review of the briefs. On December 13, 2000, Detective Superintendent Chris Lewis spoke with Mr. Stewart. He expressed his "concern that no legal opinions received from Crown Law yet." According to his notes, Mr. Stewart asked that they make another inquiry and if nothing was heard by the New Year, he would look into it.

Around this time, Detective Superintendent Lewis also contacted Ms Hallett and told her of his concerns. He said she explained that she was very busy and would get to the briefs soon. Detective Superintendent Lewis could not recall when he spoke with Ms Hallett.

On December 18, Detective Superintendent Lewis advised Detective Inspector Hall that he had spoken to Mr. Stewart about the briefs and Mr. Stewart suggested that he not get involved. Detective Inspector Hall's notes of the call further state: "Go to Toronto on same. Advised John Corolie [sic] Hallett's boss on case. Lewis will call as he knows him."

On January 15, 2001, Detective Superintendent Lewis called Murray Segal, Assistant Deputy Attorney General, Criminal Law Division, and expressed his concerns about the delay in the legal opinions. Detective Superintendent Lewis recounted that Mr. Segal apologized for the delay but was reluctant to say anything to Ms Hallett because she was starting a jury trial on Project Truth. He would figure out when best to speak with her and get back to Detective Superintendent Lewis.

Mr. Segal recalled having a brief conversation with Detective Superintendent Lewis about the briefs. Mr. Segal was aware the Leduc matter was starting within days and, as a result, Ms Hallett was extremely busy. He does not recall speaking to Ms Hallett about the matter:

If someone had on their plate a jury trial that was imminent within a matter of days or so forth, asking them or causing them to lose their focus or attention on that priority would not have made sense to me then.

Mr. Segal found the call with Detective Superintendent Lewis was cordial and there was no pointed sense of urgency or upset. He advised Detective Superintendent Lewis about the other significant priority Ms Hallett was handling. Mr. Segal did not consider reassigning the briefs to someone else. He explained that to give the briefs to somebody else would have entailed a learning curve that would far exceed the time it would take Ms Hallett to conclude the Leduc trial.

Detective Superintendent Lewis and Mr. Segal spoke again on February 6, 2001. Again Detective Superintendent Lewis expressed his concerns about the delay with the briefs. He said that the OPP was under pressure from the media and needed to move on. Mr. Segal believed he would have listened to Detective Superintendent Lewis' concerns and made a mental note to check how the Leduc trial was progressing.

Detective Superintendent Lewis understood that Ms Hallett was both the prosecutor in the Leduc trial and the Crown assigned to give opinions on the outstanding briefs. He did not recall any discussion with Mr. Segal about the priorities in Ms Hallett's workload. His sense from the conversation with Mr. Segal was that Ms Hallett was under stress because she was starting a trial and had a number of other responsibilities, and Mr. Segal was reluctant to pull the outstanding briefs from her at that time.

Detective Superintendent Lewis testified that he was not aware of the size of the briefs and did not know that Ms Hallett wanted to review the conspiracy brief before she rendered an opinion on the historical sexual assault cases.

Detective Inspector Hall testified on a number of occasions that Detective Superintendent Lewis relayed to him that Ms Hallett was having "some kind of emotional problems" and that this information had come from Mr. Segal. Detective Superintendent Lewis did not recall Mr. Segal communicating to him that Ms Hallett was having emotional problems. Detective Superintendent Lewis did not know what impression Detective Inspector Hall got from what he told him, which was that Mr. Segal was concerned about professional stress on Ms Hallett and not something personal. I heard no evidence from anyone except Detective Inspector Hall about Ms Hallett having emotional problems, and in fact the two individuals who allegedly passed this information on to Detective Inspector Hall denied doing so.

Ms Hallett did not think this was the right time to be asking her to complete her review of the briefs as she was about to start a trial on a high-profile case.

Shelley Hallett Doesn't Ask for Help

Although I accept that Ms Hallett was busy with the Leduc trial in late 2000 and early 2001, and therefore was unable to review the briefs at that time, it appears that she would have been too busy to do so regardless of the Leduc trial. In my opinion, she should have asked for assistance in managing her workload. In addition, however, senior management within the Ministry of the Attorney General should have been involved in managing Ms Hallett's workload.

Ms Hallett did not request that someone relieve her of some of her work because she was reluctant to renege on her commitment to Detective Inspector Hall to review the briefs. She also did not think there was anybody to turn to in her office. Ms Hallett was familiar with the issues and individuals involved in these cases and, as a result, she "felt more of a duty to retain the briefs for the purpose of reviewing them than simply handing them off. However, she admitted that in retrospect she should have told Mr. Stewart she had too much work and asked him to reassign the briefs.

I am of the view that although they had not received a request from Ms Hallett for assistance, both Mr. Stewart and Mr. Segal were aware of her workload and both were aware of the public pressure on Project Truth officers to finalize their investigations. They should have reassigned the briefs despite their reluctance to do so. In my opinion, this is a further example of problems resulting from a failure to allocate adequate and appropriate resources to the prosecution of criminal charges from the Project Truth investigations.

James Stewart Meets With Detective Inspector Pat Hall About Briefs

As discussed earlier in this chapter, following the stay in R. v. Leduc, Ms Hallett was no longer involved in Project Truth cases. As a result, it became necessary to find a Crown to replace her in providing an opinion on these briefs.

On March 7, 2001, Mr. Stewart wrote an e-mail to Mr. Segal:

Just to keep you up-to-date I am meeting tomorrow in Kingston with the OPP to discuss the outstanding cases where an opinion needs to be rendered as to the reasonable prospect of conviction. The ultimate review perhaps should be rendered by the new senior crown whoever that might be but I understand from Paul that Shelley might want to continue and I want to do my own initial assessment of the cases the appropriateness I will keep you posted.

Mr. Stewart testified that it appears from this e-mail that Ms Hallett may have wanted to remain involved in some of the opinions. Mr. Stewart wanted to assess the appropriateness of Ms Hallett remaining involved in light of the finding made against her in the Leduc case. Ms Hallett testified that in March 2001 she had some discussions with Mr. Stewart about the briefs being reassigned. She still wanted to attempt to review the briefs, as she believed this was her commitment. Ms Hallett later spoke with John Pearson, Director of Crown Operations, Central West Region, who told her she had to send the briefs off and that she should not worry about them.

Detective Inspector Hall's notes of the meeting with Mr. Stewart on March 8, 2001, read:

Discussed matter still under review by Hallett. Suggests he will have a scrum on same. Pick three Crown attorneys. Meeting in Ottawa. Do presentation on evidence. Require the investigators for same. Went through each case. Decided it would be better for Crown doing Father Charles MacDonald to do the conspiracy review as well.

...

Appears Hallett will not be further involved in Project Truth matters.

Mr. Stewart explained that a "scrum" means a case conference during which three or four Crowns will look at a case and make a decision about it. He could not recall whether the intention was to have three Crowns write opinions or just have a scrum and have one or two write opinions. Ultimately, Mr. McConnery rendered the opinions.

With respect to these briefs, Mr. Stewart testified that he came to understand that the police had concluded that they did not have reasonable and probable grounds. He also learned that the original agreement with Peter Griffiths, the previous regional Crown, was that all of these files would be reviewed by a Crown before the police would consider laying charges. According to Mr. Stewart, this is not the normal approach. Usually, if the police don't have reasonable and probable grounds, the cases are not referred to the Crown for an opinion. The police will sometimes bring sensitive cases to the Crown because they know the next test is reasonable prospect of conviction, and if the Crown won't prosecute a case there is little point in laying charges.

I disagree with this practice. The police have the right to lay charges and the Crown has the right to withdraw them. These roles are separate and distinct, and they should remain so. Once the police lay a charge the matter becomes public, which may lead to additional information coming to the attention of the police that could, in turn, make the case a stronger one to prosecute.

Detective Superintendent Jim Miller E-Mails Murray Segal

On May 22, 2001, Detective Superintendent Jim Miller, Director of the OPP's Criminal Investigations Branch, sent an e-mail to Mr. Segal expressing concerns about the time frames for the legal opinions. Detective Superintendent Miller had received an e-mail from Detective Inspector Hall setting out his concerns about the delay in receiving the Crown opinions. Mr. Segal responded the next day, advising that Mr. McConnery would be reviewing the material on a priority basis.

Lorne McConnery Assigned to Review Outstanding Briefs

On May 23, 2001, Mr. McConnery received a call from Mr. Stewart and was advised that he would be reviewing a conspiracy brief and some other briefs regarding sexual assault allegations that had been assigned to Ms Hallett and to do so "with some priority." Mr. McConnery was told that the matters had been outstanding for a "fair amount of time."

On May 29, Mr. McConnery attended a meeting with Mr. Stewart and others about setting up an office. As discussed previously, when Ms Hallett was assigned to Project Truth matters she was not given an office and did a lot of work out of her hotel room in Cornwall. In this instance, Mr. McConnery and Kevin Phillips, who began assisting him in June, were provided with a boardroom in which to work.

Transfer of Briefs to Lorne McConnery

Around the end of May 2001, Mr. Stewart asked Ms Hallett to send the conspiracy brief to Mr. McConnery for his review. By May 28, several of the briefs were already at Mr. Stewart's office, but Ms Hallett still had a copy of the conspiracy brief.

On June 13, Mr. McConnery met with Detective Inspector Hall and Detective Constable Joe Dupuis at the Long Sault Detachment and received their master copy of Project Truth's conspiracy brief. Mr. McConnery recalled that the officers were not happy to give him their copy because they thought he should receive Ms Hallett's copy of the brief. Mr. McConnery agreed to photocopy the brief and return the OPP's copy to them.

Mr. McConnery received the conspiracy brief from Ms Hallett on June 25. Ms Hallett did not have any further contacts with Mr. McConnery or Mr. Phillips with respect to the opinions on the briefs.

I have previously commented on some of the problems encountered when briefs remain in the possession of prosecutors no longer assigned to a case. This is yet another example of delays created by the failure to transfer a brief in a timely fashion. The stay of proceedings in the Leduc matter had been granted almost four months previously and a new Crown assigned. Crown briefs and files belong to the Ministry of the Attorney General and not to Crowns personally, and should be returned to someone within the Ministry as soon as a Crown is no longer involved in a case.

On July 4, Mr. McConnery received a letter from Detective Inspector Hall with an additional will-state and notes that were not in the briefs he was initially provided. These items included materials from 1993 and 1994, so they were not all “new” documents. Mr. McConnery explained that police notes are often not included in Crown briefs and the Crown has to request them.

At this point, Mr. McConnery found himself with significantly more material to review than he had started out with.

Murray Segal Meets With Lorne McConnery and James Stewart: Briefs to Be Done in Thirty Days

On June 4, 2001, Mr. McConnery and Mr. Stewart attended a meeting with Mr. Segal. At this point, Mr. McConnery had received some of the clergy briefs but did not yet have the conspiracy brief, which, as discussed above, he received near the end of June. During this meeting, Mr. Segal said that he would like the review of the briefs done in about thirty days. Mr. Segal testified that he does not usually set time limits:

... I must have been impressed with the passage of time, the interest of the police force, my concerns about the integrity of the cases, you know, the witnesses and victims and the community. I just wanted to get on with it.

Mr. McConnery had already been advised that the matter should be prioritized. It was clear to him from this meeting that there was a lot of concern about getting this done as quickly as possible. He understood this was a top priority and he was to devote himself full-time to this review. In the end, it took Mr. McConnery longer than thirty days to complete his review of the briefs. When asked about this delay, Mr. Segal testified that he wanted Mr. McConnery to deal with the matter quickly and he thought he took that to heart.

Lorne McConnery Begins Review of Briefs

Mr. McConnery's review of the briefs spanned from June into August. He and Mr. Phillips split the briefs between them, although they both eventually read all the briefs. Mr. McConnery reviewed all the briefs regarding allegations by Mr. Leroux, namely the Father Cameron, Bishop LaRocque, Father Ostler, Monsignor McDougald, and conspiracy briefs. Mr. Phillips reviewed the Father Maloney brief, which involved allegations by C-15. Mr. McConnery testified that because of the nature of the allegation of conspiracy to obstruct justice and the people who were mentioned in that allegation, he felt it was important that he review anything involving Mr. Leroux. Mr. McConnery wanted to be able to assess his credibility.

As will be discussed further, Mr. McConnery flagged Mr. Leroux's credibility as an issue from the moment he reviewed the videotape and transcript of his interview by the OPP. Mr. McConnery thought it was quite clear Mr. Leroux was being dishonest.

Mr. McConnery testified that there was some information missing in the briefs. There were also associated briefs he was interested in looking at. Although some of these other briefs did not assist the Crowns in forming their opinion on these particular briefs, they touched on some of the same issues and therefore were helpful. Some of the additional material requested by Mr. McConnery will be discussed below.

For all the briefs Mr. McConnery reviewed, the officers did not have reasonable and probable grounds. The issue was a lack of subjective belief. Mr. McConnery agreed that he could not tell an officer that he or she had reasonable and probable grounds. If an officer has concerns about credibility or subjective belief, the Crown cannot help him or her get over that hurdle, although the Crown may be able to give advice about areas where follow-up work could be done. In terms of what Mr. McConnery was doing with respect to these briefs, he testified as follows:

So all I was doing was looking at whether or not when you've got such substantial and significant allegations as were being made here and you have officers saying basically we're not prepared to lay charges, was that well founded on their part?

I look at whether or not they have done follow-up with respect to what the subject or suspects may have said. So, you know, have they actually gone and investigated alibis. And I think there were some of these where we had to direct some follow-up in that regard.

For each of the briefs, Mr. McConnery prepared a “factual analysis” document outlining what he thought were the more significant parts of the allegations in a more concise fashion than a several-volume brief. This was not his normal way of proceeding when asked to give an opinion, and he testified that he probably prepared these documents because he thought these matters would be subject to some type of review later. He thought these were very unusual circumstances. It was not his intention to provide them to the police with the opinion letter, although he would have provided them to the police if requested. He believed Detective Inspector Hall requested the document relating to the conspiracy brief.

View on Constable Perry Dunlop’s Role

Constable Perry Dunlop and his lawyer, Charles Bourgeois, took a number of statements from Mr. Leroux in late 1996 and early 1997, in part to support Constable Dunlop’s civil action against the Cornwall Police Service and other institutions. These statements were turned over to Chief Julian Fantino and subsequently to the OPP.

Mr. McConnery was aware that Constable Dunlop had shown photos to witnesses for identification. He felt this compromised the case and that as an experienced police officer, Constable Dunlop would know that is not the way to procure information about identity. Mr. McConnery testified that in addition to the photographs, other aspects of the interviews by Constable Dunlop concerned him with respect to tainting witnesses. For example, there were no records of Constable Dunlop’s interviews. Because allegations were made that he had prompted people and told them what to say, Mr. McConnery was very concerned that there was no record of what he said to anyone.

Lorne McConnery Meets With Murray Segal

On July 5, 2001, Mr. McConnery met with Mr. Segal, who made several suggestions regarding Mr. McConnery’s review of the briefs. Mr. McConnery’s notes of the meeting say:

During meeting with Murray Segal he suggests we obtain 1) copy of Crown brief re R. v. Malcolm MacDonald, att. obst. justice, 2) transcript of plea by Malcolm MacDonald, 3) written request to S. Hallett to ensure I have all the material needed, 4) [redacted] 5) clear picture of police view as to R&PG re the six outstanding briefs I am reviewing.
(Emphasis added)

According to Mr. Segal, the decision to lay charges rests with the police. It would be incorrect for the police to take “marching orders” from the Crown, and he was just reminding Mr. McConnery of that. Mr. Segal thought it was important in these cases to know where the police stood before Mr. McConnery expressed an opinion. It was clear to Mr. McConnery that he was conducting reasonable and probable grounds reviews and part of his responsibility was to ask the police whether they felt they had reasonable and probable grounds. According to Mr. McConnery, many police officers would like the Crown to tell them they have reasonable grounds, but that is not the Crown’s role: “it’s not what we do.”

As we have seen previously in this section, in Project Truth Crown attorneys were being asked to provide opinions to the OPP on whether there were reasonable and probable grounds to lay charges. This is not the usual way criminal charges are laid. I have mentioned several times that the police are responsible for determining whether charges should be laid. However, in the Project Truth operational plan it was contemplated that all briefs would be submitted to the Crown for review and recommendations about laying charges. It is not clear whether this document was shared with the Ministry of the Attorney General or the Crowns assigned to Project Truth cases, or whether officials within the Ministry of the Attorney General were consulted about this plan.

Lorne McConnery Meets With Detective Inspector Pat Hall

Mr. McConnery had a meeting with Detective Inspector Hall on July 10, 2001. He made a number of requests for information and material, and followed up on Mr. Segal’s request to obtain the police views on reasonable and probable grounds. According to Mr. McConnery’s notes of the meeting, the first topic of discussion was MPP Garry Guzzo. Mr. McConnery was familiar with the concerns raised by Mr. Guzzo. One of these was an allegation that someone was in possession of videotapes that were potentially relevant to alleged criminal acts. Mr. McConnery asked Detective Inspector Hall to follow up with Mr. Guzzo about this allegation.

Mr. McConnery understood that the videotapes Mr. Guzzo was describing potentially showed various parties in sexual acts, possibly with youths, and he thought these tapes could be very relevant to the briefs he was reviewing.

The next issue that was discussed was a follow-up request with respect to the Father Maloney and Bishop LaRocque briefs. It was Father Maloney’s position that he had never been at St. Joseph’s Training School in Alfred, where C-15 claimed he was abused. Mr. McConnery wanted to obtain records from St. Joseph’s to confirm or disprove that. Those records had not yet been obtained or reviewed by the Project Truth investigators. The follow-up request with respect to Bishop LaRocque was related to the Bishop’s claim that he was attending a conference on the last weekend of August in 1993. This issue was part of the analysis of the conspiracy brief and the alleged meeting that occurred on Stanley Island. The Bishop's attendance at a conference would constitute an alibi.

The conversation then moved to the police views of reasonable and probable grounds. Mr. McConnery asked Detective Inspector Hall about his impression with respect to reasonable and probable grounds on each of these briefs. According to Mr. McConnery's notes, with respect to the matters based substantially on the allegations of Mr. Leroux, Detective Inspector Hall said something to the effect of, "I would not put my hand on the Bible re: anything Leroux says, or ask any of my men to do it." It was clear to Mr. McConnery that Detective Inspector Hall did not have subjective reasonable and probable grounds on any allegation based solely on Mr. Leroux's statements.

Lorne McConnery Writes Follow-Up Letter to Detective Inspector Hall

The following day, July 11, Mr. McConnery sent a letter to Detective Inspector Hall about the issues discussed during their meeting. Regarding the issues raised by Mr. Guzzo, Mr. McConnery wrote:

The existence or non-existence of the copies Mr. Guzzo is referring to must be established immediately. If such copies exist as claimed, they must be located seized and retained as evidence. If the existence of the copies is proven false, that too is clearly significant. I suggest that immediate steps be taken to determine the existence of the videos, and to properly secure them as evidence. What ever safeguards must be undertaken to get the co-operation of "these people" who have "found" the copies must be addressed immediately. I don't think I can underline the significance of this issue anymore strongly.

Mr. McConnery wanted to ensure it was clear to Detective Inspector Hall how concerned he was and that he wanted to see some follow-up on the matter. On July 19, Detective Inspector Hall interviewed Carson Chisholm and asked him about the existence of videotaped movies of child pornography or sexual acts that allegedly belonged to Ken Seguin. Mr. Chisholm said that if the tapes still existed, as alleged by Mr. Guzzo, he did not know where they were or who had them.

Mr. McConnery also referred to the follow-up requested with respect to allegations against Bishop LaRocque and Father Maloney, which he felt was significant. In particular, he felt the follow-up on the Bishop LaRocque matter was important: "the man gave an alibi. It was imperative that there be follow-up to whatever extent there could be."

Mr. McConnery had further contacts with Detective Inspector Hall about his requests for follow-up information, and he received a letter on July 25 enclosing some of that material. Mr. McConnery felt that the issues he had raised were followed up in a timely fashion.

Crown attorneys have different approaches on requesting follow-up investigative work from police officers. Peter Griffiths was less inclined to request additional information from them, while Mr. McConnery and Ms Hallett adopted a more proactive role by requesting that the officers follow up on certain matters. I find that with respect to matters within Crown discretion, the different approaches are acceptable. However, it would be preferable to have a consistent approach when dealing with large investigations or special projects.

Review of Clergy Briefs

Mr. McConnery testified that he had no recollection of the particulars of the clergy briefs he reviewed. In respect of all five of these briefs, he concluded that there were no reasonable and probable grounds to support a charge.

Review of Conspiracy Brief

In examining Mr. McConnery's review of the conspiracy brief, the first question to consider is what exactly he was looking at. In his "factual analysis" he set out what he believed he was reviewing:

My review of this matter has been isolated to the allegation of conspiracy to obstruct justice against various members of the Roman Catholic Church, members of the Cornwall Police Service, and the Crown Attorney for the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry for allegedly arranging for a financial settlement to be paid to David Silmser for the purpose of derailing and terminating the criminal investigation of Silmser's complaint and any potential criminal prosecution arising therefrom.

Mr. McConnery was clear in his testimony that he was not looking at potential allegations of conspiracy with respect to a clan or ring of pedophiles, or whether people were conspiring to sexually abuse children. Rather, he was looking at whether there was evidence to support an allegation of a very particular criminal conspiracy among the Cornwall police, Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald, Bishop LaRocque, two or more local lawyers, and Ron Wilson, a funeral director, the result of which was the agreement between David Silmser and the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. The issue for Mr. McConnery was whether there was evidence to support charges of that conspiracy among those ten or twelve people. Nobody instructed Mr. McConnery to focus exclusively on the meeting alleged to have occurred on Stanley Island. He applied his own judgment as to what might be an offence, which led him to focus on that allegation.

Mr. McConnery was not reviewing the conspiracy to obstruct justice that was investigated by Detective Inspector Smith in 1994. An opinion had already been rendered on that matter. Rather, he was reviewing the new allegations about the conspiracy that had been raised by Mr. Leroux, particularly the allegations about the meeting on Stanley Island.

In his analysis of the conspiracy, Mr. McConnery identified three scenarios for possible charges. The first scenario consisted of conspiracy charges based on Mr. Leroux's evidence of what occurred at the Stanley Island meeting, combined with evidence of negotiations of the settlement. However, Mr. McConnery had some concerns about Mr. Leroux's credibility and about the admissibility of some of the evidence he could potentially give, in particular about conversations he had with Ken Seguin:

A significant issue in this scenario would be the extent to which Leroux could testify. If a court allowed only his observations of the Sunday meeting of the V.I.P.'s but not allow Leroux to relate what he was told by Ken Seguin, there may still be some evidence of a conspiratorial meeting a few days prior to the signing of the agreement to support the charges.

The next scenario Mr. McConnery contemplated was the case without Mr. Leroux's evidence:

If the evidence of Leroux is determined to be so unreliable that the prosecution would not advance his evidence, then what remains would appear to be the same factual premise that was presented to Peter Griffiths, Director of Crown Operations, East Region when he gave his opinion in the letter of December 21, 1994. If Leroux was determined to be unreliable, then despite the thorough investigation of Project Truth investigators, the evidence is really no different than presented to Griffiths. The theorizing and speculations of Perry Dunlop do not advance the case. Is there any reason to vary from the opinion of Mr. Griffiths?

The fact that Mr. Griffiths had rendered an opinion in 1994 on the obstruct justice issue did not intimidate or influence Mr. McConnery. He noted that without Mr. Leroux's evidence, many of the alleged conspirators could not be charged.

Mr. McConnery also contemplated a third scenario that was unrelated to Mr. Leroux's allegations:

A perplexing issue is that Jacques Leduc was never charged in 1995. Accepting that he claimed never to have intended or realized that the clause regarding the criminal proceedings was included in the final draft of the Final Release and Undertaking, and that the Crown's theory in the prosecution of Mr. Malcolm MacDonald acknowledges that position of Mr. Leduc, it is quite clear that Mr. Leduc, having been subsequently charged with sexual assault himself, is not necessarily the person he was considered to be in 1994. The subsequent investigation of both Leduc and Malcolm MacDonald put them both in a different light.

My point is that, in retrospect, Leduc and Malcolm MacDonald could clearly be seen to have their very own personal agenda in getting Mr. Silmsen to sign this agreement in 1993. Without the evidence of Malcolm MacDonald, is there really a case to pursue against Leduc?

Mr. McConnery testified that this scenario just jumped out at him. He was saying that with the benefit of hindsight, looking at the negotiations, Jacques Leduc may have had an ulterior motivation to cover up Mr. Silmsen's allegation. However, the evidence to support this theory came from Malcolm MacDonald, who was dead.

Mr. McConnery recalled a discussion with Detective Inspector Hall about what efforts had been made to source the money paid to Mr. Silmsen. He felt that if a number of the people involved in the negotiation had contributed to the fund, this would be a very significant factor to consider. Mr. McConnery was satisfied that the OPP had done what it could do, and he did not recall requesting follow-up with respect to the possibility of files or documents in possession of the lawyers involved in the settlement. He thought that at some point there was a discussion about the manner in which search warrants would be executed on solicitors' files but could not recall suggesting that the officers execute warrants and seize the files of Mr. Leduc, Mr. MacDonald, and Sean Adams.

According to Mr. McConnery, the third scenario was somewhat different from the conspiracy allegation he was looking into, which involved a number of parties. He did not believe he was asked to review or provide an opinion on this issue about Mr. Leduc, which he raised himself in his review of the materials.

Lorne McConnery Writes Opinion in August 2001

On August 2, 2001, Mr. Segal asked Mr. McConnery to write his opinion letter “ASAP.” Mr. McConnery completed his opinion letter, addressed to Detective Inspector Hall, on August 15. In the letter, he concluded:

Upon a review of all of the above-noted material, I find that your concerns and conclusions about the lack of reasonable and probable grounds are appropriate and justified. All of the allegations of the complainants Leroux and [C-15] have been carefully studied in the context in which those allegations were made, and your opinion as to the credibility of the allegations is reasonable and well-founded in my view.

OPP Issues Press Release: No Evidence of a Pedophile Ring

On August 22, 2001, the OPP issued a press release announcing the conclusion of Project Truth. The release stated, “The OPP found no evidence that a pedophile ring operated in the city. There is nothing to indicate individuals operated in concert with each other to commit offences.”

Mr. McConnery testified that he was never asked for an opinion about a pedophile ring, had not expressed an opinion on that allegation, and did not think it would have been appropriate to provide an opinion about that. He was not happy with the press release because:

... the thrust of this press release seemed to me to be saying this has all been subjected to Crown review, i.e. Lorne McConnery, without naming me, and he too has found that there is no paedophile ring in the City of Cornwall. I never expressed an opinion on it. I was never asked for an opinion on it, and if that’s what somebody might read this press release and take from it, it was dramatically incorrect.

I agree. Mr. McConnery’s opinion was based on Mr. Leroux’s conspiracy theory, and not on a broad investigation of a pedophile ring.

R. v. Jean Luc Leblanc, 2001

After his conviction in 1986, discussed earlier in this chapter, Jean Luc Leblanc came to the attention of the police again in December 1998. The consequent Project Truth investigation resulted in Mr. Leblanc being charged with fifty-one counts of sexually abusing young people. He was initially charged and arrested on January 5, 1999, and subsequently charged and arrested on further counts on March 11, 1999, July 27, 1999, and April 7, 2000.

Jean Luc Leblanc Pleads Guilty and Is Declared a Long-Term Offender

The prosecution of Mr. Leblanc was assigned to the Brockville Crown Attorney's Office. On March 26, 2001, Mr. Leblanc pleaded guilty to six counts. He pleaded guilty to twelve counts on June 7, and the remaining thirty-three counts were withdrawn by the Crown. Crown Curt Flanagan told the Court that the counts withdrawn were duplicates and covered the same factual allegations that had been previously pleaded.

Crown Claudette Wilhelm attended at the March 26 court appearance. One of the victims, Cindy Burgess-Lebrun, recalled a female Crown at one of the court appearances, and this was the only contact she recalled having with a Crown prosecutor. Ms Burgess-Lebrun was upset that she was not able to read the victim impact statement she prepared to the Court herself and that the Crown read it instead: "Like I said, it's different coming from your heart as opposed to me saying, 'Here, can you read this?' It's a big difference."

I will provide comments on a victim's involvement with the reading of his or her victim impact statement in the section on R. v. Robert Sabourin.

At the June 7, court appearance, Mr. Flanagan attended for the Crown and brought an application to have Mr. Leblanc designated a dangerous offender. At the commencement of the hearing, it was agreed on consent that the application would proceed as a long-term offender application. The Crown called Dr. Philip Klassen, Deputy Clinical Director at the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health, in support of its application. On September 20, 2001, Dr. Klassen submitted an interim report to the Crown in which he wrote:

... His [Jean Luc Leblanc's] level of risk is such, however, that I would support the notion that he presents as being at substantial risk of re-offense. I do believe, however, that there is a "reasonable possibility of eventual control of the risk in the community."

Accordingly, and from a purely psychiatric perspective, I would support that this individual be found a Long-Term Offender.

The application was heard on April 10, 2002. On April 22, Justice Dan Chilcott found that Mr. Leblanc was a long-term offender and sentenced him to ten years incarceration, with a reduction of eighteen months for time already spent in custody. In addition, he was sentenced to a ten-year long-term supervision order.

External Pressures on Project Truth Prosecutions: Garry Guzzo

In Chapter 7, where I examine the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police, I have elaborated upon some of the external pressures the OPP Project Truth officers experienced during the course of their investigation. Similar external pressures were also experienced by Crown prosecutors and employees of the Ministry of the Attorney General during the prosecution of Project Truth cases. Specific pressures experienced by Crown attorneys included the loss of the binders delivered by Constable Perry Dunlop to the Ministry, comments by MPP Garry Guzzo and others in the legislature and media, and the establishment of websites dedicated to Project Truth investigations and prosecutions.

Garry Guzzo Expresses Concern About the Dunlop Binders

As discussed in Chapter 7, on April 8, 1997, Constable Dunlop hand-delivered a cover letter, a videotape containing the Fifth Estate segment featuring him, and four binders of information (the “Government Brief”) to the following government agencies in Toronto:

- The Solicitor General and Minister of Correctional Services:
The binders and the videotape were refused by this office and only the letter was accepted, by John Periversoff.
- The Ontario Civilian Commission on Police Services: Clerk Assistant C. Labielski accepted the letter, the videotape, and the binders.
- The Ministry of the Attorney General: Appeal Records and Support Assistant Michael Austin accepted the letter, the videotape, and the binders.

The first two binders of the Government Brief contained materials compiled by Constable Dunlop. The first seventy-four tabs of these binders were identical to the seventy-four tabs of the Fantino Brief that had led to the establishment of Project Truth. An additional eleven tabs of material had not been included in the Fantino Brief. The other two binders contained materials related to the Police Services Act charges against Constable Dunlop, which also had not formed part of the Fantino Brief.

The covering letter that accompanied the Government Brief set out Constable Dunlop’s concerns about a group of pedophiles operating in the Cornwall area and about a conspiracy to cover up allegations of sexual abuse. The letter noted the accompanying materials. As mentioned in Chapter 7, Peter Griffiths responded to Constable Dunlop’s letter on June 23, 1997.

As discussed in Chapter 7, the Solicitor General was the only one of the three government offices to forward the material received from Constable Dunlop to the OPP. Because the Solicitor General had accepted only the letter and not the binders containing the Government Brief, only the letter was passed on. Chapter 7 recounts how the Government Brief eventually came into the possession of Project Truth.

Detective Inspector Pat Hall Advises Robert Pelletier That Project Truth Had Obtained the Government Brief

In a letter dated August 10, 1998, Detective Inspector Pat Hall informed Robert Pelletier that the OPP had learned of the Government Brief only on July 23, 1998, though Constable Dunlop had delivered it to the Ministry of the Attorney General in April 1997. Detective Inspector Hall provided Mr. Pelletier with two statements found in the new materials that pertained to the Father MacDonald case for his information and disclosure. Mr. Pelletier did not believe he reviewed the other materials contained in the four volumes.

Despite having provided disclosure materials relevant to the Project Truth investigation to two government agencies, Constable Dunlop was the one who provided Detective Inspector Hall with a copy of those materials on July 31, 1998.

As will be discussed below, what was contained in the Government Brief and whether the OPP had that material was an issue repeatedly raised by MPP Garry Guzzo. His inquiries led to an internal investigation within the Ministry of the Attorney General in an attempt determine what happened to the material accepted at its office.

Garry Guzzo Raises Concerns About the Materials Delivered by Constable Perry Dunlop

As discussed in Chapter 7, Mr. Guzzo started to ask questions about the investigations in Cornwall sometime between the fall of 1996 and May 1997. He testified that he had some discussions with Attorney General Charles Harnick and Solicitor General Robert Runciman, who both told him they knew nothing about Cornwall but that in any event, nothing was wrong.

Frustrated by the lack of response, Mr. Guzzo wrote a letter to Premier Mike Harris on September 18, 1998, with copies to the Solicitor General and the Attorney General. The letter raised concerns about the police investigations in Cornwall and talked about the material Constable Dunlop had delivered to the government offices:

The next question, one must ask, of course, is can we be certain that all of the documentation that was served upon our government was turned over to the OPP? Let me say that from what I have seen I am satisfied that it was. However, I cannot be certain of this fact ...

Mr. Guzzo concluded his letter by requesting a private meeting with the Premier:

I've hesitated to advise the two ministers responsible herein and would request a private meeting with you prior to your making the contents of this letter known to anyone. There is an abundance of information available which I choose not to refer to herein because I cannot prove the truth of same. However, I have little doubt that it is accurate.
(Emphasis added)

In October 1998, the Attorney General gave a copy of this letter to Murray Segal, the Assistant Deputy Attorney General of the Criminal Law Division, and requested that he take whatever action he deemed necessary. As Mr. Segal had a "relative lack of knowledge about the file," he requested a memorandum from Mr. Pelletier, Acting Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region. Mr. Pelletier prepared a memorandum about the allegations of sexual abuse in Cornwall and the Project Truth investigation. This was the primary source of information available to Mr. Segal at the time.

Mr. Segal testified that in December 1998, he attempted to contact Mr. Guzzo by telephone but his calls were not returned.

On February 23, 1999, Mr. Guzzo sent another letter to Premier Harris, again copied to the Solicitor General and the Attorney General. Mr. Guzzo testified that he felt compelled to write the second letter because the allegations in Cornwall came up during a caucus function and were dismissed as being of no serious consequence. Mr. Guzzo was told that things were under control, there was no problem, and that people had been charged in Cornwall. In his second letter, Mr. Guzzo stated that he was concerned about the fact that individuals whose allegations were contained in the Government Brief delivered in April 1997 had not been questioned.

Murray Segal Speaks With Garry Guzzo About His Concerns

In early March 1999, Mr. Segal was again asked to respond to Mr. Guzzo. Mr. Segal testified that a request to deal with an MPP was rare but happened from time to time. On March 8, Mr. Segal contacted Mr. Guzzo, who was in Florida. When he received the telephone call, Mr. Guzzo expressed concern about why Mr. Segal was contacting him. Mr. Segal explained that he was calling him as a courtesy in his administrative capacity. According to Mr. Segal, the conversation lasted fifteen to twenty minutes.

According to Mr. Segal, a number of issues were raised during this conversation. In addition to the missing materials delivered to the Ministry of the Attorney General, they discussed hotel receipts and videotapes, both of which Mr. Segal was unaware of at the time. Mr. Segal testified that he told Mr. Guzzo that if he had documents or information about documents, he should refer them to the police.

I am of the view that if Mr. Guzzo was in possession of material evidence or relevant information pertaining to ongoing investigations, he should have provided this to Project Truth investigators.

On March 14, Mr. Segal left Mr. Guzzo a voice-mail message advising him that the “brief” Guzzo had been referring to had been provided to the authorities. The following day, Mr. Guzzo sent Mr. Segal a letter confirming the message:

Mr. Segal, your tape indicates that “I (Mr. Segal) called to confirm that authorities have that brief that you (Mr. Guzzo) were referring to.” Does this mean that the authorities have it now, or had it all along? If so, from what date?

Mr. Guzzo wrote to Mr. Segal again on March 16:

Further to my memo of 03/15/99 I wish to confirm that you replied that the “authorities” (OPP) had the brief for several months and that any further communications I wish to make should be give to the police ...

...

Unless I hear to the contrary in writing, I will assume that this is the case and the evidence had been given to the OPP many months ago.

Mr. Segal sent Mr. Guzzo a note inviting him to contact the OPP if he was still concerned: “While I believe we are talking about the same stuff, if you are in any doubt feel free to contact the OPP—Insp. Tim Smith.”

Murray Segal Briefs the Deputy Attorney General

Mr. Segal prepared a briefing memorandum for Deputy Attorney General Andromache Karakatsanis on March 31, 1999. Mr. Segal detailed his contacts with Mr. Guzzo, who continued to have concerns regarding whether the police had the Government Brief and why the police had not interviewed certain individuals. Mr. Segal noted:

One of Mr. Guzzo’s chief concerns was that the police didn’t have a brief of materials apparently delivered to MAG and perhaps others.

To alleviate any concerns I spoke with the police officer in charge. Eventually, I was assured that the police had received a somewhat similar package prior to April 1997. Although I haven't located as yet where the material delivered to MAG in April 1997 went, the police confirmed that they had a duplicate copy from the same source as far back as July, 1998.

Garry Guzzo Expresses Concerns About Murray Segal in a Letter to Ron McLaughlin

On April 3, 1999, Mr. Guzzo sent a letter Ron McLaughlin, Chief of Staff for the Premier, as he had made a decision to start documenting the case. This letter raised a number of issues including the status of the police investigation and the material delivered by Constable Dunlop:

He assured me that all of the documentation had been turned over to the Ontario Provincial Police. I asked him to review his file and to advise if he had the name of the person who had accepted delivery of the documents, or if there was an affidavit of service of the documents in the file ... Mr. Segal reviewed the file for three or four minutes and then said to me, and I think I am quoting him accurately; 'Wait a minute, we did not send this material to the Ontario Provincial Police.' He then advised me that his department had sent the material to a third party. Mr. Segal then gave me the name of the third party.

When shown this passage during his testimony, Mr. Segal testified that the reference to him reviewing the file for three or four minutes did not make sense to him: "That doesn't sort of stand out in my mind as something I would have told him or I would have been able to figure out from—it's not as if there's like some master file on Project Truth."

Mr. Segal later disagreed with Mr. Guzzo's description of their conversation, which led Mr. Guzzo, on November 1, 2001, to send him a copy of his letter to Mr. McLaughlin and invite him to correct any inaccuracies. Mr. Segal responded to this letter on November 7 and suggested to Mr. Guzzo that perhaps they should both agree to disagree:

Mr. Guzzo, I doubt that we will ever see eye to eye regarding the conversation we had on March 8, 1999.

I do not want to debate with you at this stage your interpretation of the conversation. I know what I said to you, and I know that your recollection and interpretation of the conversation varies significantly from my own. In addition, I would remind you that there are matters currently before the courts. Accordingly, it is perhaps best to ‘agree to disagree.’

Internal Investigation by the Ministry of the Attorney General

On June 18, 2001, Mr. Segal submitted a report to Deputy Attorney General Mark Friedman regarding the handling of the binders known as the “Government Brief.” Mr. Segal testified that someone under his direction prepared the report. The Minister had asked the Deputy Attorney General for a report on the handling of the Dunlop materials. Mr. Segal believed this is because Mr. Guzzo was raising the issue in the Legislature.

The report focuses on the issue of the four missing binders, and the steps taken in 1999 and 2001 to locate the materials, including asking the clerk who signed the acknowledgment of receipt about his recollection of events at the time. Mr. Segal testified that nobody under his direction was able to find the documents in either 1999 or 2001. The report determined that the materials were probably sent to the Attorney General’s Office and treated as correspondence. According to Mr. Segal, the documents may have been kept in the Minister’s correspondence and thus lost over the years because “Ministers come and go and new Ministers don’t have access to old Minister’s stuff ... so it may have gone astray.”

The report outlines some of the protocols that were put in place and improvements that were made to ensure this does not happen again. Crown Law Office—Criminal now has a computerized log and a manual log to record the service of legal documents.

According to Mr. Segal, it was a rare occurrence that people would provide boxes or binders of materials directly to the Ministry of the Attorney General, as Constable Dunlop did. Although Mr. Segal acknowledged that the documents should not have been lost, he was satisfied that the police had all the materials.

Mr. Segal did not believe that this report was shared with Detective Inspector Hall or others from the OPP. Mr. Segal did not recall whether he or the Ministry made a public statement in 1999 with respect to the fact that the four binders had been lost. Mr. Segal testified that he provided information to superiors so they could make an announcement, if the question arose. Mr. Segal thought he probably advised Detective Inspector Hall or someone else of the 1999 search.

Detective Inspector Pat Hall Requests That the Ministry of the Attorney General Investigate the Missing Binders

On July 13, 2001, Detective Inspector Hall sent Crown Attorney Lorne McConnery a letter outlining the facts surrounding the disappearance of the binders delivered to the Ministry and the attempts he had made to ascertain what happened to them. He noted that this issue had been the subject of considerable media attention, and he suggested an independent investigation, as “an explanation will be required.” He wrote, “It is my view that this issue will not ‘go away’ and it is incumbent upon the Ministry of the Attorney General to conduct an investigation into this matter.”

Detective Inspector Hall testified that there were allegations in the media that the material that went to the Ministry was being withheld in order to protect Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald and that the police were not being provided with full information. The Detective Inspector said he just wanted something in writing from the Ministry stating that this was not the case.

On July 17, Mr. McConnery discussed Detective Inspector Hall’s concerns with Mr. Segal. Mr. McConnery’s notes state:

Also discussed P. Hall’s concern re brief missing in AG office. Segal says thorough search done and Susan Kyle [counsel in Mr. Segal’s office] aware of issue. He will refer this to her. Min. has been assured that the material it received from Dunlop was same as material given to Fantino and Sol. Gen. with few exceptions that the material in fact made it to the parties it was intended for. O.P.P. have confirmed that contents are complete re Dunlop’s boxes, i.e. fact that AG boxes lost has not led to anything in fact being lost.

Mr. McConnery specifically recalled James Stewart talking about the search of the Ottawa Regional Director’s Office and Mr. Segal telling him that the Ministry offices at 720 Bay were searched.

Mr. McConnery responded to Detective Inspector Hall on August 15. He advised that he had forwarded a copy of the Detective Inspector’s letter to Mr. Stewart and that his concerns would be addressed by the end of August 2001.

On September 6, Mr. Stewart responded to Detective Inspector Hall. Mr. Stewart wrote that searches had been conducted for the documents, without success, and various means had been undertaken to ensure the police had copies of the material. When Mr. Stewart wrote this letter, his understanding was that the police were in possession of the material. Mr. Stewart also wrote: “I understand that you have consistently taken the position that the investigation was not prejudiced as a result of the material not having been forwarded to the police by the Ministry.”

Detective Inspector Hall testified at the Inquiry that although the materials could have been received sooner, once they were received from Constable Dunlop, the investigation was not prejudiced. However, Detective Inspector Hall thought some of the information that was not included in the Fantino Brief, such as the Police Services Act investigation material, was important for the conspiracy investigation. He explained that he was going to be interviewing a number of police officers and it would have been helpful to know what the officers said in 1994 or 1995 when the Police Services Act investigation was conducted.

Detective Inspector Hall did not feel that he received a satisfactory explanation for the non-delivery of the material to the OPP.

Mr. Stewart received a response to his letter from Detective Inspector Hall two and a half years later, in April 2004. Mr. Stewart did not know what sparked this response.

Detective Inspector Hall testified that he replied to Mr. Stewart two and a half years after the initial letter because he wanted to clean up the investigation before he retired. He wanted something in writing from the Ministry of the Attorney General confirming that it had not withheld the Government Brief. Detective Inspector Hall contended that he was never told what happened with the four binders.

Mr. Stewart responded to Detective Inspector Hall’s letter a week later and advised that the Leduc matter was still ongoing and that if Detective Inspector Hall had new evidence he should contact the prosecutor involved in the case.

Effect of the Loss of the Dunlop Binders

According to Detective Inspector Hall, the failure of the Ministry of the Attorney General to deliver the Dunlop binders to the OPP did not affect the OPP investigation in any way.

I am prepared to accept that the failure of the Ministry of the Attorney General to locate the materials delivered by Constable Dunlop and to forward them to the appropriate police service for investigation had only limited consequence to the Project Truth investigation. It did, however, cause a number of people to question the actions of public institutions and their motivation. Many of these individuals, such as Mr. Guzzo, made those concerns public, and that in turn caused members of the Cornwall community to have those same doubts.

The loss of the binders by the Ministry of the Attorney General was not acceptable. I heard evidence that the Ministry now has a computerized and a manual log to track the service of such documents. I recommend that the Ministry review its tracking system and confirm that documents are logged not only when they are received but also when they are reviewed. If the documents disclose matters requiring an investigation, they should be forwarded to the appropriate police service and copied to a designated person within the Ministry.

Upon reflection, the public response of the Ministry to the loss of the Dunlop binders was worse than losing the materials. In hindsight, the failure of Ministry officials to acknowledge the loss of the Dunlop binders in a public and timely fashion may have fuelled public concerns about institutional incompetence and cover-ups.

External Pressures: Information Published on Local Websites

During Project Truth, several websites were established that contained information about the Project Truth investigations and prosecutions, including victim statements and media articles. These websites had an impact on the investigation and prosecution of some cases. The material they published raised concerns about the accused receiving a fair trial and had the potential to discourage further victims from coming forward for fear that their statements or other personal information might be posted on the Internet.

James Bateman's Website: www.projecttruth.com

On April 24, 2000, James Bateman created the website www.projecttruth.com. He obtained statements from Constable Perry Dunlop's investigation, which he posted on the website. Mr. Bateman closed the website on August 2, 2000.

Cornwall Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald contacted Detective Inspector Pat Hall on July 26, 2000, and expressed some concerns about allegations against him posted on www.projecttruth.com. Mr. MacDonald was also concerned that the website might violate a non-disclosure order.

In late July 2000, Crown Shelley Hallett was contacted by Detective Inspector Hall and asked to look at the website. As will be discussed below, Ms Hallett arranged a meeting of officials from the Ministry of the Attorney General to discuss the website in September 2000.

Murray Segal, Assistant Deputy Attorney General, Criminal Law Division, wrote a letter to Mr. Bateman on August 29, 2000, in response to an e-mail he had sent to the Attorney General on July 1, in which he requested, among other things, "your review, consideration and investigation, public or private of all concerns mentioned on website www.projecttruth.com." In his response, Mr. Segal wrote:

I do not support the website as it has not served the interests of the Cornwall community. You have named the website “project truth,” which is the same name as the official police investigation, which could confuse the public. Members of the public accessing the website may have been led to believe that it was associated with the O.P.P. Project Truth investigation and they may be of the view that these investigators have improperly published the affidavits of victims who reported their experience of sexual abuse. This in turn would reduce public confidence in the official O.P.P. investigation into allegations of sexual abuse of young people in the Cornwall community. These investigations are at a critical juncture with some cases just beginning to come to trial. Victims and other witnesses who may not have yet come forward to the police may be inhibited from doing so as a result of their perception that the police, contrary to accepted practices, have disseminated confidential information. As you can appreciate, reduced public confidence in the official police investigation has the potential of bringing the administration of local criminal justice into disrepute.

By the time, Mr. Bateman received this letter, www.projecttruth.com was no longer in operation.

Richard Nadeau’s Website: www.projecttruth2.com

Richard Nadeau, a victim of historical child sexual abuse, launched his own website on August 26, 2000, named www.projecttruth2.com. It reproduced some of the content of James Bateman’s website. Mr. Nadeau acknowledged under oath, during the stay application in R. v. Jacques Leduc, that he obtained statements of complainants alleging historical child sexual abuse from Constable Dunlop, some of which he published on his website. Mr. Dunlop also testified under oath, during a pre-trial motion in R. v. Leduc in 2004, that he had given Mr. Nadeau witness statements, binders, and some boxes of materials.

Mr. Nadeau also testified that Mr. Dunlop did not have any connection with the website. Mr. Nadeau viewed the website as a continuation of Constable Dunlop’s work in Cornwall.

Ministry Response to www.projecttruth2.com

On August 26, 2000, the Standard-Freeholder published an article about the creation of www.projecttruth2.com.

On August 29, Detective Inspector Hall raised the issue of the website with James Stewart, Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region, who advised him to speak with Ms Hallett about the matter. Detective Inspector Hall was later advised that lawyers from the Ministry of the Attorney General would meet to deal with the website.

On September 13, 2000, Mr. Segal, Paul Lindsay, Director of the Crown Law Office—Criminal, Mr. Stewart, and Ms Hallett met to address steps to be taken with regard to the www.projecttruth2.com website. Ms Hallett had previously asked an articling student to prepare a research memorandum on the jurisdiction of Superior Courts and the power to control their own process, as she was considering judicial measures. Ms Hallett also prepared a document for the meeting to provide senior management with background information on the websites, concerns from the perspective of the Ministry of the Attorney General, and a suggested course of action. One course of action she proposed was bringing an application before the Superior Court for an order temporarily shutting down the website until the completion of the trials.

During the meeting, everyone expressed concerns about issues such as freedom of expression as guaranteed by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Ms Hallett testified that they felt there were other ways of dealing with the matter without going to the lengths of getting an order to close down the website. Mr. Segal testified that in his experience, shutting down a website is something that is rarely contemplated and even more rarely pursued. Ms Hallett subsequently advised Detective Inspector Hall that no steps would be taken to close down the website.

I am of the view that it is not the role or responsibility of the Ministry of the Attorney General's to regulate websites or to determine whether criminal offences have been committed in their operation. If concerns arise regarding websites, the matter should be referred to the police for investigation. If a police service finds that a crime has been committed, it should lay the charge and forward a Crown brief to the Crown Attorney's Office. The Crown Attorney's Office seized with the matter should then proceed with the prosecution if there is a reasonable prospect of conviction, as with any other charge. In this case, however, it was reasonable for Detective Inspector Hall to seek pre-charge Crown advice given the novelty of website concerns at the time.

Richard Nadeau Cited in Contempt for Violation of a Publication Ban

The R. v. Leduc trial started on January 15, 2001. On January 16, at the Crown's request, Justice Colin McKinnon ordered a publication ban on the identity of alleged victims. The ban covered conventional broadcasting methods and the Internet.

Mr. Nadeau's widow, Carmen Prigent, testified that on January 16, 2001, after the court proceedings, Mr. Nadeau prepared a summary of the proceedings of the day in which he recorded certain things about victims, without mentioning their names, and the choice to proceed by judge and jury.

On January 17, defence counsel advised Justice McKinnon that Mr. Nadeau had posted some information about the preceding day on his website, in violation of the publication ban. The parties were in the process of arguing a defence motion to change its election of the mode of trial from judge and jury to judge alone. Ms Hallett had been opposing the motion; however, in light of this new development, the Crown consented to the re-election by the defence to a trial by judge alone.

Justice McKinnon requested that Mr. Nadeau attend court that afternoon regarding the information posted on the website. Justice McKinnon spoke to Mr. Nadeau about the seriousness of his actions and the damage that resulted, in particular, that he had completely compromised the Crown's ability to have a jury trial. Justice McKinnon also addressed Ms Hallett about the issue of holding Mr. Nadeau in contempt of court. He suggested that it would be unfair to prosecute Mr. Nadeau because the Judge had already questioned him about his actions: "But given the circumstances, given the fact that I've put the question directly to him, demanded an answer, without citing him, I think it would be perhaps unfair to then launch a prosecution."

Mr. Nadeau continued to publish information about the trial on his website, and on January 22 he was cited for contempt of court. Justice McKinnon stated, "Mr. Nadeau you're here, you're listening to me. I'm citing you for contempt of court, in that your web site and the article specifically attributed to you are damaging to the due administration of justice."

On January 29, Mr. Nadeau attended court with his lawyer. Assistant Crown Attorney Terrance Cooper attended as Crown counsel. Justice McKinnon ordered Mr. Nadeau to remove all material from his website relating to individuals who had been charged but not tried. The parties were to return to court on February 15.

On January 31, Detective Inspector Hall checked the website to verify whether Mr. Nadeau had complied with the order from the Court. The material was still on the website. Mr. Nadeau told the Detective Inspector that he did not know what to remove. The next day, Assistant Crown Attorney Cooper and Detective Inspector Hall faxed Mr. Nadeau's lawyer a list of material to be removed from www.projecttruth2.com pursuant to the January 29 order of the Court.

On February 13, Detective Constable Steve Seguin and Ms Hallett met with Mr. Nadeau. Ms Hallett expressed her concerns about the fact that witness statements were published on the website. She said this was affecting the Crown's ability to prosecute cases and could potentially deter other victims from coming forward.

Mr. Nadeau appeared before Justice McKinnon on February 15, and the contempt hearing was scheduled for September 20 and 21, 2001. The Court continued the interim order prohibiting Mr. Nadeau from publishing material on his website pertaining to cases before or still to be brought before the courts.

Mr. Segal retained outside counsel to handle the Richard Nadeau contempt matter, as he wanted to provide some additional distance and objectivity in determining what the Crown's position should be.

On April 5, Justice McKinnon wrote a letter to Mr. Nadeau's counsel advising that another article posted on Mr. Nadeau's website constituted contempt of the administration of justice, contained malicious and false information, and was in direct breach of his order made in January. A copy of this letter was provided to Crown Cooper separately. Justice McKinnon requested that he include this new article downloaded from the website as part of the record in the contempt proceedings.

A page from the www.projecttruth2.com website printed on April 18, 2001, states that the website was closed on April 13. According to Ms Pr gent, the fifty articles were removed from the website and a decision was made to shut it down.

On August 7, 2001, Mr. Nadeau appeared before Justice Douglas Cunningham on the charge of contempt of court. Justice Cunningham found Mr. Nadeau guilty of two counts of contempt for both the January 20 and April 3 postings on his website. He was fined $1,000.

Resurrection of the projecttruth.com Website

On February 15, 2002, an article in the Seaway News referred to Mr. Nadeau's "resurrected" website. Approximately five months later, Mr. Segal received a letter from Steven Skurka, defence counsel in the Jacques Leduc prosecution, raising concerns about information posted on www.projecttruth2.com. Mr. Skurka wrote:

It is my considered opinion that the comments noted in this website and in particular the latter comments about Justice McKinnon, feigning ignorance of Perry Dunlop, are defamatory libel within the meaning of s. 298(1) of the Criminal Code, as well as a repetition of Mr. Nadeau's contempt of court. I bring this matter to your attention for further investigation as an officer of the court concerned about the potential criminal conduct exhibited by the operator of this website.

On July 19, Mr. Segal turned the matter over to Detective Superintendent Ross Bingley of the OPP to determine the appropriate course of action. Detective Inspector Hall was assigned to conduct an investigation.

On September 11, Detective Inspector Hall contacted Crown Lorne McConnery, advised him of Mr. Skurka's letter, and asked him for his views on whether a criminal offence had been committed. According to Detective Inspector Hall, he had several contacts with Mr. McConnery over the next few months, seeking legal direction about the website.

On December 17, Detective Inspector Hall wrote to Mr. Stewart requesting an opinion on whether criminal charges should be laid against Mr. Nadeau with respect to statements made on his website. Detective Inspector Hall subsequently wrote to Mr. Stewart and Mr. McConnery in May 2003 requesting a reply to his request for advice. Mr. McConnery responded by e-mail on May 9, stating there was no case for defamatory libel:

It is my view and I have expressed it many times to Pat, that there is no evidence of an offence under s.300 of publishing a defamatory libel that the suspect knows is false. To the contrary, there is every indication that the suspect believes the allegations are true, and in fact with respect to the sexual assault allegations, the Police had rpg to lay the charges that were stayed and are under appeal. The more interesting question is the offence under s.301 which does not require proof that the suspect knew the libel was false. However, I do not see how we can get around s. 309. It appears to me that Nadeau believes what he published was true, that his belief was reasonably held and that there can be little doubt that he felt these were matters of public interest and needed to be discussed for the public interest ... Pat Hall has consistently advised me that he is not satisfied that RPG exists for libel charges, and I can't envisage that there would be RPC for the offence of defamatory libel, pursuant to s. 301.

Impact of the Website

The website inflamed the community and angered a number of victims in the Project Truth cases. In my view, the impact of the website in 2000–2001 was greater than it would be today. The Internet was still in its relative infancy and the creation and maintenance of specialized websites, particularly by individuals, was a relatively new phenomenon. Many people accepted as true information posted on the Internet in the same way as they would accept the truth of information published in a newspaper. Today most people are more skeptical of material on the Internet.

In my view, the response of the Ministry of the Attorney General was appropriate. However, in hindsight, given the residual effects of the website on the community at large, a more timely response would have been helpful.

R. v. Robert Sabourin

André Lavoie's Allegations Against Robert Sabourin

André Lavoie reported allegations of historical sexual abuse against Robert Sabourin, a teacher at St. Lawrence High School, on March 14, 1996.

As previously discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service, Mr. Lavoie gave his statement to Constable Heidi Sebalj of the Cornwall Police Service (CPS). Other complainants subsequently came forward, and Mr. Sabourin was charged with a number of counts. He eventually pleaded guilty to some of those charges.

Mr. Lavoie believed he was present at every court appearance, but did not recall ever being in communication with a Crown. Mr. Lavoie expressed concerns about the level of his involvement in the court process:

... I was not kept informed of the process as it evolved until he pled guilty, so I really have very little to say about that process. I am pleased that there was a guilty verdict entered in the process I am disappointed that part of that guilty plea also exclude victims from taking the stand, which I feel is quite regrettable to examine the full magnitude of the horror that was done to those victims.

Mr. Lavoie took many months to prepare a victim impact statement that explained the impact that the abuse had on him. It was completed on October 8, 1998. He testified that he would have liked to have read it at the sentencing hearing, which proceeded on April 12, 1999.

Mr. Sabourin was sentenced to a period of incarceration of two years less one day. In Mr. Lavoie's opinion, "[I]t was vindication but, in my mind, this was far too lenient in terms of the sentence." He further stated, "I think sexual abuse of children is considered to this day as a minor transgression committed by individuals in positions of responsibility."

Alain Seguin's Allegations Against Robert Sabourin

Alain Seguin disclosed allegations of historical abuse against Mr. Sabourin because he read in the paper that other complainants had come forward and that Mr. Sabourin had been charged. He initially called the Project Truth hotline to disclose his allegations, but someone from Cornwall Police Service called him back.

Mr. Seguin gave a statement to CPS Constable Shawn White on January 26, 1998. He alleged that Mr. Sabourin, a photography teacher at St. Lawrence/La Citadelle High School, sexually abused him. At the time, he was thirteen or fourteen years old and attended school at Jean XXIII, a junior high located near La Citadelle.

Mr. Seguin recalled that the next contact regarding his allegations was a request from the CPS to prepare a victim impact statement. He was given a package and asked to drop off the completed form at the police station. Mr. Seguin testified, “I remember feeling that there wasn’t very much communication, that my information on the case was coming from the newspaper.” Mr. Seguin also said he found out from the newspaper that Mr. Sabourin had pleaded guilty to the charges:

And then the last one is when he pled guilty and I read that in the paper and, you know, I realized—I was quite upset actually, like how come I wasn’t there? I mean, they wanted my Victim Impact Statement but yet they didn’t ask me to come down and read it.

Mr. Seguin said that he was never asked about his views on sentencing, nor offered any type of victim services, nor does he remember being contacted by anyone from the Crown Attorney’s Office.

The Crown Attorney’s Office’s Relationship With Victims

Murray MacDonald confirmed that his office handled the prosecution of Mr. Sabourin. He was involved in the judicial pre-trial, and the prosecution was handled by Assistant Crown Attorney Guy Simard. At the time, there was no Victim/Witness Assistance Program in Cornwall to communicate with victims or witnesses. Mr. MacDonald testified:

We had a practice that should have worked in theory but did not always do so at no fault of—I’m not trying to blame the police and I’m not criticizing my assistant Crown Attorneys or—we did occasionally miss the opportunity to contact a complainant. Sometimes it was with the crossing of wires between the Crown and the case manager. Sometimes it was a crossing of wires between the case manager and the investigator.

Mr. MacDonald explained that his office has since built in safeguards: “There was one back then as well but it was another one that was not foolproof. The current practice the Victim Witness Program has a double-check system that would preclude that happening.”

I believe Mr. MacDonald was referring to the process in place to obtain victim impact statements, but Mr. Lavoie and Mr. Seguin, who testified at the Inquiry on this matter, were concerned about not having the opportunity to read the statement at the sentencing hearing. I note that the current Crown Practice Memorandum PM [2004] No. 3 deals with a number of issues regarding victims and their input during sentencing. The practice memorandum also reflects legislative changes, and the policy on victim impact statements (VIS) today reads as follows:

The court shall, on the request of the victim, permit the victim to read a VIS prepared and filed in accordance with s. 722(2) to the court, or present the VIS in any other manner approved by the court.

I am satisfied that the current Crown policy provides that a victim can read his or her victim impact statement if he or she so chooses, as is provided in the Criminal Code.

The two victims in this case also expressed their dissatisfaction with their involvement in the sentencing process and the sentence received by Mr. Sabourin. Policy V-1 on “Victims of Crime,” dated January 15, 1994, provides as follows:

Victims should be given an opportunity to attend court at the time of plea and sentence, and should be informed of their right to do so. Victims should be consulted regarding significant decisions made by the Crown with respect to sentence, plea, withdrawal of charges, including any decisions which may result from resolution discussions.

Thus, even as early as 1994 the Ministry had a policy that recognized the need to consult with victims on significant decisions with respect to sentencing. It is unfortunate that Mr. Lavoie and Mr. Seguin were not provided with an opportunity to participate more actively in the process. Their involvement may not have had an impact on the sentence imposed by the Court but could have assisted the victims to obtain closure on the matter.

R. v. Earl Landry Jr.

The Cornwall Police Service (CPS) conducted an investigation into reported allegations of sexual abuse against Earl Landry Jr. This investigation is discussed in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service. This was not a Project Truth case, and the prosecution was handled by Assistant Crown Attorney Lynn Robinson from the Cornwall Crown Attorney’s Office. I have dealt with this matter in the CPS chapter. In this section I will comment on only two issues, a disagreement regarding a Crown’s request for follow-up to the police and a complainant’s reluctance to testify.

Some issues arose between Ms Robinson and CPS Sergeant Brian Snyder during the prosecution of this matter. Ms Robinson brought these issues to the attention of Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald in a memorandum dated May 27, 1998.

The next day, Mr. MacDonald wrote to Chief Anthony Repa about the concerns raised by Ms Robinson. The letter and its content have been discussed in Chapter 6. Chief Repa responded on June 9, 1998. He apologized for the “unnecessary breakdown in communications” and proposed a solution:

In an effort to effectively control the situation, I would respectfully request that you and your staff forward all correspondence concerning requests for follow-up by our officers, to my personal attention. I will ensure that the requests are given the attention deserved.

According to Mr. MacDonald, this practice was adopted.

As mentioned in Chapter 6, an issue arose in June 1998 when one of Mr. Landry Jr.’s victims, C-54, advised that he no longer wished to proceed with the charges. Crown Robinson received a letter on June 11 from defence counsel Don Johnson enclosing correspondence he had received from C-54. On July 26, Ms Robinson received a letter directly from C-54 addressed “to whom it may concern”:

I wish to drop all charges concerning Earl Landry, due to stress on myself and my family, I will be seeking counselling in the future to help me deal with my past. I do not wish to be present at any of the court dates.

In a handwritten note at the top of the document, Ms Robinson directed Constable Kevin Malloy to have Sergeant Snyder contact the victim and tell him he would be subpoenaed if there was no guilty plea. The Crown’s office intended to proceed regardless of C-54’s desire not to participate.

Mr. Landry Jr. was arrested for obstructing justice on September 4, 1998, when it was uncovered that he had promised C-54 a computer in exchange for withdrawing his charge.

Mr. Landry Jr. pleaded guilty to the sexual abuse charges against him and received a custodial sentence of five years.

The Ministry of the Attorney General adopted Policy CS-1, “Charge Screening—Commentary on Recanting Crown Witnesses,” on August 5, 1997. It explains:

The words “recanting witness” have come to have an imprecise meaning that includes many situations where a witness is reluctant or fearful to testify but has not changed the original statement. To recant means to withdraw or repudiate earlier statements. It does not mean a simple reluctance to testify.

The Crown here was not dealing with a recanting witness. C-54 was not changing his evidence but rather stating that he did not want to participate in the prosecution for personal reasons. In hindsight, given the manner in which the Crown was informed of these events and the young age of the complainant, I am of the view that this should have raised questions for the Crown.

Threatening an alleged victim of sexual abuse with a summons was not the most appropriate response in these circumstances. Perhaps the Ministry should consider modifying its policy on recanting witnesses to include a policy on reluctant witnesses. This would provide direction to Crown counsel faced with similar circumstances. An appropriate response might be to have the matter investigated by police to determine if anything is behind the victim’s reluctance to testify, as was true in this case.

R. v. Gilf Greggain

Marc Latour reported allegations of historical sexual abuse to Constable Jeff Carroll of the Cornwall Police Service (CPS), against Gilf Greggain, his grade 3 teacher at St. Peter’s Elementary School. Although Mr. Latour provided the initial complaint and statement on June 23, 2000, he told (by then) Sergeant Carroll that he was prepared to proceed with his complaint only on March 19, 2001. This investigation has been discussed in detail in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service.

Sergeant Carroll completed his investigation and had a discussion with Assistant Crown Attorney Guy Simard on January 3, 2003. Mr. Simard advised that he required a full brief and all of the videotaped witness statements in order to assess whether there was a reasonable prospect of conviction. On the same day Sergeant Carroll told Mr. Latour that he had insufficient grounds to lay a charge, but that the Crown was reviewing the Crown brief and the officer would be in touch with Mr. Latour. The Crown brief and videotapes were submitted to Mr. Simard on January 6.

On February 12, Sergeant Carroll had a discussion with Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald. The Crown advised Sergeant Carroll that he had reviewed all of the evidence gathered in the investigation and determined there was no reasonable prospect of conviction should charges be laid. Mr. MacDonald agreed with Sergeant Carroll's determination that there were not reasonable and probable grounds to believe that a sexual assault occurred. The Crown attorney's opinion was confirmed in a letter, prepared by Sergeant Carroll, dated February 12.

Mr. MacDonald testified that he had no independent recollection of this file. When asked about his confirmation of the belief that the officer had no reasonable and probable grounds, he explained:

You've noted another change in practice there that we—since the 1993 investigation, we've now in our office, and elsewhere in the Province, taken—making the—assume the practice upon request of providing our comments on the objective component of RPGs, and explaining the subjective component when asked.

As provided in the 1997 Crown Policy P-1, "Police—Relationship With Crown Counsel, the Crown's office should have kept notes on the opinion or confirmed its comments on the objective and subjective components of the reasonable and probable grounds test. Such notes may have explained why the Crown agreed with the officer's belief that he had no reasonable and probable grounds to lay a charge in these circumstances.

Sergeant Carroll testified that despite Mr. Latour's concern that he had observed Mr. Greggain in the presence of handicapped children, the officer did not have sufficient information to report this to the Children's Aid Society. Practice Memorandum, PM [2000] No. 4, dated March 31, 2000, was incorporated in the new Crown Policy Manual as of March 31, 2006. It provides that Crown counsel have a duty to report to the Children's Aid Society any case where there is a reasonable suspicion of child abuse or neglect, and that this duty to report is an ongoing obligation and cannot be delegated.

Mr. MacDonald was not asked during his testimony whether he had turned his mind to reporting the matter to the Children's Aid Society. It is clear that if Crown counsel has reasonable suspicion that a child is or may be in need of protection, it is "policy of this Ministry that Crown counsel should report suspected cases of children in need of protection."

The policy also states, "The issue of whether or not Crown counsel fall within the definition of persons who perform professional or official duties with respect to children in subsection 72(5) is unclear." I am of the view that Crown counsel fall within that definition and recommend that the practice memorandum be amended to reflect that they do.

No Charges Laid Regarding Albert Lalonde's Allegations

Albert Lalonde initially reported allegations of historical sexual abuse against Father Charles MacDonald on April 25, 1995. Detective Constable Norman Hurtubise, of the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), took his statement at the Long Sault Detachment. Mr. Lalonde alleged he was abused by Father MacDonald while he was an altar boy at St. Columban's Church. Detective Inspector Tim Smith's notes of May 1, 1995, show that Detective Constable Michael Fagan called to advise him of the new complainant. On May 12, 1995, Detective Constable Fagan took a further statement from Mr. Lalonde. Both statements were forwarded to Crown Attorney Curt Flanagan on August 16, 1995, but no charges were laid.

As will be discussed below, several years later, Mr. Lalonde again came forward with his allegations, which were investigated by both the OPP and the Cornwall Police Service (CPS). On May 27, 2002, Detective Inspector Pat Hall advised CPS Staff Sergeant Garry Derochie in a telephone conversation that the OPP had statements from Mr. Lalonde going back to 1995 and that a Crown had determined there was no likelihood of conviction.

Albert Lalonde Allegations to Lorne McConnery

As discussed in the section "R. v. Father Charles MacDonald: New Charges Laid and Trial," Lorne McConnery was assigned the Father MacDonald prosecution in spring 2001. Mr. McConnery was assisted by Crown counsel Kevin Phillips. Mr. McConnery testified that sometime during the trial, Albert Lalonde's brother came to speak to him and Mr. Phillips. The Crowns provided him with some direction about reporting his allegations against Father MacDonald. After the conversation, Mr. McConnery learned that Albert Lalonde's complaint had previously been investigated.

Investigation of the Allegations

On May 17, 2002, Albert Lalonde gave a videotaped statement regarding his allegations of abuse against Father MacDonald to CPS Sergeant Jeff Carroll. This was four days after all charges in the Father MacDonald matter were stayed. Mr. Lalonde described three incidents of alleged abuse. Two of them were said to have occurred at St. Columban's Church, which was within CPS jurisdiction. Sergeant Jeff Carroll investigated both of these allegations.

The other alleged incident occurred at Centennial Park, which was outside of CPS jurisdiction. Sergeant Carroll received a letter from Detective Inspector Pat Hall on May 30 confirming that the OPP would investigate this occurrence.

Detective Constable Joe Dupuis attended Mr. Lalonde's residence on June 18, and Mr. Lalonde gave a statement to Detective Constables Dupuis and Don Genier at the Long Sault Detachment later that day. Both of these investigations were reviewed in detail in Chapter 6, on the institutional response of the Cornwall Police Service, and Chapter 7, on the institutional response of the Ontario Provincial Police.

At one point during his investigation, Sergeant Carroll wanted a Crown attorney to review the matter and determine if there was a reasonable prospect of conviction. Sergeant Carroll felt that based on the evidence he had, he did not have reasonable grounds to believe an offence had been committed.

Crown Review of the Allegations

Sergeant Carroll contacted the office of the Director of Crown Operations, Eastern Region, James Stewart, and was advised that Lorne McConnery would contact him. On July 16, 2002, Sergeant Carroll received a call from Mr. McConnery, who requested that the brief be sent to him at his Barrie office for review. On July 24, the officer prepared a package for the Crown attorney, which included a transcript of the statement of May 17, 2002, a summary of the interview he conducted of Dr. Luc Clement, Mr. Lalonde's personal physician, and the clinical notes of Dr. Richter, Mr. Lalonde's psychiatrist. In a covering letter, Sergeant Carroll wrote, "I am seeking your advice on the reasonableness of charging at this time given the longstanding difficulties with respect to identification and offence specifics."

Mr. McConnery testified:

So I received a brief from the Cornwall Police. I don't know if that was about the 2002 investigation alone, but certainly I read that brief cover to cover. I, at some point, became aware that there had been at least one earlier investigation or one earlier interview maybe is a better way to put it. I think there was some delay. It may not have been much of a delay, but I got what had happened earlier.

Sergeant Carroll did not meet with Mr. McConnery nor did he provide him with his police notes. He did not include Mr. Lalonde's school records or a wedding picture that corroborated one of the allegations. Mr. Lalonde had said that he had been abused after he served as an altar boy at a wedding that Father MacDonald had performed. Sergeant Carroll obtained the picture for the purpose of identification, but returned it to its owner without passing it on to Crown counsel. As I have found in Chapter 6, Sergeant Carroll did not provide Mr. McConnery with all relevant information from his investigation.

On November 15, Mr. McConnery spoke to Sergeant Carroll, who gave evidence of their conversation:

He told me that he had completed reviewing the file. He made it clear to me that he was familiar with this file. And exactly how and why, I didn't go into discussing with him, but he feels that this matter was investigated before and has been reviewed by Crown counsel in the past. He agreed with me that R&PG was not present, and, in his opinion, the likelihood of conviction was not present.

He told me that he had communicated this to the OPP as well and that he would respond to me in writing later on next week.

Following their conversation, the officer prepared a supplementary occurrence report dated December 11, 2002, which stated in part:

Mr. McConnery advised that he had completed reviewing the brief and found that insufficient grounds to lay a charge existed. Mr. McConnery advised that no reasonable prospect of conviction existed at this time given the fact that this complaint had been previously investigated and no new information had come forward.

Mr. McConnery prepared and forwarded his opinion on January 8, 2003, concluding:

In reviewing your brief, the O.P.P. brief and the voluminous Project Truth briefs involving allegations against Father MacDonald by Albert Lalonde, I feel your concerns are very well founded. The allegations of Lalonde surfaced and were investigated in the early to mid 1990's. Those charges were reviewed by investigators who did not believe reasonable and probable grounds existed then. A Crown review then supported that position.

Having reviewed this large volume of information, I find that your position that reasonable and probable grounds to lay criminal charges against Father MacDonald do not exist to be a reasonable and appropriate determination by you. While that decision ultimately remains a Police decision, your view that no reasonable and probable grounds exist herein seems well founded to me.

It is unclear to me why there is a difference between Mr. McConnery's opinion letter and the occurrence report prepared by Sergeant Carroll. The supplementary occurrence report states that no reasonable prospect of conviction existed, but the opinion letter does not address the issue of reasonable prospect of conviction. It responds to Sergeant Carroll's initial request for assistance in determining whether he had reasonable and probable grounds to lay a charge. This apparent discrepancy illustrates why it is good practice for Crown counsel to follow up their opinions to investigators in writing, as provided in Practice Memorandum PM [2005] No. 34, to ensure that everyone is clear on the opinion.

As is noted in Chapter 6, Sergeant Carroll confirmed that he did not review any of the Project Truth files other than prior statements provided by Mr. Lalonde. He also confirmed that he did not interview Father Charles MacDonald. I am of the view that the Crown did a thorough review of the file before deciding not to proceed with charges in this matter.

I am, however, concerned that the Cornwall Police Service and Crown counsel did not have the same materials in their possession when determining if there were reasonable and probable grounds to lay a charge or a reasonable prospect of conviction. Sergeant Carroll did not provide the Crown with his notes, the school records, or the wedding picture that might have corroborated the date and location of one of the allegations. The investigators from both police forces were not consulting with one another, and perhaps in these circumstances they should have. Both the OPP and the Crown had information and documents from their previous involvement with the Father MacDonald prosecution, and nothing was provided to Sergeant Carroll. When conducting joint or related investigations, police services should share the fruits of their investigations with each other and Crown counsel.

The Provision of Services to Victims

Many of the prosecutions discussed in this chapter would have benefited from having early involvement of victim/witness assistance resources. As will be discussed below, the Victim/Witness Assistance Program (VWAP) operated by the Ministry of the Attorney General was not in place in Cornwall during most of Project Truth, although some services were provided by the Ottawa VWAP office. VWAP was not implemented in Cornwall until 2001.

The Victim/Witness Assistance Program in Ontario

The mandate of the Victim Witness Assistance Program is “to provide information, assistance and support to victims and witnesses of crime throughout the criminal court process in order to improve their understanding of, and participation in, the criminal court process.”

The program received Cabinet approval on March 5, 1986, for the implementation of twelve Program sites in Crown Attorney's Offices across Ontario. Today, there are fifty-six Victim/Witness Assistance Program sites across the province.

The Victims' Bill of Rights was proclaimed as law on June 11, 1996. The Act supports and recognizes the needs and rights of victims of crime in both the criminal and civil justice system. Sonia Faryna, Director of the Victim Services Secretariat, described the principles set out in the Victims' Bill of Rights, which constitute the legislative foundation for a number of services that have since been developed:

Section 2 of the Bill of Rights, otherwise called the "statement of principles" specifies how justice system officials should treat victims at different stages of the criminal justice process. The statement of principles requires that victims:

1. Be treated with courtesy, compassion and respect for their personal dignity and privacy;
2. Have access to information concerning services and remedies available to victims;
3. Have access to information about the progress of criminal investigations and prosecutions and the sentencing and interim release of offenders from custody;
4. Be given the opportunity to be interviewed by police officers and officials of the same gender as the victim, when that victim has been sexually assaulted;
5. Be entitled to have their property returned as promptly as possible by justice system officials, where the property is no longer needed for the purposes of the justice system (for example, to carry out an investigation, trial or appeal);
6. Have access to information about the conditional release of offenders from custody, including release on parole, temporary absence, or escape from custody; and
7. Have access to information about plea and pre-trial arrangements and their role in the prosecution.

The Victim/Witness Assistance Program provides a range of services to victims of crime who are involved with the criminal justice system. These services are offered once charges are laid against an alleged perpetrator.

The Victim/Witness Assistance Program provides victims with information about their case and familiarizes them with the criminal court process and the various support services available. It informs victims about the different court appearances and explains the distinctions between a pre-trial, a preliminary hearing, and a trial. Support services are also introduced to allow the victim to participate effectively in the process.

The Victim/Witness Assistance Program does not provide any therapeutic or counselling service but can refer victims to services that will help them recover from the trauma of the crime. Victims are responsible for approaching these services themselves.

VWAP Special Prosecutions

The Inquiry heard testimony from Cosette Chafe, who was the Manager of the Victim/Witness Assistance Program in Ottawa from April 1987 to November 2001, with a hiatus between June 1991 and September 1993 when she was seconded to the St. Joseph's Training School prosecutions. Around 1992–1993, she participated in the development of a protocol for the implementation of a Victim/Witness Assistance Program in multi-victim, multi-perpetrator cases. The purpose of the protocol was to establish additional guidelines for services in such cases.

The protocol sets out some principles and considers some of the issues that may arise in such cases, such as the passage of time and the risk of evidence being contaminated due to the complainants knowing each other. The protocol acknowledges how complex these prosecutions are and that they require dedicated resources:

In summary, these prosecutions are complex, time-consuming and demanding. They require special attention and should be handled by an experienced Victim / Witness Coordinator who is permitted to devote her entire attention to the case. Ordinarily this will require her to be relieved of her regularly assigned duties.

The VWAP policies and procedure manual provides that if a project is designated as a “special prosecution,” there may be additional resources and funds allocated to it. Ms Faryna testified that when the Ontario Victim Services Secretariat is considering setting up a Victim/Witness Assistance Program for any special prosecution, consideration is given to the resources already in place. Special prosecutions are described in the manual as follows:

Special prosecutions are normally designated as such because they involve several accused persons charged with serious offences against multiple victims. They are often historical in nature, often involve sexual offences and often involve crimes committed against children.

Special prosecutions typically require a substantial commitment of time, resources and expertise in order to respond effectively to the special needs of the victims and the special circumstances of the prosecutions. They also require a high level of collaboration and coordination among the Crowns, police officers and Program staff.

This section of the manual is intended to cover circumstances similar to those contemplated in the 1992–1993 protocol.

Project Truth Not Designated a Special Prosecution

Unlike the St. Joseph's Training School (Alfred) prosecutions, Project Truth was not designated a special prosecution. Robert Pelletier, one of the Alfred prosecutors, explained that because of the early identification of that case as a special prosecution, a dedicated VWAP team was assigned from the beginning. As a result, services offered in Ottawa were not affected, with the exception that the Director, Ms Chafe, was seconded to Alfred.

According to Ms Chafe, early identification is key for the establishment of special or additional services in a timely fashion: "the wheels of government move slowly, turn slowly, so timing is essential." She testified that in comparison to the St. Joseph's Training School prosecutions, there was no feeling of collaboration or coordination in Project Truth. There was a delay in requesting services, in obtaining funding, and in providing services. The Victim/Witness Assistance Program became involved only after most of the preliminary inquiries in the prosecutions had been completed.

Mr. Pelletier, who was involved in both the Alfred and Project Truth cases, explained the difference between them:

I think one of the complicating factors is that Project Truth was a work in progress and what began as three complainants against a local parish priest became a complaint by dozens of people against a local parish priest became a complaint by dozens of people against perhaps almost as many local figures.

The best example I could give from personal experience is our experience in Alfred Training School where we knew from the very beginning that there were several dozen suspects and several hundred complainants.

We knew that from the very, very start. So we assembled a team of five prosecutors and—locally. There were no conflict issues and assigned the cases. Eventually 20 were charged with 165 complainants. We divided them and we did them all in three years.

I am of the view that Project Truth quickly fell within the definition of a special prosecution as identified in the VWAP policies and procedures manual. Resources should have been deployed to Cornwall to assist investigators and prosecutors in dealing with the rapid and increasing number of victims as early as 1997.

Shelley Hallett's Experience With VWAP

By the time she became involved in Project Truth prosecutions, Crown Shelley Hallett had some experience in dealing with the Victim/Witness Assistance Program. In 1988, Shelley Hallett had been seconded to the Program for a period of six months. She was asked to take this position in order to help train Crowns with respect to the new provisions in the Criminal Code relating to child sexual abuse, as well as the evidentiary innovations introduced at the time such as the use of screens and closed-circuit television. Ms Hallett implemented these changes in courtrooms across the province. In or around 1991, she was part of the Attorney General's Advisory Committee on Victim's Issues.

Ms Hallett believed that the Victim/Witness Assistance Program had been extended to Crown Attorney's offices across the province and was quite surprised when she came to Cornwall and learned that VWAP was not in place. She became aware of the impact of the lack of VWAP services when Detective Constable Steve Seguin expressed his concern about the absence of appropriate counselling in the area for a victim of Project Truth.

Establishment of a Project Truth VWAP

In 1999, Dennis Lessard, the Regional Victim Services Consultant with the Ministry of the Solicitor General, advised Cosette Chafe of the need for VWAP services in Cornwall. Ms Chafe advised Cathy Finley, the Director of the Victim/Witness Assistance Program, who was to approach people within the Ministry of the Attorney General and attempt to secure funding. Ms Finley sent an e-mail to Project Truth prosecutors on December 23, asking them for the status of their cases and whether they felt there was a need for VWAP involvement.

Although no resources were available initially in the fiscal year to provide an office in Cornwall, Ms Chafe agreed to provide some limited services to specific prosecutions. She did this over and above her responsibilities at the VWAP office in Ottawa. In particular, she acted as a liaison between the Crowns and the victims. She attended court with the victims, provided emotional support during the process, and provided referrals for counselling and other services as needed.

Ms Hallett, Ms Chafe, and Detective Constable Joe Dupuis met on May 10, 2000, and discussed the implementation of a Victim/Witness Assistance Program in Cornwall for the Project Truth prosecutions. Ms Hallett agreed to send a letter to the victims in her prosecutions about available victim services. Detective Constable Seguin provided her with their contact information.

On June 8, there was a follow-up meeting about setting up VWAP services for Cornwall in the future. Detective Constable Don Genier and Ms Chafe were among those participating in the meeting.

By July 2000, funds had been allocated for the provision of VWAP services in Project Truth prosecutions, and Louise Lamoureux was brought on in August 2000 to provide these services.

Deputy Attorney General Murray Segal testified that the concerns of individuals such as Detective Inspector Tim Smith and Ms Hallett about the lack of Victim/Witness Assistance Program services in Cornwall might have come to his attention:

I was made aware that there were concerns about the program—Victim/Witness Program in general, and that there was a need to provide support, understandably, for victims. The exact number of victims was not something that—as I’ve tried to indicate to you that was apparent to me from the outset and it took some time—to get a better handle on that.

VWAP Services in Specific Project Truth Cases

Ms Chafe testified that because Cornwall did not have an established Victim/Witness Assistance Program there was no way to access information about charges laid and court dates; she had to rely on communications from the Crowns or the police. In Ottawa, that information was available using the ICON system, a computerized system that tracks the progression of criminal offences in the courts.

When the Victim/Witness Assistance Program became involved, most of the preliminary inquiries in Project Truth prosecutions had been completed. Ms Chafe believed many of the victims declined services because they did not feel they needed them: “they’d gotten to where they were without us.” She thought the Program’s involvement in Project Truth prosecutions would have been different if services had been offered early in the process.

Detective Constable Seguin testified that a Victim/Witness Assistance Program would have been a useful resource. He explained that there was nobody to maintain contact with victims:

One thing we could have used for sure is what we refer to now as a VWAP, Victim Witness Assistance Program. We didn't have anybody assigned. That was the biggest issue, I think. We didn't have somebody who could be the hands-on person with the victims; regular contact.

Father Charles MacDonald Prosecution

As discussed earlier, once Project Truth prosecutions were brought to the attention of the Ministry, Cathy Finley, Director of the Victim/Witness Assistance Program, sent an e-mail to prosecutors offering services for Project Truth prosecutions.

Crown Hallett responded to Ms Finley's e-mail in January 2000, providing information about the status of the Jacques Leduc and Father Charles MacDonald prosecutions and requesting services for alleged victims in these cases. Ms Hallett also sent her a memorandum in February following up on her earlier request for services in the Father MacDonald prosecution. She advised that there were eight complainants in the case and an additional complainant had recently come forward.

Ms Hallett had further exchanges with Ms Chafe about the Father MacDonald prosecution and some issues that arose for complainants in that case. Ms Hallett provided Ms Chafe with transcripts, summaries of evidence from the preliminary inquiries, and indictments.

After she came on board in August 2000, Louise Lamoureux had the most contact with complainants from the Father MacDonald prosecution.

When Lorne McConnery took over the Father MacDonald prosecution from Ms Hallett, the Victim/Witness Assistance Program was involved. VWAP and the police were conveying information to the complainants. Mr. McConnery recalls being in contact with the VWAP workers.

It was discovered in early 2002 that VWAP had never contacted the initial three complainants in the Father MacDonald matter. Ms Chafe testified that VWAP was not aware of these individuals. She confirmed this with Mr. McConnery in an e-mail dated February 15, 2002, in which she wrote that she had the names of only six alleged victims in this case: C-4, C-8, C-2, Robert Renshaw, C-5, and Kevin Upper. Although she may only have had six names, Ms Hallett had advised Ms Chafe in February 2000 that there were eight complainants and another had come forward. This clearly illustrates that insufficient information was being shared between the Crown and the VWAP office. Because VWAP workers did not have access to the ICON system, they were entirely reliant on being provided with court information by the police and the Crowns. At times, that process for the sharing of information failed and, as a result, services to victims failed as well.

Ms Chafe had a meeting with Mr. McConnery on March 1, 2002. According to her notes of the meeting, the Crown told her not to worry about connecting with the initial three complainants now: “they are o.k.” Ms Chafe never had contact with them. In my view VWAP workers should always be encouraged to participate in the process. I note that one of the three, David Silmsen, had walked out of a preparation meeting with Mr. McConnery a few days prior to this conversation.

In terms of contacts with specific complainants, Ms Chafe testified that she attended at an interview of C-2 on July 25, 2000, with Ms Hallett, Detective Constable Dupuis, and Christine Tier. She said that during the interview, C-2 said he did not need support from VWAP. Arrangements were made that the Crowns would deal with C-5, and so Ms Chafe had no contact with him. Ms Chafe testified that C-4 requested assistance for court appearances and assistance for his wife. Ms Chafe also had contacts with Mr. Upper regarding both of the suspects he made allegations against. Regarding C-8, as will be discussed below, the charges in respect of his allegations were withdrawn in April 2002. Ms Chafe testified that once charges are withdrawn, VWAP services are no longer provided.

Jacques Leduc Prosecution

Following the stay of proceedings in the Jacques Leduc prosecution, Ms Hallett sent a letter to the complainants and their parents and advised them of the appeal process. In the letter, she provided contact information for the Ottawa Victim/Witness Assistance Program office.

Claude Marleau's Allegations

Alain Godin recalled in his testimony that no Victim/Witness Assistance Program services were available in Cornwall during the course of the Project Truth prosecutions. Rather, the program in Ottawa was providing services, which he offered to Claude Marleau. He could not recall if Mr. Marleau used the services.

Mr. Marleau testified that an officer provided him with a pamphlet on victim services. He thought the information was impractical as it related to services available in Ottawa. At the time, Mr. Marleau lived in the province of Quebec.

When Mr. Marleau provided his initial statement to the Ontario Provincial Police, on July 31, 1997, no Victim/Witness Assistance Programs were offering services in the Cornwall area. He said that after his first statement he had many questions and did not know what would follow or if charges would be laid.

By early 2000, when limited VWAP services became available for Project Truth cases, Mr. Marleau had been involved in the criminal justice system for some time. Ms Chafe phoned him on August 18, 2000, and offered VWAP services to him. According to Ms Chafe's notes of this conversation, Mr. Marleau said that he did not require their services, as he was familiar with the court process since he was a lawyer.

I comment elsewhere in this chapter on the fact that the police and Crowns treated Mr. Marleau as a lawyer as opposed to a victim. Robert Pelletier, in his original opinion letter, suggested that "Marleau, who is legally trained, be advised of the apparent difficulties with these prosecutions in order to obtain his fully informed views on the matter." He was first and foremost an alleged victim and, despite his profession, should have been treated as such.

In a contact with VWAP personnel on October 5, 2000, Mr. Marleau expressed frustration with the criminal justice system and lengthy adjournments. Mr. Marleau was advised that he would be kept posted on developments.

Ms Chafe testified that when a victim resides outside of the jurisdiction of the Victim/Witness Assistance Program, the office will direct the victim to their local VWAP office. If the victim resides outside of the province, VWAP staff will try to coordinate with victim services in the other province. The VWAP office should keep in mind that arrangements for services should be set up where the victim resides, and that an initial refusal of services can change during the investigation and trial process.

Jean Luc Leblanc Prosecution

By the time the Victim/Witness Assistance Program became involved in the Jean Luc Leblanc prosecution, it was already determined that the matter would proceed by way of a guilty plea. The Program could have been involved up to the sentencing phase, but only one victim wanted VWAP services.

Link Between The Men's Project and Victim Witness Assistance Program

In 1998–1999, the Ministry of the Solicitor General identified the need to provide support to the victims in Cornwall who had come forward with allegations as well as those who had not. In 1999, the Ministry began to fund The Men's Project, a counselling and support service for victims, for the duration of the investigations and court process. This was a good initiative by the Ministry. Ms Hallett and Detective Inspector Pat Hall attended a meeting with Dennis Lessard, and Rick Goodwin and Jacques Legault of the Men's Project, on September 9, 1999.

Following the meeting, Ms Hallett prepared a letter to inform alleged victims of the new counselling service and telephone support line established for male sexual abuse survivors in the Cornwall area. The services were going to be offered on a time-limited basis.

According to Ms Chafe, there was no relationship between The Men's Project and the Victim/Witness Assistance Program. The Men's Project was a community-based agency providing services to adult male survivors in Ottawa. The Men's Project received funding for services in Cornwall and the Victim/Witness Assistance Program referred people to those services.

Improvements for VWAP Delivery of Services

I heard evidence from many witnesses regarding issues surrounding the Victim/Witness Assistance Program. It is clear that for many reasons discussed in this section and other chapters, services to victims in the Project Truth prosecutions were inadequate and not offered in a timely fashion. I was surprised to hear of the delay in implementing VWAP services in Cornwall given the context of the investigations and prosecutions.

A new VWAP Policy and Procedures Manual was implemented in the spring of 2006. I note that there is a specific section on special prosecutions, which states:

Typically, the program can only support one additional staff at a time, province-wide, for dedication to a special prosecution. As a result, the Manager must refer any request for additional resources to the Regional Manager and not make any commitment to the local Crown Attorney or Regional Crown until resources have been identified and secured.

I have also heard evidence that there was a delay in securing funds and resources once the VWAP office of Ottawa agreed to become involved in offering services to alleged victims in the Project Truth prosecutions. As I have previously indicated, time is always of the essence in securing victim services, which can have an impact on the success of a prosecution and the well-being of an individual. My concern here is that if this one additional staff person is otherwise involved in a special prosecution somewhere in Ontario, there is no resource left within the program if a second special prosecution were to materialize. Ms Chafe also testified that the protocol on special prosecutions is not part of the 2006 Policy and Procedures Manual, although there is a reference to the protocol. The matter should be reconsidered to determine if the protocol should be inserted in the manual.

Conclusion

In examining the institutional response of the Ministry of the Attorney General and its employees, I had the opportunity to review a great deal of documentary evidence and to hear testimony from a number of Crown attorneys and complainants who were involved in investigative and court proceedings. Throughout this chapter, I have drawn conclusions about specific issues and I will not repeat all of them here. I would instead like to comment on the general themes that have become apparent as a result of my examination of the Ministry's institutional response.

This Inquiry was called to deal with a number of outstanding public concerns, including those related to the prosecution of alleged perpetrators of sexual abuse. In particular, there was a great deal of public criticism over the fact that only one person was convicted as a result of a major Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) investigation into sexual abuse, Project Truth. This Inquiry was also called in order to address rumours circulating within the community about whether certain high-profile individuals, including those within the local Crown attorney's office, had conspired to cover up allegations of sexual abuse.

After reviewing the evidence, it is my view that the allegations of conspiracy involving Ministry officials are unfounded. I have reviewed in detail the actions of Crown Attorney Murray MacDonald in providing advice to Cornwall Police Service (CPS) Constable Heidi Sebalj during the 1993 investigation into David Silmsen's complaint against Father Charles MacDonald. I also examined a number of prosecutions in which decisions were made that, in hindsight, perhaps should have been made differently. Cases of historical sexual abuse are inherently difficult to prosecute due to the passage of time, faded memories, and a lack of physical evidence. It is my hope that this chapter has helped explain the outcome of the Project Truth prosecutions, those related to Project Truth, and others that pre-dated the project.

I began this chapter with an exploration of various issues that arose in the 1970s and 1980s in relation to alleged perpetrators of sexual abuse, some of whom re-offended or were re-investigated in the 1990s.

In a number of instances within this period the Crown gave advice to officials in other public institutions, such as the Ministry of Correctional Services and the Children's Aid Society of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry, about possible criminal behaviour of individuals connected to these institutions. The Crowns in these cases failed to keep a record of their discussions with these officials and did not provide their advice in writing. The absence of such records can be detrimental to later prosecutions involving the same alleged perpetrator. In addition, information about possible criminal conduct was not consistently passed along to the police for further investigation. These cases thus demonstrated the need for a Crown policy to provide guidance on when Crowns should report allegations of sexual abuse to police for investigation and to clarify Crown reporting obligations under the Child and Family Services Act.

A number of themes can be identified in the pre-Project Truth cases of the 1990s. There were several instances in which the Crown provided an opinion to the police without having all of the relevant information, or the Crown provided an informal oral opinion rather than a written one. Both practices are inadvisable and can result in an incomplete review of the investigation and in Crowns overlooking possible charges.

Further, there were instances in which the separation of roles between the prosecutor and the police became blurred, such as when Crowns gave investigative advice to police, as Murray MacDonald did with Constable Sebalj. Although Crowns and police must work closely together, it is important that neither party unduly delegate their responsibilities to the other.

In this chapter, I also undertook a detailed analysis of the Crown's role in providing advice to the OPP during Project Truth and the subsequent prosecutions. Project Truth was a major multi-victim, multi-perpetrator historical abuse investigation, but it was not the first in Ontario.

Earlier in the 1990s, two other projects investigated similar subjects. Project Jericho in Prescott was a joint OPP/Prescott Police investigation of child sexual abuse. A team of professionals was set up at the outset to coordinate the investigations and prosecutions. A Crown attorney was on the team on a full-time basis. Similarly, the OPP investigated allegations of historical sexual abuse against young people at the St. Joseph's Training School in Alfred. In that case, a team of prosecutors from Eastern Ontario jointly assisted OPP investigators during their investigation and then prosecuted the alleged perpetrators.

Unlike these major investigations, Project Truth did not have a dedicated Crown or team of Crowns assigned to it. Consequently, the OPP did not have the assistance of a Crown who could provide direction to investigations, advise on issues that arose on a daily basis, or assist the police in identifying and following up on the linkages between the various suspects. The lack of a dedicated Crown or team of Crowns meant that no one ensured that consistent advice was given to police or that consistent decisions were being made in the various matters that arose throughout the prosecutions, such as issues of consent and disclosure. In addition, the Crowns assigned to Project Truth cases were balancing this work with unrelated prosecutions in other jurisdictions. They soon became overworked, which limited their ability to provide timely advice to the police and led to significant delays in some of the proceedings.

While all special projects have their challenges, a number of factors unique to Project Truth added to the difficulties in these prosecutions.

First, the local Crown's office was under investigation during Project Truth, which meant that it was unable to take on these prosecutions and could not provide assistance or office space to the Crown attorneys who did. Crown attorneys had to be brought in from outside the area and were not given proper office space or sufficient administrative support. As a result, they had to do a lot of case preparation in their hotel rooms.

In addition, the OPP asked Crowns to provide an opinion on every brief prepared during Project Truth. This strategy can be useful, given that Crowns can advise on the appropriate charges to lay or on further avenues of investigation. However, in a number of Project Truth cases, the officers lacked both objective and subjective belief in reasonable and probable grounds for charges. These requests for opinions added to the workload of the Crowns assigned and were perhaps not the best use of scarce resources.

The Crowns also had trouble providing full disclosure of all relevant investigative materials to the defence during Project Truth, in part because the police were unable to obtain some of these materials from CPS Constable Perry Dunlop. Complicating the matter was the fact that the OPP was investigating the CPS, and therefore did not provide the CPS with all relevant material in its possession that related to CPS cases, such as the Marcel Lalonde investigation. This limited the CPS's ability to share this material with the Crown. However, aside from these problems, it is clear that Crown attorneys lacked an adequate system for tracking disclosure of documents to the defence, and I have recommended that this process be improved.

In addition to the difficulties in obtaining notes from Constable Dunlop, the police and the Crown had to deal with the fact that complainants and witnesses were having contact with Constable Dunlop. This contact was particularly problematic after one alleged victim, C-8, disclosed that he felt pressured by Constable Dunlop to embellish his story.

Communication between the police and the Crown was essential in minimizing the challenges posed by Constable Dunlop's contact with victims and witnesses, and his delayed or incomplete disclosure of notes and other materials. Unfortunately, there was a complete breakdown of communication during the Leduc trial that led to a finding of wilful non-disclosure against the Crown. Although this finding was later overturned by the Court of Appeal, it had a serious impact on the remaining Project Truth cases because Crown Shelley Hallett was removed from them. This was a significant blow to these prosecutions. Her removal not only delayed the prosecutions and opinions that she had been assigned, but the project lost the benefit of Ms Hallett's considerable experience in prosecuting cases of child sexual abuse. Further, Ms Hallett was assisted only by students or a junior Crown rather than by an experienced Crown attorney who could have taken over from her when that became necessary. Had she been working with a more experienced co-counsel, this person may have been able to carry on with the Project Truth prosecutions after Ms Hallett's removal from these cases.

Communication between the Crown and police is paramount to the functioning of the justice system and, should disagreements between the two arise, mechanisms or protocols should be in place to ensure a prompt and efficient resolution with minimal impact on prosecutions.

Delay was a significant issue during some of the Project Truth prosecutions. In some cases there were significant delays in providing the police with advice on Crown briefs, which can be attributed in part to overworked Crown counsel and a lack of resources. It must be emphasized that in historical cases, even though a lot of time may have passed since the abuse occurred, once a complaint is made all institutions must act in a timely manner. Although delay can be fatal to any case, it is a particular concern in historical cases. Alleged victims may lose patience with the justice system, and fragile complainants may have difficulty dealing with the stress of prolonged anticipation of a trial. Alleged perpetrators age and may die before their trials or become medically unfit to stand trial.

Two major cases were stayed on the basis of delay during Project Truth. In both the Father MacDonald and the Jacques Leduc prosecutions, disclosure issues and turnover among Crown counsel contributed to the delay. In the Father MacDonald case, there was the additional complication of further victims coming forward after the initial charges were laid. A decision was made to join the charges, which in hindsight may not have been advisable, but at the time was a calculated risk.

In addition, during Project Truth there was a significant amount of rumour and innuendo in the community fuelled by citizens, websites and MPP Gary Guzzo. The Ministry of the Attorney General's impartiality was challenged by some people due to the conspiracy allegations involving Crown Murray MacDonald and the disappearance of binders delivered to the Minister of the Attorney General's office. There were also rumours of an organized ring of abusers in the Cornwall area, and the OPP's outright denial of the existence of such a ring was in stark contrast to submissions being made by Crown counsel in court. The Ministry and the OPP had no co-ordinated media strategy. A dedicated Crown could have assisted with this task.

In this chapter I have attempted to address the substance of the rumours involving Murray MacDonald and those about the disappearance of the binders.

I have noted that rumours about Mr. MacDonald were unfounded and unfair, and I have set out the facts surrounding the disappearance of the binders, although I am unable to reach a definitive conclusion about what happened to them.

Finally, throughout this chapter I commented on the Crown's role in dealing with victims and ensuring that appropriate services are provided to them. Victims need someone who can explain the criminal justice system to them, help them prepare for their testimony, and keep them informed about the steps in the prosecution as it unfolds. Victims also require assistance in overcoming the effects of their abuse, and early referrals to counselling can have a positive impact. Prompt intervention from the Victim/Witness Assistance Program is essential, and it is unfortunate that these services were not made available early in the Project Truth investigation.

In addition, Crown attorneys require training in order to interact with victims in an appropriate manner. In particular, they need to understand that people alleging abuse by people in positions of authority can have a difficult time dealing with authorities throughout their lives. These individuals are not necessarily familiar with the court system, and the prosecution of their cases can be a difficult and stressful process for them. I recommend that consideration be given to having the designated Child Abuse Coordinator from each Crown attorney's office attend the joint training I am recommending for police, Children's Aid Society officials, and other individuals and institutions that work with victims of child sexual abuse.

It is my hope that this chapter has answered the questions of the public and provided the Ministry of the Attorney General with useful advice. I am optimistic that serious consideration will be given to my recommendations to ensure better co-operation between police and the Crown, to help future special projects run more smoothly, and to assist victims of historical sexual abuse participate more fully in the justice system.

Recommendations

Policies, Procedures, and Protocols

1. The Ministry of the Attorney General (MAG) should implement a practice memorandum on historical allegations of sexual offences or augment existing policies, procedures, and protocols, particularly Practice Memorandum [2006] No. 9, Sexual Assault and Other Sexual Offences, and Practice Memorandum [2006] No. 8, Child Abuse and Offences Involving Children, to ensure that they address historical cases of sexual assault/abuse¹¹ of children or young people.
2. MAG should implement or augment existing policies, procedures, and protocols to provide that allegations of sexual assault/abuse reported to a Crown counsel should immediately be turned over to police for investigation.
3. MAG should consider modifying its practice memorandum on recanting witnesses, PM [2002] No. 7, Recanting Witnesses, to provide direction to Crown counsel regarding situations where the witness is not recanting but is reluctant to proceed.
4. MAG should conduct audits of local Crown attorney offices to ensure compliance with practice memoranda that deal with sexual assault/abuse cases. Among other requirements, the audit should insist that each office has a protocol in place to ensure that:
 - complainants or the Victim/Witness Assistance Program (VWAP) person involved, or the liaison person as described in the recommendations of Phase 2 of this Report, are advised of significant steps in proceedings;
 - the office has developed a network of interagency contacts and mechanisms for sharing information and expertise;
 - the office has designated a Local Child Abuse coordinator and set out his or her role and expertise; and
 - the office has established and kept up to date local and regional protocols with police, CAS, and VWAP regarding historical sexual abuse cases.

11. The reference to sexual assault/abuse refers to the sexual abuse of children and young people, whether current or historical, unless defined otherwise.

File Control and Possession

5. MAG should clarify that prosecution files are the property of MAG and should remain in the possession of the Ministry. Crown counsel should not be permitted to retain possession or control of files when no longer involved in prosecutions.

Conflict of Interest

6. MAG should implement a practice memorandum that will provide direction to Crown counsel in identifying and dealing with conflicts of interest. The practice memorandum should also identify situations or cases that are to be referred to Justice Prosecutions.

Justice Prosecutions or Other Conflict-of-Interest Cases

7. MAG should secure adequate and sufficient staff, equipment, and temporary offices to permit Crowns to adequately prosecute Justice Prosecution and conflict-of-interest cases.

Crown Opinions

8. MAG should implement or augment existing policies, procedures, and protocols dealing with Crown opinions, particularly Practice Memorandum [2005] No. 34, Police: Relationship with Crown Counsel, to address the following issues: communicating with the investigating officer before rendering an opinion, opening a file, keeping a copy of the opinion, and ensuring that the opinion letter is available to the Crown counsel assigned to the file.

Disclosure

9. MAG should develop a uniform tracking system for disclosure, to be implemented in all Crown offices, to track the receipt of disclosure from investigators, the disclosure to the accused or to defence counsel, the description or content of the disclosure, and any disclosure updates provided.

Duty to Report

10. It is important the Crown counsel receive ongoing training regarding their statutory reporting duties to the Children's Aid Society under the Child and Family Services Act to ensure that children at risk are protected.

11. MAG should take measures to ensure that Crown counsel are aware that as “solicitors,” they are considered “professional[s] performing official duties with children” under section 72(5) of the Child and Family Services Act, which means that any failure to report on their part is considered an offence.

Language

12. Complainants should be offered the opportunity to be accommodated in the language of their choice throughout the process. To ensure this choice is the complainant’s, the Crown attorney and/or other employees should not state their preference. If the complainant has difficulty expressing him- or herself in English or French, every effort should be made to provide accommodation by way of interpreters or otherwise.

Tracking System

13. MAG should implement or augment existing policies, procedures, and protocols with regard to tracking the service of documents received by the Ministry. The system is to ensure tracking of documents received, reviewed, and forwarded to appropriate authorities and officials within the Ministry.

Delays

14. MAG should consider implementing the recommendations from the Lesage/Code report on the issue of empowering a judge to rule at the early pre-trial stages of a proceeding.

Special Project Prosecutions

15. MAG should assign a dedicated Crown or team of Crowns to assist throughout the investigations and prosecutions in Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) special projects involving sexual assault/abuse, such as Project Truth.
16. MAG should ensure that Crown counsel assigned to conduct long and complex criminal prosecutions are provided with adequate resources and are relieved of other responsibilities.

Major Case Management

17. MAG should augment its major case resource document and adopt it as a formal policy or practice memorandum.

Major Case Resource Document

18. MAG's major case resource document should be augmented to include special considerations that may arise in regard to major cases in small communities, such as the prosecutor having to travel significant distances. In addition, the threshold for defining a major case and the factors that make a case "major" may be different in a small community than in a large urban centre.

Media Relations

19. MAG should implement and augment policies, procedures, and protocols related to media issues to ensure that media representatives speaking on behalf of both the police and Crown Attorney's Office disseminate a clear and accurate message to the public representing the position of both institutions in a major or high-profile case.

Joint Training

20. MAG should consider participating in some aspects of the reinstituted joint training for CAS workers and police officers on responding to historical allegations of abuse.

Recommendations for the Ministry of the Attorney General for Ontario and Other Public Institutions

Special Project Prosecutions

21. MAG and the OPP should work together to develop joint operational plans in special project prosecutions, such as Project Truth.

Major Case Management

22. MAG and the Ontario police agencies should review and compare their major case management protocols to identify and rectify inconsistencies and gaps.

Court Management Protocol

23. The OPP and MAG, in particular the Crown Attorney's office in Cornwall, should develop a court management protocol as soon as practicable. This protocol should address the specific roles, duties, and relationship between OPP officers and Crown counsel in relation to prosecutions, and should be reviewed triennially.

Child Protection Protocol, 2001

24. MAG is a partner in the Child Protection Protocol: A Coordinated Response in Eastern Ontario (July 2001). Since this protocol has not been updated, MAG should meet as soon as practicable with other partners to review and update the protocol. For those partners actively involved in the investigation and prosecution of sexual assault/abuse cases, consistent roles for the participants should be set out as well as guidance on the sharing of information between investigating bodies. The process of reviewing and updating the protocol should continue triennially.

The Process of Phase 1 of the Cornwall Public Inquiry

The Cornwall Public Inquiry was established by the government of Ontario on April 14, 2005, under the Public Inquiries Act.¹ I was appointed Commissioner of this Inquiry by Ontario Attorney General Michael Bryant. When a Commissioner is appointed to head an inquiry, he or she begins with no more than the Order-in-Council. In general terms, the Order-in-Council establishes the commission, sets out the mandate of the inquiry, and provides some guidance with respect to how its work must be done.

Thus, I began the Cornwall Public Inquiry with the words of the Order-in-Council and nothing else. The mandate required the Commission to inquire into and report on the events surrounding allegations of historical abuse of young people in Cornwall by examining the response of the justice system and other public institutions to the allegations, as well as to make recommendations to improve the response in similar circumstances. The Commission was also mandated to inquire into and report on processes, services, and programs that will encourage community healing and reconciliation in Cornwall.

I felt immediately committed to the work of the Inquiry, but where to begin?

In the interests of transparency and openness, and in the hope of providing some assistance to future inquiries, I thought it would be useful to set out the practical steps I took, along with Commission staff, to breathe life into the Order-in-Council. Similar volumes have been prepared for previous inquiries and they were of great assistance to me in preparing for and conducting this Inquiry.

In the main, this section of the Report provides an outline of the process of Phase 1 of the Inquiry.

1. Appendix A1, Order-in-Council 558/2005, April 14, 2005.

The Purpose of a Public Inquiry

The purpose of a public inquiry has been well explained in the reports of previous inquiries.² In the interest of brevity, I will simply highlight a few key points.

Public inquiries are often convened in the wake of public shock, horror, disillusionment, or scepticism in order to uncover the truth.³ This is the fact-finding, or investigative, function of a public inquiry. The events under investigation often involve some element of public controversy and a resultant loss of confidence in the public institutions. This calls for the need to establish an independent, thorough, and transparent review of the situation. In general terms, the goal is to find out what happened and what went wrong, and to look at what can be done to avoid similar occurrences in the future.

Public inquiries can also serve the policy-development process. They do this by considering public opinion, exploring policy options, and making recommendations about the future course of action. Most inquiries, such as this one, have dual roles: fact finding and proposing policy reform.

A further purpose of public inquiries is education. Because the work of an inquiry is carried out publicly, it can increase a community's understanding of the events in question. Education is also facilitated, particularly in inquiries that have a healing and reconciliation component, through community meetings and workshops organized by the Commission.

I think it fair to say that even inquiries that do not have a mandate to encourage healing and reconciliation hope that this is, at the very least, a side effect of their work. For some individuals directly affected by the events being examined, the inquiry process itself can be healing. Throughout the course of an inquiry, questions are asked and answered and sentiments expressed, sometimes for the very first time, and the community may engage in a dialogue. All of this may be the first step along the way to healing old wounds and mending damaged community relations. Regrettably, of course, the process of reliving past events can be very difficult for some; however, it is only with full participation that an inquiry process can function at its very best. This is why it is important to have all concerned groups, organizations, and individuals represented at an inquiry.

2. For example, the Toronto Computer Leasing Inquiry and Toronto External Contracts Inquiry (Bellamy J), Ipperwash Inquiry (Linden J), and the Walkerton Inquiry (O'Connor ACJ).

3. Phillips v. Nova Scotia (Commission of Inquiry into the Westray Mine Tragedy), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 97 at para. 62, Cory J., dissenting.

A Public Inquiry Is Not a Civil or Criminal Trial

At first glance, the trappings and proceedings of a public inquiry may have the appearance of a trial. The hearings are held in a court-like setting: they are presided over by a Commissioner, who is usually a judge, and numerous lawyers examine and cross-examine witnesses.

Despite this outwardly trial-like appearance, a public inquiry is not a trial. This was a principle that I emphasized many times over the course of this Inquiry.⁴ As Commissioner, I can make findings of misconduct that are related to my mandate, but I cannot find anyone guilty of a criminal offence or civilly liable.⁵ This point is reinforced by the case law.⁶

This Inquiry was not the only process that arose from the events alleged to have occurred in Cornwall. There have been criminal investigations and proceedings and there are ongoing civil proceedings. As a part of this Inquiry, I had to look at these criminal investigations and proceedings. This was not for the purpose of trying or re-trying criminal allegations but solely to evaluate the response of the justice system and public institutions to allegations of abuse of young people.

Unlike criminal and civil litigation, the process of a public inquiry is ideally more investigative than adversarial. It is hoped that the parties will be equally committed to “getting to the bottom of things,” and will conduct themselves in a fashion as open and transparent as the inquiry itself. It is a reality, however, that public inquiries involve individuals, groups, and institutions, often with competing interests. And while a commission cannot make findings of guilt or innocence, or make findings related to civil liability, it can question the actions of individuals and institutions and make findings of misconduct in relation to these actions. A likely effect of this is some damage to reputation. This is one of the reasons that an inquiry must be procedurally fair.

4. See for example, Commissioner’s statements in Appendix P1, Opening Statement at the Hearings and Introduction to Processes in Phase 1 and Phase 2, November 7, 2005; P2, Introductory Remarks and Introduction to Processes in Phase 1 and Phase 2, February 13, 2006; and P14, Overview of Current Issues and Update on Planned Testimony, November 28, 2007; and Appendix K3, Ruling on Jurisdictional Motion, May 1, 2006.

5. Paragraph 7 of the Order-in-Council makes this eminently clear in that it states, “The Commission shall perform its duties without expressing any conclusion or recommendation regarding the civil or criminal liability of any person or organization.”

6. See for example, Canada (Attorney General) v. Canada (Commission of Inquiry on the Blood System), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 440 at para. 53, and more recently, Hartwig v. Saskatoon (City) Police Assn. (Commission of Inquiry re Death of Neil Stonechild), [2008] 9 W.W.R. 615 (Sask. C.A.).

In this Inquiry, like others, I adopted a more informal approach to the evidence than I would employ sitting as a judge. Both the Public Inquiries Act and the Order-in-Council have directed me to do so. Despite this, I have strived to ensure procedural fairness and balance less formal rules of evidence with corresponding safeguards to ensure that rights are protected. I adopted the same approach in coming to my findings.

Several of the institutional parties were concerned that I evaluate their actions based on the standards and policies in place at the time the alleged events occurred, rather than assessing them on current, and perhaps more rigid, standards. To evaluate the actions of individuals and institutions based upon today's standards, given the increased knowledge, training, and education that has been acquired over the years, would be unfair. I have viewed all institutional response evidence in its appropriate time frame.

A public inquiry is rarely able to hear from every possible witness. In this Inquiry, much of the documentary evidence consists of notes and other documents whose authors did not testify. Some of these documents were police notes and as such, like aide-mémoires, they do not constitute all of the author's evidence. These notes, like others, are subject to errors with respect to dates and other important facts. If the author is not available, cross-examination on these matters is not possible. Thus, in making fact-finding decisions, I was careful not to make findings based solely on notes or other documents from individuals who did not testify. Every finding was made by considering all of the available evidence. In cases when documents were entered in the absence of evidence from the author, I looked for some corroboration, either direct or indirect, before finding that the facts from the documents were correct.

Despite the direction of the Public Inquiries Act and guidance from other commissioners to be less formal and more investigative, it is my observation that inquiries are becoming increasingly litigious. There are progressively more challenges to the jurisdiction of commissions of inquiry and judicial reviews of their rulings. Throughout this Inquiry, I issued a total of thirty-nine rulings, orders, and directions; there were four judicial reviews and one stated case arising from these decisions; and there were two appeals to the Court of Appeal. In addition, we attended the Ontario Divisional Court four times and the British Columbia Supreme Court once to address matters relating to one particular witness who was served with an interprovincial summons and against whom both civil and criminal contempt proceedings were brought. A number of recent inquiries, including this one, have had challenges to their scope or jurisdiction.⁷

7. See, for example, Canada (RCMP) v. British Columbia (Commissioner), [2009] B.C.J. No. 1290 (S.C.); British Columbia (Attorney General Criminal Justice Branch) v. British Columbia (Commission of Inquiry into the Death of Frank Paul – Davies Commission), [2009] B.C.J.

The increased time and costs associated with dealing with numerous legal challenges may defeat one of the purposes of a public inquiry, which is to get to the bottom of matters in an expeditious fashion.

The Decision to Establish the Cornwall Public Inquiry

In early 1994, the media began reporting on allegations of historical sexual abuse made by former altar boy David Silmsen against Father Charles MacDonald, a priest in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. A short time earlier, probation officer Ken Seguin had taken his life before allegations of historical abuse against him were investigated by the police. Mr. Seguin was a friend of Father Charles MacDonald and another alleged abuser of Mr. Silmsen. Mr. Silmsen had reported allegations of abuse against these two men to the Cornwall Police Service (CPS)⁸ in December 1992. The media coverage outlined a confidential financial settlement between David Silmsen, the Diocese, and Father MacDonald that resulted in Mr. Silmsen withdrawing his criminal complaint against the priest. This sparked rumours within the community and allegations of a cover-up by local institutions such as the CPS and the Diocese.

In January 1994, the Ottawa Police Service briefly examined the investigation the CPS had conducted of Father Charles MacDonald. It recommended that a thorough reinvestigation of the case be done by another police force.

Beginning in February 1994, the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) investigated the allegations made by David Silmsen but laid no charges. In early 1995, as a result of the OPP investigation of the settlement, Malcolm MacDonald was charged with attempt to obstruct justice. Mr. MacDonald was the lawyer who had represented Father MacDonald on the settlement. Nobody else involved with the settlement was charged. When Malcolm MacDonald pleaded guilty to the charge, he was granted an absolute discharge. Following this, more alleged victims of Father MacDonald came forward, and in 1996 he was charged in relation to allegations of historical sexual abuse.

Perry Dunlop, a Constable with the CPS, began conducting an off-duty investigation into allegations of sexual abuse in June 1996, in part to support a multi-million dollar lawsuit against the CPS and others. Almost three years earlier, in the fall of 1993, Constable Dunlop had provided a copy of David Silmser's allegations against his former priest, Father MacDonald, as well as allegations against his former probation officer, Ken Seguin, to the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry (CAS) after he found out that the CPS had terminated its investigation of David Silmser's complaint.

8. On October 27, 2000, the Cornwall Police Service (CPS) became the Cornwall Community Police Service (CCPS). Accordingly, in this chapter I have referred to the organization as the CPS with respect to matters pre-dating October 27, 2000, and as the CCPS with respect to matters after this date.

In 1994, Constable Dunlop was charged under the Police Services Act for, among other things, providing Mr. Silmser's statement to the CAS. The charges against Constable Dunlop were later stayed, but his relationship with the CPS was forever changed. From 1994 onward, Constable Dunlop's difficulties with the CPS and his contacts with a number of alleged victims were widely reported in the media and well known in the community.

Constable Dunlop continued his private investigation of sexual abuse against young people. In December 1996, his lawyer, Charles Bourgeois, delivered some of the investigative work they had done to Chief Julian Fantino of the London Police Service. Chief Fantino turned these documents over to the OPP in February 1997. The Fantino Brief contained a number of individual complaints about sexual abuse as well as a claim that there was an organized group of powerful people within the community who were perpetrating and covering up allegations of abuse. These individuals were teachers, probation officers, police officers, a Crown attorney, priests, and other Church officials.

In the spring of 1997, the OPP began its "Project Truth" investigation. Its purpose was to examine the contents of the Fantino Brief and investigate the allegations of child sexual abuse and related criminal activity contained therein. At least sixty-nine alleged victims came forward, and fifteen men were eventually charged. Issues soon arose regarding the Project Truth investigation and the prosecutions. Only one person arrested as a result of Project Truth was convicted and a handful were found not guilty. Many cases did not proceed to a full trial on the merits for a variety of reasons: some elderly suspects had died or were too sick to proceed; in some cases the charges were withdrawn; and in others the trials were stayed for either delay or non-disclosure of evidence. Criticism was levelled at the OPP investigation by MPP Garry Guzzo, Constable Dunlop and his wife, and others. There continued to be widespread media interest.

Throughout the 1990s, allegations began to surface about cover-ups by the CPS or by the Diocese of other complaints of sexual abuse. In one of these cases, the alleged perpetrator was the son of a former CPS police chief. In another, the victim made it publicly known that the Diocese had transferred the priest who had abused him to another parish rather than properly dealing with the complaint. In yet another case, the alleged victim complained that neither the CPS nor the CAS had investigated her allegations of abuse against a former CAS worker and group home staff.

These cases, along with the number of alleged victims uncovered by Project Truth, suggested that there was a serious problem of sexual abuse in the community, and more particularly, a problem with the way that public institutions handled, investigated, and prosecuted complaints of abuse. Stories began to circulate attributing these problems to a massive criminal conspiracy.

In 2000, Mr. Guzzo called for a public inquiry to look into the circumstances surrounding allegations of abuse of young people in Cornwall and, in particular, the response of the police and other institutions to it. Segments of the community of Cornwall joined in, and thousands of citizens from the Cornwall area petitioned the government to inquire into the issues. It was the work of a coalition of individuals and groups that resulted in the Order-in-Council dated April 14, 2005, which established this Inquiry.

The preamble to the Order-in-Council sets out the general context for the Cornwall Public Inquiry:⁹

Whereas allegations of abuse of young people have surrounded the City of Cornwall and its citizens for many years. The police investigations and criminal prosecutions relating to these allegations have concluded. Community members have indicated that a public inquiry will encourage individual and community healing ...

As the hearings began, I heard submissions that the events alleged to have occurred in Cornwall had given rise to a great deal of rumour and innuendo and that it was difficult for the community to distinguish fact from fiction. Complicating this was that some of those said to have been involved with the alleged abuse worked within important public institutions such as the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, boards of education, and the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services. As a result, some members of the community had lost confidence in their public institutions. They were concerned about the existence of a conspiracy and attempts by powerful people in these public institutions to cover up allegations of abuse.

The community of Cornwall needed to clear the air with facts. It needed to know how the allegations of abuse had been handled by public institutions. It needed to heal and move forward. It is my hope that the work of this Commission will help to answer the questions that are important in the minds of the community members and that its recommendations will facilitate improved responses by public institutions in the future.

9. Appendix A1.

Principles Governing the Inquiry

A number of general principles have guided my work at the Cornwall Public Inquiry. These are thoroughness, expedition, openness to the public, and fairness. These principles are not unique to my work but have been used as guideposts by Commissioners of previous inquiries, and I have benefited from their direction and insight in this regard.¹⁰

Each of these principles can be considered in isolation, but in practice a balance must be struck between them. For example, an open hearing must be balanced with legitimate confidentiality and privacy interests. As will be outlined, given the subject matter of this Inquiry, issues related to confidentiality and privacy arose frequently.

The Mandate

The Mandate in General Terms: Two Phases

An inquiry's mandate is what shapes its work. An inquiry is captive to its mandate, subject to any additional constraints that are imposed by the law. The Order-in-Council establishing this Commission set out the following mandate:

2. The Commission shall inquire into and report on the institutional response of the justice system and other public institutions, including the interaction of that response with other public and community sectors, in relation to:
 - (a) allegations of historical abuse of young people in the Cornwall area, including the policies and practices then in place to respond to such allegations, and
 - (b) the creation and development of policies and practices that were designed to improve the response to allegations of abuse in order to make recommendations directed to the further improvement of the response in similar circumstances.
3. The Commission shall inquire into and report on processes, services or programs that would encourage community healing and reconciliation in Cornwall.
4. The Commission may provide community meetings or other opportunities apart from formal evidentiary hearings for individuals affected by the allegations of historical abuse of young people in the Cornwall area to express their experiences of events and the impact on their lives.

This was our starting point. From the language of the mandate, we immediately went to work trying to glean the parameters of the Commission's work. Immediately evident was that the mandate was divided into two separate parts, which I called Phase 1 and Phase 2. Phase 1 was the fact-finding phase. Put in general terms, this portion of the mandate required me to inquire into and report on the events surrounding allegations of abuse of young people in Cornwall by examining the response of the justice system and other public institutions to the allegations. I was also required to make recommendations to improve the response in similar circumstances. The work of this Phase of the Inquiry would be conducted by way of evidentiary hearings.

Phase 2 was directed toward the goal of community healing and reconciliation. Similar to the approach used in the Ipperwash and Walkerton inquiries, in Phase 2 we used a variety of additional resources to collect information on key issues that were identified in the hearings and by the community. Among other things, we commissioned research papers, held community meetings and educational workshops, established witness and counselling support programs, and provided the opportunity for individuals to give informal testimony as part of the process of healing. For my work in this Phase, I had the assistance of a policy director and an advisory panel.

While Phase 1 and Phase 2 were carried out somewhat simultaneously, the counselling program portion of Phase 2 will continue to operate until January 15, 2010, at which point its continuity will depend on whether or not my recommendations are acted upon.

Challenges With the Language of the Mandate

Unfortunately, there was some ambiguity in the language of the mandate. What was the time span we were to examine? What age range was contemplated by the term "young people"? What is "historical abuse"? These were but a few of the questions we identified early on.

In consultation with Commission counsel, I established parameters on the mandate that I believed were appropriate and, on some points, I sought the views of the parties. From very early in the Inquiry process, however, the question of what this Commission could and could not examine recurred on several occasions.

Is the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall a “Public Institution”?

Early in the hearings process, two issues arose that touched upon the meaning or scope of the mandate of this Inquiry. The first was whether the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, a party with full standing at the Inquiry, was a “public institution” within the language of the mandate.¹¹

The Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall submitted that it was a “community-sector” organization, rather than a “public institution” under the terms of the mandate. The significance of this distinction was the degree to which the Commission could examine the Diocese’s response to allegations of abuse. If the Diocese was a public institution, the Commission could examine its actions in response to allegations of abuse. If it was a community-sector organization, the Commission would be limited to examining the Diocese’s interaction with other public institutions. The scope of disclosure that could be requested by the Commission would also be restricted to the Diocese’s interactions with other public institutions.

Because counsel for the parties had conflicting views on the status of the Diocese, I invited them to make submissions on the discrete question of whether the Diocese was a “public institution” within the mandate of the Commission.

In my ruling, I found that the purposes of the Inquiry called for an interpretation of my mandate in the broadest sense and that, in the circumstances, an institution with sufficient public characteristics, quantitatively or qualitatively, would qualify as a “public institution” under the Order-in-Council. Considering this, I ruled that the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall possessed sufficient characteristics to be qualified as a “public institution.” In my view, the phrase “other public and community sectors” was a residual provision that allowed the Inquiry to canvass other bodies, organizations, or groups of people that might have been peripherally involved with the main participants—the public institutions—in the issues that were the subject of this Inquiry. Such organizations may have brought themselves under the mandate of this Commission by interacting with public institutions.

As a “public institution,” the response of the Diocese to allegations of historical abuse could be examined and recommendations could be made for how it could and should respond to such allegations in the future. I would not be investigating the Roman Catholic Church, its doctrine, or beliefs but the corporate entity of the Diocese as an employer of the priests who worked in the area. My decision to find the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall a public institution within the language of the mandate was based on the specific facts in Cornwall and not intended to have any broader application.

11. Appendix K2, Ruling on the Terms of Reference, May 1, 2006.

After my ruling that the Diocese was to be considered a public institution and not a community-sector organization for the purpose of this Inquiry, counsel for the Diocese indicated that his client was “of the opposite view.” In short, the Diocese disagreed with my ruling. It did not, however, apply for a judicial review of that ruling and its counsel indicated that the Diocese would “participate in the inquiry as if it were a public institution within the meaning of the Terms of Reference.” He submitted that this decision was based on public interest considerations, such as the avoidance of delay, and to address certain public criticism of the Diocese.

I initially recommended funding to the Diocese in December 2005. Following my public institution ruling, the Diocese requested an additional funding recommendation, in part because its role had been enlarged. Three further requests for supplementary funding followed. Other publicly funded parties also requested supplementary funding.

The Diocese participated before the Inquiry as a full public institution. It produced volumes of documents. When its interests were engaged, counsel for the Diocese attended the hearings and cross-examined witnesses. Its counsel also played an active role in the preparation of the institutional response evidence of the Diocese, assisting Commission counsel in locating relevant witnesses, arranging meetings and, of course, making written and oral closing submissions.

When he testified on September 2, 2008, Bishop Durocher stated the following:

... [O]ur Diocese has endeavoured to participate fully in this Inquiry and in that vein, I would want to invite you to make recommendations to our Diocese. Though I realize your recommendations are really meant for the government in a public inquiry, I would be open to receive any suggestions you might have to help us do a better job than was done in the past in the Diocese.

You might even consider making similar suggestions to all the bishops of Canada and address them to our National Episcopal Conference is [sic] you so wish, but I can tell you that I will take seriously any recommendations you have to make to us.

Yet in its closing submissions, the Diocese reiterated its contention that it was not a public institution within the meaning of the Order-in-Council. In its view, any factual finding that I were to make based on the premise that the Diocese is a public or other institution within the meaning of the Order-in-Council would be unlawful. This submission was unexpected and inconsistent with the factual record I have set out wherein the Diocese has participated as a full public institution at the hearings. The legality of decisions of commissioners of public inquiries can, of course, be subject to court challenges. As I have noted, I issued thirty-nine decisions in this Inquiry, many of which were subjected to court challenges.

Can Victims and Alleged Victims Testify?

The second issue that was directed toward the scope of the mandate arose when I announced that the Commission would be calling victims and alleged victims of child sexual abuse to testify.¹² These witnesses would be asked to provide evidence about when they had reported their allegations, to whom they had reported, and whom they had reported, as well as to provide some brief details about the nature of the report and the resulting action or response of the public institutions and their employees and/or officials.

A motion was brought by Father Charles MacDonald and the Estate of Ken Seguin requesting an order that the Commission had no constitutional or other jurisdiction to inquire into specific allegations of sexual abuse or other wrongdoing made against them by alleged victims. Counsel for the applicants argued that the Commission would exceed its jurisdiction and delve into the area of criminal law by calling evidence from alleged victims. He further argued that by calling this evidence, the Commission could be trying or re-trying those criminal matters and might leave the applicants factually guilty.

I dismissed the motion, ruling that the Commission was entitled to call alleged victims of sexual abuse. As noted in Starr v. Holden, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1366, the Supreme Court of Canada and other courts have consistently upheld the validity of provincial commissions of inquiry that may incidentally have an impact upon the federal criminal law and criminal procedure powers, as long as the pith and substance of the commission is firmly anchored to a provincial head of power and that a commission does not, purposely or through its effect, investigate and determine the criminal responsibility of specific individuals for specific offences.¹³ I found that calling alleged victims was essential in order for the Commission to fully investigate the institutional response of the justice system and other public institutions in relation to allegations of historical abuse of young people. The core of the Commission's mandate was firmly anchored to provincial heads of power and was directed at the institutional response of public institutions, including Ontario government institutions. I would not, and in fact could not, express any opinion as to criminal or civil responsibility in law.

In my ruling, I noted my belief that the applicants' true concern lay not with the jurisdiction of the Commission to call the evidence at issue but with the protection of their reputation and privacy. While I acknowledged that these were serious concerns, they did not affect the jurisdiction of the Commission to call alleged victims for the purpose of examining the institutional response. The applicants were entitled to a fair process and could avail themselves of the rights afforded to parties with standing. I indicated that any specific concern they had would be dealt with on a case-by-case basis, applying the provisions of the Public Inquiries Act, the Order-in-Council, and the Rules of Practice and Procedure.

The applicants sought a judicial review by Divisional Court. The Divisional Court agreed that the evidence of the alleged victims was essential to a proper assessment of the response of the justice system and other public institutions to the allegations they had made.¹⁴

Does the Evidence of C-12 and C-13 Fall Within the Mandate?

In June 2007, as we were nearing the end of the evidence of victims and alleged victims, the next matter touching upon the scope of the Commission's mandate arose. The Commission indicated that it would be calling a witness who was expected to provide the following evidence: that she was sixteen years old when she was sexually abused by two males, aged sixteen and seventeen; and that the abuse took place on December 8, 1993, and was reported to the OPP the following day.

The OPP brought a motion asking me to state a case¹⁵ and to determine whether or not it was within the Commission's mandate to hear from this witness.¹⁶ The OPP's position was that the term "historical abuse of young people" in the mandate restricted the scope of this Inquiry to those situations in which the incident complained of occurred to a child, was committed by a person in authority, and was reported to an authority only much later.

The OPP was supported in its position by the Cornwall Community Police Service (CCPS), the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services (MCSCS), and the Ontario Provincial Police Association. While the Ministry of the Attorney General also supported the interpretation put forth by the OPP, it

14. Appendix L1.

15. A "stated case" is a method of having the Divisional Court determine a question arising from the work of the Inquiry. The Commission itself may state the case or may do so upon the request of the person affected by the issue at hand. If the Commission refuses to state the case, the person requesting it may apply directly to the Divisional Court for an order directing the Commission to state a case. See Public Inquiries Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.41, s. 6.

16. Appendix K24, Ruling on the Evidence of C12 and C13, June 6, 2007.

suggested a compromise position whereby I would hear the evidence on the condition that the officers involved not be named, that the institutions not be required to respond, and that the evidence not form part of any notices of misconduct. The Citizens for Community Renewal, the Victims Group, and Commission counsel opposed the interpretation put forward by the OPP and the “compromise” position of the Ministry of the Attorney General.

Up to this point, we had already heard expert evidence addressing both current and dated reporting, we had heard from all of the institutional parties, including the OPP on its policies for responding to cases involving both historical and current reporting, and we had heard from victims and alleged victims who had reported their abuse historically or when it occurred.

I ruled that the mandate was not limited in the manner suggested by the OPP. Among other things, I noted that while the drafters of the Order-in-Council had certainly indicated that historical allegations of abuse would be a central part of the Inquiry, the mandate did not limit it to those specific cases. Furthermore, the mandate made no reference to allegations of abuse at the hands of persons in authority, nor did it define the age of the victims, but simply referred to young people.

To minimize any delay in the hearings schedule and to provide some closure to the witness, I asked that should the OPP intend to pursue the matter further it do so expeditiously.

THE DIVISIONAL COURT RULING

The OPP applied to the Divisional Court for an order directing me to state a case.¹⁷ The OPP was joined in its application by the Ontario Provincial Police Association, the CCPS, the MCSCS, and the Episcopal Corporation of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. The Ministry of the Attorney General participated as an intervenor. Neither the Citizens for Community Renewal nor the Victims Group, two publicly funded parties that argued this issue before me, participated in the arguments before the Courts. The issue of funding for parties to pursue matters arising from decisions of a commission of inquiry will be discussed later in this chapter.

The majority of the Court dismissed the application. It found that there was no support for the applicants’ submission that “historical” meant acts that had occurred a considerable time before they were reported and that “abuse” meant acts that were committed by persons in a position of trust or authority.

17. Appendix L4, Ontario (Provincial Police) v. Cornwall (Public Inquiry) (2007), 229 O.A.C. 238 (Div. Ct.).

The majority stated the following:

If one of the purposes of the Inquiry was to inquire into the institutional response of institutions like the O.P.P., one would have thought that the alleged inaction on the part of the O.P.P. would be grist for the Commissioner's mill. Merely because C12 reported the alleged sexual assault the following day does not, in our view, remove her evidence from the ambit of the Inquiry. Surely the alleged failure of the O.P.P. to respond to her complaint can be considered "reasonably relevant" to the mandate of the Inquiry.¹⁸

The majority went on to say that "the Commissioner is in the best position to assess the relevance of the weight to be attached to the proposed evidence of C12 and C13."¹⁹ It was satisfied I would ensure that the evidence would help me in carrying out my mandate.

THE COURT OF APPEAL RULING

On appeal, the Court of Appeal ruled that the evidence of C-12 and C-13 did not fall within the subject matter assigned to the Commission by the terms of the Order-in-Council, and furthermore, that it was not reasonably relevant to the subject matter of the Inquiry.²⁰

Specifically, the Court of Appeal stated the following:²¹

Properly construed, the OIC empowers the Commissioner to look into and report on institutional responses—past, present and future—relating to allegations of historical abuse of young people in the Cornwall area by persons in authority or positions of trust, including the allegations investigated in Project Truth as well as similar such allegations. Allegations that were reported at the time of the abuse, or years later, or both, would fall within this mandate. In other words, the Commissioner can look at the response of various institutions to allegations made and reported in the 1950s, as well as their response to allegations made for the first time or renewed in the 1990s.

18. Ibid. at para. 21.

19. Ibid. at para. 25.

20. Appendix M2.

21. Ibid. at para. 62.

In effect, the Court of Appeal's decision confirmed that the Commission's mandate was not limited to circumstances in which there had been historical reporting, nor was it limited to cases that were the subject of the Project Truth investigations. It did, however, serve to limit the Commission to examining cases in which the perpetrators or alleged perpetrators were "persons in authority or positions of trust." While these words were absent from the Order-in-Council, they were added by the Court of Appeal in several paragraphs of the decision. At times, the Court of Appeal inserted the word "sexual" between "historical" and "abuse," leaving some question, as will be discussed shortly, as to whether the mandate was limited to sexual abuse.

Based upon this interpretation of the mandate, the Court of Appeal held that C-12's evidence did not fall within the subject matter assigned to the Commission by the Order-in-Council. It went on to explain that although the evidence of C-12 and C-13 fell outside the subject matter of the Inquiry, it could nevertheless be admissible if it were found to be reasonably relevant to the subject matter of the Inquiry. Rather than refer the issue of reasonable relevance back to the Inquiry, which is often done, the Court of Appeal thought it would be "helpful to address it, in an effort to avoid further delays."²² The Court found that this evidence was not reasonably relevant and explained as follows:²³

Assuming that the evidence of C12 and C13 stands alone and is not the prelude to an avalanche of other such evidence from like complainants and their family members, I fail to see how it could reasonably advance the inquiry that the Commission had been asked to perform. Without wishing to minimize the seriousness of C12's complaint or the gravity of her allegations against the investigating officer, her evidence, if true, essentially comes down to one person having been treated inappropriately by a police officer in a case where she allegedly was sexually assaulted by other teenagers. Her evidence does not speak to systemic problems that may or may not exist in the way police respond to allegations of sexual abuse of young people by persons in a position of trust or authority.

THE EFFECT OF THE COURT OF APPEAL DECISION

As I indicated earlier, the Commission was nearing the end of the evidence of victims and alleged victims when this matter arose. Following the Court of Appeal's decision, the CCPS, the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties

22. Ibid. at para. 67.

23. Ibid. at para. 68.

of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry, the family of Ken Seguin, and Father Charles MacDonald each submitted that the testimony of a number of witnesses already heard by the Commission fell outside of the Commission's mandate based upon their reading of the Court of Appeal's decision.²⁴ None of the other parties took the position that any of the evidence heard to date fell outside of the Commission's mandate, and some of those parties, including the Victims Group, the Citizens for Community Renewal, and the Coalition for Action vigorously opposed the submissions of the objecting parties.

The grounds for the parties' objections included one or more of the following:

1. The person alleged to have committed the abuse was not a person in a position of trust or authority.
2. The alleged victim did not fit within the term "young people" given his or her age.
3. There was no allegation of abuse or sexual abuse.
4. Historical abuse means historical sexual abuse only, and cannot include a consideration of physical and/or emotional abuse.

Based on these objections, I was asked to examine the evidence of seventeen witnesses who had already been heard by the Commission, and the facts concerning a police investigation that Commission counsel proposed to address within the hearings room, to determine if any of the evidence or proposed evidence would now fall outside of the Commission's mandate and if it did, whether it was, in any event, reasonably relevant.

I found that, with a couple of exceptions, the evidence already heard or proposed to be addressed fell within the framework given by the Court of Appeal.

It was unfortunate to be dealing with matters surrounding the Commission's mandate so frequently and so far into the hearing of evidence. All parties involved were required to spend considerable time and energy grappling with the question of what it was that the legislature intended this Commission to examine. Of course, this was a distraction from the fact-finding work of the Inquiry. In some respects, the mandate of a commission of inquiry must leave room for some interpretation because the required breadth of an investigation may not be known until the work begins. New information may arise during a commission's investigative work, which may require it to reassess its scope.

In my view, however, given that the wording of a Commission's mandate is so important in shaping its work, it is incumbent upon the drafters of the Order-in-

24. Appendix K31, Ruling in Relation to the Effect of the Court of Appeal Decision in Ontario Provincial Police v. Cornwall Public Inquiry, February 28, 2008.

Council to ensure that, as much as possible, the mandate is sufficiently defined. Clear, unambiguous language should be used, and given the need of inquiries to be responsive to evidence as it develops, Commissioners should continue to be given deference in their determination of whether evidence is reasonably relevant to their mandates.

Getting Started: Setting up the Inquiry

Location for Evidentiary Hearings and Office Space

At the outset, I believed that it was important that the hearings be held in Cornwall. I wanted the community most affected by the subject matter of the Inquiry to have easy access to our offices and the hearings room. We decided upon a designated historic building, referred to as the “Weave Shed,” which had once served as a cotton mill. The Weave Shed provided an excellent home for the Commission, having office space and a hearings room that required only slight modifications. The cost of rental was less than a third of that of inferior accommodations in Ottawa.

The disadvantage of deciding to situate the Commission offices in Cornwall was the travel and related expenses. While several lawyers for the parties were located in Cornwall, most travelled from Ottawa and Toronto. For those coming from Toronto, rail service would prove to be an adequate means of transportation.

For me, the importance of being in the community of Cornwall was paramount.

Hiring Members of the Inquiry Team

Commission Counsel

Because of the highly contentious nature of the subject matter of this Inquiry, great care was taken to ensure that Commission counsel were free of any conflicts. Many local lawyers were involved in the events that the Inquiry was to examine and some would be called as witnesses. As a result, an expanded search for counsel was required. It also meant that some counsel were hired from afar, which resulted in long absences from their loved ones and their homes.

With the assistance of my lead counsel, Peter Engelmann, we established a legal team that was up to the challenge at hand and that worked diligently to complete my mandate. As I explained in my statements to the public, Commission counsel play a special role in a public inquiry.²⁵ Unlike a Crown attorney in a criminal matter or a lawyer in civil litigation, the Commission’s role is to represent the public interest at the hearings.²⁶ Commission counsel do not represent any particular point of view, and their role is to present the best evidence available to assist in the completion of the mandate. With respect to impartiality, Mr. Justice O'Connor has stated the following:²⁷

25. Commissioner’s statement in Appendix P18, Update on the Progress of the Hearing Schedule and Phase 2 Research, September 5, 2008.

While it is essential that commission counsel maintain an impartial posture, it is nonetheless necessary that they get to the bottom of what happened and why, and that they not be deflected by witnesses or their counsel who have a particular interest in the outcome. The balance that must be struck between impartiality and firmness is delicate but absolutely necessary to the success of the inquiry.

I think it is fair to say that discharging the functions of Commission counsel properly will always displease some of the parties. This is an inevitable result of this delicate balancing act, particularly when the subject matter is a sensitive one. In this Inquiry, the balancing act was consistently performed well.

Justice O'Connor has outlined a number of roles of Commission counsel, with which I agree. These roles are as follows:

- providing advice to the commissioner throughout the commission process;
- conducting, or at least supervising, the investigation that leads to the evidentiary hearings;
- maintaining open and continuous communication with all the parties who may be affected by the process and with those who have an interest in the issues raised by the inquiry;
- calling the evidence in the hearing in a thorough and even-handed manner;
- helping the commissioner write the report; and
- acting as the spokesperson for the inquiry to the media.²⁸

In this Inquiry, not only did Commission counsel play a vital role in organizing and calling the evidence but they also attempted to ensure that, to every extent possible, witnesses were dealt with in a caring and professional manner in order to minimize any further trauma to them. I was very well served by Commission counsel. They persevered and performed the role with professionalism and dedication.

Staff

I quickly found that running a public inquiry effectively and efficiently requires a full complement of staff. In the Commission offices, investigators, researchers, clerical staff, and lawyers all worked together to keep the hearings running smoothly.

Over the course of the Inquiry, it was necessary to add staff to keep up with the amount of work that had to be done. Had I to do it over again, I would have hired more staff at the outset, as the volume of work was at times overwhelming. Some key roles are listed below.

CHIEF ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICER

The chief administrative officer (CAO) was one of the first people whom I retained to work with me. From the outset, Monique Seguin was indispensable, being responsible for hiring support staff, communicating with the Weave Shed's building manager with respect to required modifications to our office space and hearings room, supplying the offices and hearings room with furniture and office equipment, having the website set up, and attending to many more practical and necessary matters. The CAO was responsible for all manner of financial matters as well.

Part way through the Inquiry, Ms Seguin left us for new employment. While we missed her immensely, her responsibilities were ably taken over by Anna DeVuono and Lise Kosloski.

POLICY DIRECTOR

I had the good fortune to work closely with Colleen Parrish in her role as policy director. As policy director, Ms Parrish, was responsible for all aspects of Phase 2, the healing and reconciliation portion of the Commission's mandate. This entailed, among other things, establishing and overseeing the counselling and witness support programs; organizing community meetings, workshops, education, and training sessions; and organizing the research component of the Commission's work.

SENIOR LEGAL ANALYST

Getting down to the business of writing my report would involve reviewing and considering a substantial amount of witness testimony. To assist in this task, I retained Ronda Bessner to oversee the process of summarizing the testimony and analyzing the evidence. Ms Bessner had the assistance of several junior legal analysts, who worked very hard to keep the witness summaries rolling in. Ms Bessner also assisted me in the preparation of the Phase 1 report. Ms Bessner has worked on many other public inquiries, and her wealth of experience was clearly evident.

Public Access/Communications

WEBSITE AND WEBCAST

In keeping with the principle of having an open and accessible inquiry, we promptly engaged the services of a webmaster to set up and maintain a website. The goal of the website was to keep the public up to date on the workings of the Inquiry. The website included general information about the Inquiry, a section for the media, the Rules of Practice and Procedure, the Order-in-Council, my rulings and statements, a hearings schedule, a witness list, closing submissions, and so forth. A portion of the website was also dedicated to the work of Phase 2 of the Inquiry.

While the hearings were in session, the website was updated daily to indicate the witness or witnesses scheduled for the following day. As well, the daily hearing transcripts were uploaded to the website by the end of each day. This was provided for in the Rules of Practice and Procedure.²⁹ The transcripts of in camera sessions were not posted on the website and were available only to those who were authorized in writing by the Commission.³⁰

Following the model set by the Ipperwash Inquiry, the website also included a live webcast of the hearings. For those who were not able to attend in person, the webcast gave them the opportunity to see the hearings unfold live. Not only was the webcast beneficial to the public, but it also allowed Commission counsel and staff, as well as counsel for the parties, to follow the Inquiry when they could not be present in Cornwall in person or when their standing did not permit their attendance.

I wanted the Commission to hear from people in the community who had important information to share. To facilitate this, the website provided a means for the public to communicate with us. The “Contact us” page of the website included a feedback link, whereby questions, views, and comments could be forwarded to the Commission. The messages were routed to the appropriate staff, and answers were provided by staff or Commission counsel when appropriate.

INTERVIEWS WITH THE MEDIA

It is not customary for members of the judiciary to have contact with the media. In June 2005, shortly after I was appointed Commissioner of the Cornwall Public Inquiry, I did hold a media briefing to inform the public of the work I had undertaken to get the Inquiry underway. I wanted the community to know that work had started on the Inquiry for which they had been waiting so long. Apart from this briefing, my dialogue with the public was limited to the comments

29. Appendix B, Rule 27.

30. Ibid., Rule 30.

and statements I made throughout the course of the Inquiry. These statements were posted on the Commission website. Of course, my final comments are delivered by way of this Report.

Even though I did not give interviews, I directed lead Commission counsel Peter Engelmann and Pierre Dumais, also Commission counsel, to do so when requested. Often, the Inquiry hearings dealt with legal and technical matters, and it was my hope that Commission counsel could assist the media in reporting on all matters, technical or otherwise, in an accurate fashion and in plain language. At times, Commission counsel gave several interviews, and I appreciate the time they took to perform this function. This was an extra burden on top of their responsibilities in relation to the ongoing hearings.

MEDIA RELATIONS

To facilitate media contact, I took steps to hire a communications officer, Joan Weinmann. She was not a spokesperson for the Inquiry but was given the responsibility to interact with media outlets and perform related communications tasks, including handling media advisories and press releases. Media advisories and press releases were issued regularly to give information on the hearings schedule and witness list, to announce upcoming rulings, to provide details about Phase 2 matters, and so forth.

As I have said earlier, inquiries must be open and public in every sense. Media reports are one way in which the happenings of an inquiry are broadcast in the public forum, and it is therefore important for the media to be kept informed and to have the ability to ask questions. Early in the Inquiry process, a number of the parties expressed to the Commission their view that the pre-Inquiry media coverage of what was alleged to have occurred in Cornwall might have contributed to rumour and misinformation in the community. While I certainly had no control over what the media would report, I instructed Commission counsel to be available to the media and to communicate with them in an open and timely fashion.

The Commission's website contained a media page.³¹ This contained general information for media representatives, links to the media advisories and press releases, and a copy of the media protocol for dealing with confidentiality issues.³² The media protocol addressed the procedures to be followed when confidentiality issues arose.

I will discuss this in more detail later but note here that given the subject matter of this Inquiry, many sensitive issues were addressed. While openness in Inquiry hearings is preferred, this must be balanced with any harm that may be done through the public dissemination of information. The Inquiry's Rules of Practice and Procedure contained a section dealing with confidentiality,³³ and during the Inquiry, I issued some directives relating to requests for confidentiality of victims' or alleged victims' identities.³⁴ Measures such as in camera hearings, the use of non-identifying initials, and the non-publication of a name could be, and were, used to address confidentiality concerns. On occasion, the media participated in motions concerning requests for publication bans.

31. Appendix F1, Information for Media Representatives.

32. Appendix F2, Media Protocol for Confidentiality Issues. Also see Appendix F3, Undertaking of Media to the Cornwall Public Inquiry.

During the course of in camera hearings, the audio and video stream was turned off and not broadcast to the public at large. To be present during in camera hearings, media representatives were required to sign an undertaking.³⁵

The Inquiry hearings were regularly covered by a number of local newspaper, radio, and television outlets. There was also some national coverage. A local cable station used the webcast feed to enable it to air the Inquiry hearings while in session. There was also some coverage of the Inquiry in the nature of online "citizen journalism."³⁶

A media room was constructed inside the hearings room to facilitate the work of attending media. The room could accommodate six to eight media representatives. It was equipped with a monitor and audio feed from the hearings room, two analogue telephone lines, and one copy of the daily transcripts.

SECURITY

A large portion of the work of an inquiry is investigation, and this investigative function often involves the collection of sensitive, personal, and confidential information. Several measures were implemented to preserve the confidentiality of the Commission's investigative work.

To maintain the confidentiality of information and documents, counsel for the parties were required to sign confidentiality undertakings with respect to documents and information disclosed to them in connection with the Inquiry's proceedings.³⁷ All additional lawyers and clerks of a firm that was assisting party counsel were also required to sign undertakings. Counsel could share documents

35. Appendix F4, Undertaking of the Media to the Cornwall Public Inquiry to Record an In Camera Hearing.

36. "Citizen journalism" was a term used by context-setting expert Mary Lynn Young. This is in contrast to mainstream media and generally refers to individual citizens reporting on their own about events. Ms Young was qualified at the Inquiry as an expert in media analysis with a special focus on the justice system.

and information with their clients on a need-to-know basis and only upon the client also signing an undertaking.³⁸ A breach of the terms of the undertaking could result in the imposition of sanctions, including loss or limitation of standing and/or funding. Similar undertakings were also required for counsel to a witness and witnesses.³⁹ As mentioned, members of the media were also required to sign undertakings.

Standing and Funding

Standing

I stated early on that I wanted to include as many people as possible in this Inquiry.⁴⁰ This was to ensure that I received all relevant information and perspectives. Having said this, those applying for standing had to meet the threshold set out in the Rules of Practice and Procedure.⁴¹

Individuals and groups were invited to apply for standing at the Inquiry by way of a Notice of Hearing.⁴² This Notice included a listing of the information to be included in the application and explained that applications for standing and funding in relation to both Phase 1 and Phase 2 of the Inquiry were to be submitted to the Commission by not later than 5:00 p.m. on October 25, 2005. Those individuals and groups that wished were then given the opportunity to provide oral submissions in support of their applications.⁴³ I heard these submissions on November 7, 2005.

As I alluded to above, the Rules of Practice and Procedure set out the criteria for standing in Phases 1 and 2. For Phase 1, I granted standing to persons or groups if I was satisfied that they were directly and substantially affected by Phase 1 of the Inquiry—in which event they might participate in accordance with section 5(1) of the Public Inquiries Act—or if they represented distinct, ascertainable interests and perspectives that were essential to my mandate in Phase 1 which I considered ought to be separately represented before the Inquiry, in which event the party might participate in a manner to be determined by me.⁴⁴

44. Appendix B, Rule 8. Also see Public Inquiries Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.41, s. 5.

For Phase 2 of the Inquiry, I granted standing to groups or persons if I was satisfied that they were sufficiently affected by Phase 2 of the Inquiry or that they represented distinct, ascertainable interests and perspectives that were essential to my mandate in Phase 2, and which I considered ought to be separately represented before the Inquiry.⁴⁵

I initially granted standing for Phase 1 on the basis of two categories: full standing and special standing. Each category of standing had accompanying rights, with those granted special standing having more limited rights. I later found that a third category, limited standing, was also required to permit counsel for witnesses to address discrete issues. For Phase 2, there were no separate categories. A party either had standing or it did not.

On November 17, 2005, I rendered my first decision on standing and funding, in which I granted some form of standing to thirteen of the fourteen parties that applied.⁴⁶ There was one grant of special standing, and one party was granted standing only for Phase 2. All other applicants were granted full standing.

One of the parties that applied for standing on the initial call for applications was the Coalition for Action on Child Sexual Abuse in Cornwall. I did not initially grant it standing, but I indicated that should it provide me with certain information that was lacking from its application I would reconsider. I directed Commission counsel to reconfirm that I would appreciate receiving its further written submissions by December 1, 2005, and that the group would be welcome to make oral further submissions on December 6, 2005. Counsel for the Coalition for Action wrote to Commission counsel indicating that the group would not be making further submissions. No one representing the group appeared before me on December 6, 2005. I took this to mean that the Coalition for Action had decided not to seek standing. This was unfortunate as it appeared that the group had shown a genuine interest in the matter. I indicated that I would leave the door open should the group decide to provide me with the further information I had requested.

We went about the work of the Inquiry, and in late August 2007, new counsel for Mr. Carson Chisholm and the Coalition for Action submitted a subsequent application for standing and funding. After hearing oral submissions on September 10, 2007, I granted the Coalition full standing for Phases I and 2 of the Inquiry, limited to those issues that directly affected its interests.⁴⁷ I did not grant Mr. Chisholm standing on an individual basis because his actions with respect to 45. Appendix B, Rule 54.

46. Appendix K1.

47. Appendix K27, Ruling on the Application for Standing and Funding of Carson Chisholm and the Coalition for Action, September 12, 2007.

particular investigations would be elicited through his testimony as a witness before the Inquiry.

Over the course of the Inquiry, I received seven more new applications for standing. Two applications were by school boards, both of which were granted standing.⁴⁸ One was by an individual who wished to challenge one of my decisions.⁴⁹ The remainder were applications by individuals who would be appearing before the Inquiry as witnesses. Three of these individuals were granted limited standing with respect to discrete issues.⁵⁰

In addition to this, one party, the Estate of Ken Seguin and Doug Seguin, requested that I reconsider its original application to extend standing to Phase 1. Mr. Ken Seguin was an employee of the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services. In this case, limited standing was granted to cross-examine certain specific witnesses and only to the extent that the position of the employer Ministry was adverse to the memory of Mr. Ken Seguin.

In the end, there were fourteen parties with full standing, limited to their interests.⁵¹ One party had special standing, and four witnesses were granted limited party standing with respect to discrete areas. Participating as parties in the Inquiry were public institutions, community groups, and persons who had been investigated and charged in respect of child sexual abuse. Those with limited standing were employees of public institutions and a lawyer who provided independent legal advice to an alleged victim of child sexual abuse. While at times it seemed as though the Inquiry proceedings were slowed by the number of parties, I believe that in the end the participation and input from each were very helpful to me.

Funding

I was empowered by the Rules to make recommendations to the Attorney General regarding funding.⁵² Such funding was limited by the extent of the party's interest and whether, in my view, the party would not otherwise be able to participate.⁵³ I asked that applications for funding include the following information:

48. Appendix K8, Ruling on the Application for Standing of the Upper Canada District School Board, June 30, 2006; Appendix K13, Ruling on the Application for Standing of the Catholic District School Board of Eastern Ontario, October 24, 2006.

- a. A statement of how the applicant satisfies the criteria for funding set out in the Rules of Practice and Procedure. In demonstrating why an applicant would not otherwise be able to participate without such funding, the application may include financial information and, for organizations, financial statements, operating budgets, the number of members and membership fee structure.

Applicants should also indicate whether they have contacted other groups or individuals to bring them into an amalgamated group, and the results of those contacts;

- b. A description of the purposes for which the funds are required, how the funds will be disbursed and how they will be accounted for;
- c. A statement of the extent to which the applicant will contribute its own funds and personnel to participate in the Inquiry; and
- d. The name, address, telephone number and position of the individual who will be responsible for administering the funds, and a description of the financial controls put in place to ensure that the funds are disbursed for the purpose of the Inquiry.⁵⁴

Any funding recommendations I made had to be in accordance with the Management Board of Cabinet Directives and Guidelines.⁵⁵ Given that most counsel were required to travel to Cornwall to attend the hearings, I recommended funding for reasonable claims in relation to travel expenses and disbursements.

In making my determinations on funding, I was guided by the overarching principle that the Commission must ensure that proper representation is provided for all parties whose participation in all or part of the Inquiry was required. If a necessary party were prevented from presenting its full story due to lack of financial resources, a disservice would be done to achieving the mandate of this Inquiry. As a result, I decided that if I had any doubts as to the need for funding, I would recommend rather than deny it and potentially exclude a party whose attendance and representation would be required.⁵⁶

At the first call for applications for standing and funding in late 2005, I received an initial eight requests for funding recommendations. In the main, these requests were related to funding for counsel and clerks. I did, however, receive two additional and somewhat unusual applications for funding. The Men's Project, an incorporated charitable, non-profit organization that provides a variety of victim services and other counselling programs for men and their families requested

54. Appendix C1.

55. Appendix A1, s. 10.

56. Appendix K1.

funding to hire a part-time interim manager of the Project. This interim manager, it was submitted, would assume some of the duties of the executive director, who would be required to devote time to the organization's participation in the Inquiry. I denied this request.⁵⁷ I was also asked by a number of parties to recommend funding for and/or provide some form of counselling for persons involved with the Inquiry. I was immediately supportive of this request but determined that it was an initiative more appropriately funded through the work of Phase 2 of the Inquiry. The Commission established a counselling support program by which counselling services were made available to all persons affected by the Inquiry.⁵⁸

Throughout the course of the Inquiry, I received and ruled upon a number of requests from parties to recommend supplementary funding. In the main, these requests were related to additional counsel, clerk, or paralegal time. I did, however, receive one request from a party to recommend funding for a policing expert to assist them in dealing with policing issues in a more informed manner.⁵⁹ I also received applications for counsel funding in relation to several witnesses.⁶⁰

While historically, the Ontario government has not provided funding for applications for judicial review, I was asked to recommend funding for a party to judicially review one of my decisions.⁶¹ Father Charles MacDonald, a party before the Inquiry, wished to review the decision in which I had held that victims and alleged victims could testify before the Inquiry.⁶² While I was not convinced that I had the authority to make funding recommendations in regard to judicial review applications, I found that nothing precluded me from making appropriate suggestions with respect to the conduct of the Inquiry and related issues.⁶³ Fairness dictated that parties should be on the same footing with respect to bringing issues related to the work of the Commission before the courts, regardless of their financial means. I therefore suggested funding for two counsel for Father MacDonald to bring a judicial review application, as well as for a number of parties who had indicated that they might seek to intervene in the matter before the Divisional Court. The Attorney General accepted my suggestion, noting that this was an extraordinary circumstance warranting an extraordinary response.

While I stated that this was an exceptional ruling and one that should not be viewed as a precedent, I am of the view that the Attorney General may wish to consider developing a process to assess funding applications with respect to judicial reviews made by funded parties in an Inquiry. There were a number of other reviews before the courts and in those cases only public institutions participated. Parties receiving funding, such as the Citizens for Community Renewal, the Victims Group, and the Coalition for Action did not appear despite actively participating in arguments before me. The Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall was the only “publicly funded” party appearing before the courts. This led to situations such as the OPP challenge to the proposed evidence of C-12 and C-13, in which public institutions arguing for a restrictive mandate were the only parties making submissions to the courts. While the Commission retained and instructed external counsel for all Divisional Court and Court of Appeal cases, the role of a decision maker in making submissions to the courts on its own decision is rightly circumscribed. Given the profound importance of court decisions on public inquiries, particularly when mandate issues are in play, a mechanism should exist whereby publicly funded parties can apply for special funding to ensure that a balance of views are represented before the courts.

As has been the process in previous inquiries, an independent officer was selected to assess the accounts of participants who were granted funding.

Rules of Practice and Procedure

The Process of Arriving at the Rules

A public inquiry, though not as formal as a court procedure, nonetheless requires its own rules to ensure that the process runs smoothly, is thorough, and is efficient and fair. I had the benefit of reviewing the rules of other inquiries and I adapted those rules to suit the particular circumstances of our Inquiry.

As in numerous other commissions, we first prepared draft rules, which were posted on the Commission’s website. Once I made my decision on who would have standing, the parties were invited to comment on the rules. After a careful review of their comments, a number of changes were made, and the rules were finalized. On January 16, 2006, we sent out a notice to the parties that set out the amendments to the rules, and posted the “finalized” Rules of Practice and Procedure on the website.⁶⁴

64. Appendix C3, Notice to Parties: Amendment to Rules of Practice and Procedure, January 16, 2006.

Challenge to Rule 31

While I say “finalized” Rules, this was not the end of the matter. Two of the parties, the Cornwall Police Services Board and the Cornwall Community Police Service (CCPS) and the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, still had concerns with Rule 31, which dealt with the production of documents to the Commission. I heard submissions on the matter on June 15, 2006.

Rule 31, as drafted, required the production of all relevant documents. In a situation in which a party objected to the production of any document on the grounds of privilege, the Rule outlined a screening process whereby Commission counsel would review the document(s) and determine the validity of the privilege claim. If the party that produced the document(s) disagreed with Commission counsel’s assessment as to privilege, the Rule provided that, on application, I might inspect the impugned document(s) and make a ruling, or refer the matter to a judge assigned by the Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Justice.

Our Rule 31 came out of a process initiated at the Walkerton Inquiry. The process, as I understand it, was an informal agreement between counsel wherein the parties would meet and permit Commission counsel to review the documents. If Commission counsel concluded that solicitor–client privilege applied, they would immediately return the document, and that would end the matter. The Ipperwash Inquiry codified this procedure in its Rules, and we adopted it for our process. The Toronto Computer Leasing Inquiry also had a similar provision to our Rule 31.⁶⁵

In short, the concern of the CCPS was that Rule 31 sought to compel the production of documents that were properly subject to solicitor–client privilege. The CCPS was supported in its motion by another party, the Episcopal Corporation of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall. Commission counsel objected to the motion.

After careful consideration, I dismissed the motion of the CCPS.⁶⁶ The CCPS sought a review of my decision by the Divisional Court. On the date the matter

65. The Divisional Court upheld the screening process instituted by Commissioner Bellamy in the Toronto Computer Leasing Inquiry whereby Commission counsel, in the presence of the party’s counsel, could review the contents of boxes over which there were claims of solicitor–client. In the event of a dispute about relevance or helpfulness, the matter would be brought before the Commissioner. In the event of a dispute about solicitor–client privilege, the matter would be brought before a Regional Senior Justice for Toronto or his designate. The Divisional Court found that it was unlikely that the material in the boxes would be the subject of solicitor–client privilege, and in any event, the screening mechanism ensured that any solicitor–client privilege would be minimally impaired. See Lyons v. Toronto Computer Leasing Inquiry – Bellamy Commission (2004), 70 O.R. (3d) 39, 12 Admin. L.R. (4th) 157 (Div. Ct.).

66. Appendix K6, Ruling on the Motion Regarding Rule 31 of the Rules of Practice and Procedure, June 27, 2006.

was to be heard by the Court, discussions were held between the Court and the parties, which led to a decision to adopt a process to deal with claims of solicitor–client privilege. I agreed to this process rather than possibly bind future inquiries with a ruling on how privilege claims should be adjudicated.

In short, the new process required the party objecting to the production of any document on the basis of solicitor–client privilege to deliver a list setting out the pertinent details of the documents over which privilege was claimed. Commission counsel would review the list and make a determination. If Commission counsel did not accept the claim for privilege, additional material could be filed by the party to support its claim. If the dispute remained unresolved, the matter could be submitted to a Judge of the Superior Court of Justice.⁶⁷ It was never necessary to resort to a review by a Judge of the Superior Court.

On September 29, 2006, a further Notice to Parties was sent out regarding the amendment to Rule 31.⁶⁸ The now finalized Rules were posted on the website.

Preparing for the Evidentiary Hearings

Investigation

While there is always a pressure to begin hearings as quickly as possible, this must be balanced with the need to prepare. The Commission’s investigative work was well underway months before the hearings began and continued until the very end. This is because without thorough, focused investigation, an inquiry’s work runs the risk of going astray and missing key information.

We started the investigative phase of the Inquiry with two investigators on staff, but we quickly learned that more help was needed. Over the course of the Inquiry, we hired several more investigators as required.

The investigators were not alone in their work. They worked closely with Commission counsel in preparation for the hearings. Junior lawyers and researchers were also involved in the investigative process.

Disclosure and Management of Documents

For the work of an inquiry to be performed thoroughly, all relevant information must be gathered. Of that information, much is in the form of documents. Given the time span covered by this Inquiry, the number of parties, the institutional nature of some of those parties, the fact that there had been both police investigations and criminal prosecutions of some of the matters examined by the Inquiry,

67. Appendix B, Rule 31A.

68. Appendix C5, Notice to Parties: Amendment to Rules of Procedure and Practice, September 29, 2006.

and the fact that some of the parties were also engaged in civil litigation, the process surrounding documentary disclosure was no small task.

Obligation of the Parties to Produce

Certain rights and responsibilities flowed from becoming a party to the Inquiry. One of those responsibilities was to provide the Commission with all relevant documents in accordance with the Rules of Practice and Procedure.⁶⁹

After standing was granted, Commission counsel prepared summonses for documents, which were served upon the parties. To the extent possible, Commission counsel attempted to provide direction to the parties in terms of the areas to be covered in their documentary disclosure. From time to time, additional specific document requests were made of parties when investigation or witness testimony suggested further areas for examination.

When necessary, a number of summons for documents were sent to non-parties. For example, there were questions surrounding the cause of death of a number of individuals. A summons was sent to the Coroner for the Province of Ontario to see if any documents were available that might shed some light on these matters.

Document Management Staff and SUPERText

Early on, we decided upon the use of a software program called SUPERText for the electronic organization and searching of documents. Documents produced by the parties were scanned, sometimes by Inquiry staff, and if the volume was great, by the company supporting the software, and then uploaded to the program.

As the disclosure began to roll in, we soon discovered that to handle the volume of documents effectively and efficiently, we would need a dedicated staff member and software. We hired a document management administrator, who was responsible for dealing with all aspects of documentary disclosure.

Throughout the Inquiry, her role evolved and expanded. By the end, she had a dedicated team to assist with the management of incoming documents, documents that needed to be disclosed to the parties, preparation of materials for the hearings room, and documentary research.

On receiving relevant documents, the Commission had the concomitant obligation to provide them to the parties. Documents were disclosed to the parties electronically, either on a hard drive or on a compact disk. Certain documents were also provided to the parties by e-mail.

69. Appendix B, Rule 31.

Certificates of Production

Upon the completion of a party's documentary production, it was required to complete a certificate of production certifying that all relevant documents had been produced to the Commission.⁷⁰ Documents in the possession of the party but not produced, primarily on the basis of solicitor–client privilege, were to be listed along with the reasons for non-production. The Rule 31A process outlined in the Rules, discussed above, was used to resolve any disputes arising from privilege issues.

Issues and Process Surrounding Disclosure

Dealing with issues surrounding the production and disclosure of documents was no small task for the Commission. These issues were both time consuming and challenging.

VOLUME OF DOCUMENTS

The first issue was simply managing the volume of documents. This volume can be explained by, among other things, the number of parties, the historical nature of the matter, the police and other institutional investigations, and the existence of both civil and criminal proceedings. By the end of the Inquiry, the Commission had disclosed to the parties 71,956 documents, which amounted to a total of 374,558 pages.

Documents were provided by the parties in both paper and electronic form. All of these documents had to be reviewed and categorized. Those that arrived on paper had to be scanned and uploaded to SUPertext. Without a full-time document management administrator, it would have been impossible to manage the documents in an effective manner.

As I said earlier, there is always pressure to begin hearings as quickly as possible, but this must be balanced against the need to prepare. As Commissioner, I felt a great pressure to begin the hearings promptly. I knew that the community had already been waiting a long time for this Inquiry. I also knew, however, that if Commission counsel and staff weren't given enough time to sufficiently prepare in advance, we would run the risk of veering off course and missing critical information.

On February 13, 2006, the Commission began hearing context-setting experts. This expert evidence was then followed by evidence from the institutional parties on their corporate policies. This corporate policy evidence began on April 3, 2006.

70. Appendix H, Sample Certificate of Production.

On October 4, 2006, the first witness in the evidentiary portion of the hearings was called. This was under a year after my first decision on standing and funding. The considerable number of documents produced to the Commission on an on-going basis made getting ready quickly an onerous task, but one that was managed admirably Commission counsel and staff. They could not have worked any harder. Beginning any sooner was not an option. I suggest to Commissioners heading up future document-laden inquiries to “front load” in terms of staffing. Having enough staff at the critical start-up stage will facilitate a more efficient hearing as it will allow Commission and party counsel more time to analyze the voluminous documentary evidence and to have a better sense of the full nature of all the issues they will have to deal with.

ONGOING PRODUCTION AND DISCLOSURE

As I mentioned above, the summons process required the production of documents to be ongoing. This meant that throughout the course of the Inquiry, new documents were produced by the parties and then disclosed to the parties. One party produced a number of documents as late as January 2009. These documents were clearly relevant and had to be provided to the parties.

Receipt of documents at such a late stage can result in issues of process and fairness in the hearings room. For example, some debate surfaced over which documents could and could not be entered as exhibits, and certain documents may have been more properly put to a previous witness who had not had an opportunity to address them. While the rules of evidence are somewhat more relaxed in a public inquiry and we did our best to manage the situation, late production and disclosure is not ideal. Commission counsel did make efforts to facilitate timely production, but even more vigilance on this front may have helped to avoid late disclosure.

HANDWRITTEN NOTES

The nature of the documents also presented some challenges and issues. Handwritten police officer notebooks, as well as other handwritten materials, were difficult to search and compile. This occasionally lengthened the research time needed to do a thorough job. Commission staff did spend time coding certain aspects of these handwritten materials, which made them somewhat easier to search.

CONFIDENTIALITY AND PRIVACY CONCERNS AT THE DISCLOSURE STAGE

Confidentiality and privacy issues arose many times over the course of the Inquiry. The disclosure of documents to the parties did not mean that those documents would be tendered as evidence before the Commission or otherwise be made public. Notwithstanding that confidentiality undertakings had to be signed before documents could be viewed, a number of parties argued that disclosure should not take place without significant editing.

In considering these arguments, I had to balance concerns relating to the disclosure of sensitive information with fairness requirements toward those affected by the Inquiry. I ruled that the following information should be redacted from the officer notes of the CPS and the OPP:⁷¹

- The name of confidential police informants and any information allowing the identification of police informants;
- Any information concerning police investigations unrelated to the Commission's mandate, and
- Information concerning covert police investigative techniques, police procedures, and any information that could jeopardize police officers' safety.

I also advised the OPP and the CCPS to provide the Inquiry with the names and details of complainants who the police indicated wished to remain anonymous. These matters would be reviewed by Commission counsel and possibly subject to further disclosure or ruled upon by me as to whether confidentiality measures were warranted.

Unfortunately, process of redaction was a time consuming. With one party, disclosure of their documents was delayed so that the process of redaction could be completed.

YOUTH CRIMINAL JUSTICE RECORDS

When it was time for the Commission to disclose the relevant documents it had received from the parties, there was some concern that disclosure of some documents was prohibited because they would tend to identify persons as young persons dealt with under the Youth Criminal Justice Act or its predecessor legislation.

With the assistance of counsel for the Ministry of the Attorney General, a motion was brought before the Youth Justice Court of Ontario and an order was issued that allowed counsel to parties and parties with standing to have access to this information, subject to undertakings not to make the records public.⁷² As was already discussed, the signing of an undertaking was a precondition to receiving disclosure from the Commission.

71. Appendix K11, Ruling on Redaction, August 30, 2006, p. 11.

72. Appendix O1, Attorney General and The Cornwall Public Inquiry v. John Does (July 25, 2006), Toronto (Ont. C.J.).

CLAIMS

As discussed earlier, Rule 31 provided a process for dealing with privileged documents. A number of parties were engaged in criminal and civil litigation related to the subject matter of this Inquiry. As a result, some parties had documents over which they claimed either solicitor–client or litigation privilege.

Unfortunately, the Rule 31A process for dealing with privilege claims was somewhat slow and arduous. The process was more akin to a formal civil litigation process and, in my view, not ideal for a public inquiry, which is intended to resolve matters expeditiously. A less formalized process, much like that used in the Ipperwash, Walkerton and Toronto Computer Leasing inquiries, is preferable.

CONSENTS

To acquire certain documents, Commission counsel had to obtain the consent of the individual to whom the records pertained. For example, consents were needed to obtain student records from school boards.

Determining the Stages of the Inquiry

As already discussed, the mandate of this Inquiry was broad and spanned a large time frame. I conferred with Justices O'Connor and Linden, Commissioners of the Walkerton and Ipperwash inquiries, respectively, for insights on how to approach the mandate of this Inquiry. I also examined their Reports. Their support and knowledge was very valuable to me.

After speaking with them, I believed that we had to organize our work in a logical way that would allow us to remain focused and to be thorough and efficient. Accordingly, early in the process, I set out a blueprint for the Inquiry. Part of this blueprint involved breaking the hearings into a number of stages. These stages were not cast in stone because I knew that as the investigations and hearings evolved, our path may well need to change to account for things that we learned along the way.

Context-Setting Evidence

When I spoke to Justices O'Connor and Linden, they reminded me that one of the purposes of a public inquiry is to educate. I thought that in order for us to better understand and properly assess the situation in Cornwall, it was essential that we hear from experts who would establish a context for full comprehension of the events that led to this Inquiry.

We called experts in every field for which I thought they would be of assistance. In the end, we called experts in the following fields:

- child sexual abuse and the impact of child sexual abuse on victims
- the evolution of legislation, law, and legal processes involving children and, in particular, child sexual abuse
- the reporting of abuse against children
- the child welfare response to allegations of child sexual abuse
- child sexual abuse and the institutional and community response to it
- social work, with a particular emphasis on community needs assessments
- the investigation of sexual offences and historical sexual offences and the training of police officers in this area
- the Ontario Police College
- the prosecution of child sexual abuse
- canon law, with a particular interest and involvement in the Church's response to clergy sexual abuse
- canon law and the historical background of clergy sexual abuse, with a particular interest in the spiritual and pastoral dimensions.

I believe that this evidence was well received and set the tone for the hearings.

Apart from these context-setting experts, Commission counsel also called an expert in media analysis with a special focus on the justice system.

Corporate Overviews

It was then important to learn historical and background information about the institutions whose responses were the subject matter of the Inquiry. This was what we called the corporate overview evidence. The focus of these corporate overviews was to review the relevant policies and procedures that were in place over time and how they evolved. The nature of the information covered varied from institution to institution, but in general terms, the corporate overviews covered areas such as the evolution of the corporate structure; policies in relation to hiring, training, and responding to allegations of child sexual abuse; interagency protocols; and so forth.

In essence, this evidence would assist me to better understand how the particular institutions functioned as well as serve as a benchmark by which we could measure the institutional responses.

Victim and Alleged Victim Evidence

One of the most delicate decisions I made was to call persons who had made allegations of child sexual abuse. While I understood the sacrifice that I was asking of them, I thought that the public needed to hear about their experiences with the public institutions I was mandated to examine. Hearing their evidence was important for several reasons. The primary reason was to examine the response of the justice system and other public institutions. These witnesses would be asked to provide evidence about when they reported, to whom they reported, and about whom they reported, and to provide some brief details about the nature of the complaint and the resulting action or response of the public institutions and their employees and/or officials. I also thought it was important to put a face to their complaints and concerns and to give them the opportunity to be heard.

As already discussed, the Divisional Court agreed that the evidence of the alleged victims was essential to properly assess the response of the justice system and other public institutions to the allegations they had made.⁷³

During this stage of the evidence, I also thought it was appropriate to hear from a number of family members of persons who had made allegations of child sexual abuse.

Community Context Evidence

Following the evidence of victims and alleged victims, we turned to community context evidence. In Cornwall, there were individuals who, although most of whom were not themselves victims of child sexual abuse, nonetheless took an interest in the allegations of abuse that were surfacing. In some instances, they made public their view that there had been a disregard for, mishandling, or suppression of information about child sexual abuse in their community. They raised the profile of the allegations, both in the community and throughout the province. The views of these people were part of the backdrop to this Inquiry.

In this stage of the evidence, I wanted to hear from these key individuals, including Perry Dunlop, Helen Dunlop, Carson Chisholm, and others. As will be discussed later, unfortunately, we did not have the benefit of Mr. Dunlop's testimony.

In this section, I also wanted to hear evidence from an expert who would address issues surrounding the role and impact of the media in shaping community perceptions and responses and as a factor in the community environment.

Evidence of Persons Investigated or Charged

I thought it would be useful to have some testimony from persons who had been investigated or charged with respect to child sexual abuse or from their family members. These witnesses would not be asked about the facts underlying the allegations, investigations, or charges. Instead, they would be able to comment on the conduct of the institutions that dealt with them.

73. Appendix L1.

Institutional Response Evidence

After all of this, we needed to hear from employees or officials of institutions with respect to their responses to allegations of abuse against young people. In some cases, that testimony would be from institutional witnesses regarding the employment of an offender or alleged offender within an institution and how the institution and its officials responded both internally and in connection with other institutions. In other cases, it would be testimony regarding the handling of allegations generally, and the specific responses of the institutions.

Identifying and Preparing Witnesses

Context Setting and other Experts

The matters that I was to investigate and report on in Cornwall drew upon many areas, which I have listed above. Commission counsel undertook the task of locating and interviewing experts in these key areas. These witnesses were not selected to provide Cornwall-specific evidence. In fact, care was taken to ensure that they had no previous involvement in matters relating to the situation in Cornwall that this Inquiry was called to examine.

For most context-setting experts, a book of documents relevant to the given expert was prepared that generally contained a curriculum vitae, a biography, an outline of evidence, selected bibliography, and copies of the documents that would be referred to over the course of the witness's testimony. There was some variation on this depending on the specific needs of the witness. The book of documents was filed as an exhibit and was also posted on the Commission's website.

Apart from context-setting experts, the Commission also called an additional expert. One of the parties encouraged the use of a media expert and I was of the view that such an expert would be of assistance to me.

Corporate Overviews

Corporate overview evidence was prepared for all institutional parties. Because this evidence was mainly a historical overview of an institution and its structure and policies over time, Commission counsel worked alongside counsel for the parties in identifying appropriate witnesses and preparing the materials to be filed. It was Commission counsel, however, who had the ultimate responsibility of ensuring that the evidence was thorough and covered relevant points. For the most part, this cooperative effort worked quite well, as the parties also had an interest in ensuring that "their" presentation was as complete as possible. Commission counsel led this evidence.

This said, there were some challenges in putting together comprehensive presentations. Because of the large time frame covered by the mandate, a number of parties were able to provide only limited information by way of historical policies and procedures. In some cases, the Commission was told that the documents no longer existed, could not be located, or were no longer in the institution's control because of an amalgamation or restructuring. In addition, finding appropriate witnesses also posed some hurdles as the person(s) who may have had the best corporate memory were either deceased or suffering from failing memory due to advanced age.

Books of documents were also prepared for witnesses in relation to the corporate overviews. These books would generally contain a biography of the witness(es), an outline of evidence, and copies of available and relevant documents.

Witness Identification and Preparation for Remaining Witnesses

Preparing the remaining witnesses was, in many ways, more difficult. These witnesses were victims and alleged victims of child sexual abuse and their family members, the employees or officials of institutions responding to these allegations, and community members who had some degree of involvement in the matters alleged to have happened in Cornwall. It takes courage to come forward and speak in a public venue about painful past events. Testifying is not easy, and I offer my sincerest thanks to those who came forward to help us understand what happened in Cornwall.

As the Commission conducted its investigative work, possible witnesses were identified. Advertisements were also run on the radio and in newspapers inviting anyone who believed they might have information relevant to the Inquiry to contact the lead Commission investigator.

It is important to note that witnesses could avail themselves of the witness support program, which was an initiative of Phase 2 of the Inquiry. This program provided assistance to those who were called as witnesses at Inquiry by providing them with orientation to the physical setting of the Inquiry room; explaining what to expect from the hearings process; arranging or providing escort to and from the Inquiry on testimony day; escorting individuals to a private witness room during breaks in testimony; ensuring provision of refreshments during lunch breaks; touching base to ascertain well-being after testimony; informing witnesses about delays in bringing them forward to testify; and liaison with counselling support if witnesses were interested in obtaining counselling. Witnesses were first informed of this program upon meeting with Commission counsel. Details of the program were also included with the summons, if one was served, and posted on the Commission's website.

VICTIMS, ALLEGED VICTIMS, AND THEIR FAMILY MEMBERS

Some of the most time-consuming work for Commission counsel and investigators was meeting with victims and alleged victims of child sexual abuse.

Victims and alleged victims whose names arose during the Commission's investigative work were contacted by Commission investigators for preliminary interviews. A number of people also contacted the Commission directly, expressing the desire to speak about their dealings with a public institution in relation to allegations of child sexual abuse.

Given the mandate, it was determined that Commission counsel could lead evidence only of persons who had reported their allegations to public institutions. If they had not reported, there would be no institutional response to measure. I should note, however, that we did hear context-setting evidence about the reasons why people might find it difficult to come forward with allegations. While those who had not reported could not give evidence in Phase 1, they were invited to provide informal testimony in Phase 2.

Once it was determined that a witness had complained to a public institution and was prepared to testify, preparatory meetings began. It took time to conduct these meetings. Commission counsel wanted the witnesses to feel as comfortable and prepared as possible. Often, numerous meetings and frequent breaks were required. I am hopeful that the Phase 2 witness and counselling programs were of assistance to those who took advantage of them.

Following the model of the Ipperwash Inquiry, for each witness, a summary of anticipated evidence (AE) was prepared by Commission counsel. This document was provided to counsel for the parties in advance of the witness's testimony and was intended to give notice of the areas to be covered in the examination-in-chief. Unlike a will-state, the AE was not filed as an exhibit and a witness could not be cross-examined on its contents.

No matter what protection the Commission could offer in terms of confidentiality, a number of victims and alleged victims did not wish to testify, and in some cases, did not wish even to meet with Commission staff. In some cases, they had moved on with their lives, had medical conditions, or did not want their families or employers to know about or be affected by their allegations of abuse. As will be discussed below, in several cases in which a victim or alleged victim was unavailable to testify, Commission counsel determined that it was still appropriate to "tell their story" through a documentary overview.

Many victims and alleged victims who testified were represented by the Victims Group, a party with full standing at the Inquiry. In most cases, the presence of counsel was of assistance in facilitating the process of witness preparation, as witnesses' own counsel often had the opportunity to meet with their clients and review documents in advance of meeting with Commission counsel.

Several witnesses, not members of the Victims Group, had their own counsel. A number of others were unrepresented. Commission counsel often needed to spend more time with these witnesses preparing them for their testimony.

COMMUNITY CONTEXT

As with victims and alleged victims, a list of community context witnesses was compiled as a part of the Commission's investigative work. Investigators and Commission counsel met with these witnesses, AEs were prepared by Commission counsel and disclosed to the parties in advance of the witnesses' testimony.

EVIDENCE OF PERSONS INVESTIGATED OR CHARGED

As parties, and persons who were investigated and charged with respect to allegations of child sexual abuse, both Father Charles MacDonald and Jacques Leduc were invited to provide evidence at this stage of the Inquiry. As noted earlier, they would not be asked about the facts underlying the allegations, investigations, or charges but rather, would be asked to comment on the conduct of the institutions that had dealt with them. Both declined.

Because of his position as a priest in the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, an overview of documentary evidence was prepared for Father MacDonald and filed as an exhibit during the institutional response evidence. Several additional overviews were prepared for deceased persons who had been investigated or charged. As these individuals were employees of public institutions that were parties before the Inquiry, the overviews were entered during the institutional response evidence.

Commission counsel contacted many other individuals who had been investigated or charged. All declined to provide evidence. As a further step, Commission counsel attempted to provide notice to all persons investigated or charged who were discussed during the Inquiry hearings.

EMPLOYEES AND OFFICIALS FROM INSTITUTIONS

With this category of witnesses, Commission counsel shared with counsel for each of the institutional parties a list of witnesses it wished to interview as a part of that institution's response evidence. Counsel was also asked for its input on the list of witnesses. In most cases, counsel were of assistance in scheduling meetings with possible witnesses. Counsel for witnesses were also in attendance at the preparatory meetings.

As for victim and alleged victim witnesses, AEs were prepared by Commission counsel and disclosed to the parties in advance of the witnesses' testimony. On occasion, there was some friction between Commission counsel and counsel for the witnesses in terms of the language of the AEs. While Commission counsel considered and often incorporated comments from counsel on a draft copy, the AE was a Commission document. Commission counsel therefore made the final decision on its wording.

I had mistakenly thought that the institutional response evidence would progress more rapidly than that of the victims and alleged victims. I soon came to realize that testifying about one's involvement in these sensitive matters, even as an employee or official of an institution, was difficult for some. As with the victim and alleged victim witnesses, a number of institutional witnesses were unavailable to testify because of medical conditions. In some cases, motions were brought to excuse the witnesses.⁷⁴

Additional Documents Prepared and Disclosed to the Parties

AREAS TO BE CANVASSED

On occasion, the Commission had to call a witness who was unwilling to meet with Commission counsel in advance of appearing at the Inquiry to testify. In these cases, Commission counsel prepared a document that set out areas to be canvassed with the witness during the examination-in-chief. This document was provided to counsel to the parties in advance of the witness's testimony to give counsel some notice of what Commission counsel intended to cover with the witness. It was not entered as an exhibit.

OVERVIEWS OF DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE

It is always preferable to have viva voce evidence. Over the course of this Inquiry, however, we found that for any number of reasons, such as medical conditions, concern about re-victimization, or death, witnesses may not be available to testify. When Commission counsel determined that the evidence of an otherwise unavailable witness was of sufficient significance to justify drawing it out in documentary form, Commission counsel prepared an overview of documentary evidence.

The overview document outlined a sequence or summary of events related to a particular individual, and its focus was the individual's contact with various public institutions. It was drafted in a neutral fashion. The source of the information included in the overview was the relevant documents that had been produced by the Commission, and these documents were appended to the overview. The overview of documentary evidence was read into the record and the appended documents were made exhibits.

There were a number of reasons for preparing the overviews. First, they were to provide me with a starting point to review the appended evidence. Second, they were to assist the parties in identifying relevant evidence from our database in relation to the institutional response, and thereby to better understand the scope of the issues and themes that would be examined during that stage. This would help maximize efficiency, fairness, and thoroughness. Finally, the overviews were to assist the public in following the evidence.

When Commission counsel first proposed to present an overview of documentary evidence, it was with respect to C-3, an individual who had reported to a number of public institutions that he had been abused when he was a young person. For medical and other reasons, he was unavailable to testify. One party brought a motion objecting to the overview being made an exhibit. I ruled that I had the authority to receive overviews of evidence, that there was no prejudice in entering the overview as an exhibit, and that it should be entered as an exhibit for reasons of transparency and openness, so that, subject to any confidentiality measures in place, it was available for all to review.⁷⁵ I placed an important caveat in my reasons, which was that the evidentiary value of the overview was admittedly less than that of the documents used in its preparation, and in the case of conflict between the overview of C-3 and the documents, the content of the documents would clearly prevail.

In making any findings for the purpose of my Report, I always relied on the actual documents appended to the overview of documentary evidence, along with other evidence, rather than on the text of the overview itself.

A draft of the overview was always circulated to counsel for the parties for comment. Commission counsel would review the comments and make those changes they thought were appropriate. Counsel for the parties may not always have been completely satisfied with the final version. The caveat that the evidentiary value of the overview was less than that of the documents used in its preparation served to quell some of their concerns.

Twelve overviews were prepared over the course of the Inquiry. While they were certainly not a substitute for viva voce evidence, I found them to be of assistance to me. I am hopeful that they were also of assistance to the parties and the public.

The need for an overview for Mr. Perry Dunlop was identified after he was found in contempt. Several efforts were made by Commission counsel, and by counsel to the parties, to draft an overview document that would be acceptable to all parties concerned. Despite repeated efforts and much discussion with counsel for the parties, consensus was never achieved. No overview of documentary evidence was finalized or filed. The parties were advised that there would be no overview, and they were invited to address any issues arising in respect of Mr. Dunlop and his interactions with all public institutions in their final submissions.

75. Appendix K23, Ruling in Relation to the Overview of Documentary Evidence of C-3, May 29, 2007.

TESTIMONY FACILITATION OUTLINE/OVERVIEW

A facilitation outline was prepared for Mr. Tom O'Brien, who was a former executive director of the Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry. Mr. O'Brien had a number of medical conditions that prevented him from testifying for any great length of time. A number of parties agreed that hearing from Mr. O'Brien was important. As a result, it was necessary to expedite his testimony as much as possible, while still ensuring that it was thorough and that the parties had an opportunity to cross-examine.

To reduce the time required for examination-in-chief and to set out key themes and issues, Commission counsel prepared a document that included both an overview of the relevant documentary evidence and an outline of the witness's recollections. Documents referred to within the facilitation overview were referenced. When the source of the information was the witness's recollection, it was indicated as such.

Keeping in mind the limited time Mr. O'Brien had to testify, the facilitation overview was read into the record in the absence of the witness and entered as an exhibit. Mr. O'Brien then attended, was sworn, and adopted the content of the document. Commission counsel proceeded to examine him in-chief on several areas and cross-examination by the parties continued as usual, subject to the medical accommodations he required.

FACTUAL OVERVIEWS

Another form of document that was prepared and filed as an exhibit before the Commission was a factual overview. The Order-in-Council establishing the Inquiry provides that "[t]he Commission may, to the extent it considers advisable, refer to and rely on ... factual overview reports prepared by any party."⁷⁶ Factual overviews were documents prepared by parties, not the Commission.

There were two factual overviews prepared and filed in these proceedings. The Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services prepared a factual overview that was intended to bring together in one document an inventory of policies and procedures by which the Ministry governed its institutional response to allegations of abuse. As well, it was to provide some very specific instances of how allegations were handled, including when people came forward with allegations, what they said, how they were dealt with, and to whom they were referred.⁷⁷

76. Appendix A1, s. 5(b).

A factual overview was also prepared by the Catholic District School Board of Eastern Ontario (CDSBEO). It addressed historical information concerning former employees and students of the Board, as well as its predecessor, the English section of the former Stormont, Dundas & Glengarry County Roman Catholic Separate School Board, and the institutional responses to allegations of historical abuse as contained in the CDSBEO files and Board records.

Summonses and Search Warrants

Summonses and Search Warrants Generally

The *Public Inquiries Act*⁷⁸ empowers a commission to issue summonses to witnesses. The Inquiry's Rules of Practice and Procedure also provided that "[w]itnesses may request that the Commission hear evidence pursuant to a summons, in which case a summons shall be issued."⁷⁹

Summonses were offered to all witnesses.⁸⁰ In some cases, a summons was important to facilitate a witness's attendance because the conduct money received upon service of the summons would help to offset any expense the witness would incur as a result of attending. For some witnesses, summonses were also required to justify their absence from work, although many institutional witnesses indicated that they did not require one. There were also a number of witnesses who were served because we had some concern that they would not attend and wanted to ensure that they did.

All witnesses who received summonses appeared or provided a lawful excuse for their non-appearance, save and except Mr. Perry Dunlop. On a few occasions, the Commission summonsed persons to attend at the Commission offices to produce documents. There was no need for the individual to appear as a witness; the Commission was simply seeking the production of the documents. When summonses are related to the production of documents only, any concern counsel may have with regard to the necessity of the individual to attend as a witness will be alleviated. Any stress on the part of the individual served will also be mitigated.

Pursuant to the Public Inquiries Act, the Commission also had the power to seek search warrants from the Ontario Superior Court of Justice.⁸¹ No search warrants were executed over the course of the Inquiry.

Perry Dunlop: Summons and Contempt Proceedings

Unfortunately, efforts made to have Perry Dunlop voluntarily attend to give evidence before the Commission were unsuccessful. Because I was of the view that the Mr. Dunlop and his wife, Helen, were clearly involved in and concerned with the events that gave rise to the calling of this Inquiry, I directed Commission counsel to take steps to have them summonsed in their home province of British Columbia. This required applying to the Ontario Divisional Court for an order pursuant to section 5 of the *Interprovincial Summonses Act*⁸² to have the summonses certified.⁸³ The Supreme Court of British Columbia then adopted the summonses pursuant to section 2 of the Subpoena (Interprovincial) Act.⁸⁴ The Dunlops were to appear before the Commission on September 17, 2007.

After the summonses were served, staff of the Commission began communicating with Helen Dunlop for the purpose of assisting the Dunlops in making travel and other arrangements to come to Cornwall to give evidence before the Commission. Lead Commission counsel offered to meet with the Dunlops in British Columbia or Cornwall to prepare their evidence and to assist them in finding counsel should they so wish. Commission counsel also offered to make a request that the Commissioner make a recommendation to the Attorney General that the Dunlops be represented at the Inquiry by a lawyer of their choice and that this lawyer be funded by the government.

In advance of their testimony, the Dunlops were provided with a document that covered many of the points that Commission counsel intended to cover with Perry Dunlop during his examination-in-chief.

The Dunlops refused Commission counsel's offer to meet in British Columbia or in Ontario. On September 17, 2007, the Dunlops arrived at the Commission. Mr. Dunlop took the stand, was affirmed, and read a prepared statement. He then refused to answer any questions asked of him by Commission counsel. I gave Perry Dunlop an opportunity to reconsider his refusal to testify and asked him to reappear the following day. He did appear, but again indicated that he was not prepared to answer any questions. He also refused my offer of seeking independent legal advice.

On September 19, 2007, and September 20, 2007, Perry Dunlop attended the Commission during the examination and cross-examination of his wife. I asked him to re-attend the next day to resolve the issue of his testimony. On September 21, 2007, Perry Dunlop again took the stand. On this occasion, he advised that he was not prepared to answer questions at that time, but requested leave to obtain independent legal advice about his options. I granted him this opportunity and ordered him to return on October 9, 2007.

To allow Perry Dunlop to remain at home and make whatever arrangements were necessary to minimize the impact on him and his children, I directed Commission counsel to travel to British Columbia to prepare Perry Dunlop. Commission counsel communicated with Helen Dunlop by e-mail about meeting with her husband in British Columbia. Helen Dunlop indicated that they were seeking legal advice and either she or their lawyer would contact Commission counsel. Helen Dunlop was also communicating with Commission staff about travel and other arrangements for herself and her husband to return to Cornwall on October 9, 2007.

As the date of October 9, 2007, approached, Commission counsel had still not received a response to their offer to meet with Perry Dunlop in advance of his testimony. In correspondence with the Dunlops, Commission counsel indicated that if Perry Dunlop did not intend to testify for medical and/or other reasons, or if he required a postponement, that he advise the Commission at that time, before significant funds were expended on travel arrangements. Commission counsel also outlined that the Commission's participants and service providers required notice of the Commission's schedule, and should hearing time become available, the Commission would like to be able to use that time by hearing from other witnesses. Without notice of Perry Dunlop's intentions, hearing time might be lost. Helen Dunlop replied, among other things, that she had not yet heard from their lawyer and would contact Commission counsel when she had.

On October 5, 2007, the last business day before Mr. Dunlop was to attend to testify before the Inquiry, his counsel brought a motion in the Supreme Court of British Columbia for an order:

- a) Declaring void ab initio the Summons issued against Perry Dunlop by the Ontario Superior Court of Justice dated August 21, 2007 and which the Supreme Court of British Columbia adopted as an Order of that Court, by Order dated August 27, 2007 (the “Interprovincial Summons”);
- b) Setting aside the Order of August 27, 2007;
- c) Staying the Order of August 27, 2007 until a full hearing of the application.

Justice Smart of the Supreme Court of British Columbia dismissed Perry Dunlop’s motion in oral reasons delivered late on October 5, 2007.⁸⁵

On October 9, 2007, Perry Dunlop attended before the Commission. After taking the stand, Perry Dunlop advised that he had sought legal advice. He was permitted to read a prepared statement, at the end of which he indicated that he would testify by reading his will-state (prepared in 2000) into evidence. He indicated that he was not prepared to answer the questions of Commission counsel and other counsel and to fully participate as a witness in the Inquiry. I did not allow him to simply read his will-state and not be examined and cross-examined. As discussed earlier, public inquiries have a fact-finding function. This function would surely not be served if questions could not be asked of him and if his evidence could not be tested by cross-examination.

Following Perry Dunlop’s refusal to answer questions before the Inquiry, a case was stated to the Divisional Court. The Court issued oral reasons on November 19, 2007, culminating in the order of December 7, 2007. In finding Perry Dunlop guilty of civil contempt for refusing to answer questions before the Commission, the Court stated the following:

Mr. Dunlop has given no legal reason for his refusal to answer questions. He refused to answer questions because he said that he has no faith in the Ontario justice system or the mandate of the inquiry; he is a “scapegoat”; the process is a cover-up; he was forced to appear against his will; and he could add nothing to his “will state”. In our view, he has provided no lawful excuse for his refusal to answer relevant questions.⁸⁶

Mr. Dunlop was ordered to reappear on January 14, 2008, to answer questions asked by Commission counsel and counsel for parties with standing. He was also ordered to attend before the Divisional Court to deal with the appropriate punishment.

Mr. Dunlop did not appear before the Commission on January 14, 2008. Nor did he appear before the Divisional Court for sentencing on January 28, 2008, as ordered. On January 28, 2008, the Divisional Court issued a warrant for Mr. Dunlop's arrest and made an order requesting the Attorney General's assistance in making submissions to the Court regarding criminal contempt for Mr. Dunlop's disobedience of the Court's order that he appear before the Commission on January 14, 2008, and that he appear before the Court for sentencing.⁸⁷

Police gave Mr. Dunlop the opportunity to travel to Ontario voluntarily for his next Court appearance of February 20, 2008. Mr. Dunlop refused the opportunity, insisting that he be arrested.⁸⁸ On February 17, 2008, he was arrested before a large crowd assembled in front of his residence in Duncan, British Columbia.⁸⁹ Mr. Dunlop had orchestrated the time and place of his arrest so that there would be a large public gathering of his supporters and media to witness the arrest and for his supporters to publicly express their disapproval of it.⁹⁰

On February 20, 2008, the Divisional Court convened with Mr. Dunlop present. He was again granted the opportunity to testify before the Inquiry, this time on February 25, 2008. In the court room, in the presence of a full public gallery, Mr. Dunlop once again refused to testify.⁹¹ He has indicated that he would rather go to jail than testify.⁹²

Arguments were made regarding the issue of criminal contempt and the penalty for civil contempt for failing to testify on October 9, 2007. The Court reserved judgment until March 5, 2008. During that time, Mr. Dunlop remained in custody in Ontario.

On March 5, 2008, the Divisional Court offered Mr. Dunlop yet another opportunity to purge his contempt. Again he refused. The Court went on to find Mr. Dunlop guilty of criminal contempt. In its decision, the Court noted that Mr. Dunlop's disobedience of the order of the Court was "open, continuous and flagrant.”⁹³ The Court further explained: “[N]ot only did Mr. Dunlop fail to appear as ordered, he publicized his intention to disobey the order and attacked the integrity of the Commission, bringing the administration of justice into disrepute.”⁹⁴

With respect to the civil contempt, the Court ordered that Mr. Dunlop be imprisoned for six months. If Mr. Dunlop purged his contempt prior to the end of that period, he could apply to the Court for an immediate release from custody. The Divisional Court further ordered that Mr. Dunlop appear before the Court upon the completion of the six-month sentence to be sentenced for criminal contempt.

Mr. Dunlop did not take the opportunity to purge his contempt, and on September 3, 2008, he was sentenced to a further thirty days incarceration for criminal contempt consecutive to his sentence for civil contempt.⁹⁵ At his initial request, Mr. Dunlop served much, if not all, of his sentence in protective segregated custody because of his status as a former police officer.

Throughout his time in custody, it was always open to Mr. Dunlop to agree to testify and thus to end his period of incarceration.

The Commission, parties, and, I think it fair to say, many members of the community were of the view that the evidence of Perry Dunlop would have assisted the Inquiry in completing its work. Unfortunately, we did not have the benefit of his testimony.

Notices of Alleged Misconduct

Given that one of the roles of an inquiry is to examine what happened and what went wrong, a Commissioner may well make findings in his report that will indicate wrongdoing on the part of an individual or institution.

The Public Inquiries Act provides: “No finding of misconduct on the part of any person shall be made against the person in any report of a commission after an inquiry unless that person had reasonable notice of the substance of the alleged misconduct and was allowed full opportunity during the inquiry to be heard in person or by counsel.”⁹⁶ The purpose of the notice is to provide the witness with a chance to respond to matters contained therein.

Because my mandate required me to inquire into and report on the institutional response of the justice system and other public institutions, I would make findings of misconduct only in relation to those institutions and their employees and officials. When I had determined that I might make such findings, the goal was to serve the institutional witness with a notice of alleged misconduct before he or she testified. In most cases, we were successful on this front. Witnesses who were not served in advance still had the right to be heard and to address the matters raised in the notice.

Some notices were amended after witnesses testified. In a few cases, parties asked for more details of the alleged misconduct and, on occasion, notices of misconduct were slightly amended.

Consistent with long-standing public inquiry practice, the identity of any person served with a notice of alleged misconduct was confidential.

Hearing Room and Facilities

As I explained earlier, the Commission's offices and hearing room were located in a designated historic building, referred to as the Weave Shed, which had once served as a cotton mill. This building contained sufficient vacant space to accommodate all of the Commission's offices. Some renovations were required and as the building is a historic site, applications were required before any changes could be made to ensure that the proposed changes respected the property's heritage value. Along the way, we found that we needed to expand our office space to include more meeting rooms for counsel meetings, witness preparation, and witness support.

The Weave Shed also contained a small auditorium suitable for holding ninety to one hundred members of the public. This auditorium, the Weave Shed Arts Theatre, had once been used for live music and theatre performances. With some modifications, it became the hearings room.

To prepare this room for the hearings, very few structural changes were required. A dais was added to provide seating for me, as well as for the clerk and reporters. Counsel tables were also added. One room, which was adjoined to the hearings room, housed the documents and exhibits. Two additional rooms were constructed within the hearings room to accommodate the media and the interpreters. A table was added to facilitate the work of the audiovisual technician.

All counsel tables, my seat, and that of the witness, clerk, court reporters, interpreters, and media were equipped with monitors that displayed the exhibits electronically. Two large monitors positioned in front of the public seating area also permitted the public to view these documents. When documents were stored in SUPERText, the document management software program we used, they were assigned unique document and Bates page numbers. Counsel were required to refer to documents by way of these unique identifiers. This was a bit of an adjustment for everyone, but it permitted the clerk to more easily locate the documents and display them on the monitors for all to see. On occasion, documents were not displayed on the public monitors due to confidentiality concerns.

A podium equipped with a microphone was placed at the front of the hearings room. It was only from this podium that counsel were permitted to communicate with me and examine witnesses.

A further use of the hearings room was to hold all counsel meetings. While at first these meetings were held in the boardroom in the Commission offices, the number of counsel soon exceeded the space. Counsel who were not able to attend in person were invited to do so by conference call.

These meetings were facilitated by Commission counsel to provide updates and discuss outstanding procedural issues. Prior to each meeting, an agenda would be circulated to the parties. For the most part, these meetings were useful in resolving matters without the need to take up valuable hearing time.

Records of the Proceedings

The Inquiry proceedings were recorded by two methods: the webcast and transcription.

From the webcast, a master set of tapes of the Inquiry proceedings and a CD copy set were retained by the Commission. The public and in camera tapes were stored separately. Over the course of the Inquiry, we received a number of requests for certain portions of the recorded webcast. Each request was considered individually and consistently by the Commission's Executive Committee. No requests were made for in camera sessions. In each case, the request was granted, with the requestor agreeing that the DVD copy was to be used only for research and review purposes and not to be rebroadcast or reproduced without obtaining the prior written permission of both the Commission and the witness, through the Commission. A fee was set that would cover the cost of the DVD plus time to duplicate.

The public and in camera tapes will be stored separately once archived, and the record schedules will identify whether they are public or in camera sessions. The in camera sessions will be archived with specific access instructions.

The Inquiry proceedings were transcribed daily by competent and dedicated court reporters. Like many of the counsel, they travelled from outside Cornwall to do their work in the hearings room. The transcripts were completed at the end of each day and posted to the Commission website. As with the tapes of the webcast, the transcripts of the public and in camera sessions were stored separately and will be archived in the same manner.

Conduct of the Hearings

Commissioner's Statements

As I indicated earlier, I did not give interviews to the media. I did make statements. The text of these statements was posted separately on the website, as well as being included in the body of the daily transcripts.⁹⁷ I made these statements at the start and finish of the Inquiry, before and after certain lengthy breaks, and regularly throughout to provide updates of our progress and roadmaps of our next steps. I also made statements to announce various Phase 2 work and updates.

Opening and Closing Statements

Parties were invited to provide written and oral opening statements. I asked that these statements outline the major principles that the parties submitted should guide the Inquiry process and the specific factual issues raised by the mandate.⁹⁸

The opening statements were delivered orally on October 3, 2006, and October 4, 2006. This was immediately prior to the calling of the first witness in the victim and alleged victim stage of the hearings. Commission counsel also provided an opening statement.

Parties were also invited to provide written and oral closing statements. The closing submissions would provide the parties with the opportunity to express their views on the key findings and conclusions that flowed from the evidentiary record as well as to suggest changes in policies and practices that could improve responses to allegations of abuse.

The amended Order-in-Council provided that the closing submissions were to be completed by February 27, 2009, less than one month after the conclusion of the evidentiary hearings. Working backward from this date, I asked that parties provide their written closing submissions by February 19, 2009.

On January 21, 2009, a motion was brought requesting that the deadlines for written and oral closing statements be extended by approximately one month. Many parties supported the motion, expressing concern that given the length of the Inquiry and the volume of materials to examine, there was not sufficient time to prepare comprehensive and thoughtful submissions.

I agreed to make a recommendation to the Attorney General on behalf of the parties that a thirty-day extension be granted to allow for the proper completion of the closing submissions. In my recommendation to the Minister, I indicated my view that the request for an extension was reasonable, particularly given the fact

97. These statements are also contained in Appendix P.

98. Appendix C4, Notice to Parties: Opening Statements, February 1, 2006.

that counsel had, out of necessity, focused their full attention on the hearing since the amended Order-in-Council.⁹⁹ The Attorney General denied the request.¹⁰⁰

Accordingly, closing submissions were delivered orally from February 23, 2009, to February 27, 2009. I asked parties to adhere to a two-hour time limit, although in scheduling, some parties were given less time based on the degree of their interests.

Party counsel worked tirelessly to complete written submissions in the time allowed. An extension would have been helpful for the parties and for me.

The written submissions were posted to the Commission's website. Parties were asked to create an executive summary of no more than ten pages to accompany their submissions. The executive summary, which was also posted on the website, was to assist the public in reviewing the submissions. Commission counsel did not provide a closing statement.

With respect to Phase 2, the public was also invited to provide written closing submissions. A total of fifteen individuals and organizations took this opportunity before the deadline of February 12, 2009.

Hearings Schedule

One of the realities of holding the Inquiry hearings in Cornwall was that most people had to travel. This would put a great toll on all concerned, from lawyers to interpreters and Commission staff. Knowing that this would not be a six-month Inquiry, I thought it best to begin by setting a pace that would permit those involved to be home on Fridays and travel on Mondays. Hearings generally ran for two consecutive weeks, followed by one week off. Issues would occasionally arise that would cause us to modify the schedule.

When setting this initial schedule, I was keeping in mind that travel wears people down. I was also keeping in mind the subject matter of the Inquiry. One of the important points learned from the experts was the effect of vicarious trauma. As explained so well by Dr. Peter Jaffe, one of the Commission's context-setting experts, professionals who work closely in the area of child sexual abuse, meeting with victims or investigating these matters, can be traumatized by the work. They may experience the same sense of depression, hopelessness, and helplessness that victims feel, and they may feel overwhelmed. As Commissioner, I considered it my responsibility to see to the mental and physical well-being of those testifying and also of those participating at the Inquiry as counsel and staff.

99. Appendix Q1, Letter, G. Normand Glaude, Commissioner, to the Honourable Chris Bentley, Attorney General, January 21, 2009.

100. Appendix Q2, Letter, Mark Leach, Assistant Deputy Attorney General, to G. Normand Glaude, Commissioner, January 26, 2009.

Accordingly, I chose to begin slowly and expected that the evidence would speed up once we got to the institutions. While it did, I found that in some cases institutional witnesses were fragile as well.

Beginning in mid-November 2007, once the evidence of victims and alleged victims was completed, we began to increase the sitting time, sitting five straight weeks until the Christmas break of that year. In 2008, we often sat five days per week rather than four, and in the summer of that year, I increased the number of consecutive hearings weeks.

During the fall of 2008, we received the amended Order-in-Council that required the evidence to be completed by January 30, 2009. While we had been working toward an end, this deadline forced the work of the Inquiry to move ahead at a rapid pace. We had virtually no breaks, and the hearings days were often extended into the evenings. This, I regret to say, was all too exhausting a pace for all concerned but was necessary to meet our new deadline.

Evidence and Examinations

Documents for the Parties and Hearings Room

Prior to a witness being called to testify, the parties would be provided with an AE and a list of documents. This was a relatively exhaustive list that included the set of documents used to prepare the witness, as well as those documents to which Commission counsel was likely to refer or to enter as exhibits during the examination-in-chief.¹⁰¹

In accordance with Rule 37, parties were required, at the earliest opportunity, to provide Commission counsel with any documents that they intended to file as exhibits or otherwise refer to during the hearings, and in any event, to do so no later than twenty-four hours prior to the day the document was to be referred to or filed.¹⁰²

Rule 38 stated that a party who believed that Commission counsel had not provided copies of relevant documents was required bring this to the attention of Commission counsel at the earliest opportunity. This was to prevent witnesses from being surprised with a relevant document that they had not had an opportunity to examine prior to their testimony. If Commission counsel decided the document was not relevant, it need not be produced. The document could still, however, be used in cross-examination by any of the parties. To do so, forty-eight hours notice was required.¹⁰³ In practice, counsel for the parties would submit a list of documents to which they expected to refer in the hearings room for the purposes of their

101. Appendix B, Rule 36.

102. Ibid., Rule 37.

103. Ibid., Rule 38.

cross-examination. Commission counsel would make their best efforts to ensure that the witness had reviewed all documents on both lists prior to testifying.

The lists of documents prepared by Commission counsel and counsel for the parties were compiled by the document management administrator and her staff. They worked very hard, on tight timelines, to prepare appropriate numbers of copies for the hearings room.

Because Commission staff prepared the documents, in practice, there was some overlap between Rules 37 and 38. The Commission generally required the parties to provide their lists of documents forty-eight hours in advance. In most cases, however, even if notice was provided twenty-four hours in advance, the documents would be prepared by Commission staff. If sufficient notice was not provided, the party was required to bring the necessary number of copies for use in the hearings room.

Nature of Examinations

RULES

Matters of evidence and procedure were covered in the Rules of Practice and Procedure.¹⁰⁴ In the ordinary course, Commission counsel called and questioned witnesses who appeared before the Inquiry. Commission counsel were permitted to adduce the evidence by way of leading and non-leading questions.

Following the examination-in-chief, parties with standing would then have the right cross-examine the witness to the extent of their interest. Early on in the hearings, the parties came to an agreement as to the order of cross-examination. From time to time, based upon the circumstances, the parties would agree to a variation of that order.

Counsel for a witness, regardless of whether or not that counsel was also representing a party, examined last.¹⁰⁵ Commission counsel then had the right to re-examine the witness.

For the most part, the process surrounding the examination of witnesses ran relatively smoothly. There were, however, a few issues that we addressed along the way.

Because of the number of parties, I insisted that parties strive not be duplicative in the cross-examination of a witness. We needed to use the hearings time efficiently and effectively, so if an area had already been covered by a previous party, I instructed counsel to move on to their next area.

104. Ibid., Rules 12–45.

105. In accordance with Rule 12, counsel for a party may apply to the Commissioner for permission to lead a particular witness's evidence-in-chief. If permission was granted, counsel would have the right to re-examine the witness. This did not happen during the course of the Inquiry.

Another area that deserves noting relates to the right of a party to examine its own witness. As I just indicated, counsel for a witness examined last. From time to time, counsel took this to mean that they were entitled to cross-examine their own witness. This was based on the notion that all of the witnesses were the Commission's witnesses because they were leading the evidence. When this was argued, I permitted counsel for parties to ask leading questions of their own clients, but advised that I would give the evidence less weight. This occasionally lengthened the examinations.

In hindsight, the rule on examination of one's own witness should have been more explicit. I thought that it was clear, as I know of no judicial or quasi-judicial proceedings in which counsel have the right, except in specific circumstances such as a hostile witness, to cross-examine their own client(s). Given the extra time this took and the extremely limited value of the answers, I recommend that future inquiries state very clearly in their Rules that no matter who actually leads the evidence of the witness, counsel for that party and/or witness not be allowed to cross-examine in such circumstances.

DIRECTIONS ON PROCESS

Public inquiries are not intended to be adversarial in nature. Despite this, at times, they take on an adversarial tone. I think this is probably inevitable. While Commissioners cannot make any findings of civil or criminal liability, they may make findings of misconduct. Reputations may be tarnished, and counsel for parties are entrusted with protecting the reputations of their clients.

The adversarial tone I speak of plays out in the hearings room, where witnesses are examined and cross-examined. For any witness, this may be difficult, but it may be acutely difficult for a victim or alleged victim of child sexual abuse. It was important for me that the Inquiry proceed in a way that respected the challenges associated with testifying, and helped to minimize the possible negative effects, all the while ensuring that the principles of fairness were met.

Accordingly, following a cross-examination that was particularly difficult for a witness, I considered it important to issue some directions on our process. I set out the following process obligations:¹⁰⁶

Witnesses

- Witnesses will be asked to cover more areas in their examination-in-chief.
- Witnesses should be given in advance the documents that will be used in cross-examination, in order to maximize their comfort level.

106. Appendix K18, Directions on Process, February 20, 2007.

- Witnesses need to spend more time with Commission counsel to review the vast number of documents related to them.

Parties

- Counsel should focus on the issues that pertain to institutional responses as they affect their clients.
- Counsel for the parties will need to be more specific about the areas to be covered in cross-examination.
- Full adherence to the Rules of Practice and Procedure is required. Parties must provide their lists of documents in a timely fashion to permit an opportunity for witnesses to review them.
- Counsel needs to be prepared to explain the relevance of cross-examination and why it is needed when asked by the Commissioner or as a result of an objection.
- Counsel should exercise discretion and good judgment in deciding to address personal opinions or impressions, and if they do so, to focus on the underlying reasons for the opinion or impression.

Commission counsel

- Commission counsel must lead more of the evidence in examination-in-chief and anticipate questions on cross-examination.
- Given that the parties will be providing more documents in advance, Commission counsel should review these documents with witnesses prior to their taking the stand.
- Commission counsel must carefully monitor to ensure that questions posed to the witnesses are relevant.

In this ruling, I indicated that I would be vigilant in ensuring that the process was fair to all concerned, which might necessitate greater intervention than I had made in the past.

I also indicated that I would be clearer on the scope of the permitted examination.

RECOMMENDATIONS FROM WITNESSES

I wanted to hear all perspectives and insights as to the operation of the justice system and involved public institutions. To help gather this information, Commission counsel made it a practice to ask all witnesses at the end of their examination-in-chief whether, based on their own experiences, they had any recommendations for me to consider in preparing my Report. I found many witnesses to be very thoughtful in their responses to this question.

Confidentiality Issues

As at the disclosure stage, addressing confidentiality issues in the hearings room was an important, but time-consuming, part of the Commission's work.

The Order-in-Council (April 14, 2005) provides: "The Commission shall ensure that the disclosure of evidence and other materials balances the public interest, the principle of open hearings, and the privacy interests of the person(s) affected, taking into account any legal requirements."¹⁰⁷ This balancing exercise posed unique and ongoing challenges. Public inquiries, by their very nature, are intended to be open and public, but there are limits. This is recognized in section 4 of the Public Inquiries Act.¹⁰⁸

As the hearings proceeded, we encountered a number of confidentiality related issues.

PRE-EXISTING PUBLICATION BANS

There were pre-existing publication bans that arose from previous court proceedings. These publication bans limited the information, mainly the names of victims and alleged victims of child sexual abuse, that could be made public. We were, of course, obliged to respect those bans within the context of the Inquiry process. In several cases, however, witnesses who were victims or alleged victims wished to have the ban on their names lifted. The Ministry of the Attorney General with the assistance of Commission counsel brought motions to the Ontario Superior Court of Justice to have these bans lifted.

YOUTH CRIMINAL JUSTICE RECORDS

As was mentioned earlier, there were also records subject to the provisions of the Youth Criminal Justice Act. To use these documents in the hearings room, motions were brought jointly by the Commission and the Ministry of the Attorney General. The consent of the individual to whom the records pertained was required. Orders were granted providing that the relevant records could be used for the purpose of the Inquiry, including being tendered as evidence for the public record of the proceedings.

CONFIDENTIALITY MEASURES FOR WITNESSES AND OTHERS

The Commission's Rules of Practice and Procedure set out Rules to address issues of confidentiality.¹⁰⁹ Rule 39, for example, provided that I might:

107. Appendix A1.

108. R.S.O. 1990, c. P41, s. 4.

109. Appendix B, Rules 39–45.

... conduct hearings in private, and/or issue orders prohibiting the disclosure, publication, broadcast or communication of any testimony, document or evidence, when ... [I was] of the opinion that intimate medical or personal matters, or other matters, ... [were] of such a nature, having regard to the circumstances, that the desirability of avoiding disclosure outweighs the desirability of adhering to the general principle that the hearings should be open to the public.¹¹⁰

In dealing with issues relating to the non-publication of certain information, I applied the Dagenais/Mentuck test as set out by the Supreme Court of Canada.¹¹¹

The Commission's Rules also provided that a witness could apply for measures aimed at protecting his or her identity.¹¹² When I agreed that some form of confidentiality measure was appropriate, the usual course was to identify the witness by a moniker.

Because the issue of the protection of the names of victims and alleged victims, some of whom had never come forward to the Commission, was raised on a number of occasions, I issued some directions on process.¹¹³ These directions applied to the following scenarios:

1. requests for confidentiality made on behalf of victims or alleged victims who had specifically communicated that they did not want their identities to be made public; and
2. requests for confidentiality on behalf of victims or alleged victims who had not communicated, whatever the reason, that they did not want their identities to be made public.

In that ruling, I indicated that I saw no reason to limit the application of the Commission's confidentiality rules solely to the situation of a witness seeking confidentiality. In my view, section 3 of the Public Inquiries Act and section 6 of the Order-in-Council were broad enough to authorize similar orders applicable to persons other than witnesses. Accordingly, on occasion, monikers were also granted to protect the confidentiality of individuals who were not witnesses but who fit the categories listed above.

110. Ibid., Rule 39.

111. Dagenais v. Canadian Broadcasting Corp., [1994] 3 S.C.R. 835; R. v. Mentuck, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 442. Summarized in Toronto Star Newspapers Ltd. v. Ontario, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 188 at paras. 9, 10, and 26–31.

112. Appendix B, Rule 40.

113. Appendix K14.

A list of monikers was available in the hearings room for counsel to ensure that confidentiality was maintained. 133 monikers were issued over the course of the Inquiry. On the very few occasions on which counsel inadvertently mentioned the name of a monikered witness, the transcript was corrected to reflect the moniker. Unfortunately, nothing could be done to correct the webcast. I understand that in the recent Inquiry into Pediatric Forensic Pathology in Ontario,¹¹⁴ the webcast operated on a slight delay, permitting the registrar to cut transmission when counsel misspoke and mentioned a name that had confidentiality measures attached to it. I highly recommend this for all future inquiries using a webcast.

I also granted the request of some witnesses to testify in private. There was some variation in terms of what “in private” meant. Some witnesses wished to testify completely in private. When I agreed that this was appropriate, the public would be excluded from the hearings room and the webcast would be shut down. There were several cases in which the witness was comfortable with the audio stream of the webcast being on but not the video stream, and I accommodated this request.

Two motions were brought to restrict the publication of the names of certain individuals against whom allegations of sexual abuse had been made.¹¹⁵ In each instance, I refused to grant the publication ban, although in the interest of fairness, in one case, I issued a temporary publication ban pending the outcome of a judicial review and appeal. My decision was upheld by the Divisional Court and the Ontario Court of Appeal and as a result the temporary ban was lifted.¹¹⁶ The local media were advised of upcoming requests for publication bans so that they would have the opportunity to participate should they so choose.

ACCESS TO EVIDENCE

The Rules provided that all evidence be categorized and marked P for public sittings and, if necessary, C for sittings in camera and/or under a publication ban.¹¹⁷ Motions were brought to limit public access to, or impose confi-

Witnesses could also request to testify before the Commission in private. In some instances, I allowed witnesses to testify in camera. In these circumstances, the webcam was turned off and the public, other than members of parties that had signed undertakings, was excluded from the hearings room. Several witnesses were willing to testify in the open hearings room but requested that the camera be turned away from them. I granted this request.

Alternative Processes

There were two witnesses who began but were unable to complete their testimony before the Inquiry.

DAVID SILMSER

Mr. David Silmsier is an individual who made allegations of child sexual abuse against a Catholic priest, a probation officer, and a teacher. Given the pivotal role that his settlement played in the events in Cornwall and the questions surrounding that settlement, as well as his interaction with various other public institutions, Mr. Silmsier was an important witness for the Commission to hear from.

Mr. Silmsier completed his examination-in-chief and started his cross-examination. As it was underway, Mr. Silmsier left the stand and did not return due to medical reasons. Five parties had not yet had the opportunity to complete their cross-examination of Mr. Silmsier. Much discussion ensued over how to proceed. Given the unlikelihood that Mr. Silmsier could return to complete his cross-examination, the parties fashioned an alternative process whereby they would essentially provide an oral narrative, referring to documents where appropriate, of the areas on which they would have cross-examined Mr. Silmsier.

As the alternative process was to begin, Mr. Silmsier sent a letter that was addressed to me. The letter was distributed to counsel for the parties, and I heard submissions as to whether I should read the letter and what the next steps should be. Some of the parties argued that Mr. Silmsner's letter raised a number of possibilities: expunging Mr. Silmsner's evidence; asking Mr. Silmsner to reattend; or continuing with the alternative process as planned. I ruled that the best option was to proceed with the alternative process.¹¹⁹ Mr. Silmsner's medical documentation indicated that his appearance to give evidence had worsened his condition and further participation carried a risk of harm. His letter, in my view, reinforced this point. Given all the circumstances and the importance of his evidence, expunging it would have been a great shame. Thus, the alternative process was the best option we had. Hearings time was set aside for this process. At the conclusion of the process, parties still had the opportunity to request that Mr. Silmsner's evidence be expunged. No one did.

Also see Appendix L3, Children's Aid Society of the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry v. Cornwall (Public Inquiry) (2007), 223 O.A.C. 66 (Div. Ct.), in which the Divisional Court ruled that I erred in my decision that certain portions of two exhibits need not be subject to a publication ban even though they contained information that paralleled that contained in the Child Abuse Register.

While not ideal, the alternative process gave counsel for the affected parties an opportunity to provide their submissions on Mr. Silmsner's testimony and to give examples of areas they would have covered with the witness.

RON LEROUX

Mr. Ron Leroux made allegations of child sexual abuse against a number of individuals, including Catholic priests, a bishop, a probation officer, and other community members. One of the alleged victims, C8, testified that he was abused by Mr. Leroux. Mr. Leroux, like Mr. Silmsner, completed his examination-in-chief. While being cross-examined by the first party to do so, Mr. Leroux brought a motion asking to be excused from continuing his testimony for medical reasons and the effect that continuing to testify would have on him. I was satisfied with the medical evidence and excused Mr. Leroux from having to give further testimony before the Inquiry.¹²⁰ A slightly different alternative process was implemented. Counsel were required to prepare a written outline of the areas they intended to cover with the witness. This was then presented orally.

I found it very unfortunate that two significant witnesses were unable to complete their testimony due to medical reasons. As noted, viva voce evidence is preferable.

Similar medical problems existed for important institutional witnesses, such as Sergeant Ron Lefebvre and Constable Heidi Sebalj of the Cornwall Police Service, Ron Wilson of the Cornwall Police Service and the Cornwall Police Services Board, Monsignor McDougald and Father Paul Lapierre of the Diocese of Alexandria-Cornwall, and Detective Constable Don Genier of the Ontario Provincial Police.

Phase 1 Research

Research of several different types was undertaken during the course of the Cornwall Public Inquiry. Contextual research was undertaken in Phase 1. Research papers were prepared by experts with relevant academic and research experience. These papers were intended to assist me in understanding and analyzing the complex and systemic issues that arose in fulfilling my mandate, inform me about the policies and practices of other jurisdictions, and provide certain context for evidence heard in Phase 1 of the Inquiry.

Research was commissioned on the following topics:

- a survey of policies and practices with respect to police responses to complaints of child sex abuse and complaints by adults of historical sexual abuse;
- a survey of policies and practices with respect to child welfare/protection/Children's Aid Society (CAS) responses to complaints of child sexual abuse and complaints by adults of historical childhood sexual abuse when the alleged abuser may have continued contact with children;
- a survey of policies and practices of government or government agency officials with respect to responses to complaints of child sexual abuse and complaints of historical sexual abuse of young persons in the context of provision of government services to young persons, whether those services are provided by employees or volunteers; and
- a survey of policies and practices with respect to response by religious institutions to complaints of child sexual abuse and complaints by adults of historical childhood sexual abuse.

Parties to the Inquiry were given the opportunity to participate in the research agenda. The parties were consulted both in the drafting of the research plan and in the retention of experts. Draft papers were circulated to parties when received, and comments received from the parties were provided to the experts for consideration in finalizing the reports.

Costs

I was always mindful that a public inquiry is an expenditure of public funds. It is in the public interest to manage the costs, while still ensuring that the inquiry is thorough and fulfils its mandate. Justice Linden stated the following about his work on the Ipperwash Inquiry:¹²¹

121. The Honourable Sidney B. Linden, Commissioner, Report of the Ipperwash Inquiry, vol. 3, Inquiry Process (Toronto: Ministry of the Attorney General, 2007), p. 14.

Ultimately, this Inquiry would be measured by its success in meeting its dual mandate of fact finding and making recommendations for the future. However, it was also inevitable and even justifiable that the assessment would take into account the time taken and the costs incurred.

While I, too, hope that this Inquiry will be judged by its findings and recommendations, I expect that the time taken and the costs incurred will not go unnoticed.

This Inquiry had a number of unique features that contributed to additional costs. These features include, but are not limited to, the following:

- Because of the bilingual nature of the community of Cornwall and the participants in the Inquiry, simultaneous interpretation was provided.
- Counselling and witness support programs were recommended from early on in the Inquiry process. In my view, these programs were essential, and the extent to which they were used is a testament to their necessity.
- Additional time was required for the preparation and testimony of vulnerable persons, such as victims and alleged victims, their family members, and some institutional officials who were obviously affected by their involvement in the matters being examined by this Commission.
- As discussed earlier, the subject matter of the proceedings lent itself to additional litigation, and time was required for preparation for motions, judicial reviews, and appeals.
- Additional travel and related expenses were incurred because the Commission offices and hearings room were both located in Cornwall. As I stated earlier, I thought it was important for the Commission offices to be located in Cornwall so that we were accessible to the community. This is unlike the Walkerton and Ipperwash inquiries, each of which had separate Commission offices in Toronto. As a result, when those hearings were not in session, no travel was required.
- The broad scope of the Commission's mandate, including that the alleged institutional response issues spanned decades, resulted in the disclosure of a large volume of documents. Costs were associated with organizing and compiling these documents in a manner that would make them most useful.
- A further consequence of the broad mandate was the need to call a fairly significant number of witnesses. While some may criticize the number of witnesses who were called, it is important to note that there were many more individuals who wanted to testify. Commission counsel had to screen out witnesses who were not considered absolutely necessary to the mandate.

- The large number of parties also contributed to the expense of the Inquiry. Some may say that I allowed too many parties to participate. Having said this, I applied long-standing legal tests on standing applications. Parties met those standards. In my view, it is not a question of too many parties but another indication of the broad mandate of the Order-in-Council.

I had hoped that this Inquiry would take less time and use fewer financial and human resources, but I had made a commitment to look at the facts and issues thoroughly. Increased time and costs are a natural consequence of a public inquiry with the unique features I have described.

Report

The original Order-in-Council establishing the Cornwall Public Inquiry did not contain a date for the delivery of my final Report. We nonetheless went about the work of the Inquiry as quickly and efficiently as possible, all the while keeping in mind the need to be thorough. On October 22, 2008, the Order-in-Council was amended to include a firm end date to the work of the Inquiry.¹²² It directed that all evidence must be received by no later than January 30, 2009. All other activities, with the exception of counselling support in place as of the date of the Order, must also conclude by January 30, 2009. Closing submissions were to be completed by February 27, 2009, and the report delivered by no later than July 31, 2009.

In accordance with this, on February 27, 2009, the final closing submissions from the parties were delivered and I made some brief closing comments. In some ways, my work was just beginning, or at least a new chapter of it was beginning. My full attention could now be given to the actual writing of the Report.

The Order-in-Council required the Commission to ensure that the Report would be available in both English and French and that sufficient copies of the Report were prepared. The Report also had to be available in electronic form.

The Report is the culmination of the work of the Inquiry. By the end, we had completed 353 hearing days, heard from 177 witnesses,¹²³ and amassed approximately 3,500 exhibits. There was a significant amount of evidence to weigh and consider in writing my Report and making recommendations.

122. Appendix A2, Order-in-Council 1787/2008, October 22, 2008.

123. This number also includes the twelve overviews of documentary evidence that were prepared by Commission counsel. See Appendix E, Witness List.

Writing would take time. On top of this, we would need to set aside adequate time for translation and production. Delivering a comprehensive Report by July 31, 2009, was unrealistic. As a result, I requested an extension for the delivery of my Report until at least October 31, 2009. An extension was granted until October 15, 2009.¹²⁴ A final delivery date of December 15, 2009 was set by Order-in-Council.

In the past, most commissions of inquiry were not given completion dates by governments. More recently, completion dates have been set out in some Orders-in-Council. In this case, the completion dates were imposed part way through the hearing. While the government is free at all times to set dates for the completion of an inquiry, or part thereof, it is preferable that such dates be set out in the Order-in-Council establishing the inquiry.

Wrapping Up

A commission of inquiry is a temporary body. At its conclusion, the infrastructure that is put in place to make it operational must be carefully dismantled.

Our temporary home in the Weave Shed had to be left as we had found it. This required the transfer of office equipment and furniture to other locations and the termination of services such as phone and Internet.

Contracts for service providers were ended, although some new, short-term contacts were necessary for matters related to the production of the Report.

Inquiry records had to be prepared for transfer to the Archives of Ontario. This involved cataloguing, creating record schedules, and determining public access.

The Commission's website will remain operational for a period of two to three months after the release of my Report. It will then be decommissioned and transferred to the Ministry of the Attorney General server. The Commission's website, which will also include the Report, will then be available through the Ministry's website.

Recommendations

Resolution of Interlocutory Matters

1. The Public Inquiries Act should be amended to include a mechanism whereby interlocutory matters, including issues related to solicitor–client privilege, can be resolved expeditiously. This was a recommendation made by Justice Bellamy in the context of the Toronto Computer Leasing Inquiry and the Toronto External Contracts Inquiry, and I agree with her entirely.

Production of Documents

2. The Public Inquiries Act should be amended to formalize the power to summons the production of documents without the need for attendance by a witness. This is also a recommendation made by Justice Bellamy that I support.

Funding for Judicial Review Applications

3. The Ministry of the Attorney General should develop a process to assess funding applications with respect to judicial reviews made by funded parties in an inquiry.

Examination of Witnesses

4. An inquiry's Rules of Practice and Procedure should be clear in providing that counsel for a witness is not permitted, except with permission of the Commissioner, to cross-examine his or her own client(s), no matter who actually leads the evidence of the client/witness.
